

Dictionary OF THE Old Testament Prophets

Editors: Mark J. Boda and J. Gordon McConville

A COMPENDIUM OF CONTEMPORARY BIBLICAL SCHOLARSHIP

Dictionary

OF THE Old Testament

Prophets

Editors:

Mark J. Boda

J. Gordon McConville

 IVP Academic
An imprint of InterVarsity Press
Downers Grove, Illinois

InterVarsity Press

P.O. Box 1400, Downers Grove, IL 60515-1426, USA

World Wide Web: www.ivpress.com

Email: email@ivpress.com

©2012 by InterVarsity Christian Fellowship/USA

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced in any form without written permission from InterVarsity Press.

InterVarsity Press® is the book-publishing division of InterVarsity Christian Fellowship/USA®, a movement of students and faculty active on campus at hundreds of universities, colleges and schools of nursing in the United States of America, and a member movement of the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students. For information about local and regional activities, write Public Relations Dept., InterVarsity Christian Fellowship/USA, 6400 Schroeder Rd., P.O. Box 7895, Madison, WI 53707-7895, or visit the IVCF website at <www.intervarsity.org>.

InterVarsity Press, England, is closely linked with the Universities and Colleges Christian Fellowship, a student movement connecting Christian Unions in universities and colleges throughout Great Britain, and a member movement of the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students. Website: <www.uccf.org.uk>.

All Scripture quotations, unless otherwise indicated, are the author's own translation.

Cover design: Cindy Kiple

Images: The Eternal Father in Glory with Prophets and Sibyls, from Sala dell'Udienza (1496-1500; fresco) by Pietro Perugina at Collegio del Cambio, Italy. Alinari/The Bridgeman Art Library.

ISBN 978-0-8308-9583-0 (digital)

ISBN 978-0-8308-1784-9 (print)

InterVarsity Press

Project Staff

Senior Editor/Project Editor

Daniel G. Reid

Managing Editor

Allison Rieck

Copyeditor

Robert G. Maccini

Editorial &

Administrative Assistants

Rebecca Carhart

Benjamin M. McCoy

Rachel Neftzer Snaveley

Elaina Whittenhall

Design

Cindy Kiple

Typesetters

Gail Munroe

Maureen Tobey

Jeanna Wiggins

Proofreaders

Adam Stevenson

Claire VanderVelde

InterVarsity Press

Publisher

Robert A. Fryling

Associate Publisher for Editorial

Andrew T. Le Peau

Associate Editorial Director

James Hoover

Production Manager

Anne Gerth

Print Coordinator

Jim Erhart

Contents

Preface _____	ix
How to Use This Dictionary _____	xi
Abbreviations _____	xiii
Transliterations _____	xxii
List of Contributors _____	xxiii
Dictionary Articles _____	1
Scripture Index _____	915
Subject Index _____	952
Articles Index _____	966

Preface

It has been both a challenge and a privilege to edit this volume on the Prophets in IVP's highly regarded series of Black Dictionaries on the Bible. The prophetic books represent a large division of the Old Testament canon and contain within them a rich variety of language, literature and ideas. For this reason, they continue to be an area of fast-moving scholarly research, attracting the attention of researchers with a wide range of interests and commitments. They have also been hugely important for theology, and in Christian interpretation have played a major part in attempts to understand the relationship between the Old and New Testaments. All this has made the editing of this volume a particularly rewarding experience.

We have been keenly aware, in approaching and undertaking the work, that some issues in interpreting the prophets are fiercely debated because matters of fundamental importance are perceived to be at stake. This might have posed an acute dilemma. Was it our task to make a case for a particular viewpoint or to try to resolve contentious issues? We believe, however, that it would have been neither possible nor desirable to do this. Instead, we have undertaken to let the volume portray a broad picture of contemporary scholarship on the Prophets. With this in mind, we are glad that we have been joined in the project by scholars from all points on the scholarly spectrum, Jewish as well as Christian.

There are several good reasons for proceeding in this way. First, it signals that we acknowledge and honor the strong commitments of all our contributors and the constituencies they represent. We sincerely hope that the volume will be read in this way, and so as a "whole offering." That is to concede that readers may find some particular article not agreeable to their way of thinking. But we hope it is implied in the range of contributions that no one viewpoint has been allowed a final word. Our contributors have respected all points of view, and all the articles are offered to our readers for their own judgment and further reflection. We think there is a balance overall, and we have no wish to present the work as a contest.

The second reason is simply that contemporary work on the Prophets is extremely varied and complex, and we think it incumbent on us to represent this in a modern dictionary on the subject. In our selection of articles, we have included, of course, articles on the prophetic books themselves, and for the purpose of this volume and series, we have followed the convention of the Christian Old Testament in including the book of Daniel. There are additional articles on the reception history of the four major prophetic books (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Daniel), since reception history is a growth area in biblical study at large. And along with these stands the Book of the Twelve, since the concept of the Twelve “minor prophets” as a “book,” though itself ancient, has come to prominence as an area for research in recent times. We have also included articles on aspects of prophetic language and imagery, on textual and historical topics, on prophetic genres, on hermeneutics, and on important conceptual and theological themes. And finally we have thought it essential to reflect the range of critical methodologies that are in current use. It is in this area especially (though not only here) that the fast-moving nature of research on the Prophets is evident. Though we hesitate to pick out specific articles, the list includes entries on Conversation Analysis, Performance Criticism, and Psychological and Social-Scientific approaches. These simply illustrate how the parameters of a reference work on the Prophets have changed since an earlier generation. Our contributors across the board have worked in this modern context, and we are confident that the Dictionary makes many fresh contributions to scholarship.

A third reason for our approach, following from the preceding, is that the collection in its range and diversity expresses the fact that our understanding of the Prophets, as of Scripture more broadly, is an unfinished work, and that interpretation inescapably involves the hearing of many voices. It is in this spirit that we present the volume to our readers.

We are grateful first to our contributors, who have worked patiently with us over a lengthy period, and responded graciously to editorial suggestion and persuasion. We have learned enormously from them. We are grateful also to Dan Reid, for his scholarly and insightful work with us as editors, as well as his judicious and tactful management of the information flow between editors and contributors, and of the project as a whole. It has been a pleasure to work with him, to say nothing of some excellent breakfasts at SBLs. We are grateful too for the expert copyediting of Robert Maccini.

Mark J. Boda

J. Gordon McConville

How to Use This Dictionary

Abbreviations

Comprehensive tables of abbreviations for general matters as well as for scholarly, biblical and ancient literature may be found on pages xiii-xxii.

Authorship of Articles

The authors of articles are indicated by their first initials and last name at the end of each article. A full list of contributors may be found on pages xxiii-xxvi, in alphabetical order of their last name. The contribution of each author is listed following their identification.

Bibliographies

A bibliography will be found at the end of each article. The bibliographies include works cited in the articles and other significant related works. Bibliographical entries are listed in alphabetical order by the author's name, and where an author has more than one work cited, they are listed by date of publication. In articles focused on the Prophetic Books, the bibliographies are divided into the categories "Commentaries" and "Studies."

Cross-References

This Dictionary has been extensively cross-referenced in order to aid readers in making the most of material appearing throughout the volume. Five types of cross-referencing will be found:

1. One-line entries appearing in alphabetical order throughout the Dictionary direct readers to articles where a topic is discussed, often as a subdivision of an article:

BABYLONIAN EXILE. See EXILE; ISRAELITE HISTORY.

2. An asterisk before a word in the body of an article indicates that an article by that title (or closely worded title) appears in the Dictionary. For example, "*covenant" directs the reader to an article entitled COVENANT. Asterisks typically are found only at the first occurrence of a word in an article. There are few cross-references to articles on prophetic books, since their presence within the Dictionary can be assumed.

3. A cross-reference appearing within parentheses in the body of an article directs the reader to an article by that title. For example, (see God) directs the reader to an article by that title.

4. Cross-references have been appended to the end of articles, immediately preceding the bibliography, to direct readers to articles significantly related to the subject:

See also DESTRUCTION; RETRIBUTION; WARFARE AND DIVINE WARFARE; WRATH.

5. Occasionally references are made to articles in the companion volumes, primarily the Dictionary of the Old Testament: Pentateuch (DOTP), Dictionary of the Old Testament: Historical Books (DOTHB) and Dictionary of the Old Testament: Wisdom, Poetry & Writings (DOTWPW). Others include Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels (DJG), Dictionary of Paul and His Letters (DPL), Dictionary of the Later New Testament and Its Developments (DLNTD) and Dictionary of New Testament Background (DNTB). These references are found within the body of the text of articles. For example, a reference such as (see DOTP, Law) refers to the article on "Law" in the Dictionary of the Old Testament: Pentateuch.

Indexes

Since most of the Dictionary articles cover broad topics in some depth, the Subject Index is intended to assist readers in finding relevant information on narrower topics that might, for instance, appear in a standard Bible dictionary. For example, while there is no article entitled "Darius the Mede," the subject index might direct the reader to pages where Darius the Mede is discussed in the article on "Daniel: Book of."

A Scripture Index is provided to assist readers in gaining quick access to the numerous Scripture texts referred to throughout the Dictionary.

An Articles Index found at the end of the Dictionary allows readers to review quickly the breadth of topics covered and select the ones most apt to serve their interests or needs. Those who wish to identify the articles written by specific contributors should consult the list of contributors, where the articles are listed under the name of each contributor.

Transliteration

Hebrew has been transliterated according to the system set out on page xxii.

Abbreviations

General Abbreviations

//	parallel text	HB	Hebrew Bible
§ or §§	section or paragraph numbers	Heb	Hebrew
Akk	Akkadian	i.e.	id est , that is
Arab	Arabic	lit.	literally
Aram	Aramaic	masc.	masculine
c.	circa	no(s.)	number(s)
cf.	confer , compare	NT	New Testament
chap(s).	chapter(s)	OT	Old Testament
col(s).	column(s)	pace	with all due respect to
contra	against	par.	parallel text(s)
d.	died	passim	in various places
DSS	Dead Sea Scrolls	pl.	plural
e.g.	exempli gratia , for example	r.	reigned
esp.	especially	repr.	reprint
ET	English translation	rev.	reverse (back) of a tablet
fem.	feminine	rev. ed.	revised edition
fig.	figure	sg.	singular
frg(s).	fragment(s)	v(v).	verse(s)
Gk	Greek

Texts and Translations of the Bible

ASV	American Standard Version	NEB	New English Bible
BHQ	Biblia Hebraica Quinta	NET	New English Translation
BHS	Biblia Hebraica Stuttgartensia	NIV	New International Version
ESV	English Standard Version	NJB	New Jerusalem Bible
HCSB	Holman Christian Standard Bible	NJPS	Tanakh: The Holy Scriptures: The New JPS Translation according to the Traditional Hebrew Text
JB	Jerusalem Bible
KJV	King James Version	NKJV	New King James Version
LXX	Septuagint	NLT	New Living Translation
MESSAGE	The Message: The Bible in Contemporary Language	NRSV	New Revised Standard Version
MT	Masoretic Text	REB	Revised English Bible
NAB	New American Bible	TNIV	Today's New International Version
NASB	New American Standard Bible

Books of the Bible

Old Testament	1-2 Kings	Is	Mic	Mk	1-2 Thess
Gen	1-2 Chron	Jer	Nahum	Lk	1-2 Tim
Ex	Ezra	Lam	Hab	Jn	Tit
Lev	Neh	Ezek	Zeph	Acts	Philem
Num	Esther	Dan	Hag	Rom	Heb
Deut	Job	Hos	Zech	1-2 Cor	Jas
Josh	Ps (Pss)	Joel	Mal	Gal	1-2 Pet
Judg	Prov	Amos		Eph	1-2-3 Jn
Ruth	Eccles	Obad	New Testament	Phil	Jude
1-2 Sam	Song	Jon	Mt	Col	Rev

Apocrypha

1-2 Esdr	1-2 Esdras	Sir	Sirach
1-4 Macc	1-4 Maccabees	Tob	Tobit

Old Testament Pseudepigrapha

Ahiqar	Ahiqar	4 Ezra	4 Ezra
Apoc. Ab.	Apocalypse of Abraham	Jub.	Jubilees
Apoc. Zeph.	Apocalypse of Zephaniah	Let. Aris.	Letter of Aristeas
2 Bar.	2 Baruch (Syriac Apocalypse)	Liv. Pro.	Lives of the Prophets
4 Bar.	4 Baruch (Paraleipomena Jeremiou)	Pss. Sol.	Psalms of Solomon
1 En.	1 Enoch (Ethiopic Apocalypse)	T. Sim.	Testament of Simeon

Mishnah, Talmud, and Related Literature

b.	Babylonian Talmud	Mek.	Mekilta
m.	Mishnah	Menah.	Menahot
t.	Tosefta	Mo'ed Qaṭ.	Mo'ed Qatan
y.	Jerusalem Talmud	Naz.	Nazir
		Nid.	Niddah
ʿAbot	ʿAbot	Pe'ah	Pe'ah
ʿArak.	ʿArakin	Pesaḥ.	Pesaḥim
B. Bat.	Baba Batra	Qidd.	Qiddušin
B. Qam.	Baba Qamma	Šabb.	Šabbat
Ber.	Berakot	Sanh.	Sanhedrin
Beṣah	Beṣah	Soṭah	Soṭah
Ḥag.	Ḥagigah	Ta'an.	Ta'anit
Ḥul.	Hullin	Yad.	Yadayim
Mak.	Makkot	Yebam.	Yebamot
Meg.	Megillah	Yoma	Yoma (= Kippurim)

Other Rabbinic Works

ʿAbot R. Nat.	ʿAbot de Rabbi Nathan	Rab.	Rabbah (+ biblical book)
Midr.	Midrash (+ biblical book)	Šiṭre	Šiṭre
Pesiq. Rab.	Pesiqta Rabbati	S. ʿOlam Rab.	Seder ʿOlam Rabbah
Pesiq. Rab Kah.	Pesiqta de Rab Kahana	Sop.	Soperim

Dead Sea Scrolls

CD-A	Damascus Document^a	1Q28a (1QSa)	1QRule of the Congregation
CD-B	Damascus Document^b	1Q28b (1QSb)	1QRule of Benedictions
1QH ^a	1QHodayot^a	1Q33 (1QM)	1QWar Scroll
1QIsa ^a	1QIsaiah^a	1Q71 (1QDan ^a)	1QDaniel^a
1QIsa ^b	1QIsaiah^b	1Q72 (1QDan ^b)	1QDaniel^b
1QpHab	1QPesher to Habakkuk	2Q13 (2QJer)	2QJeremiah
1QS	1QRule of the Community	2Q22 (2QapDavid?)	2QApocryphon of David?
1Q6 (1QJudg)	1QJudges	2Q26 (2QEnGiants ar)	2QBook of Giants ar
1Q7 (1QSam)	1QSamuel	3Q1 (3QEzek)	3QEzekiel
1Q9 (1QEzek)	1QEzekiel	3QLam (3Q3)	3QLamentations
1Q14 (1QpMic)	1QPesher to Micah	3Q4 (3QpIsa)	3QIsaiah Pesher
1Q15 (1QpZeph)	1QPesher to Zephaniah	4Q47 (4QJosh ^a)	4QJoshua^a
1Q20 (1QapGen ar)	1QGenesis Apocryphon	4Q48 (4QJosh ^b)	4QJoshua^b
1Q23 (1QEnGiants ^a ar)	1QEnoch Giants^a ar	4Q49 (4QJudg ^a)	4QJudges^a
1Q24 (1QEnGiants ^b ar)	1QEnoch Giants^b ar	4Q50 (4QJudg ^b)	4QJudges^b

4Q51 (4QSama)	4QSamuela	4Q253a (4QcommMal)	4QCommentary on Malachi
4Q52 (4QSamb)	4QSamuelb
4Q53 (4QSamc)	4QSamuelc	4Q254 (4QcommGen C)	4QCommentary on Genesis C
4Q54 (4QKgs)	4QKings
4QIsaa (4Q55)	4QIsaiah ^a	4Q285 (4QSM)	4QSefer ha-Milhamah
4Q56 (4QIsa ^b)	4QIsaiah ^b	4Q378 (4QapocrJoshua ^a)	4QApocryphon of Joshua ^a
4Q57 (4QIsa ^c)	4QIsaiah ^c	4Q379 (4QapocrJoshua ^b)	4QApocryphon of Joshua ^b
4Q70 (4QJer ^a)	4QJeremiah ^a	4Q382	4QParaphrase of Kings
4Q71 (4QJer ^b)	4QJeremiah ^b	4Q383 (4QapocrJer ^a)	4QApocryphon of Jeremiah ^a
4Q72 (4QJer ^c)	4QJeremiah ^c
4Q72a (4QJer ^d)	4QJeremiah ^d	4Q384 (4QapocrJer ^b)	4QApocryphon of Jeremiah ^b (?)
4Q72b (4QJer ^e)	4QJeremiah ^e
4Q73 (4QEzek ^a)	4QEzekiel ^a	4Q385 (4QpsEzek ^a)	4QPseudo-Ezekiel ^a
4Q74 (4QEzek ^b)	4QEzekiel ^b	4Q385a (4QpsMoses ^a)	4QPseudo-Moses ^a
4Q75 (4QEzek ^c)	4QEzekiel ^c	4Q385b (4QapocrJer ^c)	4QApocryphon of Jeremiah ^c
4Q76 (4QXII ^a)	4QMinor Prophets ^a
4Q77 (4QXII ^b)	4QMinor Prophets ^b	4Q385c (4QpsEzek ^c)	4QPseudo-Ezekiel ^c
4Q78 (4QXII ^c)	4QMinor Prophets ^c	4Q386 (4QpsEzek ^b)	4QPseudo-Ezekiel ^b
4Q79 (4QXII ^d)	4QMinor Prophets ^d	4Q387a (4QpsMoses ^b)	4QPseudo-Moses ^b
4Q80 (4QXII ^e)	4QMinor Prophets ^e	4Q387b (4QapocrJer ^d)	4QApocryphon of Jeremiah ^d
4Q81 (4QXII ^f)	4QMinor Prophets ^f
4Q82 (4QXII ^g)	4QMinor Prophets ^g	4Q388 (4QpsEzek ^d)	4QPseudo-Ezekiel ^d
4QLam (4Q111)	4QLamentations	4Q388a (4QpsMoses ^c)	4QPseudo-Moses ^c
4Q112 (4QDan ^a)	4QDaniel ^a	4Q389 (4QpsMoses ^d)	4QPseudo-Moses ^d
4Q113 (4QDan ^b)	4QDaniel ^b	4Q389a (4QapocrJer ^e)	4QApocryphon of Jeremiah ^e
4Q114 (4QDan ^c)	4QDaniel ^c
4Q115 (4QDan ^d)	4QDaniel ^d	4Q390 (4QpsMoses ^e)	4QPseudo-Moses ^e
4Q116 (4QDan ^e)	4QDaniel ^e	4Q391 (4QpsEzek ^a)	4QPapPseudo-Ezekiel ^e
4Q123 (4QpaleoParaJosh)	4QParaphrase of Joshua	4Q393	4QCommunal Confession
4Q160 (4QVisSam)	4Q Vision of Samuel	4Q397 (4QMMT ^d)	4QHalakhic Letter ^d
4Q161 (4QpIsa ^a)	4QIsaiah Pesher ^a	4Q400 (4QShirShabb ^a)	4QSongs of the Sabbath Sacrifice ^a
4Q162 (4QpIsa ^b)	4QIsaiah Pesher ^b
4Q163 (4Qpap pIsa ^c)	4QIsaiah Pesher ^c	4Q401 (4QShirShabb ^b)	4QSongs of the Sabbath Sacrifice ^b
4Q164 (4QpIsa ^d)	4QIsaiah Pesher ^d
4Q165 (4QpIsa ^e)	4QIsaiah Pesher ^e	4Q402 (4QShirShabb ^c)	4QSongs of the Sabbath Sacrifice ^c
4Q166 (4QpHos ^a)	4QHosea Pesher ^a
4Q167 (4QpHos ^b)	4QHosea Pesher ^b	4Q403 (4QShirShabb ^d)	4QSongs of the Sabbath Sacrifice ^d
4Q168 (4QpMic [?])	4QMicah Pesher (?)
4Q169 (4QpNah)	4QNahum Pesher	4Q404 (4QShirShabb ^e)	4QSongs of the Sabbath Sacrifice ^e
4Q170 (4QpZeph)	4QZephaniah Pesher
4Q174 (4QFlor)	4QFlorilegium	4Q405 (4QShirShabb ^f)	4QSongs of the Sabbath Sacrifice ^f
4Q177 (4QCatena A)	4QCatena A
4QapocrLam A (4Q179)	4QApocryphal Lamentations A	4Q406 (4QShirShabb ^g)	4QSongs of the Sabbath Sacrifice ^g
4Q180 (4QAgCreat A)	4QAgas of Creation A	4Q407 (4QShirShabb ^h)	4QSongs of the Sabbath Sacrifice ^h
4Q201 (4QEn ^a ar)	4QEnoch ^a ar
4Q202 (4QEn ^b ar)	4QEnoch ^b ar	4Q481a (4QapocrElisha)	4QApocryphon of Elisha
4Q203 (4QEnGiants ^a ar)	4QBook of Giants ^a ar	4Q489	4QApocalypse ar (?)
4Q204 (4QEn ^c ar)	4QEnoch ^c ar	4Q500 (4QpapBened)	4QBenediction
4Q205 (4QEn ^d ar)	4QEnoch ^d ar	4QapocrLam B (4Q501)	4QApocryphal Lamentations B
4Q206 (4QEn ^e ar)	4QEnoch ^e ar
4Q207 (4QEn ^f ar)	4QEnoch ^f ar	4Q521	4QMessianic Apocalypse
4Q208 (4QEnAstr ^a ar)	4QAstronomical Enoch ^a ar	4Q522 (4QapocrJosuē [?])	4QProphecy of Joshua
4Q209 (4QEnAstr ^b ar)	4QAstronomical Enoch ^b ar	4Q523	4QJonathan
4Q210 (4QEnAstr ^c ar)	4QAstronomical Enoch ^c ar	4Q530 (4QEnGiants ^b ar)	4QBook of Giants ^b ar
4Q211 (4QEnAstr ^d ar)	4QAstronomical Enoch ^d ar	4Q531 (4QEnGiants ^c ar)	4QBook of Giants ^c ar
4Q242 (4QPrNab ar)	4QPrayer of Nabonidus ar	4Q532 (4QEnGiants ^d ar)	4QBook of Giants ^d ar
4Q243 (4QpsDan ^a ar)	4QPseudo-Daniel ^a ar	4Q551 (4QDanSuz [?] ar)	4QDaniel-Suzanna (?) ar
4Q244 (4QpsDan ^b ar)	4QPseudo-Daniel ^b ar	4Q552	4QFour Kingdoms ^a ar
4Q245 (4QpsDan ^c ar)	4QPseudo-Daniel ^c ar	4Q553	4QFour Kingdoms ^b ar
4Q246	4QAramaic Apocalypse	5Q2 (5QKgs)	5QKings

5Q4 (5QAmos)	5QAmos	7Q2 (7QLXXEpJer)	7QE ^p istle of Jeremiah
5QLama (5Q6)	5QLamentations ^a	7Q4 (7QpapEn gr)	7QEnoch
5QLamb (5Q7)	5QLamentations ^b	11Q4 (11QEz)	11QEzekiel
5Q10 (5QpMal?)	5QMalachi Pesher	11Q10 (11QtgJob)	11QTargum of Job
5Q11 (5QS)	5QRule of the Community	11Q11 (11QapocrPs)	11QApocryphal Psalms
6Q4 (6QpapKgs)	6QKings	11Q13 (11Melch)	11QMelchizedek
6Q7 (6QpapDan)	6QDaniel	11Q14 (11QSM)	11QSefer ha-Milhamah
6Q8 (6QpapEnGiants ar)	6QGiants ar	11Q19 (11QT ^a)	11QTemple ^a
6Q9 (6Qpap apocrSam-Kgs)	6QApocryphon on Samuel-Kings

Wadi Murabbaʿat

Mur 88 (XII [unopened scroll]) Scroll of Minor Prophets

Nahal Hever

8Hev 1 (8HevXII gr) Scroll of Minor Prophets

Masada

Mas1k (MasShirShabb) Masada Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice

Classical and Early Christian Literature

Augustine		Josephus
Conf.	Confessionum libri XIII	Ag. Ap.	Against Apion
Trin.	De Trinitate	Ant.	Jewish Antiquities
Cyprian		J.W.	Jewish War
Ep.	Epistulae	Origen
Eusebius		Cels.	Contra Celsum
Dem. ev.	Demonstratio evangelica	Philo
Hist. eccl.	Historia ecclesiastica	Contempl.	De vita contemplativa
Herodotus		Spec.	De specialibus legibus
Hist.	Historiae	Polybius
Homer		Hist.	Historiae
Od.	Odysseia (Odyssey)	Tertullian
Irenaeus		Marc.	Adversus Marcionem
Haer.	Adversus haereses	Theodoret
Jerome		Comm. Dan.	Commentarius in Daniele
Comm. Habac.	Commentariorum in Habacuc libri II
Comm. Isa.	Commentariorum in Isaiam libri XVIII
Epist.	Epistulae

Periodicals, Reference Works and Serials

ÄAT	Ägypten und Altes Testament	ADOG	Abhandlungen der deutschen
AB	Anchor Bible		Orient-Gesellschaft
ABD	Anchor Bible Dictionary, ed. D. N.	ADPV	Abhandlungen des deutschen
	Freedman (6 vols.; New York:		Palästina-Vereins
	Doubleday, 1992)	AG	Analecta gorgiana
ABR	Australian Biblical Review	AJA	American Journal of Archaeology
ABRL	Anchor Bible Reference Library	AJP	American Journal of Philology
ACCS	Ancient Christian Commentary on	AJSR	Association for Jewish Studies Review
	Scripture	AMD	Ancient Magic and Divination

AmUS	American University Studies	Bib	Biblica
AnBib	Analecta biblica	BibAr	Bibel und Archaeologie
ANEP	The Ancient Near East in Pictures Relating to the Old Testament , ed. J. B. Pritchard (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1954)	BibEnc	Biblical Encounters Series
ANES	Ancient Near Eastern Studies	BibH	Bible historiale
ANET	Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament , ed. J. B. Pritchard (3rd ed., with supplement; Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1969)	BibInt	Biblical Interpretation
ANETS	Ancient Near Eastern Texts and Studies	BibJudS	Biblical and Judaic Studies
AnOr	Analecta orientalia	BibOr	Biblica et orientalia
AOAT	Alter Orient und Altes Testament	BibSem	The Biblical Seminar
AoF	Altorientalische Forschungen	BIS	Biblical Interpretation Series
AOTC	Abingdon Old Testament Commentaries	BJRL	Bulletin of the John Rylands University Library of Manchester
ApOTC	Apollos Old Testament Commentary	BJS	Brown Judaic Studies
ARM	Archives royales de Mari	BKAT	Biblischer Kommentar, Altes Testament
AS	Assyriological Studies	BLS	Bible and Literature Series
ASTI	Annual of the Swedish Theological Institute	BN	Biblische Notizen
ATA	Alttestamentliche Abhandlungen	BOR	Babylonian and Oriental Record
ATANT	Abhandlungen zur Theologie des Alten und Neuen Testaments	BR	Biblical Research
ATD	Das Alte Testament Deutsch	BRLAJ	Brill Reference Library of Ancient Judaism
AThR	Anglican Theological Review	BSac	Bibliotheca sacra
ATM	Altes Testament und Moderne	BSAH	Blackwell Sourcebooks in Ancient History
AUMSR	Andrews University Monographs: Studies in Religion	BSCS	Bible Study Commentary Series
AUSS	Andrews University Seminary Studies	BST	The Bible Speaks Today
AUSTR	American University Series: Theology and Religion	BTCL	Brazos Theological Commentary on the Bible
BA	Biblical Archaeologist	BTCL	Biblical and Theological Classics Library
BAC	Bible in Ancient Christianity	BTSt	Biblich-theologische Studien
BASOR	Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research	BWANT	Beiträge zur Wissenschaft vom Alten und Neuen Testament
BBB	Bonner biblische Beiträge	BZ	Biblische Zeitschrift
BBET	Beiträge zur biblischen Exegese und Theologie	BZAW	Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft
BBR	Bulletin for Biblical Research	CAD	The Assyrian Dictionary of the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago , ed. E. Reiner et al. (Chicago: Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago, 1956-)
BBRSup	Bulletin for Biblical Research Supplements	CAH ²	The Cambridge Ancient History , ed. J. B. Bury et al. (2nd ed.; 12 vols.; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1924-1939)
BCW	Bücherei der christlichen Welt	CahRB	Cahiers de la Revue biblique
BDB	F. Brown, S. R. Driver and C. A. Briggs, A Hebrew and English Lexicon of the Old Testament (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1907)	CAT	The Cuneiform Alphabetic Texts from Ugarit, Ras Ibn Hani and Other Places , ed. M. Dietrich, O. Loretz and J. Sanmartín (2nd ed.; ALASP 8; Münster: Ugarit Verlag, 1995)
BE	Biblische Enzyklopädie	CBC	Cambridge Bible Commentary
BEATAJ	Beiträge zur Erforschung des Alten Testaments und des antiken Judentums	CBET	Contributions to Biblical Exegesis and Theology
BETL	Bibliotheca ephemeridum theologicarum lovaniensium	CBQ	Catholic Biblical Quarterly
BEvT	Beiträge zur evangelischen Theologie	CBQMS	Catholic Biblical Quarterly Monograph Series
BFCT	Beiträge zur Förderung christlicher Theologie	CBR	Currents in Biblical Research
BHT	Beiträge zur historischen Theologie	CBSC	Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges
		CC	Continental Commentaries
		CEB	Commentaire évangélique de la

	Bible		Grove, IL: IVP Academic, 2008)
CHANE	Culture and History of the Ancient Near East	DSBS	Daily Study Bible Series
ConBNT	Coniectanea biblica: New Testament Series	DSD	Dead Sea Discoveries
ConBOT	Coniectanea biblica: Old Testament Series	EA	El-Amarna tablets. According to the edition of J. A. Knudtzon, Die el-Amarna-Tafeln (Leipzig: Hinrichs, 1908-1915 [reprint, Aalen: Zeller, 1964]). Continued in A. F. Rainey, El-Amarna Tablets, 359-379 (2nd ed.; Kevelaer, 1978)
ConJ	Concordia Journal
COS	Context of Scripture , ed. W. W. Hallo (3 vols.; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997-)
CSCD	Cambridge Studies in Christian Doctrine	EBC	Everyman's Bible Commentary
CTA	Corpus des tablettes en cunéiformes alphabétiques découvertes à Ras Shamra-Ugarit de 1929 à 1939 , ed. A. Herdner (Mission de Ras Shamra 10/2; Paris: Imprimerie Nationale, 1963)	EBib	Études bibliques
		ED	Essays in Divinity
CTJ	Calvin Theological Journal	EdF	Erträge der Forschung
CTM	Concordia Theological Monthly	EDSS	The Encyclopedia of the Dead Sea Scrolls , ed. L. H. Schiffman and J. C. VanderKam (2 vols.; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000)
CTR	Criswell Theological Review
CurBS	Currents in Research: Biblical Studies	EH	Europäische Hochschulschriften
CurTM	Currents in Theology and Mission	EI	Eretz- Israel
CWSSS	Corpus of West Semitic Stamp Seals , ed. N. Avigad, rev. and compl. B. Sass (Jerusalem: Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities; Israel Exploration Society; Institute of Archaeology, Hebrew University of Jerusalem, 1997)	Enc	Encounter
		EOT	Exploring the Old Testament
DBInt	Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation , ed. J. H. Hayes (2 vols.; Nashville: Abingdon, 1999)	ErIsr	Eretz-Israel
DDD	Dictionary of Deities and Demons in the Bible , ed. K. van der Toorn, B. Becking and P. W. van der Horst (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1995)	EsBib	Essais bibliques
DDD ²	Dictionary of Deities and Demons in the Bible , ed. K. van der Toorn, B. Becking and P. W. van der Horst (rev. ed.; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1999)	EvQ	Evangelical Quarterly
Did	Didaskalia	EvT	Evangelische Theologie
DJD	Discoveries in the Judean Desert	ExAud	Ex Auditu
DJG	Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels , ed. J. Green and S. McKnight (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1992)	ExpTim	Expository Times
DNWSI	Dictionary of the North-West Semitic Inscriptions , by J. Hoftijzer and K. Jongeling (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1995)	FAT	Forschungen zum Alten Testament
		FBBS	Facet Books: Biblical Series
DOTHB	Dictionary of the Old Testament: Historical Books , ed. B. T. Arnold and H. G. M. Williamson (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2005)	FC	Fathers of the Church
DOTP	Dictionary of the Old Testament: Pentateuch , ed. T. D. Alexander and D. W. Baker (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2003)	FCB	Feminist Companion to the Bible
DOTWPW	Dictionary of the Old Testament: Wisdom, Poetry and Writings , ed. T. Longman III and P. Enns (Downers Grove, IL: IVP Academic, 2008)	FCBS	Fortress Classics in Biblical Studies
		FLP	Tablets in the collections of the Free Library of Pennsylvania
		FOTL	Forms of Old Testament Literature
		FRC	Family, Religion, and Culture
		FRLANT	Forschungen zur Religion und Literatur des Alten und Neuen Testaments
		FTL	Forum theologiae linguisticae
		GBS	Guides to Biblical Scholarship
		GPT	Growing Points in Theology
		GRBS	Greek, Roman, and Byzantine Studies
		GTA	Göttinger theologische Arbeiten
		HAL	L. Koehler, W. Baumgartner and J. J. Stamm, Hebräisches und aramäisches Lexikon zum Alten Testament , fascicles 1-5 (3rd ed.; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1967-1995)
		HALOT	L. Koehler, W. Baumgartner and J. J. Stamm, The Hebrew and Aramaic Lexicon of the Old Testament , trans. and ed. M. E. J. Richardson (4 vols.; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1994-1999)
		HAR	Hebrew Annual Review
		HAT	Handbuch zum Alten Testament
		HBM	Hebrew Bible Monographs
		HBS	Herders biblische Studien
		HBT	Horizons in Biblical Theology
		HCOT	Historical Commentary on the Old

	Testament	JPT	Journal of Pentecostal Theology
HDR	Harvard Dissertations in Religion	JPTSup	Journal of Pentecostal Theology: Supplement Series
Hen	Henoch
HeyM	Heythrop Monographs	JQR	Jewish Quarterly Review
HKAT	Handkommentar zum Alten Testament	JSJSup	Supplements to the Journal for the Study of Judaism
HO	Handbuch der Orientalistik	JSNTSup	Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series
HOTC	Holman Old Testament Commentary	JSOT	Journal for the Study of the Old Testament
HSM	Harvard Semitic Monographs
HSS	Harvard Semitic Studies	JSOTSup	Journal for the Study of the Old Testament: Supplement Series
HTIBS	Historic Texts and Interpreters in Biblical Scholarship	JSP	Journal for the Study of the Pseudepigrapha
HTKAT	Herders theologischer Kommentar zum Alten Testament	JSS	Journal of Semitic Studies
HTR	Harvard Theological Review	JTS	Journal of Theological Studies
HUCA	Hebrew Union College Annual	K	Tablets in the collections of the British Museum (Kuyunjik)
IB	Interpreter's Bible , ed. G. A. Buttrick (12 vols.; New York: Abingdon, 1951-1957)	K&D	C. F. Keil and F. Delitzsch, Biblical Commentary on the Old Testament , trans. J. Martin et al. (repr., 10 vols.; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1996)
IBC	Interpretation: A Bible Commentary for Teaching and Preaching	KAI	Kanaanäische und aramäische Inschriften , ed. H. Donner and W. Röllig (2nd ed.; 3 vols. in 1; Wiesbaden: Harrasowitz, 1966-1969)
ICC	International Critical Commentary	KAR	Keilschrifttexte aus Assur religiösen Inhalts , ed. E. Ebeling (2 vols.; Leipzig: Hinrichs, 1919-1923)
IDB	The Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible , ed. G. A. Buttrick (4 vols.; Nashville: Abingdon, 1962)	KAT	Kommentar zum Alten Testament
IDBSup	Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible: Supplementary Volume , ed. K. Crim (Nashville: Abingdon, 1976)	KHC	Kurzer Hand-Commentar zum Alten Testament
Int	Interpretation	KTU	Die keilalphabetischen Texte aus Ugarit , ed. M. Dietrich, O. Loretz and J. Sanmartín (AOAT 24/1; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1976)
IRT	Issues in Religion and Theology	LAI	Library of Ancient Israel
ISBE	International Standard Bible Encyclopedia , ed. G. W. Bromiley (4 vols.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1979-1988)	LCBI	Literary Currents in Biblical Interpretation
ISBL	Indiana Studies in Biblical Literature	LHBOTS	Library of Hebrew Bible/Old Testament Studies
ITC	International Theological Commentary	LNTS	Library of New Testament Studies
ITL	International Theological Library	LSTS	Library of the Second Temple Studies
JANESCU	Journal of the Ancient Near Eastern Society of Columbia University	MBPS	Mellen Biblical Press Series
JAOS	Journal of the American Oriental Society	MNTS	McMaster New Testament Studies
JBL	Journal of Biblical Literature	MSL	Materialien zum sumerischen Lexikon , ed. B. Landsberger (17 vols.; Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1937-1985)
JBPR	Journal of Biblical and Pneumatological Research	NABU	Nouvelles assyriologiques breves et utilitaires
JBQ	Jewish Bible Quarterly	NAC	New American Commentary
JBR	Journal of Bible and Religion	NCBC	New Century Bible Commentary
JBS	Jerusalem Biblical Studies	NDBT	New Dictionary of Biblical Theology , ed. T. D. Alexander and B. S. Rosner (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2000)
JCS	Journal of Cuneiform Studies	NIB	The New Interpreter's Bible , ed. L. E. Keck et al. (12 vols.; Nashville: Abingdon, 1994-2002)
JerBS	Jerusalem Biblical Studies
JETS	Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society
JFSR	Journal of Feminist Studies in Religion
JHNES	Johns Hopkins Near Eastern Studies
JHScr	Journal of Hebrew Scriptures
JJS	Journal of Jewish Studies
JNES	Journal of Near Eastern Studies
JNSL	Journal of Northwest Semitic Languages
JPSBC	Jewish Publication Society Bible Commentary
JPSTC	Jewish Publication Society Torah Commentary

Dictionary of the Old Testament: Prophets

NIBCOT	New International Biblical Commentary: Old Testament Series	RevistB	Revista bíblica
NICOT	New International Commentary on the Old Testament	RevQ	Revue de Qumran
		RHPR	Revue d'histoire et de philosophie religieuses
NIDB	New Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible , ed. K. D. Sakenfeld (5 vols.; Nashville: Abingdon, 2006-2009)	RIMA	The Royal Inscriptions of Mesopotamia, Assyrian Periods
		RivBSup	Supplements to Rivista biblica
NIDOTTE	New International Dictionary of Old Testament Theology and Exegesis , ed. W. A. VanGemeren (5 vols.; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1997)	RNBC	Readings: A New Biblical Commentary
		RRBS	Recent Research in Biblical Studies
NIGTC	New International Greek Testament Commentary	RTR	Reformed Theological Review
		SAA	State Archives of Assyria
NIVAC	NIV Application Commentary	SAAS	State Archives of Assyria Studies
NovT	Novum Testamentum	SAIS	Studies in the Aramaic
NSBT	New Studies in Biblical Theology		Interpretation of Scripture
NTM	New Testament Monographs	SBL	Studies in Biblical Literature
NTOA	Novum Testamentum et Orbis Antiquus	SBLAB	Society of Biblical Literature Academia Biblica
		SBLABS	Society of Biblical Literature
NTS	New Testament Studies		Archaeology and Biblical Studies
NTSI	New Testament and the Scriptures of Israel	SBLAIL	Society of Biblical Literature Ancient Israel and Its Literature
OBO	Orbis biblicus et orientalis	SBLANEM	Society of Biblical Literature Ancient Near East Monographs
OBS	Oxford Bible Series
OBSt	Österreichische biblische Studien	SBLDS	Society of Biblical Literature Dissertation Series
OBT	Overtures to Biblical Theology
OCuT	Oxford Editions of Cuneiform Texts	SBLMS	Society of Biblical Literature Monograph Series
OEANE	The Oxford Encyclopedia of Archaeology in the Near East , ed. E. M. Meyers (5 vols.; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997)	SBLRBS	Society of Biblical Literature Resources for Biblical Study
		SBLSBS	Society of Biblical Literature Sources for Biblical Study
OIS	Oriental Institute Seminars
OLA	Orientalia Iovaniensa analecta	SBLSP	Society of Biblical Literature Seminar Papers
OOTD	Outline of an Old Testament Dialogue	SBLSS	Society of Biblical Literature Semeia Studies
OPBF	Occasional Publications of the Babylonian Fund	SBLSymS	Society of Biblical Literature Symposium Studies
OTE	Old Testament Essays
OTG	Old Testament Guides	SBLWAW	Society of Biblical Literature Writings from the Ancient World
OTL	Old Testament Library
OTM	Oxford Theological Monographs	SBLWGW	Society of Biblical Literature Writings from the Greco-Roman World
OTMes	Old Testament Message
OTS	Old Testament Studies	SBS	Stuttgarter Bibelstudien
OtSt	Oudtestamentische studiën	SBT	Studies in Biblical Theology
OTT	Old Testament Theology	SBTS	Sources for Biblical and Theological Study
OuTWP	Die Ou Testamentiese Werkgemeenskap in Suid-Afrika	ScrCon	Scripture in Context
PEQ	Palestine Exploration Quarterly	SCRK	Studien zur christlichen Religions- und Kulturgeschichte
PFES	Publications of the Finnish Exegetical Society	ScrMin	Scripta minora
PRSt	Perspectives in Religious Studies	SCS	Septuagint Commentary Series
PSB	Princeton Seminary Bulletin	SE	Studia evangelica I, II, III (= TU 73 [1959], 87 [1964], 88 [1964], etc.)
PTMS	Princeton Theological Monograph Series	SEÅ	Svensk exegetisk årsbok
PTR	Princeton Theological Review	SFSHJ	South Florida Studies in the History of Judaism
RAcc	François Thureau-Dangin, Rituels accadiens (Paris: Leroux, 1921)	SHBC	Smith & Helwys Bible Commentary
RB	Revue biblique	SHCANE	Studies in the History and Culture of the Ancient Near East
RD	Religions and Discourse
ResQ	Restoration Quarterly	SHCT	Studies in the History of Christian Traditions
RevExp	Review and Expositor

SHR	Studies in the History of Religions (supplement to Numen)	TGUOS	Transactions of the Glasgow University Oriental Society
SHS	Scripture and Hermeneutics Series	TH	Texte der Hethiter
SJLA	Studies in Judaism in Late Antiquity	ThA	Theologische Arbeiten
SJOT	Scandinavian Journal of the Old Testament	THAT	Theologisches Handwörterbuch zum Allen Testament , ed. E. Jenni, with C. Westermann (2 vols.; Munich: Kaiser; Zürich: Theologischer Verlag, 1971-1976)
SJT	Scottish Journal of Theology	Them	Themelios
SJud	Studies in Judaism	ThEv	Theologica evangelica
SO	Symbolae Osloenses	THNTC	The Two Horizons New Testament Commentary
SOTBT	Studies in Old Testament Biblical Theology	ThTo	Theology Today
SOTSMS	Society for Old Testament Studies Monograph Series	TLOT	Theological Lexicon of the Old Testament , ed. E. Jenni, with C. Westermann (3 vols.; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1997)
SPRTS	Scholars Press Reprints and Translations Series	TLZ	Theologische Literaturzeitung
SSN	Studia semitica neerlandica	TOTC	Tyndale Old Testament Commentaries
ST	Studia theologica	TQ	Theologische Quartalschrift
StBT	Studia biblica et theologica	TR	Theological Review
STDJ	Studies on the Texts of the Desert of Judah	Transeu	Transeuphratène
STI	Studies in Theological Interpretation	TS	Theological Studies
STL	Studia theologica Lundensia	TSAJ	Texte und Studien zum antiken Judentum
StPB	Studia post-biblica	TSK	Theologische Studien und Kritiken
STR	Studies in Theology and Religion	TThSt	Trierer theologische Studien
SubBi	Subsidia biblica	TTR	Tübinger theologische Reihe
SUNT	Studien zur Umwelt des Neuen Testaments	TU	Texte und Untersuchungen
SVTP	Studia in Veteris Testamenti pseudepigraphica	TUMSR	Trinity University Monograph Series in Religion
SWBA	The Social World of Biblical Antiquity	TWOT	Theological Wordbook of the Old Testament , ed. R. L. Harris and G. L. Archer Jr. (2 vols.; Chicago: Moody, 1980)
TA	Tel Aviv	TynBul	Tyndale Bulletin
TAD A	Textbook of Aramaic Documents from Ancient Egypt , vol. 1, Letters , ed. B. Porten and A. Yardeni (Jerusalem: Hebrew University, Department of the History of the Jewish People, 1986)	TynHS	Tyndale House Studies
TAD B	Textbook of Aramaic Documents from Ancient Egypt , vol. 2, Contracts , ed. B. Porten and A. Yardeni (Jerusalem: Hebrew University, Department of the History of the Jewish People, 1989)	UCOP	University of Cambridge Oriental Publications
TAD D	Textbook of Aramaic Documents from Ancient Egypt , vol. 4, Ostraca and Assorted Inscriptions , ed. B. Porten and A. Yardeni (Jerusalem: Hebrew University, 1999)	UF	Ugarit-Forschungen
TAPS	Transactions of the American Philosophical Society	USQR	Union Seminary Quarterly Review
TBC	Torch Bible Commentaries	UUA	Uppsala universitets årsskrift
TBN	Themes in Biblical Narrative	VAT	Vorderasiatische Abteilung Tontafel, Vorderasiatisches Museum, Berlin
TBS	Tools for Biblical Study	VCSup	Supplements to Vigiliae christianae
TBT	The Bible Today	VF	Verkündigung und Forschung
TCS	Texts from Cuneiform Sources	VT	Vetus Testamentum
TDOT	Theological Dictionary of the Old Testament , ed. G. J. Botterweck and H. Ringgren (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974-)	VTSup	Vetus Testamentum Supplements
		WA	D. Martin Luthers Werke, Kritische Gesamtausgabe. 72 vols. Weimar: Verlag Hermann Böhlaus Nachfolger, 1883-
		WBC	Word Biblical Commentary
		WBT	Word Biblical Themes
		WEC	Wycliffe Exegetical Commentary
		WestBC	Westminster Bible Companion
		WUNT	Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament
		WW	Word and World

YNER	Yale Near Eastern Researches	ZAW	Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche
ZABR	Zeitschrift für altorientalische und		Wissenschaft
	biblische Rechtsgeschichte	ZDPV	Zeitschrift des deutschen Palästina-Vereins
ZAH	Zeitschrift für Althebräistik	ZTK	Zeitschrift für Theologie und Kirche

Transliteration of Hebrew

Consonants		Short Vowels		Long Vowels
א	= ʾ	א	= a	(אָ)ֿ	= â
ב	= b	בֿ	= e	יֿ	= ê
ג	= g	גֿ	= i	יִֿ	= î
ד	= d	דֿ	= o	יֹֿ	= ô
ה	= h	הֿ	= u	יֻֿ	= û
ו	= w			וֿ	= ā
ז	= z		Very Short Vowels	זֿ	= ē
ח	= ḥ	חֿ	= ă	זִֿ	= ō
ט	= ṭ	טֿ	= ě
י	= y	יֿ	= ě (if vocal)
כ,ך	= k	כֿ	= ǝ
ל	= l
מ,ם	= m
נ,ן	= n
ס	= s
ע	= ʿ
פ,ף	= p
צ,ץ	= ṣ
ק	= q
ר	= r
שׁ	= ś
שׂ	= š
ת	= t

Contributors

- Ahn, John, PhD. Assistant professor of Old Testament, Austin Theological Seminary, Austin, Texas: Exile.
- Allen, Leslie C., DD. Senior Professor of Old Testament, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California: Jeremiah: Book of.
- Ames, Frank R., PhD. Professor of Medical Informatics, Rocky Vista University College of Osteopathic Medicine, Parker, Colorado: Warfare and Divine Warfare.
- Arnold, Bill T., PhD. Paul S. Amos Professor of Old Testament Interpretation, Asbury Theological Seminary, Wilmore, Kentucky: Babylon.
- Baker, David W., PhD. Professor of Old Testament and Semitic Languages, Ashland Theological Seminary, Ashland, Ohio: Evil; Nahum, Book of.
- Barker, Joel D., PhD. Adjunct Professor of Old Testament, Heritage Theological Seminary, Cambridge, Ontario, Canada: Day of the Lord; Rhetorical Criticism.
- Barrett, Rob, PhD. Postdoctoral Research Fellow, Georg-August-Universität, Göttingen, Germany: Idols, Idolatry, Gods.
- Block, Daniel I., DPhil. Gunther H. Knoedler Professor of Old Testament, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois: Worship.
- Boda, Mark J., PhD. Professor of Old Testament, McMaster Divinity College, Hamilton, Ontario, Canada: Lament, Mourning; Lamentations, Book of; Repentance; Sin, Sinners; Zephaniah, Book of.
- Brenneman, James E., PhD. President, Goshen College, Goshen, Indiana: True and False Prophecy.
- Briggs, Richard S., PhD. Lecturer in Old Testament and Director of Biblical Studies, St. John's College, Durham University, England, United Kingdom: Hermeneutics.
- Bruckner, James K., PhD. Professor of Old Testament, North Park Theological Seminary, Chicago, Illinois: Habakkuk, Book of.
- Carroll R., M. Daniel, PhD. Distinguished Professor of Old Testament, Denver Seminary, Littleton, Colorado: Ethics; Social-Scientific Approaches.
- Chisholm, Robert B., Jr., ThD. Chair and Professor of Old Testament Studies, Dallas Theological Seminary, Dallas, Texas: Retribution.
- Cook, John A., PhD. Associate professor of Old Testament, Asbury Theological Seminary, Wilmore, Kentucky: Hebrew Language.
- Cook, Paul M., DPhil. Affiliate Professor, Asbury Theological Seminary, Wilmore, Kentucky: Faith; Nations.
- Dearman, J. Andrew, PhD. Professor of Old Testament, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California: Jeremiah: History of Interpretation.
- Dempsey, Carol J., PhD. Professor of Theology (Biblical Studies), University of Portland, Portland, Oregon: Feminist Interpretation.
- Dempster, Stephen G., PhD. Professor of Religious Studies, Crandall University, New Brunswick, Canada: Canon, Canonization.
- Dille, Sarah J., PhD. Independent scholar, Moorhead, Minnesota: Women and Female Imagery.
- Duguid, Iain M., PhD. Professor of Old Testament, Grove City College, Grove City, Pennsylvania: Ezekiel: History of Interpretation; Israel.
- Eggleston, Chad L., PhD. Assistant Professor of Religion, Huntingdon College, Montgomery, Alabama: Wilderness, Desert.
- Evans, Craig A., PhD. Payzant Distinguished Professor of New Testament, Acadia Divinity College, Wolfville, Nova Scotia, Canada: Dead Sea Scrolls.
- Ferris, Paul W., PhD. Professor of Hebrew Bible, Bethel University, St. Paul, Minnesota: Prayer.
- Firth, David G., PhD. Lecturer in Old Testament and Director of Research, St. John's College, Nottingham, Nottinghamshire, England, United Kingdom: Leadership; Messiah.
- Friebel, Kelvin G., PhD. Associate Professor of Old Testament Studies, Houghton College, Houghton, New York: Sign Acts.

- Fuller, Russell E., PhD. Professor of Hebrew Bible, University of San Diego, San Diego, California: Text and Textual Criticism.
- Gane, Roy E., PhD. Professor of Hebrew Bible and ancient Near Eastern languages, Andrews University, Seventh-Day Adventist Theological Seminary, Berrien Springs, Michigan: Sacrifice and Atonement.
- Garrett, Duane A., PhD. John R. Sampey Professor of Old Testament Interpretation, The Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Kentucky: Joel, Book of.
- Giles, Terry, PhD. Professor, Gannon University, Erie, Pennsylvania: Performance Criticism.
- Glazov, Gregory Yuri, DPhil. Associate professor of biblical studies, Seton Hall University, South Orange, New Jersey: Canonical Criticism.
- Goldingay, John, PhD. David Allan Hubbard Professor of Old Testament, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California: Servant of Yahweh.
- Hadjiev, Tchavdar S., DPhil. Lecturer in Old Testament Studies, Belfast Bible College, Belfast, Northern Ireland, United Kingdom: Honor and Shame; Peace, Rest.
- Halton, J. Charles, PhD. independent scholar: Law.
- Hayes, Elizabeth R., D.Phil. Adjunct professor of Old Testament, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California: Justice, Righteousness.
- Hays, Christopher B., PhD. D. Wilson Moore Assistant Professor of Ancient Near Eastern Studies, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California: Death.
- Hays, J. Daniel, PhD. Dean of the Pruet School of Christian Studies and Professor of Biblical Studies, Ouachita Baptist University, Arkadelphia, Arkansas: Prophecy and Eschatology in Christian Theology.
- Heiser, Michael S., PhD. Academic Editor, Logos Bible Software, Bellingham, Washington: Chaos; Destruction; Divine Council.
- Hilber, John W., PhD. Professor of Old Testament Grand Rapids Theological Seminary, Grand Rapids, Michigan: Liturgy and Cult.
- Hildebrandt, Wilf, ThD. Dean of Education, Summit Pacific College, Abbotsford, British Columbia, Canada: Spirit of Yahweh.
- Hill, Andrew E., PhD. Professor of Old Testament Studies, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois: Malachi, Book of.
- Irwin, Brian P., PhD. Associate Professor of Old Testament/Hebrew Scripture, Knox College, Toronto School of Theology, University of Toronto, Toronto, Ontario, Canada: Social Justice.
- Jenson, Philip P., PhD. Lecturer in Old Testament, Ridley Hall, Cambridge, England, United Kingdom: Temple.
- Johnson, Timothy J., PhD. Senior pastor, Rock Valley Chapel, Beloit, Wisconsin, and adjunct professor, Philadelphia Biblical University, Langhorne, Pennsylvania: Apocalypticism, Apocalyptic Literature.
- Johnston, Philip S., PhD. Senior Tutor, Director of Studies in Theology and Religious Studies, Hughes Hall, University of Cambridge, Cambridge, England, United Kingdom: Afterlife.
- Kelle, Brad E., PhD. Professor of Old Testament, Point Loma Nazarene University, San Diego, California: Israelite History.
- Kessler, John, DTheol. Professor of Old Testament, Tyndale University College and Seminary, Toronto, Ontario, Canada: Haggai, Book of.
- Klingbeil, Gerald A., DLitt. Research Professor of Old Testament and Ancient Near Eastern Studies, Seventh-day Adventist Theological Seminary, Andrews University, Berrien Springs, Michigan: Animal Imagery.
- Klingbeil, Martin G., DLitt. Professor of Biblical Studies and Archaeology, Southern Adventist University, Collegedale, Tennessee: Floral Imagery.
- Lamb, David T., DPhil. Associate Professor of Old Testament, Biblical Theological Seminary, Hatfield, Pennsylvania: Word of God; Wrath.
- LeCureux, Jason T., PhD. Director of Old Testament Studies, Trinity Theological College, Brisbane, Queensland, Australia: Obadiah, Book of.
- Lim, Bo H., PhD. Assistant Professor of Old Testament, Seattle Pacific University, Seattle, Washington: Isaiah: History of Interpretation.

Lucas, Ernest C., PhD. Vice Principal and Tutor in Biblical Studies, Bristol Baptist College, Bristol, England, United Kingdom: Daniel: Book of.

Lund, Jerome A., PhD. Consultant in Biblical Languages, Accordance, Kviteseid, Telemark, Norway: Aramaic Language.

Marlow, Hilary F., PhD. Research Associate for Cambridge Inter-faith Programme and Affiliated Lecturer in Biblical Hebrew, Faculty of Divinity, University of Cambridge, Cambridge, England, United Kingdom: Creation Theology; Land.

Martens, Elmer A., PhD. President Emeritus and Professor Emeritus of Old Testament, Fresno Pacific Biblical Seminary, Fresno, California: Eschatology.

Mason, Rex, DD. Fellow Emeritus, Regent's Park College, Oxford: Prophecy and Tradition.

Matthews, Victor H., PhD. Professor of Religious Studies and Dean of the College of Humanities and Public Affairs, Missouri State University, Springfield, Missouri: Prophecy and Society.

McConville, J. Gordon, PhD. Professor of Old Testament Theology, University of Gloucestershire, Cheltenham, England, United Kingdom: Hosea, Book of; Micah, Book of.

McKeown, James, PhD. Lecturer in Hebrew and Old Testament, Union Theological College Belfast, Belfast, Northern Ireland, United Kingdom: Forgiveness.

Meier, Samuel A., PhD. Professor of Near Eastern Languages and Cultures, The Ohio State University, Columbus, Ohio: Angels, Messengers, Heavenly Beings.

Millard, Alan R., MPhil. Emeritus Rankin Professor of Hebrew and Ancient Semitic Languages, University of Liverpool, Liverpool, England, United Kingdom: Writing and Prophecy.

Möller, Julie C., DPhil. Associate Professor of Biblical Studies, Grove City College, Grove City, Pennsylvania: Salvation, Deliverance.

Möller, Karl, PhD. Senior Lecturer in Theology & Religious Studies, University of Cumbria, Lancaster, England, United Kingdom: Amos, Book of.

Moore, Michael S., PhD. Director, Arizona Research Center for the Ancient Near East, Scottsdale, Arizona: Divine Presence; Wealth and Poverty.

Morgan, David M., PhD. Assistant Professor of Biblical Studies and Associate Director of the Bryan Institute, Bryan College, Dayton, Tennessee: Remnant.

Moyise, Steve, PhD. Professor of New Testament, University of Chichester, Chichester, England, United Kingdom: Prophets in the New Testament.

Oswalt, John, PhD. Visiting distinguished professor of Old Testament, Asbury Theological Seminary, Wilmore, Kentucky: God.

Parker, Tom C., MPhil. Director, Fuller Theological Seminary Southwest, Phoenix, Arizona: Marriage and Divorce.

Person, Raymond F., Jr., PhD. Professor of Religion and Chair of the Department of Philosophy and Religion, Ohio Northern University, Ada, Ohio: Conversation Analysis.

Peterson, Brian N., PhD. Assistant Professor of Old Testament and Hebrew Bible, Lee University, Cleveland, Tennessee: Cosmology.

Phinney, D. Nathan, PhD. Associate Professor of Biblical Studies, Malone University, Canton, Ohio: Call/Commission Narratives.

Rata, Tiberius, PhD. Professor of Old Testament Studies and Chair of Biblical Studies Department, Grace College and Theological Seminary, Winona Lake, Indiana: Covenant.

Redditt, Paul L., PhD. Emeritus Professor, Georgetown College, Georgetown, Kentucky: Editorial/Redaction Criticism; Prophecy, History of.

Routledge, Robin L., PhD. Senior Lecturer in Old Testament and Academic Dean, Mattersey Hall College, Mattersey, Nottinghamshire, England, United Kingdom: Blessings and Curses.

Sandy, D. Brent, PhD. Visiting Professor of New Testament, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois: Mountain Imagery.

Schart, Aaron, PhD. Professor for Old Testament and New Testament, University Duisburg-Essen, Institute for Protestant Theology, Essen, Germany: Twelve, Book of the: History of Interpretation.

Shields, Martin A., PhD. Sydney, Australia: Prophecy and Wisdom.

Stead, Michael R., PhD. Visiting Lecturer in Old Testament, Moore Theological College, Sydney, Australia: Intertextuality and Innerbiblical Interpretation; Visions, Prophetic.

Stökl, Jonathan, DPhil. Researcher, University College London, London, England, United Kingdom: Ancient Near Eastern Prophecy.

Strawn, Brad D., PhD. Vice President for Spiritual Development and Dean of the Chapel, Southern Nazarene University, Bethany, Oklahoma: Prophecy and Psychology.

Strawn, Brent A., PhD. Associate Professor of Old Testament, Candler School of Theology, Emory University, Atlanta, Georgia: Prophecy and Psychology.

Stromberg, Jacob, DPhil. Visiting Lecturer, Duke Divinity School, Durham, North Carolina: Formation of the Prophetic Books.

Stuart, Douglas, PhD. Professor of Old Testament, Gordon-Conwell Theological Seminary, South Hamilton, Massachusetts: Jonah, Book of.

Sweeney, Marvin A., PhD. Professor of Hebrew Bible, Claremont Lincoln University and Claremont School of Theology, Claremont, California, and Professor of Tanakh, Academy for Jewish Religion California, Los Angeles, California: Twelve, Book of the.

Thomas, Heath A., PhD. Assistant Professor of Old Testament and Hebrew, Southeastern Baptist Theological Seminary, Wake Forest, North Carolina, and Fellow in Old Testament Studies, The Paideia Centre for Public Theology, Ancaster, Ontario, Canada: Suffering; Zion.

Tiemeyer, Lena-Sofia, PhD. Senior Lecturer in Hebrew Bible, University of Aberdeen, Aberdeen, Scotland, United Kingdom: Ezekiel: Book of.

Toffelmire, Colin M., PhD (cand.). McMaster Divinity College, Hamilton, Ontario, Canada: Form Criticism.

Tucker, Wade Dennis, Jr., PhD. Associate Professor of Christian Scriptures and Associate Dean of Academic Affairs, George W. Truett Theological Seminary, Baylor University, Waco, Texas: Daniel: History of Interpretation.

Van Dam, Cornelis, ThD. Emeritus Professor of Old Testament, Canadian Reformed Theological Seminary, Hamilton, Ontario, Canada: Divination, Magic.

Watts, Rikk E., PhD. Professor of New Testament, Regent College, Vancouver, British Columbia, Canada: Exodus Imagery.

Williamson, H. G. M., PhD., DD. Regius Professor of Hebrew and Student of Christ Church, University of Oxford, Oxford, England, United Kingdom: Isaiah: Book of.

Wolters, Al, PhD. Professor Emeritus of Religion and Theology/Classical Languages, Redeemer University College, Ancaster, Ontario, Canada: Zechariah, Book of.

Wray Beal, Lissa M., PhD. Associate Professor of Old Testament, Providence Theological Seminary, Winnipeg, Manitoba, Canada: Literary Approaches.

A

ABRAHAMIC COVENANT. See COVENANT.

AFTERLIFE

Like the rest of the OT, the Prophetic Books are concerned primarily with this life rather than anything beyond it, and the prophets themselves with repentance and reform in the present life rather than judgment or recompense in an afterlife. However, the judgment that they proclaim often includes death, while they occasionally address those with an unhealthy interest in the dead. Further, a few texts portray national demise and restoration as *death and resurrection, and this paradigm is eventually extended to individual fate. Nevertheless, the relevant texts are often difficult, and their exact meaning is unclear (for detailed discussion of all texts mentioned, see Johnston 2002).

1. Death
2. The Dead
3. Surviving Death

1. Death.

The Prophetic Books contain little narrative, and what there is entirely lacks the intergenerational time span of Genesis or Kings. Thus, death is seldom recorded as simply the natural end of life, as is common elsewhere in the OT (see Johnston, DOTHB 215–18). However, the general fragility of life and the certainty of death are noted—for example, in contrast to the permanence of God’s word (Is 40:7).

At the same time, the prophetic focus on issues of life and death leads to the occasional portrayal of death as an enemy. Women will lament that “death has come up into our windows . . . to cut off our children,” while the grim reaper leaves a trail of ungathered sheaves (Jer 9:21–22). Elsewhere Sheol is thought to open its mouth wide but never to be satisfied (Is 5:14; Hab 2:5). There are some parallels here to Ugaritic Mot (e.g., KTU 1.5.ii.3–4), though in the OT death is barely personified and never deified.

In one text Yahweh apostrophizes Sheol as destructive, toying with the idea of ransoming its victims but then declining (Hos 13:14). This tension is only resolved in the NT when the outcome is reversed through Christ’s resurrection (1 Cor 15:54–55). That resolution is nevertheless foreseen in the Isaiah Apocalypse, where Yahweh will destroy the shroud and “swallow up death forever” (Is 25:7–8).

2. The Dead.

The Prophetic Books contain the only two underworld descriptions in the OT, and both are brief (these complement evocative imagery elsewhere, notably Ps 88). Isaiah 14:9–11 describes the former great king of Babylon descending to Sheol, now as weak as those whom he had conquered. Ezekiel 32:17–32 predicts the Egyptians joining the many other slain armies lying in their ethnic groups, prostrate and immobile in a vast cavern. These texts fit the typical OT portrayal of the underworld as the general human fate, devoid of meaningful existence and remote from Yahweh.

Various legal texts prohibit Israelites from contacting or venerating the dead. However, several prophetic texts indicate that such practices indeed existed, though it is impossible to establish their extent at any one period or through time. Isaiah instructs his disciples to oppose necromancers, whose future is bleak (Is 8:19–22). He also indicts drunken priests and rulers who “made a covenant with death” (Is 28:15); their practices possibly include necrotic activity, but the proposed allusions are tenuous. Another Isaianic passage condemns fertility cults, child sacrifice and *idolatry in general (Is 57:3-13), which quite plausibly included consulting or honoring the dead (Is 57:6, 9). A final text castigates those who "sit inside tombs, and . . . eat swine's flesh" (Is 65:3-4), a similar illicit combination though tantalizingly without further detail. Ezekiel's lengthy vision contrasts the pure temple of the future with the tainted previous one, defiled by royal corpses and possibly their veneration (Ezek 43:7, 9).

One possible context for honoring the dead was the marzēāh. The West Semitic root mrzh is attested in several contexts (Ebla, Ugarit, Moab, Elephantine, Phoenicia, Nabatea, Palmyra, Talmud) to indicate a social group, or its gatherings, or their location. These gatherings often involved eating and drinking and were sometimes explicitly funerary or commemorative. The Hebrew marzēāh occurs twice in the OT, once implying revelry and with no obvious link to the dead (Amos 6:7, in a variant construct form, mirzāh), and once in a funerary context, where bēt-marzēāh is usually translated "house of mourning" and contrasted with "house of [wedding] feasting" (Jer 16:5, 9). The phrase "house of mourning" without further explanation implies that this was an established custom in late preexilic times. Some scholars argue that the marzēāh necessarily involved ancestor cults, which were generally prevalent, and that other biblical references to this were later removed by orthodox redactors. However, evidence from other cultural contexts does not prove that the mrzh was primarily related to the dead. And if the Israelite version had been so related, then the posited zealous redactors would surely also have expunged the references just noted.

Two further phenomena have sometimes been associated with ancestor cults. First, tērāpīm, often translated "household gods," feature in several narratives (Gen 34; Judg 18; 1 Sam 19) and as divinatory objects in a few prophetic texts (Ezek 21:21; Hos 3:4; Zech 10:2). The tērāpīm may well have represented revered ancestors, but arguments that this necessarily indicates an active ancestor cult are tenuous. Second, religiously significant pillars (maššēbôt) occur in several narratives, including that of sacrifice at Sinai (Ex 24:4), and again coupled with sacrifice in a prophetic text (Hos 3:4 [alongside tērāpīm]). These pillars have also been associated with ancestor veneration, since Absalom set up a self-commemorative pillar, and the dutiful son in the Aqhat epic set up "a pillar of his ancestor" (skn ilib [KTU 1.17.i.27]). However, these arguments are equally tenuous, since Absalom lacked offspring to venerate him, and the Ugaritic text uses different terms and reflects a different socioreligious context.

3. Surviving Death.

Apart from the aspects discussed below, the Prophetic Books share the general OT perspective of Sheol as the only specified human destiny (for recent summary, see Routledge). The identity of individuals can persist in family line and name (as is emphasized by Levenson), but this is quite different from individual afterlife.

3.1. Heavenly Books. There are a few intriguing references to heavenly books in the prophets (as elsewhere). These occur with different wording in a variety of contexts and may well imply different underlying ideas. Some scholars trace the Israelite concept back to the Babylonian "tablets of destiny" or to Persian civilian registers, but these may have no relevance and at most they show religious and administrative parallels.

In an Isaianic vision, the restored community "will be holy, everyone who has been recorded for life in Jerusalem" (Is 4:3). As an alternative to the prevalent religious cynicism, Malachi offers "a book of remembrance . . . of those who revered Yahweh" (Mal 3:16). Daniel's final apocalyptic vision climaxes with the deliverance of "everyone who is found written in the book" (Dan 12:1). His earlier terrifying vision of the Ancient of Days included heavenly asizes: "The court sat in judgment and the books were opened" (Dan 7:10). And the events detailed in his lengthy final vision are recorded in a "book of truth" (Dan 10:21).

Intertestamental and NT writers understood "the book of life" as referring to postmortem fate (e.g., 1 En. 47:3; 90:20; 108:3; Jub. 30:20, 22; 36:10; Lk 10:20; Phil 4:3; Heb 12:23; Rev 21:27), and this interpretation has often been read back into the OT. This approach takes the few OT references as glimpses of future hope. However, this need not be the meaning in their initial context. The record for life (Is 4:3) applies to the current life on earth, not a later one. The divine comment on those in Malachi's heavenly book, "on the day when I act

... I will spare them" (Mal 3:17), suggests preservation during judgment rather than life after death. Even the book of names in Daniel's final vision (Dan 12:1), though mentioned just before resurrection, concerns "your people [who] shall be delivered"—that is, who will survive the unprecedented "anguish" and presumably remain alive on earth. Similarly, the books mentioned in several psalms need imply no more than Yahweh's careful concern and provision for his people.

In Daniel's earlier vision, the opening of books in the heavenly court (Dan. 7:10) leads to the destruction of the fourth beast and the subjugation of the other three, divine judgment on current ungodly oppression as a prerequisite to the "heavenly human" and his earthly people receiving God's kingdom. The opening of the heavenly books leads here to judgment on the four beasts, not on all humans. This is a function different from that ascribed to it in later eschatology, though the development is natural. The NT recasts the various elements of Daniel's visions to describe the parousia of Christ, and the resurrection and final judgment of all humanity. The books opened in Daniel's heavenly court are one significant element in this, and thus they are the strongest OT link between heavenly books and the afterlife.

3.2. National Restoration. Two prophetic texts use the concept of renewal of human life as a metaphor for national restoration. Hosea 6:2 invites a return to Yahweh, the very one who had brought destruction on the nation: "After two days he will revive us; on the third day he will raise us up, that we may live before him." The context and language suggest healing from physical wounds and sickness; for example, "three days" occurs in Hezekiah's healing (2 Kings 20:8, though not Is 38) and in Mesopotamian medical texts.

Some scholars see a death-and-resurrection motif in Hosea 6:2. However, the text does not specify that the wounding is fatal, and both the verbs "revive" (hyh, Piel) and "raise up" (qwm, Hiphil) occur frequently and in varied contexts. J. Day (1996; 1997) notes references to death in the immediate context (Hos 5:14; 6:5), and parallels between Hosea 5—6 and Hosea 13—14. He sees death-and-resurrection motifs in Hosea 13—14, so argues that they occur also in Hosea 5—6, notably resurrection in Hosea 6:2. But Hosea's profuse images appear throughout his book, giving several themes within each chapter and numerous parallels across different chapters. Death is certainly a theme in Hosea 5—6; 13—14, but this does not determine the meaning of Hosea 6:2.

Nevertheless, there is perhaps a more profound link between wounding and death, healing and resurrection. Hosea grapples in anguish with the message of God's punishment and destruction of the nation, while still clinging to the hope of healing and restoration. Inevitably the images that he uses may fuse together, so that healing from grievous wounds and resurrection from the dead are alternate images for the renewal of a moribund nation. Hosea and his audience may have been aware of death-and-resurrection motifs, from whatever source, but they are not necessarily evident here.

In a stupendous vision Ezekiel prophesies to a valley littered with bones, which first regroup as skeletons and, on further word, return to life. The vision is immediately explained: the exiled Israelites have lost hope, but Yahweh will open their graves and repatriate them, and they will live (Ezek 37:1-14). The vision of re-vivified bodies clearly indicates a restored people, but it says nothing about personal resurrection, even if it was later interpreted in that way. The references to graves in Ezekiel 37:12-13 may seem to imply the latter, but they must be taken in context. Israelites normally buried their dead in rock-cut tombs or, for the poor, in shallow pits, so the equivalent for them of unburied bones coming to life would be bodies emerging from graves. In applying this vision to Israel, Ezekiel 37 first translates the imagery into a culturally relevant equivalent before giving its meaning.

Whether Ezekiel or his contemporaries had a concept of personal resurrection is irrelevant, though the prophet's cautious reply to Yahweh's opening question makes this unlikely. Resurrection could have been part of the religious backdrop, but the vision makes as much sense without it. Ezekiel proclaimed God's message of restoration after destruction, of resettlement after banishment, of national life after death. So the imagery of physical bodies being reconstituted would be a perfect illustration. Its use does not imply a prior belief in resurrection, any more than our understanding of science fiction implies a belief in any of its imaginative worlds. Ezekiel's vision uses physical reconstitution as an image of national restoration, but it says nothing determinative about individual resurrection.

3.3. Individual Resurrection. There are a few possible allusions to individual return to life outside the Prophetic Books. God's power to kill and make alive is twice asserted (Deut 32:39; 1 Sam 2:6), though neither text refers to specific individuals. The prophets Elijah (1 Kings 17:22) and Elisha (2 Kings 4:34) caused life to return, as did the latter's bones (2 Kings 13:20-21), but all these were cases of resuscitation within a few hours of death. These events, though certainly miraculous, were significantly different from resurrection of the long dead.

A clear allusion to individual return to life occurs in the famous fourth Servant Song. After being "cut off from the land of the living" and buried, the enigmatic servant will "see offspring and prolong days . . . see and be satisfied" (Is 53:10-11). There is no mention of resurrection. But the few descriptions of his new life are strongly evocative of earthly existence: offspring, days, seeing, allotted portion. So the servant apparently returns to life in some unspecified form (see Servant of Yahweh).

Two texts are more explicit. The Isaiah Apocalypse offers several glimpses of Yahweh's general triumph over death, most notably when he "will swallow up death forever" (Is 25:8). It then notes that the wicked dead do not rise (Is 26:14) but boldly asserts, "Your dead shall live, their corpses shall rise" (Is 26:19). The context is one of national revival and restoration, but there is more here. Both verses refer specifically to "the shades" and "the dead" (i.e., to deceased individuals), while in the latter verse the dust-dwellers will awake and sing, Yahweh's life-giving dew will fall, and the earth will disclose the shades. The imagery clearly envisages the personal resurrection from death of at least some Israelites. The application may be national, but the imagery presupposes a concept of individual resurrection.

Finally, Daniel 12:2 speaks unmistakably of personal resurrection at the climax of Daniel's final vision (Dan 10—12): "Many of those who sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt." This clearly is individual resurrection of both righteous and wicked. However, it may still be limited. The context focuses on Daniel's people, not all humanity, and the phrase "many of" probably means "many, but not all" (cf. rabbim min elsewhere; e.g., Esther 8:17), rather than "the many" (cf. NIV: "multitudes"). In context, they are probably those who die in the final persecution, some rising to be rewarded for their resistance, others to be shamed for their collaboration. So this resurrection envisages the Jewish people, and possibly only one specific generation.

The two last texts are dated by nearly all scholars to much later than the times of their putative authors, Isaiah 24—27 as late postexilic and Daniel as second century. The theme of overcoming death forms part of the argument, since it is considered a very late development. In particular, resurrection in Daniel (as in 2 Maccabees) is interpreted as a theological response to the Antiochene persecution and Jewish martyrdom (e.g., Burkes). Thus, resurrection belief only emerged at the very end of the OT period, too late to influence other writers.

In contrast, some critical scholars propose an earlier, preexilic date for Isaiah 24—27, while conservative scholars continue to argue for the unity of Isaiah and Daniel, as respectively eighth- and sixth-century books. However, it must then be accepted that the potentially revolutionary belief in personal resurrection remained theologically unassimilated into Israelite faith. If glimpsed by Isaiah of Jerusalem and developed by Daniel in exile, the theme remained unexplored by these writers elsewhere and was ignored by successive prophets of the seventh to fifth centuries, as well as psalmists, sages and historians. To them, the concept of resurrection was unknown or incomprehensible, and their works maintain the traditional Israelite view of the unwelcome underworld. Thus, resurrection and life after death remained marginal to OT belief, whether chronologically or theologically, and awaited exploration in intertestamental literature and resolution in the NT.

See also DEATH.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. S. L. Burkes, God, Self, and Death: The Shape of Religious Transformation in the Second Temple Period (JSJSup 79; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2003) 87-158; J. Day, "The Development of Belief in Life after Death in Ancient Israel," in After the Exile: Essays in Honour of Rex Mason, ed. J. Barton and D. J. Reimer (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1996) 231-58; idem, “Resurrection Imagery from Baal to the Book of Daniel,” in Congress Volume: Cambridge, 1995, ed. J. A. Emerton (VTSup 66; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997) 125-33; P. S. Johnston, “Death and Afterlife,” DOTHB 215-18; idem, Shades of Sheol: Death and Afterlife in the Old Testament (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press; Leicester: Apollos, 2002); J. D. Levenson, Resurrection and the Restoration of Israel: The Ultimate Victory of the God of Life (New Haven: Yale University Press, 2006); R. L. Routledge, “Death and Afterlife in the Old Testament,” Journal of European Baptist Studies 9.1 (2008) 22-39. P.S. Johnston

AMOS, BOOK OF

The book of Amos, possibly the earliest legacy of the “writing prophets,” is a paradigm of the prophetic genre. It is notable especially for its powerful rhetorical language, while its most significant theological contribution to the biblical canon lies in the uncompromising censure of the social injustice prevalent in Israelite society in the eighth century BC.

1. Structure and Argument
2. Composition and Interpretation
3. Theology
4. Place in the Canon

1. Structure and Argument.

1.1. Structure. Until well into the 1980s it was common for OT scholarship to affirm that the Prophetic Books, Amos included, lack a clear structure. According to G. von Rad, “The prophetic corpus lies before us in what are, to some extent, very shapeless collections of traditional material, arranged with almost no regard for content or chronological order” (von Rad, 33). Of Amos it has been said that the book “has too little story, too little train of thought, and too little internal coherence to hold interest for more than a few verses or, at most, a chapter” (Coote, 1).

However, such views had to be thoroughly revised following detailed redaction- and rhetorical-critical investigations, with the effect that R. Gordon can now claim that “the prophetic books . . . clearly represent the work of craftsmen and rhetoricians who sought to influence not only by the content of the message but also by the literary form into which they molded it” (Gordon, 107). Similar conclusions have been reached with regard to the arrangement of Amos, but since the book features a complex array of structural devices and literary forms, no final consensus has been reached regarding its structure.

At the most basic level, Amos can be divided into three or four parts: Amos 1—2, the introduction; Amos 3—6, often labeled the “words”; Amos 7—9, the “visions.” The final verses of Amos 9 sometimes are treated as a separate part that is thought to have been appended in postexilic times. However, this outline, which provides no more than a general starting point, glosses over the fact that Amos 7—9, in addition to *visions, also features a historical narrative (Amos 7:10-17), judgment speeches (Amos 8:4-14) and a *salvation oracle (Amos 9:11-15). Observations such as this led some earlier commentators to reassign (some of) those sections to other parts of the book (see, e.g., the overview of proposed solutions regarding Amos 7:10-17 in Gordis, 217-18), but B. Childs probably is correct to conclude that “the editorial shaping established no theological significance between Amos’ words and visions” (Childs, 404).

In an attempt to move beyond the general tripartite outline, various proposals have been suggested. For instance, a structural function has sometimes been assigned to the hymn fragments in Amos 1:2 (if this is to be included among the hymn fragments); 4:13; 5:8-9; 9:5-6 (Koch), to the distribution and use of, in some cases, highly elaborate divine names (such as ’ādōnāy yhw̄h ’ēlōhē haṣṣēbā’ōt in Amos 3:13 [see Koch; Dempster]), to heptads and seven-plus-one series (Limburg) and to “telescoping n+1 patterns” (O’Connell). However, none of these proposals has won wide appeal (for further discussion, see Möller 2003, 62-88).

A far more popular approach has been to find a variety of chiasmic structures in the book of Amos. This endeavor goes back to some early studies by J. de Waard and N. Tromp, who argued that Amos 5:1-17 displays a concentric arrangement. Building upon these proposals, some have attempted to extend the outer limits of this central chiasm to include wider sections of the book. Intermediate steps are represented by the works of J. Lust, who extended the boundaries to Amos 4:1—6:7, and P. Noble, who found a chiasmic arrangement throughout Amos 3:9—6:14. The most far-reaching chiasms that have been suggested encompass more or less the entire book of Amos (see, e.g., Dorsey; Rottzoll). However, while the early studies by de Waard and Tromp successfully demonstrated the chiasmic arrangement of Amos 5:1-17, thus making a significant contribution to the study of the book of Amos, many of the proposals for more extensive concentric structures suffer from a tendency to rely on obscure section breaks, exaggerate the level of correspondence between purportedly parallel parts, or delete or rearrange passages that sit awkwardly within the proposed arrangement (see the discussion in Möller 2003, 64-74).

Perhaps a better way forward is to pay attention to indicators of aperture and closure within the text, such as divine speech formulas and other structural markers. Based on these, it has been suggested that, in addition to the historical superscription in Amos 1:1 and the motto in Amos 1:2, the book consists of nine major units (Möller 2003, 89-103). The first of these, the introductory series of oracles against the nations in Amos 1:3—2:16, is easily identified as one of the book's major sections due to its strophic arrangement, in which each of the eight oracles not only is introduced by the divine speech formula "This is what the LORD says," but also features additional recurring elements, such as the phrase "For three sins of . . . , even for four, I will not turn back my wrath." The occurrence of a major break after Amos 2:16 is signaled by the introductory words "Hear this word the LORD has spoken against you, O people of Israel" in Amos 3:1. Similar phrases in Amos 4:1 and Amos 5:1, together with other structural indicators, such as the inclusio achieved by the use of pāqad ("punish") in Amos 3:2, 14 and the chiasmic arrangement of Amos 5:1-17, indicate that the oracles against the nations are followed by three extended judgment speeches in Amos 3:1-15; 4:1-13; 5:1-17.

These judgment speeches give way to two extended woe oracles in Amos 5:18-27; 6:1-14, each of which is introduced by the term hōy ("woe"). In the visions-cum-narrative section Amos 7:1—8:3 we find another passage that is serial in nature in that each of its four visions is introduced by the words "This is what the Sovereign LORD/he showed me," a phrase that performs a similar function to the recurring divine speech formula in Amos 1:3—2:16. The two final parts are introduced by phrases that represent variations on the introductory markers employed in earlier sections of the book.

Thus, the words "hear this" mark the commencement of another judgment speech in Amos 8:4-14, while the book's conclusion in Amos 9:1-15 is opened by the phrase "I saw the LORD standing by the altar," which by its repetition of the term rā'â (Qal "see" in Amos 9:1; Hiphil "show" in Amos 7:1, 4, 7; 8:1) recalls the introductions to the earlier visions. These two final parts share some similarities in that both end in sections introduced by the eschatological formulas "in that day" (Amos 8:9, 13; 9:11) and "the days are coming" (Amos 8:11; 9:13). To summarize, this analysis suggests that the book of Amos falls into the following main parts: Amos 1:1-2; 1:3—2:16; 3:1-15; 4:1-13; 5:1-17; 5:18-27; 6:1-14; 7:1—8:3; 8:4-14; 9:1-15.

1.2. Argument. The book opens with a superscription (Amos 1:1), which briefly introduces the prophet Amos and outlines the period of his ministry with reference to the ruling kings in Israel and Judah, thus pointing to a time toward the earlier part of the eighth century BC (see Israelite History). The book's gloomy mood is foreshadowed in Amos 1:2, a verse perhaps best understood as the book's motto. This is followed by a series of oracles that threaten Israel's neighbors with the divine punishment for their atrocious war crimes (Amos 1:3—2:5). The series, which appears to play on the audience's nationalistic feelings, features an adroit rhetorical arrangement that moves from foreign *nations proper (Arameans, Philistines, Phoenicians) to Israel's blood relatives (Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites) before apparently settling on the sibling nation, Judah (Amos 2:4-5), whose inhabitants are accused of having rejected the divine Torah, as the prime target. However, Amos's words turn out to be a cleverly designed rhetorical trap, for his harangue eventually culminates in a judgment speech against the Israelites themselves (Amos 2:6-16). It is they who are singled out as the prime target of the divine punishment, and their inclusion in this powerful discourse suggests that the social injustice, the oppression of the poor and marginalized, that especially the upper echelons of Israel's society are guilty of is just as bad as, if indeed not worse than, the war crimes committed by their neighbors.

It has been argued that the book from this point on presents the debate between the prophet Amos and his complacent audience (see Möller 2003), who reject the prophetic message of judgment, relying instead on their cherished theological traditions (such as the *Day of the Lord [see Amos 5:18-20]). A reading of the book in its final form suggests that the debate is triggered by Amos's denunciation of Israel in the concluding part of the introductory series of oracles against the nations (Amos 2:6-16). To this the people apparently replied that they would not be punished by their God, who, after all, had elected them as his chosen people. The people's reply has to be inferred at this point, but similar responses are explicitly stated throughout (see Amos 5:14; 6:1-3; 9:10). In response to the Israelites' reliance upon their status as the chosen people, Amos, in what is the first of a series of extended judgment speeches addressed to Israel, stresses that this status, far from implying impunity from punishment, brings with it a greater level of responsibility (Amos 3:1-2).

That the book of Amos features the debate between the prophet and his audience is suggested not only by those passages that refer to the people's objections (e.g., Amos 5:14; 9:10), but also by the fact that the prophet feels compelled to reinterpret and subvert cherished theological concepts such as the *exodus tradition (Amos 2:9-10; 3:1-2; 9:7) and the Day of the Lord (Amos 5:18-20). Indeed, with regard to Amos's allusions to the exodus tradition, it can be seen that the prophet's stance becomes increasingly more radical. In Amos 2:9-10 the exodus is simply affirmed, and in Amos 3:1-2 the special responsibilities ensuing from Israel's election as God's chosen people are pointed out, while in Amos 9:7 any special status is now flatly denied. This is best understood in the context of a debate where positions have become more and more entrenched, thus demanding more drastic rhetorical measures from Amos if he is to succeed in his attempt to get his audience to face up to reality. The hymn fragments extolling God's destructive powers (Amos 4:13; 5:8-9; 9:5-6) and the acerbic criticism of Israel's religious activities (Amos 4:4-5; 5:21-23) are also best understood from the polemical perspective demanded by this dialogical context.

The judgment speeches in Amos 3:1-15; 4:1-13; 5:1-17, each of which is introduced by the phrase "Hear this word," reiterate the threat of the divine punishment, but they also represent progressive stages in the debate between the prophet and his audience. In Amos 3:1-15 the judgment is threatened at the beginning and reaffirmed at the end of the speech (Amos 3:1-2, 13-15). Its initial announcement once again features Amos's rhetorical shock tactics, for the basic meaning of the verb pāqad in Amos 3:2 is "to visit." In its context here, which talks about Israel's election, the natural assumption would be to take this as a friendly visit, and it is only when Amos makes the point that God is going to visit because of "all your sins" that it becomes clear that God's intention is to visit in order to punish his people. The concluding judgment section (Amos 3:13-15), which repeats the verb pāqad (Amos 3:14), underlines that the punishment is aimed especially at the rich, the owners of several, richly adorned houses, and that there will be no refuge anymore, since the horns of the altar, which would have guaranteed sanctuary (see Ex 21:13-14; 1 Kings 1:50; 2:28), will be cut off.

In between these framing judgment sections we find Amos arguing his case. First (Amos 3:3-8), in response to an apparent demand that he refrain from proclaiming such a terrible message, Amos employs a series of rhetorical questions to make the point that he has no other choice: "The Sovereign LORD has spoken; who can but prophesy?" He even, in another polemical twist, offers the supporting evidence of two witnesses, ironically provided by Ashdod and Egypt—described by one commentator as "experts in terms of oppression" (Rudolph, 163)—which are called upon to witness the oppression that is going on in Israel's midst (Amos 3:9-10) and that will lead to an enemy plundering the fortresses of the plunderers (Amos 3:10-11). But surely God would rescue his people from such an attack, or so the people assumed. To this objection Amos replies with heavy irony, indicating that there will be a "rescue," but only in the form of some worthless remains that merely prove that God's devastating judgment has indeed taken place (Amos 3:12). For that is the point of the remains that a shepherd might rescue from a lion's mouth: they serve as evidence that the animal truly has been torn by a wild beast (Ex 22:13; see also Gen 31:39).

The well-to-do are also the focus at the beginning of the next judgment speech (Amos 4:1-3), as Amos singles out Israel's upper-class women as an illustration of the lifestyle that Yahweh denounces. Again the oppression of the poor and needy is highlighted, together with what appears to be a drinking problem, as these “cows of Bashan,” as the *women are called, are known for demanding drink from their husbands. God now even swears that they will be punished for their outrageous behavior; and the punishment is described in the most drastic of terms (Amos 4:2-3). The numerous *sacrifices and tithes that the people boast about cannot avert this punishment (Amos 4:4-5), as Amos points out, again with the help of a heavy dose of irony, as he parodies a priest’s call to *worship. Whereas a priest might have encouraged the people to “go to Bethel and worship; go to Gilgal and bring your sacrifices,” Amos turns this on its head when he says, “Go to Bethel and sin; go to Gilgal and sin yet more” (Amos 4:4). Once more the judgment announced at the beginning of the discourse (Amos 4:2-3) is reaffirmed at least implicitly at its end when the Israelites are called upon to prepare for a meeting with a God who is described in highly ominous terms as the one who turns down to darkness and treads upon the high places of the earth (Amos 4:12-13). This meeting will be necessary not least because the people had failed to respond to Yahweh’s earlier acts of judgment, which had been intended to occasion their return to him (Amos 4:6-11).

The drama increases in the third judgment speech (Amos 5:1-17) when Amos suddenly laments Israel’s fall (Amos 5:1-3). When read in context, the text’s implication is that this is the outcome of Israel’s meeting with Yahweh, which appears to have resulted in the nation’s death. However, as we read on, the exhortation to seek God and live (Amos 5:4-6) indicates that it is not too late, and that the divine punishment might yet be averted. Yet the central part (Amos 5:7-13) of this chiasmatically arranged text underlines the existing crisis between Yahweh and Israel. God’s people, who pervert justice (Amos 5:7, 10, 12), commit social crimes and live a self-complacent life (Amos 5:11), are to face the creator God, whose awesome destructive powers are once again highlighted in one of the book’s hymn fragments (Amos 5:8-9). This contrast between Yahweh and his people provides the backdrop for another exhortation (Amos 5:14-15), which now admonishes the Israelites to seek good instead of *evil. If they were to do this, Yahweh might still be merciful toward at least the “remnant of Joseph.”

However, the concluding part (Amos 5:16-17) suggests otherwise. Forecasting the people’s wailing in response to the divine passing through their midst, it anticipates a negative outcome to Israel’s meeting with their God.

The ensuing “woe oracles” in Amos 5:18-27; 6:1-14 are fitting sequels to the lament in Amos 5:16-17. Again, the transition to Amos 5:18 from the preceding verse gives the impression of Amos reacting to an implied response by his addressees. The prophet’s references to Israel’s meeting with God (Amos 4:12; 5:17) triggered the people’s memory of the Day of the Lord tradition, which they understood to speak of a time when God would come to their rescue. Because they believed Yahweh to be with them (Amos 5:14), his arrival would be a glorious occasion, a day of light (Amos 5:18). But Amos turns the Day of the Lord tradition against them (Amos 5:18-20). That day, far from being a day of light, would turn out to be utter darkness. It would be a time of terror, as the prophet’s story of a person fleeing from a lion and getting away from a bear only to be bitten by a snake illustrates. Further reasons for Amos’s negative interpretation of the Day of the Lord are given in Amos 5:21-27, a passage that also explicates the consequences of that day as the people’s exile “beyond Damascus.” Here, as in Amos 4:4-5, the focus is on empty worship rituals together with a lack of concern for justice (Amos 5:21-24).

In the second woe oracle (Amos 6:1-14) Amos once more rebukes the people’s complacency and contemptuous lifestyle, which slights “the ruin of Joseph”—that is, the ruin of the poor (Amos 6:1-7). Again Amos appears to be reacting to the audience’s objections to his message of judgment. Those who trust in their military prowess, thinking that this would help them against any threat of exile, are reminded of others who had suffered military defeat despite their assumed strength (Amos 6:2-3). The ruling classes’ attempt to “put off the evil day” thus only testifies to their self-delusion, and their excessive decadence and complacency pictured in Amos 6:4-6 will soon come to an end when, in another ironic twist, Israel’s leaders will lead their people into exile (Amos 6:7). The remainder of this extended woe oracle sees Amos struggling to convince the Israelites that Yahweh is indeed going to punish them, that the impending judgment will be of the utmost severity (Amos 6:8-11, 14), that their pride and complacency are abhorred by God (Amos 6:8, 13), and that the injustice they are guilty of is profoundly irrational and unnatural (Amos 6:12).

The visions in Amos 7:1—8:3, together with the embedded narrative report of Amos's clash with the priest Amaziah, which confirms the hostile attitude of Amos's audience (Amos 7:10-17), emphasize that the punishment, while not desired by Amos, will not be averted (Amos 7:8; 8:2). Twice, having become alert to the disastrous consequences of Yahweh's destructive actions in the first two visions, Amos had been successful in obviating the judgment by interceding on Israel's behalf (Amos 7:2, 5). However, in the third vision (Amos 7:7-9) he is prevented from a similar course of action by the fact that there does not appear to be a picture of devastation. In fact, it seems that the significance of the third vision is not immediately clear to the prophet, and when he eventually receives an explanation, Yahweh, before spelling out the punishment, declares that he would not spare Israel again (Amos 7:8). At this point, the visions are interrupted by the story of Amos's encounter with Amaziah (Amos 7:10-17), which appears to have been included here because Amaziah's refusal to take Amos's words as a divine message (compare Amos's "then the LORD said" in Amos 7:8 with Amaziah's "this is what Amos is saying" in Amos 7:11) illustrates the problem that Amos had been facing all along. With the priest's intervention, which is intended to silence the prophet, the debate between Amos and his audience intensifies. The placement of the fourth vision (Amos 8:1-3) after this interlude stresses that the priest's attempt had been futile: God and his prophet cannot be silenced. This vision also features the climactic announcement that "the end has come upon my people Israel" (Amos 8:2).

In another judgment speech in Amos 8:4-14 Amos revisits the exploitative practices of the rich and powerful (Amos 8:4-6) (see Wealth and Poverty), before once again focusing upon the divine judgment and its implications (Amos 8:7-14). The judgment section, which is introduced by another divine oath (Amos 8:7), returns to the notion of Yahweh's awe-inspiring cosmic power (Amos 8:9). The theme of mourning and wailing also resurfaces (Amos 8:10), but the most striking feature is the announcement of a famine, yet not a famine of food and drink but rather of hearing the word of the Lord (Amos 8:11-13). This is poetic judgment par excellence: those who did not want to listen to Yahweh's word when Amos proclaimed it will one day hunger and thirst for it, but in vain. Their search for the life-sustaining word of Yahweh is described in vivid colors, but all their attempts will be futile (Amos 8:12).

The divine judgment that had been at the center of Amos's proclamation is depicted as finally occurring in the last, climactic vision (Amos 9:1-4), in which Amos witnesses Yahweh ordering the destruction of the temple. Its fall brings about the demise of the people, and although some may be able to make an initial escape, Yahweh will track them down wherever they hide. Now Israel's God is no longer content with his people's exile but instead is determined to destroy them (Amos 9:4). The book's final hymn fragment (Amos 9:5-6) underlines that no one could possibly escape from this God, who only has to touch the earth for it to melt and who can pour the waters of the sea out over the face of the earth. Now, in a last polemical flourish, Israel is denied special status altogether (Amos 9:7-8). Their exodus experience and election will not save them, as the sinful kingdom will be destroyed. It also becomes clear, however, that Israel's end (see Amos 8:2) entails not the total annihilation of the populace but rather the demise of Israel as a national entity, and that it is "all the sinners among [God's] people" who are the prime target of the divine judgment (Amos 9:9-10). Their identity has been revealed throughout the book in passages that talk about social injustice and hollow worship practices, but, in a fitting conclusion to the debate that Amos has been leading with his audience, the prophet emphasizes that it is the ones who had been complacent all along, thinking that "disaster will not overtake or meet us," who are most at risk.

An image of future restoration, agricultural abundance and security in the *land concludes the book (Amos 9:11-15). This envisaged future, contrary to J. Wellhausen's well-known dictum that these verses offer "roses and lavender instead of blood and iron" (Wellhausen, 96), does not mitigate, let alone negate, Amos's message of judgment. In line with a message that knows culprits and victims, hope is offered for those who are not to be counted among the sinners. From a rhetorical perspective, one might say that while the announcements of judgment provide “negative motivation” by warning the addressees not to continue with their present lifestyle, the salvation oracle in Amos 9:11-15 offers “positive motivation” by appealing to the audience’s hopes and aspirations. The book eventually closes with the words “says the LORD your God,” which is the only time that Yahweh is called “your God,” thus reinforcing the emotive impact of Amos’s final words, which seek to elicit a positive response from the prophet’s audience.

2. Composition and Interpretation.

The foregoing analysis of Amos’s argument is based on a rhetorical reading that engages with the final form of the text as it has come down to us and interprets the book without recourse to diachronic reflections on how the text might have come into being. This is in line with prominent developments in the study of the OT literature over the last thirty years, which have witnessed an increased focus on the study of the text’s final form that is primarily concerned with the investigation of its structure, poetics or rhetorical nature. These developments have also left their mark on Amos studies (see, e.g., Carroll R. 1992; Möller 2003). However, alongside the exploration of these new avenues, which also include studies that approach the text from various reader-centered perspectives that pay attention to the contribution made by the reader in the generation of meaning, there is an undiminished emphasis on the investigation of Amos’s composition that assumes that an adequate reading of the book must be able to relate its individual parts to their putative times of composition.

2.1. The Composition of the Book of Amos. Modern research on Amos shows the same tendencies as the scholarly investigation of the OT prophets generally. From the 1880s to the 1920s interpreters concentrated on the innovative impetus of the prophet, understood by some as an “ethical monotheist,” whose task it was to announce the divine ethical imperative (Wellhausen). This stress often went hand in hand with a search for Amos’s ipsissima verba, the very words of the prophetic genius. From the 1920s onward form and tradition critics reversed this trend when they focused on the social and institutional settings (such as the Israelite cult or certain wisdom circles) of the speech forms used by Amos and understood the prophet largely as a transmitter of traditional theological convictions (see Form Criticism). What characterized these early approaches was their concern with the oral stages of the prophet’s words. In contrast to this earlier emphasis, redaction criticism, which emerged in the 1960s, attends to the book’s literary history and attempts to trace its stages of growth (see Editorial/Redaction Criticism). Contrary to their predecessors, who were interested in the prophet’s ipsissima verba, which were deemed to be far superior to any “secondary” or “inauthentic” additions, redaction critics reject such pejorative labels and affirm the value of contributions made by later redactors in their quest to adapt the prophetic message to changed historical circumstances.

The beginnings of redaction-critical work on Amos can be traced back to W. Schmidt’s 1965 article, in which he argued that several passages show the influence of a Deuteronomistic redaction. Schmidt’s conclusions, which were based primarily on philological observations (i.e., on comparisons of certain phrases in Amos with the language and style of the Deuteronomists), had a significant impact on Amos studies, affecting, for instance, H. Wolff’s influential presentation of the book’s redactional growth. Wolff was the first to posit that behind the book of Amos lay a long history of literary growth, stretching from the eighth century BC down to postexilic times and leading to the book’s six redactional layers. However, since the first three stages are thought to date either to Amos’s own time or to the period immediately following his prophetic ministry, in Wolff’s redaction-critical model the majority of the book is still understood in close connection with the prophet himself.

Wolff’s work on the redaction history of the book of Amos, though highly influential, found few supporters as such. However, it did lead to further attempts to come to terms with the book’s composition, the most notable of which has been provided by J. Jeremias, who published a series of redaction-critical studies as well as a commentary on Amos. Similarly to Wolff, he believes that the book has been continually updated in order to adapt its meaning to changed historical situations. According to Jeremias, Amos’s message therefore “can be recovered only through complicated, and in many instances only hypothetical, reconstruction" (Jeremias, 5). And he maintains that the book as we now have it in the biblical canon comes from the (late) postexilic period, having undergone a long redactional process that spanned several centuries. This, in Jeremias's view, is highly significant for the book's interpretation, for "the modern exegete must deal first of all with the exilic/postexilic history of transmission of Amos' message. Any attempt to get back to earlier strata of the book, not to speak of Amos' actual words themselves, is necessarily burdened by a (variously differing) degree of uncertainty" (Jeremias, 9).

One of the most complex analyses of Amos's literary growth has been provided by D. Rottzoll, who isolates no fewer than twelve redactional layers, each of which he seeks to link to its own specific historical setting. The account of redaction-critical developments up to this point might suggest that the findings have become increasingly complex, with the number of proposed redactional layers ever increasing, but it should be noted that this is not necessarily the case. Thus, for instance, A. Park has detected only three compositional layers, all three of which, he claims, have been composed during the preexilic era. Most recently, T. Hadjiev has similarly argued for a less complex scenario, suggesting that a "repentance scroll," written in the northern kingdom, was later reworked in Judah when its message was applied to the southern kingdom. Sometime later, an independently composed "polemical scroll" was added before the resulting book was edited once more in the exilic period.

2.2. Amos and the Redaction of the Twelve.

Whereas the works surveyed above agree in their assumption that the development of the book of Amos was a self-contained process, from around the mid-1980s onwards there has been a constant flow of studies that have moved beyond the boundaries of the individual Prophetic Books in an attempt to trace the redaction history of the minor prophets, or the so-called *Book of the Twelve, as a whole. Here the assumption is that the redaction history of Prophetic Books such as Amos did not develop in isolation from the other books that make up the Twelve. Instead, it has been suggested that these books were gathered together from a fairly early stage in their development, and that subsequent editors or redactors not only left their mark on individual books, but also were engaged in redactional operations that spanned several of the books within the Twelve.

Important stages in the investigation of the redaction history of the Twelve, which cannot be traced here in any detail, include E. Bosshard's observation of structural similarities between Isaiah and the Twelve, which he interpreted as reflecting deliberate redactional efforts by the same tradents, and J. Nogalski's two-volume work, which investigates redactional catchword links and proposes that two multivolume collections (i.e., a "deuteronomic corpus," consisting of early versions of Hosea, Amos, Micah and Zephaniah, and a "Haggai-Zechariah 1—8 corpus") eventually were combined into a "Joel layer." This layer, dated to the fourth century BC, also included Nahum, Habakkuk, Joel, Obadiah and Malachi, while the subsequent addition of Zechariah 9—14 and Jonah at last completed the Twelve's redaction history.

One of the difficulties with proposals that focus on catchword links between adjacent books lies in the possibility that the order of the individual books within the Book of the Twelve may have been somewhat variable, as is indicated by a comparison of the MT with the versions found in the LXX and in 4Q76, one of the texts discovered at Qumran (see Dead Sea Scrolls). Indeed, it has been suggested that the order preserved in the LXX should be considered to reflect the original ordering of the Twelve, which, if correct, would seriously undermine many of the redaction-critical proposals that have been advanced in recent years. Finally, mention should be made of A. Scharf's study, which is of particular interest in this context because it understands the development of the Twelve as a gradual process of revisions of the book of Amos. As envisaged by Scharf, the process is thought to be far more complex than the scenarios proposed by Nogalski and others in that the development of the Book of the Twelve is supposed to have gone through multiple redactional layers.

2.3. Interpreting Amos. The redaction-critical study of Amos has made a substantial contribution to our understanding of the book. Redaction criticism represents a major advance over against earlier attempts at identifying the prophet's ipsissima verba in assigning a more positive role to proposed redactional additions, which are no longer regarded as inauthentic and inferior. Despite redaction criticism's interest in earlier redactional layers and the tracing of the book's development, the canonical text is generally regarded in more positive terms in that subsequent modifications of the prophetic message are understood as legitimate endeavors to relate Amos's words to changed historical circumstances. In addition to this positive outlook on the redactors' work, redaction criticism's minute attention to details has also helped to advance our understanding of Amos.

However, perceived weaknesses in redaction-critical methodology have led to the emergence of alternative approaches that concentrate on the received text of the book of Amos rather than its assumed literary development. The ostensible presence of textual inconsistencies and intertextual verbal clues that have played a major role in redaction-critical reconstructions has been questioned by some. But perhaps more importantly, it has been pointed out that redaction criticism's insistence that a proper understanding of the biblical books necessitates that readers are capable of relating individual passages to their presumed historical contexts, which in turn presupposes detailed knowledge not only of those contexts but also of redaction-critical methodology and findings, has had the effect of taking the Bible out of the hands of the laity. This, ironically, reverses the aspiration of the Reformation, whose heirs many redaction critics claim to be, for the Reformers were intent upon making it possible for Scripture to be understood apart from any overriding authority, which in their day and age would have referred to the church. Another serious problem with the redaction-critical approach is that historical interpretation of Amos's redactional layers often runs counter to the perspective demanded by the text itself, as B. Childs especially has highlighted (Childs, 408). However one believes the book to have come into being, canonically it is best read as what it purports to be: the words of the prophet Amos (Amos 1:1).

Some major commentators on Amos (e.g., F. Andersen and D. Freedman; S. Paul) have therefore largely resisted redaction-critical trends. In addition, several approaches have emerged that concentrate on Amos's final form, seeking to elucidate the book's poetics (Carroll R. 1992) or to apply a rhetorical-critical perspective (Möller 2003). In the former case, the book is subjected to a detailed literary analysis that pays close attention not only to formal textual mechanics, such as structural markers and rhetorical devices, but also to characterization and point of view in order to enable readers to enter the world of the text. When coupled with a theological hermeneutic, such an approach can help us to address questions such as how the representation of reality in the textual word of the book of Amos, including its depiction of the identities of God and his people, might draw modern readers of faith into the book's "covenantal discourse" and challenge them to respond to the divine demands and guidance for life in once again very significantly changed historical situations.

Rhetorical-critical readings (see Rhetorical Criticism) that apply a sociolinguistic model of interpretation and approach the prophetic literature as a form of social discourse understand the book's rhetoric in suasive terms and thus seek to explicate its "art of persuasion." Based on the classical Aristotelian conception of rhetoric and, in some cases, on the steps of rhetorical-critical analysis outlined by G. Kennedy (Kennedy, 33-38), these readings pay close attention to the rhetorical situation and the specific problem or exigency that occasioned the utterance in question. In the case of the book of Amos, it has been suggested that the presentation of the prophet struggling, and failing, to convince his eighth-century BC Israelite audience that their God would punish them for their disregard for the poor was utilized as a cautionary precedent in a subsequent Judean context, a time when Amos's successors were for their part striving to convince their fellow Judeans of the impending divine judgment should they fail to mend their ways (Möller 2003, 119-20). The rhetorical situation influences the rhetorical choices made by the speaker or writer, such as Amos's rhetoric of entrapment that was mentioned above in connection with the book's oracles against the nations.

The rhetorical situation and problem also determine the choice of rhetorical genre. In the book of Amos the judicial genre is prevalent, yet this does not necessarily reflect the author's main purpose, as has sometimes been argued (see Kennedy, 19), but might rather be indicative of the rhetorical strategy, which is yet another aspect that has attracted scrutiny by rhetorical critics. In Amos the presence of nonjudicial rhetoric (such as rhetorical questions) and the inclusion of the prophet's appeal to his audience's emotions—for instance, in the warning that the divine punishment would lead to a time of lamentation and wailing (Amos 5:1-3, 16-17; 8:10)—suggest that the overarching purpose of those presenting the prophet's debate with his Israelite audience is best described not as judicial but rather as deliberative: it is an attempt to persuade subsequent Judean readers to reexamine their own lifestyle and theological assumptions, especially regarding issues such as divine election and protection. Rhetorical critics also seek to evaluate the rhetorical effectiveness of the discourse in question, whether or to what degree the utterance is a fitting response to the exigency that prompted it. With reference to Amos, one might conclude that “at a time when, for instance, the prophet Isaiah, criticizing the Judean elite for their social crimes and luxurious lifestyle, announced the divine judgment as a consequence of the people's wrongdoings, the book of Amos would have been a powerful means for backing up that message” (Möller 2003, 296).

The canonical approach developed by B. Childs and those following in his footsteps similarly focuses on Amos's final form (see Canonical Criticism). While acknowledging that the book is the result of complex literary developments, the stance endorsed by proponents of this approach is one in which the interpreter identifies with the perspective suggested by the text itself. Childs illustrates this with reference to the salvation oracle in Amos 9:11-15. Whereas redaction critics tend to regard this passage as a commentary on the *exile, a reality that the redactor had already experienced, in Amos 9 both the threatened *destruction and exile and the promise of the nation's subsequent restoration are in fact presented as future events. It is for this and similar reasons that Childs arrived at the conclusion, already alluded to above, that redaction-critical readings (Childs refers specifically to Wolff's approach) often run counter to the perspective demanded by the biblical text itself (Childs, 408).

It probably is fair to say that the last two decades have seen some greater awareness among Western biblical scholars of the contribution made to the study of the book of Amos by those who understand themselves as reading “from the margins” or “from below,” from the perspective of marginalized groups throughout the world. These are intentionally contextual readings (although it is now more widely acknowledged and understood that any reading is determined to a large extent by the context in which it originates) that approach the biblical text out of a deep desire to redress injustices endured because of race or gender and all too frequently legitimated by the biblical interpretation of those in power. A helpful introduction to these readings that is still reasonably up-to-date has been provided by M. Carroll R., who refers to African American, Hispanic American, *feminist and womanist perspectives and looks at ideological critique of Amos, ecological readings and interpretations from Africa and Latin America (Carroll R. 2002, 53-72) (see Hermeneutics).

Some of these readings have found in Amos's “alternative imagination” an ally “that persuades the reader that ultimate power, far from being ‘a monopoly of throne and temple,’ remains with Amos's God” (García-Treto, 124) or “a model dissenting voice to what appears to have been the prevailing way of thinking about Israel's divine election,” a voice that “criticizes the hegemonic interpretation of what it meant to be God's elect people” (Weems, 222). Others, adopting a hermeneutics of suspicion, have been critical of the way the poor are “gendered” in Amos and of the book's apparent lack of concern with the lamentable fate of poor women in eighth-century BC Israel (Sanderson). It is, however, instructive to note M. Carroll R.'s observation that “the level of suspicion argued by First World scholars does not find an echo in the Two-Thirds World” (Carroll R. 2002, 67), where the book of Amos tends to be received as an encouragement and an inspiration by liberationists committed to social change.

3. Theology.

Since the early part of the twentieth century there has been a strong tendency to regard the prophet Amos as the messenger of an inescapable and all-inclusive divine punishment. Yet this has not gone uncontested, as others have rejected what has been described as the construal of the prophet as the messenger of a nation-murdering God, maintaining that Amos's proclamation aimed at *repentance rather than the announcement of an inexorable disaster. More recently, the application of sociolinguistic approaches such as rhetorical criticism and speech-act theory has gone some way toward overcoming the aforementioned dichotomy by demonstrating that prophetic judgment oracles, by their very nature, evoke the possibilities of ineluctable doom and of mercy invoked by repentance (see Möller 2001).

Discussions of Amos's theology, such as those alluded to above, have tended to focus on the theology of the prophet Amos rather than on the theological contribution made by the book bearing his name. Moreover, the understanding that Amos's theology is restricted to an unconditional announcement of divine punishment goes hand in hand with judgments regarding the inauthenticity or secondary nature of passages, such as the calls to seek God in Amos 5:4-6, 14-15 and the salvation oracle in Amos 9:11-15, which seem to contradict the prophet's categorical proclamation of judgment by offering some rays of hope. Of course, a different picture emerges once it is admitted that prophetic oracles of judgment are genuinely open to the two possibilities of ineluctable doom and of mercy invoked by repentance. In this case, glimpses of hope and salvation are no longer as incompatible and out of place as is frequently maintained.

Yet another situation arises with the focus shifting to the theology of the book of Amos, although in this case too there are at least two principal avenues along which to proceed. One is the route taken by redaction criticism, which concentrates on the gradual development of the emerging book's theology. This has been traced in a variety of ways, but the general principle is that each subsequent version needs to be understood as a theological response to the specific time of its composition or redaction. As noted above, some redaction-critical proposals envisage highly complex scenarios involving several stages in the development of the book and thus also its theology. To illustrate this with a simple example, redaction critics generally maintain that the theologies of the book's earlier versions did not include the message of hope and salvation now found in Amos 9:11-15, and that this was introduced only during the final stage of its development by exilic or postexilic redactors whose theology once again reflects and responds to the exigencies of their own situation.

Another approach to the discussion of Amos's theology is to focus on the book's final form. Although redaction criticism also eventually arrives at this, for other scholars Amos's canonical text has been the focal point throughout. From such a perspective, a "full" theological reading entails not only an awareness of the prophet's condemnation of the social injustice prevalent in Israelite society and the attendant threat of the forthcoming divine judgment; it also includes an appreciation of Amos's vision of a restored people who, at some stage in their future, will once again enjoy life in the land under the divine blessing. Other theological emphases appear in, for instance, the oracles against foreign nations (Amos 1—2), which highlight God's sovereign control over the entire world and his resolve to hold the nations accountable for their inhumane war crimes, and in the book's hymn fragments (Amos 4:13; 5:8-9; 9:5-6) with their focus on God's awesome power displayed in creation and de-creation.

As regards contemporary engagement with Amos's theology, special attention should be drawn to Latin American theologies of liberation, for which the book of Amos has been a highly inspirational text. Interpreting it out of their own concrete political, economic and social circumstances, such readings have discovered a great sense of affinity between those conditions and the world depicted in the biblical text. And this affinity has enabled liberationist interpreters to appropriate Amos's message in their desire to modify prevailing political and economic realities and construct a society characterized by solidarity with the poor and marginalized and "sacrificial service in the struggle to eradicate oppression" (Carroll R. 1992, 19).

4. Place in the Canon.

As noted above, recent redaction-critical scholarship has devoted considerable effort to the investigation of Amos's place in the Book of the Twelve, not only historically but also in terms of its literary links with other parts of the Twelve. Redaction critics have paid particular attention to literary echoes, such as that of Joel 3:16a (מִן 4:16a) in Amos 1:2, which are commonly regarded as deliberate redactional linkages aimed at juxtaposing the two prophetic writings. While these observations have led to a variety of suppositions concerning the development of the book of the Twelve, they also are profitably employed in a canonical reading of the text that seeks to interpret Amos in the light of its place in the biblical canon. However, such a canonical perspective is not confined to perceived literary links but seeks also to read the entire book of Amos against the wider context provided by the canon, beginning with the Book of the Twelve but also considering, in turn, the prophetic corpus more generally, the OT as a whole and, ultimately, the full biblical canon consisting of OT and NT.

From such a canonical viewpoint, Amos's message of judgment can be fruitfully compared with, for instance, a text such as Habakkuk 1:12-17. For whereas one prophet, Amos, can readily and unproblematically announce a divine judgment in the form of an enemy invasion, Habakkuk, by raising the question of theodicy that such an enemy attack elicits, offers an intriguing canonical counterperspective. In the wider outlook afforded by the canon of the OT and regardless of how the historical relationship between the prophets and the Torah is construed, Amos is portrayed as presupposing some of the stipulations found in the Torah (see Law). Examples of this include the regulations regarding a garment taken in pledge (Ex 22:26), which are referred to in Amos 2:8, and the instructions concerning the remains of an animal mangled by wild beasts (Ex 22:13), which inform Amos's ironic statement about rescue in Amos 3:12. From a canonical viewpoint, such passages present the prophet as an interpreter and an enforcer of the divine instructions contained in the Torah. Another link between Amos and the Torah has been seen in the book's utilization of the language of the pentateuchal curses and blessings in its numerous judgment speeches and the salvation oracle in Amos 9:11-15 (see Stuart, xxxi-xlii).

Canonical links between the NT and the book of Amos are most readily perceived in the two quotations found in the book of Acts. In Acts 7:42-43 Amos 5:25-27 is interpreted as a reference to Israel's idolatry during the time in the wilderness, whereas in Acts 15:13-18 James reapplies the rebuilding of David's fallen booth (Amos 9:11-12) to God forming a new people for himself from among the Gentiles. But it would be wrong to give the impression that a canonical reading is dependent upon direct quotations. In the pages of the NT allusions to the OT abound at many different levels, beckoning us to read one in the light of the other. A general illustration of this is the ministry of Jesus, whose praxis and eschatological message about the kingdom of God evince clear links with the OT prophets. Another example concerns certain statements in the letter of James regarding the luxurious lifestyle of the rich and their oppression of the poor (Jas 2:6-7; 5:1-6), which clearly are influenced by the language of the OT prophets generally and perhaps some of Amos's speeches in particular.

See also DAY OF THE LORD; SOCIAL JUSTICE; TWELVE, BOOK OF THE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Commentaries: F. I. Andersen and D. N. Freedman, Amos: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (AB 24A; New York: Doubleday, 1989); J. Jeremias, The Book of Amos: A Commentary, trans. D. W. Stott (OTL; Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1998); S. M. Paul, Amos: A Commentary on the Book of Amos (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); W. Rudolph, Joel, Amos, Obadja, Jona (KAT 13/2; Gütersloh: Mohn, 1971); J. E. Sanderson, "Amos," in The Women's Bible Commentary, ed. C. A. Newsom and S. H. Ringe (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1992) 205-9; D. Stuart, Hosea—Jonah (WBC 31; Waco, TX: Word, 1987); H. W. Wolff, Joel and Amos: A Commentary on the Books of the Prophets Joel and Amos, trans. W. Janzen, S. D. McBride Jr. and C. A. Muenchow, ed. S. D. McBride Jr. (Hermeneia; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977). Studies: E. Bosshard, "Beobachtungen zum Zwölfprophetenbuch," BN 40 (1987) 30-62; M. D. Carroll R., Contexts for Amos: Prophetic Poetics in Latin American Perspective (JSOTSup 132; Sheffield: JSOT, 1992); idem, Amos—The Prophet and His Oracles: Research on the Book of Amos (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 2002); B. S. Childs, Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); R. B. Coote, Amos among the Prophets: Composition and Theology (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1981); J. de Waard, "The Chiasmic Structure of Amos v 1-17," VT 27 (1977) 170-77; S. Dempster, "The Lord Is His Name: A Study of the Distribution of the Names and Titles of God in the Book of Amos," RB 98 (1991) 170-89; D. A. Dorsey, "Literary Architecture and Aural Structuring Techniques in Amos," Bib 73 (1992) 305-30; F. O. García-Treto, "A Reader-Response Approach to Prophetic Conflict: The Case of Amos 7.10-17," in The New Literary Criticism and the Hebrew Bible, ed. J. C. Exum and D. J. A. Clines (JSOTSup 143; Sheffield: JSOT, 1993) 114-24; R. Gordis, "The Composition and Structure of Amos," in Poets, Prophets, and Sages: Essays in Biblical Interpretation (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1971) 217-29; R. P. Gordon, "The Place Is Too Small for Us": The Israelite Prophets in Recent Scholarship (SBTS 5; Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1995); T. S. Hadjiev, The Composition and Redaction of the Book of Amos (BZAW 393; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2009); G. A. Kennedy, New Testament Interpretation through Rhetorical Criticism (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1984); K. Koch, "Die Rolle der hymnischen Abschnitte in der Komposition des Amos-Buches," ZAW 86 (1974) 504-37; J. Limburg, "Sevenfold Structures in the Book of Amos," JBL 106 (1987) 217-22; J. Lust, "Remarks on the Redaction of Amos V 4-6, 14-15," in Remembering All the Way: A Collection of Old Testament Studies Published on the Occasion of the Fortieth Anniversary of the Oudtestamentisch Werkgezelschap in Nederland, ed. B. Albrektson et al. (OtSt 21; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1981) 129-54; K. Möller, "Words of (In-)evitable Certitude? Reflections on the Interpretation of Prophetic Oracles of Judgement," in After Pentecost: Language and Biblical Interpretation, ed. C. Bartholomew, C. Greene and K. Möller (SHS 2; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2001) 352-86; idem, A Prophet in Debate: The Rhetoric of Persuasion in the Book of Amos (JSOTSup 372; London: Sheffield Academic, 2003); P. R. Noble, "The Literary Structure of Amos: A Thematic Approach," JBL 114 (1995) 209-26; J. D. Nogalski, Literary Precursors to the Book of the Twelve (BZAW 217; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1993); idem, Redactional Processes in the Book of the Twelve (BZAW 218; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1993); R. H. O'Connell, "Telescoping N+1 Patterns in the Book of Amos," VT 46 (1996) 56-73; A. W. Park, The Book of Amos as Composed and Read in Antiquity (SBL 37; New York: Peter Lang, 2001); D. U. Rottzoll, Studien zur Redaktion und Komposition des Amosbuchs (BZAW 243; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1996); A. Schart, Die Entstehung des Zwölfprophetenbuchs: Neubearbeitungen von Amos im Rahmen schriftenübergreifender Redaktionsprozesse (BZAW 260; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1998); W. H. Schmidt, "Die deuteronomistische Redaktion des Amosbuchs: Zu den theologischen Unterschieden zwischen dem Prophetenwort und seinem Sammler," ZAW 77 (1965) 168-93; N. J. Tromp, "Amos V 1-17: Towards a Stylistic and Rhetorical Analysis," in Prophets, Worship, and Theodicy: Studies in Prophetism, Biblical Theology, and Structural and Rhetorical Analysis, and on the Place of Music in Worship, ed. A. S. van der Woude (OtSt 23; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1984) 56-84; G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, 2: The Theology of Israel's Prophetic Traditions, trans. D. M. G. Stalker (Edinburgh: Oliver & Boyd, 1965); R. J. Weems, "Womanist Reflections on Biblical Hermeneutics," in Black Theology: A Documentary History, 2: 1980-1992, ed. J. H. Cone and G. S. Wilmore (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1993) 216-24; J. Wellhausen, Die kleinen Propheten (4th ed.; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1963).

K. Möller

ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN PROPHECY

One of the most exciting changes in the study of prophecy in the Hebrew Bible in the last thirty years is the realization that other ancient Near Eastern cultures also knew prophecy, just as there were prophets in Israel. Not only do they know of people who occasionally were inspired to speak in a deity's name, but also there were "professional" prophets, people recognized as regularly speaking in the name of a deity. This article focuses on those individuals in the ancient Near East who were "professional" prophets and, therefore, whose social and religious role is directly comparable to that of the Israelite nābī.

1. The Corpora
2. Terminology
3. Comparison of Prophecy in the Hebrew Bible and in the Ancient Near East

1. The Corpora.

Most texts come from two large archives: the royal archive from Old Babylonian Mari (eighteenth century BC) and the Neo-Assyrian state archives (seventh century BC). Some of the texts preserve oracles transmitted in letters by governors and priests to their king; other texts are administrative documents that attest to the existence of prophets even when we do not have oracular material. In addition, there are some Aramaic inscriptions from Transjordan. Prophecy as such is usually not identified in Egyptian, Ugaritic and Hittite sources, but a number of recent studies have challenged this consensus. Recent English translations of virtually all ancient Near Eastern prophetic texts can be found in Nissinen 2003c. Some, but not all, of the texts are also available in ANET 449-55, 604-7.

1.1. Old Babylonian/Mari. The royal archives from Mari were found in excavations of Tell Hariri on the Euphrates in Eastern Syria close to the Syrian-Iraqi border in the first half of the twentieth century. There are about fifty administrative letters containing reports of prophetic oracles written by high officials such as governors and addressed to the king, most of them to King Zimri-Lim, but a few also to Yasmah-Addu, his predecessor. The first text was published in 1950, but most texts have recently been edited by J.-M. Durand and D. Charpin. There are also other administrative texts, such as lists of expenses, which show that prophets were provided for by the royal administration. Most oracles contained in the letters are concerned with cultic provisions for various temples and military matters, and they include some criticism of the king's behavior. There are also one to two texts each from Ishchali (Ellis 1987), Uruk (van Dijk) and Kish (Dalley).

1.2. Neo-Assyrian State Archives. The Neo-Assyrian state archives have been known for over a century, and the so-called Sammeltafeln (tablets collecting several oracles) were first published in 1889 by A. Delattre. Despite the obvious similarities between these texts and some biblical passages, few Hebrew Bible scholars took note of them until their reedition in 1997 by S. Parpola. In addition to the two Sammeltafeln, there is one adê ("covenant")-tablet, several tablets containing a single oracle, a few letters containing quoted oracles, and administrative documents attesting to prophets, most of which are published in Nissinen 1998b.

1.3. Aramaic Inscriptions. There are three *Aramaic inscriptions with prophetic content: the Deir 'Alla inscription (750-650 bc), the Zakkur inscription (805-775 bc) and the Amman citadel inscription (late ninth century bc).

1.3.1. Deir 'Alla. The Deir 'Alla inscription contains an oracle of doom by Balaam bar Beor, the h[z]h 'lhn ("seer of the gods"). This inscription recently has been interpreted as an indication that not all ancient Near Eastern prophecy was positive for the king (Blum; Williamson). There can be little doubt that the archival nature of ancient Near Eastern evidence for prophecy has a bias toward supportive messages, and that negative oracles were not preserved; however, they did presumably occur, as indicated by SAA 16 59, a letter to the king in which it is reported that a female slave prophesied in support of a rival pretender to the throne. The oracle preserved in the Deir 'Alla inscription is a literary narrative creation, and in its depiction of an apocalyptic future it is more akin to Egyptian literary predictive texts such as the so-called Prophecy of Neferti than prophetic oracles preserved in Akkadian texts or in the Hebrew Bible. It also shows that the genre "predictive text" was known in Transjordan, close to Israel, in the early eighth century bc.

1.3.2. Zakkur. The Zakkur inscription is a royal inscription by King Zakkur of Hamath. In the text he thanks his god Ba'al-Samen for rescuing him from Bar Hadad II, who had laid siege to Zakkur. According to the inscription, Ba'al-Samen answered [b]yd hzyn whyd 'ddn ("through seers and messengers") and it contains the classical "fear not" formula of salvation oracles from Neo-Assyrian and biblical texts (Nissinen 2003b). The term 'ddn, plural of 'dd, comparable to biblical Hebrew 'dd in 2 Chronicles 15:1; 28:9, is difficult to translate (Barstad 2003).

1.3.3. Amman Citadel. The Amman Citadel inscription is difficult to decipher, and so it is unclear whether it is intended as recording an oracle from Milkom or as a narrative about the beneficiary deeds of that deity. Despite the argument that if these words are Milkom's, they must be prophecy (Sasson), it is unclear whether this oracle is prophetic or was gained by more technical means (see 2.4 below the question of technical versus intuitive divination).

1.4. Corpora in Which the Existence of Prophecy Is Disputed (Egypt, Ugarit, Hittites, Ebla, Emar).

1.4.1. Egypt. For most of the twentieth century, there has been a consensus that the socioreligious phenomenon "prophecy" did not exist in Egypt. Instead, there are several texts that could be regarded as falling into the category "literary predictive texts" (Ellis 1989): the Prophecy of Neferti and the Admonitions of Ipu-Wer. There is also the story of Wenamun, the Egyptian official sent to Byblos to buy wood who, during his adventures, encounters prophets (Schipper). Apart from the travelogue told by Wenamun, none of these texts explicitly includes a human intermediary from a deity to a human addressee, which is one of the requirements according to the standard definition of prophecy (Weippert, 289-90; Nissinen 2004). Either, like in Neferti, the human is portrayed as a wise man who knows the future or, like in the Memphis and Karnak stelae, the deity speaks directly to the royal addressee. This led N. Shupak to come forward with her interpretation of these religious specialists as wise men (Shupak 1990; 2006, #3063).

More recently, two approaches have reassessed the use of the Egyptian texts for the study of prophecy in the Hebrew Bible and in ancient Israel. J. Hilber (2012; forthcoming) has attempted to find evidence for prophetic activity in victory inscriptions. As with Mesopotamian inscriptions, it is always possible that words ascribed to deities in inscriptions result from prophetic activity, but any other form of *divination can also be their source. The other approach regards Egyptian literary texts as appropriate comparative material to prophecy in the Hebrew Bible precisely because they are literary productions; Egyptian and biblical texts are, to a large extent, representatives of the genre "literary predictive texts" (Grabbe, 86-87; Scurlock; Weeks).

The only Egyptian text that may go back to the socioreligious phenomenon "prophecy" is Wenamun, the story of an Egyptian official on a rather adventurous journey to Byblos to acquire timber for the Amun-Re temple at Karnak. Everything that could go wrong on his journey does go wrong: his money is stolen, and he is even arrested. Wenamun's fortunes change only when a person referred to as 'dd '3 appears and, while in trance, announces a divine decree to let Wenamun go. The term 'dd '3 is extremely rare (only here and in P. Berlin 10494) and is now mostly translated as "ecstatic" because of the similarities with Aramaic 'dd. Whether or not this text is fictitious, the person who goes into ecstasy is not Egyptian, but Phoenician. Thus, if this Egyptian text is read as an example of prophecy, it should be taken not as Egyptian prophecy but rather as Levantine prophecy.

1.4.2. Ugarit. Recently, N. Wyatt suggested that an episode in the Keret epic (KTU 1.15 ii 17-iii 19) should be understood as a prophetic oracle. However, in that text El talks directly to Keret rather than going through an intermediary, rather like in many ancient Near Eastern dreams.

1.4.3. Hittites. It is unclear whether the Hittite term LÚ DINGIR^{lim}-ni-an-za-ma ("ecstatic man of god") should be translated as prophet as suggested by R. Beal. The most promising context for finding out its significance is in the Second Plague Prayer by Muršili II: "Let me either see it in a dream, or let it be established through an oracle, or let an 'ecstatic man of god' declare it." G. Beckman points to 1 Samuel 28:6, where the same order (dreams, oracles, prophets) occurs, and therefore he translates the Hittite term as "prophet." This may well be justified, but the data does not provide any further information as to how these "prophets" operated, and "unfortunately no examples of their utterances survive" (Beal, 381). Additionally, the term "man of the Storm-god" occurs in Middle Hittite rituals denoting a priest who introduces the king to the deity but who does not seem to perform any divinatory functions (Taggar-Cohen, 248-70).

1.4.4. Ebla. In 1976 G. Pettinato claimed that he had found two classes of prophets in texts from twenty-fourth century BC Ebla, the mahhû and the nabî'utum. In 1977 Pettinato modified this to nabî and mahhû, citing TM.75 G.428 and 1860. The second of the two texts was already well known to the scholarly public, as Pettinato previously had claimed that it contained reference to Sodom and Gomorrah. Pettinato later admitted that this tablet is a metallurgical text and does not contain references to Sodom and Gomorrah or prophets (Archi, 151-52). Despite this, references to prophecy at Ebla can still be found in modern scholarly literature. While it is impossible to prove that prophecy did not exist in Ebla, we can confidently say that no evidence of it, textual or otherwise, has reached us today.

1.4.5. Emar. The textual evidence for the existence of prophecy at Emar is somewhat stronger but by no means conclusive. The root nb is attested in two professional titles, nabû* and munabbiātu*, in the following four texts: Emar 373:97', 379:11-12, 383:10' and 406:5' (Arnaud 1986; 1987). D. Fleming (1993a; 1993b; 1993c) adduced these titles, and the isolated occurrence of the nabî ša Ḥanameš in a text from Mari (ARM 26 216), arguing for an active etymology of Hebrew nābî, for which he was criticized by J. Huehnergard (for Fleming's response, see Fleming 2004). Because the Mari text is often understood as referring to prophecy, Fleming and others regard the Emar occurrence as referring to prophecy too. However, it is by no means certain that this Mari text refers to prophecy; the context and the language of ARM 26 216 suggest technical divination but do not rule out the possibility of intuitive divination/prophecy. The usage of the verb nb' in Emar suggests the invocation of deities/ancestors, and it is therefore likely that the two related nominal forms nabī and munabbiātu* are also related to ancestor worship (Stökl forthcoming b). As in the case of Ebla, it is impossible to prove that prophecy did not exist in Emar, but no evidence for its potential existence survived.

2. Terminology.

Much research has focused on understanding the professional titles used in prophetic texts from Mari and the Neo-Assyrian Empire. The title muhhūm/mahhū (fem. muhhūtum/mahhūtu) is used in both corpora. The term āpilum (fem. āpiltum) occurs only in the Mari texts, while raggimu (fem. raggintu) is used exclusively in Neo-Assyrian texts. Prophecy is one of the few religious professions in the ancient Near East that is performed by men and women and for whom the same terms are used (albeit in masculine and feminine forms). Unlike in most other religious professions, there do not appear to be any differences between male and female prophets (Stökl 2010).

2.1. muhhūm/mahhū. The muhhūm ("ecstatic"; Neo-Assyrian mahhū), an ecstatic cult official, is attested throughout Mesopotamian history, mostly unrelated to prophecy. Because at Mari they mostly occur in letters in which they transmit divine messages, most scholars believe that the muhhūm is a professional "prophet." However, it is unclear whether this is in fact the case. It is possible that the term refers to a specific kind of cult ecstatic, similar to, for example, the zabbu, close to whom the muhhūm appears in lexical lists. This in turn raises the question of what we mean when we use the term prophet: is it the socioreligious role or the technical term for a profession? If we mean the former, then some individual muhhūms are prophets; but the term is not a technical one for a professional prophet.

2.2. The āpilum and the raggimu. The āpilum is the technical term for a prophet in the Old Babylonian period. It used to be translated as "answerer," but the better translation "spokesperson" is gaining ground (Merlo; van der Toorn 1998, 60). The Neo-Assyrian equivalent of the Old Babylonian āpilum is the raggimu ("shouter"). While it is generally assumed that they are employed in temples, it is significantly less clear than normally assumed. They are the "spokespeople" of a deity, and in the case of Mari prophecy, they often, but by no means always, speak in temples. But, as ARM 26 199 shows, royal officials send the āpilum Lupaḫum to a number of different temples, implying that he is working for the royal administration. It seems that some prophets, maybe even many prophets, had some form of an association with a temple, but that they were not required to have such a connection. Significantly, the same is also true for other professional diviners in the ancient Near East.

2.3. Prophecy and Gender. There is a debate on the involvement of people with third-gender in prophecy in the ancient Near East. Here, "gender" is used to describe the social role performed by people—that is, the question is whether they behave like men or women, rather than their biological sex. At Mari three religious professionals called assinnu are reported to be involved in prophecy. Elsewhere, particularly in texts from the first millennium, assinnu are described as men whom the goddess (Ishtar) had turned into women (Henshaw). The assinnu were cult performers who were ecstatic and danced, as did other cult "ecstatics," such as the zabbu and probably the muhhūm. It is argued that because the assinnu performed an ambiguous gender role, ambiguous gender performance is common in prophetic people, particularly in the Neo-Assyrian period (Parpola; Huffmon; Nissinen forthcoming). There is ample evidence for assinnu in the Neo-Assyrian period; however, they never prophesy. The Neo-Assyrian evidence for gender ambiguity consists of three peculiar spellings in SAA 9 1 (texts 1, 4, 5) that leave open the possibility that the writer may have been attempting to write ambiguous gender performance of three prophets. This is, however, extremely unclear. In my view, it is difficult to defend the thesis that gender ambiguity is well established on the basis of one tablet, which can be interpreted in various ways. While it is impossible to disprove that people with ambiguous gender were involved in prophecy, there is equally little to suggest that prophecy was a particularly prominent occupation with ambiguous gender (Stökl forthcoming a; Zsolnay).

2.4. Divination and Prophecy. Deuteronomy 13; 18 condemn divination. The study of prophecy in Mesopotamia, however, has shown that far from being opposed to technical forms of divination, prophecy is an integral part of the system of divination there; it is one of the ways in which the human king (and others) has access to information from the divine sphere (Nissinen 2000). It is therefore better to classify prophecy as one of the many forms of divination, where “divination” refers to all manner of communication with the divine with the aim of finding out the will of a deity. With this terminology, prophecy is an “intuitive” form of divination, while the reading of entrails, for example, is one of the technical forms of divination. This terminology has the benefit of explaining the similarities between various forms of divination while still allowing for differences between them (Nissinen 2010b; Grabbe, 150-51; Pongratz-Leisten).

3. Comparison of Prophecy in the Hebrew Bible and in the Ancient Near East.

3.1. Criticism of the King. One of the major features of biblical prophecy is the radically critical encounter of prophecy and king. There is no direct evidence for such meetings from anywhere in the nonbiblical material. Some of this absence can be explained by the nature of the sources: the nonbiblical sources come mostly from royal archives and royal inscriptions, while the biblical text could be classified, at least in parts, as protest literature. Royal archives are unlikely to preserve messages critical of a king in particular and human kingship in general. Some criticism of the king’s actions in particular instances can be found in the Mari letters. Additionally, in a Neo-Assyrian letter (SAA 16 59) an incident is quoted in which a female slave prophesied in favor of a pretender to the throne. Though not critical toward kingship in general, this letter shows that prophecies against the king were delivered. It is only through the accident of preservation that they do not survive (Nissinen 1998a; 2003a).

3.2. Prophecies of Doom, Salvation Oracles and the Function of Prophecy/Divination. Most ancient Near Eastern prophecy is in support of the king, with a significant focus on legitimizing the rule of a new king (Dalley). One common form of oracle is the promise of support against enemies both without and within, similar to, for example, Isaianic promises of divine support for Judah. On the basis of such similarities, some scholars recently have argued that Israelite prophecy, as seen in Isaiah, presumably followed the same model: they mostly gave salvation oracles in favor of the king. It is true that most preserved oracles from nonbiblical sources are positive for the king and can very well be compared to salvation and victory oracles (van der Toorn 1987). However, they also knew more critical forms of oracles. E. Blum and H. Williamson have pointed to the Deir ‘Alla inscription to show that ancient Near Eastern prophets were capable of pronouncing oracles of doom as well as salvation oracles. It certainly is to be expected that prophets, just like other diviners, occasionally pronounced oracles of doom. These should not, however, be understood as oracles of unconditional doom, but rather as oracles that attempt to cause a change of behavior by warning the king that otherwise the announced catastrophe will take place (Tiemeyer). This may indicate that biblical oracles of doom should be understood as conditional as well. Interpreted in that way, Amos does not announce the destruction of the northern kingdom, but rather that it will be destroyed unless the ruling classes mend their ways. Mesopotamian omen literature is full of omens that announce the destruction of the capital, the state, the death of the king and other such catastrophes. Their purpose was to warn the addressee of the outcome if nothing was done to change the conditions. When oracles occurred that supported a rival king, as in the example given above (SAA 16 59), it appears that they could be taken as “false prophecy” (Nissinen 1996).

3.3. Cultic Prophecy. Ever since S. Mowinckel’s magisterial study on Psalms, there has been the consensus that cultic prophecy existed in Israel, and most scholars find it in the ancient Near Eastern sources as well (Hilber 2005) (see Liturgy and Cult). With regard to the ancient Near Eastern texts, many oracles occur in temples, and the muhhû/mahhû (pl.) are active participants of the temple cult. Currently, the consensus view is that there was cultic prophecy in the ancient Near East. Many oracles are said to have occurred within the temple. However, if by “cultic prophecy” we mean prophecy that occurred within the temple cult, the evidence base consists of the Eštar-ritual texts from Old Babylonian Mari (FM 3 2 and 3), and even that is far from clear (Durand and Guichard 1997). One of the two texts stipulates that if the muhhû “go into trance” (immaḥû), the musicians will play a certain melody. The verb māhû (“to rave”) is translated there by supporters of cultic prophecy as “to prophesy” rather than with its normal meaning. The evidence for professional prophecy within the cult in the ancient Near East is very slim indeed and depends on how one translates the verb māhû, either with its normal meaning or with a special meaning for this text. It appears instead that the Old Babylonian muhhû and his Neo-Assyrian counterpart fall within another class of cult ecstasies within Mesopotamian religion.

Another issue that comes up in these two texts (FM 3 2 and 3) is the connection between prophecy and music. Although the OT Prophetic Books are silent on the matter, 2 Kings 3:15 shows a clear link between prophecy and music. The question, however, is not only whether music and prophecy occur in the same text, but also whether there is some form of functional link between them. Although 2 Kings 3:15 is fairly clear on the issue, in the two texts from Mari this link is less clear. In FM 3 3 the musicians are supposed to play a ritual lament when the cult ecstasies do not go into trance. In FM 3 2 it appears that the opposite is the case: the musicians play the lament only if the ecstatic has gone into trance. Both texts break off immediately afterwards. This indicates that while there is temporal connection between ecstasy and music in Mari, there is no proof that music is used to induce prophetic trance.

3.4. The Literary Production of Literary Predictive and Prophetic Texts. M. de Jong argued that the Neo-Assyrian *Sammeltafel*n present us with something of an intermediate stage between the individual oracle by a prophet and literary predictive texts as found in Egypt and Mesopotamia (de Jong, 395–442). Further, since it is not always clear whether a divine utterance that is cited in Neo-Assyrian royal inscriptions and elsewhere is the result of prophecy or more technical forms of divination—that is, from a form-critical perspective they can look identical—the literary reflexes of various forms of divination become very difficult to distinguish.

At Mari the following procedure appears to have been at work: a prophet pronounces an oracle in front of a governor or an important priest, or it is reported to them and they include it in their regular report to the king. A. Schar identified Mari letters in which a governor reports two oracles to the king as an early stage in the production of literary prophetic texts. It is true that some reports combine several oracles in a larger text, but administrative letters often report several events. The Neo-Assyrian *Sammeltafel*n are a better example of the early stages adding several prophetic oracles in one physically continuous text. From the Neo-Assyrian Empire, we can see that if the oracle was deemed useful to preserve, they kept it on an individual tablet in the archive. At some point, several oracles were combined and written down on a Sammeltafel. It is likely that these *Sammeltafel*n were then used as source material in the composition of royal inscriptions. Indeed, the letters reporting an individual oracle are themselves already literary products and should be read as such. This does not mean that the oracles that they contain are fabricated; to the contrary, it simply means that they were written down after the fact. It is likely that similar processes took place in Israel and Judah as well (see Writing and Prophecy).

3.5. General Assessment. Research on ancient Near Eastern prophecy has proven to be very influential for the study of prophecy in the Hebrew Bible, particularly in providing paradigms of how prophecy was integrated into society. Prophecy was common in the ancient Near East, and therefore prophecy should no longer be regarded as confined to Israel. At the same time, there is no evidence that ancient Near Eastern prophecy ever fundamentally questioned the monarchy. Some social criticism can be found (Nissinen 2003a). Much of the difference can be explained by pointing out that the evidence for ancient Near Eastern prophecy that we have comes from royal archives, whereas in the Hebrew Bible we find also the evidence of circles that were critical of the establishment. The longer time period that the OT Prophetic Books could grow explains the lack of genres such as the prophetic novel. The similarity of the underlying socioreligious phenomenon can also be seen in the use of the expression “thus say DN” in both corpora (Nissinen 2010a). Through studying nonbiblical ancient Near Eastern prophetic texts we gain a control in our (re)constructions of prophecy in ancient Israel and Judah, and they enable modern readers to better appreciate ancient societies’ views on communication with the divine (Barstad 2000).

See also DIVINATION, MAGIC; LITURGY AND CULT; PROPHECY, HISTORY OF; PROPHECY AND SOCIETY; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES; WRITING AND PROPHECY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. A. Archi, “Further Concerning Ebla and the Bible,” BA 44 (1981) 145-54; D. Arnaud, Recherches au pays d’Aštata: Emar VI, 3: Textes sumériens et accadiens: Texte (Paris: Éditions Recherche sur les civilisations, 1986); idem, Recherches au pays d’Aštata: Emar VI, 4: Textes sumériens et accadiens: Texte (Paris: Éditions Recherche sur les civilisations, 1987). H. M. Barstad, “Comparare necesse est? Ancient Israelite and Ancient Near Eastern Prophecy in a Comparative Perspective,” in Prophecy in Its Ancient Near Eastern Context: Mesopotamian, Biblical, and Arabian Perspectives, ed. M. Nissinen (SBLSymS 13; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2000) 3-11; idem, “The Prophet Oded and the Zakkur Inscription: A Case of Obscuriore Obscurum?” in Reading from Right to Left: Essays on the Hebrew Bible in Honour of David J. A. Clines, ed. J. C. Exum and H. G. M. Williamson (JSOTSup 373; London: Sheffield Academic, 2003) 25-37; R. H. Beal, “Divination and Prophecy. Anatolia,” in Religions of the Ancient World: A Guide, ed. S. I. Johnston et al. (Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press, 2004) 381-82; G. M. Beckman, “Plague Prayers of Muršili II (1.60),” in Context of Scripture, 1: Canonical Compositions from the Biblical World, ed. W. W. Hallo and K. L. Younger (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997) 156-60; E. Blum, “Israels Prophetie im altorientalischen Kontext: Anmerkungen zu neueren religionsgeschichtlichen Thesen,” in “From Ebla to Stellenbosch: Syro-Palestinian Religions and the Hebrew Bible,” ed. I. Cornelius and L. Jonker (ADPV 37; Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz in Kommission, 2008) 81-115; S. Dalley, “Old Babylonian Prophecies at Uruk and Kish,” in Opening the Tablet Box: Near Eastern Studies in Honor of Benjamin R. Foster, eds. S. C. Melville and A. L. Slotsky (CHANE 42; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2010) 85-97; M. J. de Jong, Isaiah among the Ancient Near Eastern Prophets: A Comparative Study of the Earliest Stages of the Isaiah Tradition and the Neo-Assyrian Prophecies (VTSup 117; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2007); A. Delattre, “The Oracles Given in Favour of Esarhaddon,” BOR 3 (1889) 25-31; J.-M. Durand and D. Charpin, Archives épistolaires de Mari (ARM 26; Paris: Éditions Recherche sur les civilisations, 1988); J.-M. Durand and M. Guichard, “Les rituels de Mari,” in Florilegium marianum III: Recueil d’études à la mémoire de Marie-Thérèse Barrelet, ed. D. Charpin and J.-M. Durand (Mémoires de N.A.B.U. 4; Paris: Société pour l’étude du Proche-Orient ancien, 1997) 19-78; M. Ellis, “The Archive of the Old Babylonian Kititum Temple and Other Texts from Ishchali,” JAOS 106 (1987) 757-86; idem, “Observations on Mesopotamian Oracles and Prophetic Texts: Literary and Historiographic Considerations,” JCS 41 (1989) 127-86; D. E. Fleming, “The Etymological Origins of the Hebrew nābî”: The One Who Invokes God,” CBQ 55 (1993a) 217-24; idem, “LU and MES in lu-na-bi-imes and Its Mari Brethren,” NABU (1993b) §4; idem, “Nābû and Munabbiātu: Two New Syrian Religious Personnel,” JAOS 113 (1993c) 175-83; idem, “Prophets and Temple Personnel in the Mari Archives,” in The Priests in the Prophets: The Portrayal of Priests, Prophets, and Other Religious Specialists in the Latter Prophets, ed. L. L. Grabbe and A. O. Bellis (JSOTSup 408; London: T & T Clark, 2004) 44-64; L. L. Grabbe, Priests, Prophets, Diviners, Sages: A Socio-Historical Study of Religious Specialists in Ancient Israel (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1995); R. A. Henshaw, Female and Male: The Cultic Personnel; The Bible and the Rest of the Ancient Near East (PTMS 31; Allison Park, PA: Pickwick, 1994); J. W. Hilber, Cultic Prophecy in the Psalms (BZAW 352; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2005); idem, “Prophetic Speech in the Egyptian Royal Cult,” in On Stone and Scroll: Essays in Honour of Prof. Graham Ivor Davies, ed. J. Aitken, K. Dell and B. Mastin (BZAW 420; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2011); idem, “Royal Cultic Prophecy in Assyria, Judah, and Egypt,” in “Thus Speaks Ishtar of Arbela: Prophecy in Israel, Assyria and Egypt in the Neo-Assyrian Period,” ed. R. P. Gordon and H. M. Barstad (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, forthcoming); J. Huehnergard, “On the Etymology and Meaning of Hebrew NĀBĪ,” EI 26 (1999) 88*-93*; H. B. Huffman, “The Assinnum as Prophet: Shamans at Mari?” in Amurru 3: No- mades et sédentaires dans le Proche-Orient ancien; Compte rendu de la XLVIe Rencontre assyriologique internationale, Paris, 10-13 juillet 2000, ed. C. Nicolle (Paris: Éditions Recherche sur les civilisations, 2004) 241-47; P. Merlo, “āpilum of Mari: A Reappraisal,” UF 36 (2004) 323-32; M. Nissinen, “Falsche Prophetie in neuassyrischer und deuteronomistischer Darstellung,” in Das Deuteronomium und seine Querbeziehungen, ed. T. Veijola (PFES 62; Helsinki: Finnische Exegetische Gesellschaft; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1996) 172-95; idem, “Prophecy against the King in Neo-Assyrian Sources,” in “Lasset uns Brücken bauen ...: Collected Communications to the XVth Congress of the International Organization for the Study of the Old Testament, Cambridge 1995,” ed. K.-D. Schunck and M. Augustin (BEATAJ 42; New York: Lang, 1998a) 157-70; idem, References to Prophecy in Neo-Assyrian Sources (SAAS 7; Helsinki: Neo-Assyrian Text Corpus Project, 1998b); idem, “The Socioreligious Role of the Neo-Assyrian Prophets,” in Prophecy in Its Ancient Near Eastern Context: Mesopotamian, Biblical, and Arabian Perspectives, ed. M. Nissinen (SBLSymS 13; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2000) 89-114; idem, “Das kritische Potential in der altorientalischen Prophetie,” in Propheten in Mari, Assyrien und Israel, ed. M. Köckert and M. Nissinen (FRLANT 201; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2003a) 1-33; idem, “Fear Not: A Study on an Ancient Near Eastern Phrase,” in The Changing Face of Form Criticism for the Twenty-First Century, ed. M. Sweeney and E. Ben Zvi (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003b) 122-61; idem, Prophets and Prophecy in the Ancient Near East (SBLWAW 12; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2003c); idem, “What Is Prophecy? An Ancient Near Eastern Perspective,” in Inspired Speech: Prophecy in the Ancient Near East; Essays in Honour of Herbert B. Huffmon, ed. J. Kaltner and L. Stulman (JSOTSup 378; London: T & T Clark International, 2004) 17-37; idem, “Comparing Prophetic Sources: Principles and a Text Case,” in Prophecy and Prophets in Ancient Israel: Proceedings of the Oxford Old Testament Seminar, ed. J. Day (LHBOTS 531; London: T & T Clark, 2010a) 3-24; idem, “Prophecy and Omen Divination: Two Sides of the Same Coin,” in Divination and Interpretation of Signs in the Ancient World, ed. A. Annus (OIS 6; Chicago: Chicago University Press, 2010b) 341-51; idem, “Gender and Prophetic Agency in the Ancient Eastern Mediterranean,” in Prophecies Male and Female: Gender and Prophecy in the Hebrew Bible, the Eastern Mediterranean and the Ancient Near East, ed. C. L. Carvalho and J. Stökl (Atlanta: Society for Biblical Literature, forthcoming); S. Parpola, Assyrian Prophecies (SAA 9; Helsinki: Helsinki University Press, 1997); G. Pettinato, “The Royal Archives of Tell Mardikh-Ebla,” BA 39 (1976) 44-52; idem, “Relation entre les royaumes d’Ebla et de Mari au III millénaire, d’après les archives royales de Tell Mardikh - Ebla,” Akkadica 2 (1977) 20-28; B. Pongratz-Leisten, Herrschaftswissen in Mesopotamien: Formen der Kommunikation zwischen Gott und König im 2. und 1. Jahrtausend v. Chr (SAAS 10; Helsinki: Neo-Assyrian Text Corpus Project, 1999); V. Sasson, “The ‘Ammān Citadel Inscription as an Oracle Promising Divine Protection: Philological and Literary Comments,” PEQ 111 (1979) 117-25; A. Schart, “Combining Prophetic Oracles in Mari Letters and Jeremiah 36,” JANESCU 23 (1995) 75-93; B. U. Schipper, Die Erzählung des Wenamun: Ein Literaturwerk im Spannungsfeld von Politik, Geschichte und Religion (OBO 209; Fribourg: Academic Press; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2005); J. Scurlock, “Prophecy as a Form of Divination, Divination as a Form of Prophecy,” in Divination and Interpretation of Signs in the Ancient World, ed. A. Annus (OIS 6; Chicago: Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago, 2010) 277-316; N. Shupak, “Did the Phenomenon of Biblical Prophecy Exist in Ancient Egypt?” [in Hebrew], in Proceedings of the Tenth World Congress of Jewish Studies, Jerusalem, August 16-24, 1989: Division A, The Bible and Its World, ed. D. Assaf (Jerusalem: World Union of Jewish Studies, 1990) 59*-64*; idem, “The Egyptian ‘Prophecy’: A Reconsideration,” in “Von reichlich ägyptischem Verstande: Festschrift für Waltraud Guglielmi zum 65. Geburtstag,” (eds.) K. Zibelius-Chen and H.-W. Fischer-Elfert (Philippika 11, Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 2006), 133-44; J. Stökl, “Female Prophets in the Ancient Near East,” in Prophecy and Prophets in Ancient Israel: Proceedings of the Oxford Old Testament Seminar, ed. J. Day (LHBOTS 531; London: T & T Clark, 2010) 47-61; idem, “Gender Ambiguity in Ancient Near Eastern Prophecy? A Re-Assessment of the Data Behind a Popular Theory,” in Prophecies Male and Female: Gender and Prophecy in the Hebrew Bible, the Eastern Mediterranean and the Ancient Near East, ed. C.

L. Carvalho and J. Stökl (Atlanta: Society for Biblical Literature, forthcoming a); idem, "The מַלְאָכִים of Ezekiel 13 Re-Considered," JBL (forthcoming b); A. Taggar-Cohen, Hittite Priesthood (TH 26; Heidelberg: Winter, 2006); L.-S. Tiemeyer, "Prophecy as a Way of Canceling Prophecy—the Strategic Uses of Foreknowledge," ZAW 117 (2005) 329-50; K. van der Toorn, "L'oracle de victoire comme expression prophétique au Proche-Orient ancien," RB 94 (1987) 63-97; idem, "Old Babylonian Prophecy between the Oral and the Written," JNSL 24 (1998) 55-70; J. van Dijk, "Die Tontafeln aus dem Palast des Šinkāšid," in XVIII. vorläufiger Bericht über die von dem Deutschen Archäologischen Institut und der Deutschen Orient-Gesellschaft aus Mitteln der Deutschen Forschungsgemeinschaft unternommenen Ausgrabungen in Uruk-Warka, Winter 1959/60, ed. H. Lenzen (ADOG 7; Berlin: Mann, 1962) 61-62; S. Weeks, "Predictive and Prophetic Literature: Can Neferti Help Us Read the Bible?" in Prophecy and Prophets in Ancient Israel: Proceedings of the Oxford Old Testament Seminar, ed. J. Day (LHBOTS 531; London: T & T Clark, 2010) 25-46; M. Weippert, "Aspekte israelitischer Prophetie im Lichte verwandter Erscheinungen des Alten Orients," in Ad bene et fideliter seminarium: Festgabe für Karlheinz Deller zum 21. Februar 1987, ed. U. Magen and G. Mauer (AOAT 220; Kevelaer: Butzon & Bercker; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1988) 287-319; H. G. M. Williamson, "Isaiah: Prophet of Weal or Woe?" in Thus Speaks Ishtar of Arbela: Prophecy in Israel, Assyria and Egypt in the Neo-Assyrian Period, ed. R. P. Gordon and H. M. Barstad (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, forthcoming); N. Wyatt, "Word of Tree and Whisper of Stone: El's Oracle to King Keret (Kirta), and the Problem of the Mechanics of Its Utterance," VT 57 (2007) 483-510; I. Zsolnay, "The Misconstrued Role of the assinnû in Ancient Near Eastern Prophecy," in Prophets Male and Female: Gender and Prophecy in the Hebrew Bible, the Eastern Mediterranean and the Ancient Near East, ed. C. L. Carvalho and J. Stökl (Atlanta: Society for Biblical Literature, forthcoming). J. Stökl

ANGELS, MESSENGERS, HEAVENLY BEINGS

The Prophetic Books are distinguished from other biblical literature in at least two ways with respect to the subject of the angelic realm. On the one hand, unlike many narrative texts in the OT, most texts in the prophets tend to ignore any direct contemporary activity of angels in human affairs. On the other hand, there are a few select texts in the prophets, specifically texts associated with later apocalyptic literature, in which contemporary angelic activity becomes not just prominent but central.

1. Defining Angelic Functions and Roles
2. Mediating God's Message
3. "Angel of the LORD"
4. Specific Supernatural Creatures
5. Physical Appearance
6. Summary

1. Defining Angelic Functions and Roles.

Angelic roles widely attested in the Bible are found also in the prophets, even if there are but few examples. The protection and rescue of God's people from calamity (cf. Gen 48:16; Num 20:16; Ps 91:11-12) occurs in the case of Daniel in the lion's den (Dan 6:22) and the three young men in the blazing furnace (Dan 3:28). An extension of this role, the destruction of God's enemies (cf. 2 Sam 24:15-17; 1 Chron 21:14-27; 2 Kings 19:35), occurs when 185,000 Assyrian soldiers are slain in one night (Is 37:36) and when the population of Jerusalem is decimated in judgment (Ezek 9:1-11). The angelic praise and adoration of God (Job 38:7; Ps 29:1-2; 148:2; Neh 9:6) surfaces when seraphim extol God's holiness in Isaiah's presence (Is 6:3).

The English word angel does not correlate easily with any Hebrew word, for the English word unequivocally refers to a supernatural being with unspecified duties in God's service. This word, however, derives from Greek angelos ("messenger"), referring to an individual, human or divine, having the focused task of communicating a message long-distance from one party to another (Meier 1988). Because the Hebrew (and Aramaic) word mal'āk was a precise semantic counterpart to the Greek word, there are at least two fundamental shifts in meaning that complicate our reading of the activity of these supernatural creatures when they appear in the Prophetic Books.

On the one hand, the English word angel means less than the Hebrew term mal'āk. In English its reference is confined to the supernatural world, and if we apply the word to humans, we do so only metaphorically ("You are such an angel"). In contrast, one-third of all references to mal'ākīm in prophetic and apocalyptic books are to humans, where the term is translated not as "angel" but rather as "messenger" or "ambassador" (Is 14:32; 18:2; 30:4; 33:7; 37:9, 14; Jer 27:3; Ezek 17:15; 23:16, 40; 30:9; Nah 2:13; Hag 1:13; Mal 2:7). The Hebrew term's broad reference thus may result in ambiguity if the context does not make it clear if a human is in view (e.g., is the mal'āk whom God sends in Mal 1:1 a human "messenger" or a supernatural "angel"?).

The many references to human mal'ākīm underscore, on the other hand, how the English word angel also means much more than the Hebrew term mal'āk, for the latter narrowly focuses the activities of these human messengers: the transmission of verbal messages over a substantial distance from one party to another. Since the word mal'āk simply means "messenger" (general Semitic root l'k ["to send"]), it is clear that the primary task of a supernatural mal'āk in early Hebrew was to relay messages from God to humans, unlike "angels" in English, whose tasks encompass all activities that God may delegate to the members of his supernatural entourage. Thus, although cherubim and seraphim are commonly assumed in contemporary culture to be angels, it would be a misnomer in biblical Hebrew (and early Greek) to call them mal'ākīm (or angeloi) "messengers": the bizarre appearances of such creatures immediately disqualify them from ever being sent by God with a message to humans. It is only in later Hebrew and Greek (and English) that the terms mal'āk and angelos, through the natural evolution of language, extended their meaning to encompass all supernatural beings in God's employ. It is misleading to read this later, broader meaning back into the biblical text.

2. Mediating God's Message.

Given, then, the precise significance of Hebrew mal'āk as "messenger" (supernatural or human), it is noteworthy how rarely supernatural messengers are identified by this term in prophetic and apocalyptic books of the OT. The prophets do speak of the activity of supernatural creatures in Israel's past, such as the one that wrestled with Jacob (Hos 12:3-4; cf. Gen 32:24-32) or the one that protected Israel through the wilderness sojourn (Is 63:9; cf. Ex 23:20-23). But nearly half of all occurrences of the word in the Prophetic Books, and most of the occurrences that refer to supernatural creatures, appear in the book of Zechariah. There the word usually refers to a supernatural creature that dialogues with this prophet in a series of night visions that reveal what God is doing among the nations and for Judah. The backbone of the first six chapters of this book (Zech 1:8—6:8) is a retelling of Zechariah's perception of, and dialogue with, a variety of supernatural creatures, some of which are explicitly identified as mal'ākīm. Zechariah carries on a sustained dialogue with one supernatural messenger characteristically identified in strikingly unusual Hebrew as the "angel who was speaking with me" (hammal'āk haddōber bi [Zech 1:9, 13, 14, 19; 2:3; 4:1, 4, 5; 5:5, 10; 6:4]). This angel answers questions, asks questions, makes explanations, and dialogues with God (Zech 1:13).

This exceptional encounter between Zechariah and a supernatural messenger (mal'āk) from God is explicable from the very nature of the prophetic office. When information is provided about the source of their proclamations, the classical prophets are presented as receiving their messages directly from God, unmediated by any other creatures (e.g., Is 6:8; Jer 1:9; Ezek 1:1—3:11; Hos 1:2-9; Amos 7:1—8:2; Hab 2:1-2). The classical prophets had direct access to God, participating with other supernatural beings in the divine council where God's decrees originated (e.g., Is 6:1-9; Jer 23:18-22; Amos 3:7; cf. 1 Kings 22:19-23), rendering superfluous any messenger relay between God and his prophet. As time progressed, however, prophetic literature portrays the prophet gradually losing his place on the *divine council (Meier 2009, 19-62). With the rise of *apocalyptic literature, of which the book of Zechariah is a harbinger, God's message is relayed to humans indirectly by angelic intermediaries (e.g., 1 En. 19:1; 72:1; 4 Ezra 4:1; 5:31; T. Levi 2:6-9; Apoc. Zeph. 3:1; 11:3). Thus, in the book of Ezekiel God's voice is heard throughout, even though angels begin to provide revelation in Ezekiel 40—42. In the book of Daniel the voice of God is never heard, and it is angels who do any explaining of God's future plans for the world.

3. "Angel of the LORD."

In the same way that the Hebrew term mal'āk ("messenger") is limited in its appearance in the Prophetic Books, an "angel of the LORD" is also a designation that generally is not significant for the prophets, a phrase appearing only in Isaiah and Zechariah of a supernatural creature. The identical phrase, “angel of the LORD,” is applied as a legitimate title for the prophet Haggai (Hag 1:13) and priests (Mal 2:7) as individuals who relay God’s word to humans, so once again it is not clear that the very presence of the title indicates a peculiar and distinctive creature of exalted status. On the contrary, the OT knows of no uniquely privileged being, “the angel of the LORD,” a perspective similar to what continues in the NT (Mt 1:20; 2:13, 19; 28:2; Lk 1:11; 2:9; Jn 5:4; Acts 5:19; 8:26; 10:3; 12:7, 23; Gal 4:14; note the interpretation of Ex 3:2 in Acts 7:30). The earliest accessible interpretation of this phrase that removes its ambiguity (“an angel of the LORD”? “the angel of the LORD”?) is the LXX, which typically translates “an angel of the Lord” whenever the phrase first occurs in a narrative (Meier, *DDD*² 53-59). Early Christian interpreters saw in the figure a reference to the preincarnate Christ (e.g., Eusebius, Dem. ev. 5.10-11 [§§235-238]; Hist. eccl. 1.2), a consensus later reversed by those who followed Augustine in seeing this designation as simply referring to any supernatural messenger sent from the Lord (Augustine, Trin. 3.22-26).

The solitary occurrence of the phrase in Isaiah (Is 37:36) is explicable in a narrative that has been introduced into the book from the Deuteronomistic History (2 Kings 19:35), where a “messenger of Yahweh,” supernatural or human, is otherwise a more common figure (Judg 2:1-4; 5:23; 6:11-22; 13:3-21; 2 Sam 24:16; 1 Kings 19:7; 2 Kings 1:3, 15). Zechariah is the only prophet for whom the phrase “angel of the LORD” is important, occurring six times in three contexts (Zech 1:11, 12; 3:1, 5, 6; 12:8). The LXX in two of these contexts introduces the creature as “an angel of the LORD” (Zech 3:1; 12:8)—that is, a supernatural envoy who relays God’s messages to humans (Zech 3:1, 5, 6) and with whom the house of David is favorably compared (Zech 12:8; cf. 2 Sam 14:17, where David was compared to an envoy from God to render wise decisions). The third context (Zech 1:11, 12) is not entirely lucid in distinguishing the characters who speak, but if one assumes that the single angel who is identified in a number of different ways in Zechariah 1:8-14 is everywhere the same figure, one is confronted again with a supernatural envoy from God delegated with the task of communicating to Zechariah God’s message.

4. Specific Supernatural Creatures.

Names for specific angels are exceptional, corresponding to an apparent aversion at times to reveal their names to humans (Gen 32:29; Judg 13:17-18). In mustering the heavenly armies (see 4.1 below), however, God is said to call them all by name (Is 40:26), and the names of a few of God’s supernatural warriors are preserved: “Pestilence” and “Plague” (Heb deber and rešep in Hab 3:5 [the latter widely attested as a deity in polytheistic cultures]; cf. “Fury, Rage, and Havoc” in Ps 78:49, identified as “a band of angels of evil” [ASV]), names associated with their particular means of devastation (whether the depictions here were intended as poetic metaphor or as a portrayal of supernatural beings is moot; it is certain that many pre-exilic Israelites subscribed to the latter, it is possible that many recognized the former, and for many the distinction would have been irrelevant). It is only in the last five chapters of the book of Daniel that supernatural messenger figures are explicitly provided with individual names when they cordially interact with humans in the OT. In these chapters, Gabriel functions as a revealer and interpreter (Dan 8:16; 9:21), while Michael is one of the foremost angelic princes, with a more militant role (Dan 10:13, 21; 12:1).

4.1. The Stars. The astral bodies—sun, moon, stars—are explicitly identified as God’s heavenly “hosts” (Jer 8:2; cf. Deut 17:3; 2 Kings 23:5), something that humans are quite capable of seeing (Is 40:26). The connection of astral bodies with God’s angelic hosts is explicit in the Bible (Is 14:12-13; cf. Josh 5:13-15; Judg 5:20; Job 38:7; Ps 148:2-3), prompting considerable later speculation as to the precise physical reality involved (Halpern; Scott) and encouraging the connection between the innumerable stars and the innumerable angels (Jer 33:22; Dan 7:10; cf. Job 25:3). The Hebrew term šābā’, translated as “host,” simply means “army,” with its verbal counterpart meaning “to wage war” (e.g., Is 29:7, 8; Zech 14:12), a connection that Isaiah makes explicit: “The LORD of hosts [šēbā’ôt] is mustering a host [šēbā’] for battle” (Is 13:4).

Thus, the divine epithet “LORD of hosts” is a portrait of God in a militant posture as he leads his angelic armies against the forces of evil, whether human or divine. This epithet is a distinctive feature of Isaiah and Jeremiah, as well as of the three postexilic books Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi. These armies/stars/supernatural beings that accompany God into battle when he confronts evil (e.g., Judg 5:20; Rev 12:3-7; 19:14, 19), who provide part of the background for the astral phenomena in prophetic elaborations of the divine warrior's march to battle in the storm (e.g., Is 13:10-13; Joel 3:11-16; Hab 3:11; cf. Josh 10:11-13), are said to employ chariots, horses and swords (Josh 5:13-15; 2 Kings 6:15-17; 1 Chron 21:16) just as God does (Hab 3:8-11). These angelic armies consequently are associated quite comfortably with supernatural chariots and horses (Zech 1:8-11; 6:1-8) and were a constant temptation for Israelites to worship (Jer 19:13; Zeph 1:5).

4.2. Classes of Supernatural Beings. Discrete categories of supernatural creatures are identified in the prophets and nowhere else in the Bible. The "Watchers" (Aram 'ir; Gk egregoros ["wakeful one, vigilant one"] in Aquila and Symmachus) are mentioned only in Nebuchadnezzar's dream in Daniel 4 (Dan 4:13, 17, 23) in the Bible, although they are abundantly attested in Second Temple literature. These creatures in the Bible make decrees about human history, descend from heaven, and give orders to carry out these decrees.

Seraphim, also, are explicitly named as supernatural creatures in God's service only in the book of Isaiah (Is 6:2, 6), bearing a name that, if it is a Qattāl nominal pattern, could reflect the meaning "a burner, one who sets on fire." It is likely that Isaiah's vision assumes a serpentine figure, for elsewhere the same word refers to venomous snakes that inhabit the desert (Deut 8:15; Is 30:6), that fatally bit Israelites (Num 21:6), and as a remedy for which Moses made a bronze model (Num 21:8). Since there are references to the ability of these desert-dwelling creatures to fly (Is 14:29; 30:6), one is encouraged to think of the winged uraeus that appears on preexilic Hebrew seals (CWSSS, nos. 11, 104, 127, 194, 206, 284, 381) in imitation of Egyptian royal iconography, where such supernatural creatures could be represented with wings, hands and legs (Joines).

Cherubim are a characteristic feature of only one prophetic book, Ezekiel, where one-third of all biblical occurrences of the term are found. The only other mention of cherubim in the prophetic corpus occurs in Hezekiah's prayer that probably was incorporated into the book of Isaiah from the book of 2 Kings (Is 37:16 // 2 Kings 19:15). This peculiar focus in Ezekiel is likely a function of Ezekiel's intimate connection with the temple, which was elaborately decorated with representations of cherubim (Ezek 41:18-20, 25; cf. 1 Kings 6:23-32; 7:29, 36; 8:6-7). Indeed, the extended verbal description of these composite creatures occupies much of the stunning introduction to the book: four wings, four faces (human, lion, bull, eagle), calves' hooves, human hands, and radiant like bronze (Ezek 1:5-12). These four creatures serve here, and often in Ezekiel's book, as bearers of God's portable throne (Ezek 1:26; 10:1) with its accompanying wheels (Ezek 1:15-21; cf. Ezek 9:3; 10:1-22; 11:22; 43:2-3). This task of supporting or transporting God is elsewhere specified as a distinctive function of cherubim (2 Sam 6:2; Ps 18:10; 80:1; 99:1; Is 37:16), reflected in the design of the ark, where the two cherubim figures with their outstretched wings were understood to form a platform above which God manifested himself (Ex 25:22; Num 7:89). The emphasis upon this activity for cherubim in the book of Ezekiel results from the prophet's new relationship to the divine council, for unlike his predecessors who participated in the council's deliberations, Ezekiel has the council come to him, so to speak, with a decision that has already been ratified (Meier 2009, 21-24).

Typically, the cherubim are portrayed in Ezekiel as a group without further specification of individual identity. However, God singles out an exceptional cherub, explicitly so identified twice (Ezek 28:14, 16) in an oracle against the king of Tyre that is rich in imagery associated with God's sacred mountain (Ezek 28:12-19). The story that unfolds is allusively told only in barest outlines, recounting the privileged status and gifts of this creature that God trusted with his most intimate access. Nevertheless, the cherub betrayed these privileges and was expelled, consumed by fire.

5. Physical Appearance.

The extended descriptions of these classes of supernatural creatures in God's service contrast with descriptions of supernatural messengers (mal'ākīm) that are sent to humans with messages from God. The latter usually are not physically described, suggesting that there was nothing remarkable about their appearance. In fact, the term “man” commonly appears as a way of describing supernatural messengers from God: “the man Gabriel” flies to Daniel with information (Dan 9:21), one who has “the appearance of a man” is divinely commissioned to interpret a vision (Dan 8:15) or to strengthen Daniel (Dan 10:18), while one “according to the likeness of the sons of men” opens Daniel’s mouth so that he can dialogue with God’s envoy (Dan 10:16) (cf. Gen 18:2-22; Judg 13:3-8; Tob 5:4-6, where the terms mal’āk/angelos and “man” appear together to refer to the same supernatural creatures). As a result, it is not awkward for Hosea to identify Jacob’s ancient wrestling partner as a mal’āk (Hos 12:4) even though the narrator of Gen 32:24 called this figure a “man,” and the actors called him ’ēlōhīm (Gen 32:28, 30). The identification “man” for superhuman envoys dispatched by God with their characteristic tasks can continue in the prophets (Ezek 9:2-3; 40:3-5; 47:3; Dan 10:5; 12:6-7).

The unremarkable human appearance of such supernatural messengers is assumed in earlier books of the Bible where they are not described, for there is nothing out of the ordinary. The nondescript character of supernatural messengers changes in the later books of the Bible, in tandem with the rise of apocalyptic literature. Physical description becomes very important in apocalyptic literature as the extraordinary appearance of even the messenger angels is underscored: although they can have human hands, legs and eyes (Ezek 40:3, 5; 47:3; Dan 10:5-6; 12:7), are described as “standing” (Heb ’md [Ezek 40:3; 43:6; Dan 8:15; 10:16; 12:5]), wearing linen clothing (Ezek 10:6-7; Dan 10:5; 12:6, 7) and girded with gold (Dan 10:5), they clearly are nonhuman, with a luminous radiance (Dan 10:6) comparable to precious stones (Dan 10:6) and bronze (Ezek 40:3; Dan 10:6), while their speech can be described as a roaring (Dan 10:6). The human response to supernatural messengers in these later contexts is generally a complete physical breakdown (Dan 8:17-18; 10:7-12, 15-19), unlike in most earlier biblical texts (e.g., Gen 16:7-13; 18:1-8; Josh 5:13-15; Judg 13:9-16; 1 Kings 19:5-8). In such portraits of supernatural messengers wings are notably absent. Instead, wings are associated only with the more bizarre creatures in God’s service that have tasks other than relaying messages to humans, such as seraphim (Is 6:2), cherubim (Ezek 1:6-25; 3:13; 10:5-21; 11:22; cf. Ex 25:20) and others (Zech 5:9).

The overt similarity of supernatural messengers to humans on so many levels proceeds from an awareness in ancient Israel that angelic creatures were understood to be made in the image of God no less than humans, and evidently more so. God addresses the divine council at creation with the cohortative “Let us make man in our image” (Gen 1:26; cf. Is 6:8), an image that was once in some fashion more congruent between God and his divine retinue in the light of Genesis 3:22 (“the man has become like one of us”). The epithet “son(s) of God” (Dan 3:25, 28; cf. Job 1:6) is one way of referring to angelic-like beings that reflects the divine image in such creatures (cf. Gen 5:3), an epithet that appears in other ancient cultures of the Near East to affirm a genetic continuity but whose mechanics Israel denied. In the same way, even the word ’ēlōhīm itself, typically translated “God,” can be used to identify the class of supernatural beings that includes both God and the creatures subordinate to God (“gods” [Ps 82:1, 6 KJV]; cf. the LXX translation of ’ēlōhīm in Ps 8:5 as angeloi, and Heb 2:7, which in turn stresses the subordinate status of humans to all these). The fact that both God and angelic creatures can be subsumed together under a common noun (’ēlōhīm) that cannot apply to humans underscores the greater continuity between angels and God. A specific communicable attribute that is more characteristic of supernatural creatures than humans is connected to God’s identity as “the Holy One” (2 Kings 19:22; Job 6:10; Is 5:24), for he often shares this title with angels who are called “holy ones” (Dan 4:13, 17, 23; 8:13; Zech 14:5; cf. Job 15:15; Ps 89:5-7). Both of these epithets are applied to the genus of supernatural creatures indiscriminately, unlike their restricted applicability to humans in the OT, for whom this quality is contingent and not natural: the only human who can be identified as a “son of God” is the Judean king (2 Sam 7:14; Ps 2:7), and the only human who bears the epithet “holy one” is a priest (Ps 106:16), in marked contrast to the NT, where all of redeemed humanity are distinctively identified as “sons of God” (e.g., Rom 8:14; 1 Jn 3:2) and by the substantive “holy one(s)” (e.g., Eph 1:1; Phil 4:21).

6. Summary.

For most of the Prophetic Books in the Bible, the supramundane cosmos of living creatures is an arena that attracts little attention. It is God who is everywhere at work with an immediacy of interaction with humans accompanied by sporadic references to mediate causes that are largely confined to the human realm (e.g., Is 10:5-7; Jer 25:9). Some later visionary contexts in the Bible, however, gradually expand this perception to include an increasing interest in the supernatural creatures that do God's bidding at a time that God distances himself from his people during the *exile (Ezek 8:6; 10:18-19; 11:23; cf. Dan 9:12-19; Zech 1:12). A proliferating heavenly bureaucracy gradually unfolds (cf. Dan 10:10-21) that exhibits an increasingly transcendent God at work through myriads of supernatural creatures.

See also DIVINE COUNCIL; IDOLS, IDOLATRY, GODS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. B. Halpern, "The Assyrian Astronomy of Genesis 1 and the Birth of Milesian Philosophy," ErIsr 27 (2003) *74-83; V. Hirth, Gottes Boten im Alten Testament: Die alttestamentliche Mal'ak-Vorstellung unter besonderer Berücksichtigung des Mal'ak-Jahwe-Problems (ThA 32; Berlin: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 1975); D. Irvin, Mytharion: The Comparison of Tales from the Old Testament and the Ancient Near East (AOAT 32; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1978); K. R. Joines, "Winged Serpents in Isaiah's Inaugural Vision," JBL 86 (1967) 410-15; G. J. Marshall, Angels: An Indexed and Partially Annotated Bibliography of Over 4300 Scholarly Books and Articles Since the 7th Century B.C. (Jefferson, NC: McFarland, 1999); S. Meier, "Angel of Yahweh," *DDD*² 53-59; idem, The Messenger in the Ancient Semitic World (HSM 45; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1988); idem, Themes and Transformations in Old Testament Prophecy (Downers Grove, IL: IVP Academic, 2009); A. Rofé, "Israelite Belief in Angels in the Pre-Exilic Period as Evidenced by Biblical Traditions" [in Hebrew] (Ph.D. diss., Hebrew University of Jerusalem, 1969); A. Scott, Origen and the Life of the Stars: A History of an Idea (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1991); M. Welker, "Angels in the Biblical Traditions: An Impressive Logic and the Imposing Problem of their Hypercomplex Reality," ThTo 51 (1994) 367-80. S. A. Meier

ANGER. See WRATH.

ANIMAL IMAGERY

The past decades have witnessed an increasing recognition of the important interaction between human beings and animals. Environmental pressures and the tremendous changes brought on nature by human development have highlighted the importance of ecology and also resulted in an increasing number of studies dealing with biblical and ecological issues (Martens).

These are not new issues. Ancient Israelites, living in a premodern and agrarian society, recognized the importance of fauna and flora as part of creation order and, in consequence, employed a surprising quantity of animal imagery in their written documents. This article focuses upon these literary devices in the prophetic literature of the OT, including also the apocalyptic book of Daniel. All the references cannot be discussed here, but distinct categories of usage will be introduced, following a short section looking at current research on the topic and a concise introduction to the concept of metaphor and imagery. The descriptive categories used in this entry (e.g., wild, domesticated, Mischwesen) are based on the source domain—that is, the real-life category from which the metaphor or imagery has been taken.

1. Animal Imagery and Metaphors in Current Scholarship
2. Wild Animals and Animal Imagery
3. Domesticated Animals and Animal Imagery
4. Mischwesen and Animal Imagery
5. Conclusion

1. Animal Imagery and Metaphors in Current Scholarship.

Over the past decades an increasing number of studies have focused upon animal imagery in the OT (Jenni; Lucas; Schwab; Janowski, Neumann-Gorsolke and Glessmer; Dell; Riede; Strawn; Nielsen; Kuntz; Forti; Shemesh). Most of these looked at poetry or wisdom writings, where animal imagery occurs repeatedly. Some of this research studied the bigger hermeneutical issue of how animal imagery (especially linked to God) may contribute to biblical theology (Nielsen) or described the interaction between human being and animal in the OT (Riede; some chapters in Janowski, Neumann-Gorsolke and Glessmer). Connected to these endeavors has been the drive to understand metaphor theory more adequately (see Seifert, 11-85; Nwaoru; Aaron; G. A. Klingbeil 2006; M. G. Klingbeil, 115-19), recognizing both the literary and the conceptual power of these literary images. Since word pictures (including metaphors, similes, symbols) establish either consciously or subconsciously a link between disparate entities (such as a comparison), they are important communicators and are used more often in poetic texts than in prose, though not exclusively so. These verbal images are providing a view of the mental map of the user (or author), opening, beyond the literary level, vistas of worldview, theology and social realities (see de Hulster, 270).

It has been recognized that large portions of the prophetic literature of the OT are written in poetry, even though not all prophetic texts are poetic texts, but could be understood instead as a hybrid "prophetic prose," consciously utilizing both poetic and prosaic literary characteristics (Petersen, 32-33). Keeping in mind these specific literary conventions, we must pay close attention to the conceptual world of the imagery, as it reflects on the social, economic and environmental conditions of the biblical authors as well as on their theological understanding of the creator God, who was active in Israel and the world (see Creation Theology).

What kind of animal imageries did Israel's prophets use in order to communicate the word of the Lord? A careful reading of the biblical texts shows a wide gamut of both domesticated and wild animals that are used metaphorically to make distinct points. Most of these animals were familiar to the readers, and their particular characteristics easily supplemented or even carried the prophetic message in a meaningful way. Some of these animals were uncommon in Palestine (e.g., the crocodile) or even non-existent, such as the Mischwesen described in Daniel 7:4, 6 (a lion with eagle's wings, and a leopard with four wings).

Often, animal imagery is expressed indirectly, making use of sounds and verbal forms that characterize specific animals but without naming the animal per se. Enemies roar or growl like lions (Is 5:29, 30) while the persecuted can growl like bears or moan like doves (Is 59:11) (see Nielsen). Judgment imagery often contains references to tearing something apart (Hos 5:14; 6:1), even though the same verbal form (trp) is also used to describe the predatory manner of degenerate leadership (Ezek 22:25; Zeph 3:3). In an attempt to make sense of the hundreds of references to animal imageries in the prophets of the OT, this article is divided into three basic sections, beginning with metaphors that use wild (undomesticated) animals, followed by a discussion of references to domesticated animals, and finally a look at Mischwesen (hybrid animals), which often appear in apocalyptic contexts.

2. Wild Animals and Animal Imagery.

Generic references to the beasts (either bēhēmā or hayyā) of the field occur often and seem to indicate the natural world per se. For example, Joel 1:20 describes how nature suffers the divine judgment. Notably, the same expression reappears in Joel 2:21, denoting the restored lands. Both in creation (or re-creation) and judgment, humanity is closely linked to the animal world. Similar concepts can be found also in Jonah's narrative (Jon 3:7; 4:11) and are already foreshadowed in the creation (Gen 1—2) and flood records (Gen 6:12 mentions "all flesh" [see Stipp]).

Many times prophets use imagery of wild animals, such as lions, wolves or locusts, to indicate pending judgment (e.g., Is 5:29; 15:9; Hos 5:14; 13:7; Joel 1; Amos 4:9; 5:19; Nahum 3:15-17; Zeph 3:3; Zech 11:3). Even today, locust plagues still represent a major destructive force. The prophets used different Hebrew terms to describe the locust phenomenon (Joel 1:4 employs four different Hebrew terms, possibly suggesting a life cycle), indicating both the magnitude and immensity of the day of judgment (Simkins, 101-7; cf. Croatto). Joel's description of an overwhelming locust invasion uses a well-known phenomenon (i.e., a locust plague that people living in the Levant were familiar with) in order to graphically describe the complete military destruction that God would bring upon his wayward people (see Day of the Lord). The huge numbers and the unstoppable nature of the locust attack inform the imminent military invasion, providing it with a bone-chilling background "noise" that communicates effectively. Interestingly, Joel 1:7 employs an additional animal image, the lion, seeking to indicate utter destruction.

Other imagery of wild animals associated with judgment includes serpents (Jer 8:17; Amos 5:19), maggots and worms (Is 14:11), leopards (Jer 5:6) and eagles (Jer 48:40; 49:22). A particular characteristic of the animal applies to the divine judgment that often is brought about by human agents. Swiftmess, inevitability, speed, completeness of destruction and uncountable numbers are part of the communicative purpose of employing these images. Although wild animals were part of God's creation (and thus subject to the Creator), they could not be controlled by humans and thus represented dangerous forces.

Notably, however, the biblical prophets did not always employ the same metaphor in a standardized manner. A leopard did not only indicate swift and complete destruction; it also was used to highlight the impossibility of change—after all, the spots of a leopard cannot be simply wiped off or changed (Jer 13:23). The lion metaphor did not only symbolize divinely ordained judgment (be it through direct divine intervention or outside conquest); at times, God himself is described as a lion fighting ferociously for his people and his city (Is 31:4). As with other literary devices, animal metaphors need to be read contextually and not only according to specific “typical” categories.

Frequently associated with the messianic age, savage and dangerous undomesticated animals are pictured together with helpless domesticated animals that, in a post-fall world, often represented the prey of the wild animals. Wolves graze with lambs; a leopard lies down with a goat kid; a young lion will be together with a calf yearling; bear and cow will feed together (Is 11:6, 7). The hole of the cobra and viper will no longer be dangerous to a playing child (Is 11:8). New and unexpected behavioral patterns are the characteristics of the messianic age (Is 65:25).

Sometimes people groups are compared to wild animals. Ezekiel decries the fact that prophets, instead of proclaiming God's word, tear apart the poor and the widow. Israel is as poisonous and dangerous as a scorpion (Ezek 2:6). Judah is compared to a swift female camel or donkey in heat as she follows Baal (Jer 2:23-24). Assyria and Egypt are like a bee or a fly respectively, called by God's whistle and at his disposal (Is 7:18). In both cases the insect metaphor indicates the swarming, suffocating and inescapable nature of the invading powers. Babylon's armies are compared to a slithering and hissing serpent and devouring grasshoppers (Jer 46:22-23), emphasizing the quick and quiet approach as well as their huge numbers that cannot be counted. Babylon's conquest of Judah is as speedy as a leopard, as fierce as wolves hunting in a pack, and as eager as an eagle swooping down to devour a meal (Hab 1:8). However, people groups can also be described as weak and powerless, as, for example, Moab, which is as helpless as a wandering bird thrown out of its nest (Is 16:2).

Desert animals, such as jackal and ostrich, are frequently mentioned when the prophets want to highlight complete desolation (Is 13:22; 34:13-14; Jer 9:10; 10:22; 49:33; 51:37). Vultures and birds of prey not only devour cadavers on the roads and deserts of Palestine but are also an indication of complete divine judgment (Is 34:15; Ezek 13:20; 32:4; 39:4-5), sometimes even with more specific indications of the direction from which they will come (Is 46:11).

Unexpected comparisons at times challenge the reader to readjust expectations. God is not only like a lion in his death pounce of judgment; he also is like a moth that causes uneasiness and discomfort that, hopefully, will result in a wake-up call of his wayward people (Hos 5:12), even though it should be noted that it may be possible that the Hebrew ʿās used in Hosea 5:12 is a homonym referring to an “emaciating disease” (cf. the difficult translation in the LXX using tarachē), which provides a better parallel to the second member of the parallelism (Macintosh, 207-8).

Dogs generally are much-loved pets these days. However, in the biblical world they were mostly regarded as lowlife, crouching on the outskirts of society. Isaiah 56:10-11 describes Israel's leaders in a pejorative manner as dumb or greedy dogs who pay no attention to the impending doom and look only after their own interests. In Jeremiah 15:3 the dog metaphor is used in a rather distinct way and is part of a list of four means of divine destruction: sword, dogs, vultures and beasts, three of which come from the natural world. This sequence highlights the completeness of divine punishment.

Finally, a number of more exotic wild animals appear in the prophets, including stork, turtledove, swift and swallow (Jer 8:7). They all know (yǝd') seasons and times and are obedient to the natural laws. In contrast, Israel does not know Yahweh's law—a theme that appears frequently in prophetic texts (e.g., Is 1:3 [in connection with domesticated animals]; Jer 2:8; Hos 5:4).

To summarize this section: The natural world outside of house and town is subject to God's power and order and, since creation, is intricately linked to humanity. The sounds and behaviors of wild and savage animals provide graphic images to communicate effectively the nature of the judgment that God is about to bring upon a wayward people and the nations surrounding Israel. The Day of the Lord is not only a significant theological motif; it is described in terms that must have been very real to people living close to the land and its creatures. However, judgment is not the only motif communicated through metaphors involving wild animals. Restoration, and a God who fights like a lion for his people, are part and parcel of the prophetic message as conveyed by animal imagery.

3. Domesticated Animals and Animal Imagery.

The domestication of animals marked a significant development in human society. Nomadic hunter-gatherers became herders and farmers and developed a different relation to animals. Instead of focusing primarily on food (the hunter can eat the prey only once!), domestication opened the way for secondary use, such as milk, wool, fiber, eggs and a more dependable meat supply (Borowski, 23-29; G. A. Klingbeil 2003a, 411-13; DOTHB, 1-20). Domesticated animals also began to impact farming (as plow animals) and changed the way people and goods traveled.

By the time the Israelite prophets preached and wrote their messages, domesticated animals had already been established in the Levant for millennia. They were a part of daily life, even in small towns and urban centers.

The image of well-fed cows from fertile Bashan is used in Amos 4:1 in comparison to the wealthy, fat, lazy, self-sufficient female elite of Samaria (similar also Amos 6:4). These elite will experience judgment, deportation and ruin. Hosea 4:16 employs a similar metaphor and compares the stubbornness of Israel to the stubbornness of a young calf.

All of the appropriate sacrificial animals were domesticated, most likely because domesticated animals provide a more reliable source for *sacrifices than wild animals. Bulls, calves, lambs, goats and doves were offered to the Lord as part of the daily tāmid (i.e., the daily continuous burnt offering for the community) or in response to a specific problem or sin. The sacrificial legislation, found specifically in Leviticus 1—7, clearly correlates between social status and the particular sacrificial animal. When a priest was convicted to offer a sin offering, he was required to offer a young bull, while a leader recognizing unintentional sin had to offer a male goat. A common member of the Israelite community had to offer a female lamb or (if unable to afford one) two doves or two young pigeons (Lev 4—5). The different animals highlight the typological or symbolic function of the sacrificial system and reflect the stratification of Israelite society.

The prophets treat the *temple and its cult (including also the animal sacrifices) as a given (see Liturgy and Cult). However, the prophetic critique of the ritual system points beyond the sacrificial animal to the motivation and commitment of the offerer. Micah 6:6-8 is a classic locus of this important concept (on this prophetic critique, see G. A. Klingbeil 2007a, 70-80), as is Isaiah 1:11-18. This critique focused on particular religious practices and was cyclical (i.e., every new generation of prophets seems to have taken it up). It was not aimed at ritual per se; rather, *forgiveness and rightful living tended to be separate issues in the minds of ancient Israelites, and the prophets pointed their audience to this dichotomy.

The prophets are aware of (and decry) the sacrificial use of domesticated animals for idolatrous *worship (Hos 8:5-6) and compare the *idolatry and sinfulness of God's people to donkeys or horses in heat (Jer 5:8; Ezek 23:20).

The generic term "flock" (šō'n) is often used to describe people and could refer in positive or negative contexts to Israel and Judah (Is 40:11; 63:11; Jer 13:17, 20; 23:2, 3; 25:35; Ezek 34:2, 3, 6; Zech 9:16; 10:3; 11:4-17). God is depicted as the shepherd who guides his flock and will restore a "remnant flock" (Is 63:11; Jer 31:10, 12; Ezek 34:11).

Lambs not only are prime sacrificial animals but also are used to indicate helplessness (Is 16:1 [cf. the parallel image of a young bird thrown out of its nest in Is 16:2]; Jer 12:3) or willingness (Is 53:7). Jeremiah, confronted by family opposition and persecution, feels like a lamb led to the slaughter (Jer 11:19).

Among the equids, horses and mules were animals for the elite (G. A. Klingbeil 2003a; 2003b) and could appear in a list of luxury items (Ezek 27:14). Together with chariots, they could indicate strength (Jer 17:25). The one who owned a horse (or a mule) was powerful, and many horses suggested accumulated power (Ezek 38:4, 15; Hab 1:8) and self-reliance (Is 30:16; 31:1, 3; Hos 1:7; 14:3; Hab 3:8; Zech 9:10). Reference to horses is often made in contexts of judgment (Jer 4:13; 46:4, 9; 47:3; 51:27). Those affected by judgment include the covenant people as well as other surrounding nations. In Zechariah four distinctly colored horses with riders (Zech 1:8-17) appear in the opening vision of the prophet, and together with the four horses and chariots of the last vision (Zech 6:1-8), they form an inclusio (or envelope structure) of the first part of the book. The text does not provide a clear explanation regarding the difficult-to-translate colors. They may have simply helped to distinguish the four horses from a distance. In the vision the celestial riders report back from their exploratory mission throughout the earth. The use of horses as the fastest domesticated animal, generally reserved for military or royal purposes, highlights the speedy nature of the mission and its far-reaching extent. Zechariah's audience may have immediately remembered the extended and extremely fast messenger service of the Persian period (see G. A. Klingbeil 1995).

Foreign nations often are compared to animals, though not always domesticated ones. For example, in Jeremiah 46:20 Egypt is described as a beautiful young heifer, attractive and inviting. Isaiah describes Moab's refugees as a three-year-old heifer that is skittish and fleeing (Is 15:5). In the same vein, Moab is as helpless as a wandering bird thrown out of its nest (Is 16:2).

To summarize this section: We can note both positive and negative imagery of domesticated animals throughout the prophetic corpus. God is the shepherd of the "flock" of his people Israel. The sacrificial temple cult requires domesticated animals, even though its prophetic critique reminds Israel that external form and internal motivation need to go hand in hand. Specific characteristics of domesticated animals (such as speediness, playfulness, fearfulness) are used to describe other nations. The horse imagery is often connected to military prowess, speed and self-reliance and regularly appears in contexts of judgment.

4. Mischwesen and Animal Imagery.

Some animals that appear in prophetic or *apocalyptic literature could not be easily spotted in the wild. Isaiah 27:1 refers to Leviathan (liwyātān), a serpentine being that will be slain by the Lord "in that day/time," referring to the future *Day of the Lord, a day of divine judgment, when wrong will be set right. It is quite feasible to argue that the biblical author included here a conscious reference to an Ugaitic myth (possibly KTU 1.5, also known as the Baal Cycle) that was reshaped and used polemically to demonstrate Yahweh's superiority over all powers (Averbeck, 337-40). This polemic use of extrabiblical material (or concepts) can also be found in numerous other references in the OT—for example, Psalm 121:6 (G. A. Klingbeil 1997), Isaiah 24:21-23 (Barker) and Daniel 2:34-35 (G. A. Klingbeil 2007b).

The tannin is another animal not easily identified. In Isaiah 27:1 (and possibly Is 51:9) it is linked to Leviathan. However, in other references it is associated with the Pharaoh of Egypt, and its description would fit a crocodile (Ezek 29:3; 32:2). The translation of the term in Ezekiel (which may be misspelled there) is not easy, as demonstrated by the LXX's rendering of "dragon" in Ezekiel 29:3. In this passage the imagery of a great battle that the Lord dominates is reminiscent of Isaiah 27:1 and Leviathan.

Hybrid beings (Mischwesen) occur also in the vision of Ezekiel 1 (cf. Ezek 10:14). The prophet describes these creatures as human-like (Ezek 1:5), with four faces and four wings (Ezek 1:6), the feet of a calf and gleaming like burnished bronze (Ezek 1:7). Four different faces reminded Ezekiel of a human being, a lion, an ox and an eagle (Ezek 1:10). Some elements of these living beings are reminiscent of ancient Near Eastern religious art (Keel), even though there is no exact depiction of these cherubim (cf. Ezek 10:14). The prophet struggles to find the right words (or terminology) to describe this unearthly reality that is also reflected in the grammatical variance of pronouns and verbal forms that vacillate between masculine and feminine forms (Greenberg, 44). The prophet, recognizing the strangeness of these creatures, describes them as Mischwesen that share characteristics from humans and known animals, all fused together. The lion's fierceness is linked to the eagle's swiftness and majesty, while the bull is chosen for its steady power and its value as a plow and transport animal (see Block, 96-98). The presence of the human face appears to be a reminder of God's creative power, as humanity was made in the "image" and "likeness" of God (Gen 1:26-27). It seems that the significance of these four faces exceeded the sum of the imagery (Block, 96), pointing to God's omnipotence and omnipresence and reminding the reader that heavenly realities, including God, are completely different from human realities.

Other Mischwesen occur in Daniel's vision found in Daniel 7, following the summary statement detailing the "four great beasts" (Dan 7:3). As has been noted before, their backgrounds are not necessarily Mesopotamian Mischwesen (Eggler). The first hybrid animal is a lion with eagle's wings (Dan 7:4), followed by a bear that was raised up on one side (Dan 7:5), a leopard with four wings (Dan 7:6) and, finally, a dreadful fourth beast (Dan 7:7) for which the prophet finds no fitting nametag. Based on the explanation given in Daniel 7:17, these four beasts represent four "kings." It should be noted that the LXX translates here basileiai ("kingdoms"). Many interpreters have noted the parallel nature of Daniel 2 and Daniel 7 (Collins, 297), whereby Daniel 7 recapitulates and adds to the already established historical sequence of major kingdoms found in Daniel 2. These hybrid beasts are unclean animals (Ford, 205-6), which is significant in light of the fact that the fourth beast's attack appears to be religious (Dan 7:21, 25).

Suggestions of possible sources and background for the hybrid animals in Daniel have been manifold. E. C. Lucas has discussed most of these but has noted that one should not disregard a possible OT background (cf. Hos 13:7, which contains the list of the same animals) (see Lucas 182-85). J. Eggler has suggested that the two key elements of the composite animals (e.g., the lion and the wings) should be studied separately (in terms of both their iconography and their significance in the prophecy), highlighting the importance of understanding the conceptual background of the imagery as compared to often superficial parallels taken from diverse ancient Near Eastern sources.

Other hybrid beings can be found in Zechariah 5:5-9, where two female figures, having wings like a stork, carry the enigmatic 'êpâ (NRSV: "basket"), containing a woman identified as wickedness, on the wind to Shinar (i.e., Babylon). Based on Sumerian and Akkadian cognates, it has been suggested that 'êpâ does not indicate the well-known weight or measure but rather refers to a cult room for a divine statue that was situated atop a Mesopotamian temple building (Meyers and Meyers, 295-97). The two female composite beings with stork wings carry the cult cella toward Babylon, thus purifying the land. They are not explicitly described as cherubim (which generally are masculine in the OT). One wonders about the significance of the reference to the stork, which was a migratory bird with a particularly large wingspan and associated with maternal roles. Additionally, it has been suggested that Zechariah used hāsîdâ because of its phonetic similarity to hāsîd ("the devoted, faithful") (Smith, 211). In either case, the focus is upon the action rather than upon the instruments.

5. Conclusion

As has become clear in this discussion, context is the main factor when studying the use of animal imagery in the prophets of the OT. This appears to be a truism in a dictionary focusing upon a particular genre of the OT. The use of animal imagery reminds us of the importance of this key concept. Lions are not only majestic animals associated with kings or the messianic age; they also can be symbols of divine judgment. Both familiar and unfamiliar animals are part and parcel of an important communicative strategy, taking the reader from the known (and often mundane) to the unknown, surprising and challenging word of Yahweh that reminds the careful reader (and listener) that God is the Lord of creation, in both salvation and judgment.

See also CREATION THEOLOGY; FLORAL IMAGERY; LAND; MOUNTAIN IMAGERY; WILDERNESS, DESERT.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. H. Aaron, Biblical Ambiguities, Metaphor, Semantics, and Divine Imagery (BRLAJ 4; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2001); R. Averbeck, "Ancient Near Eastern Mythography as It Relates to Historiography in the Hebrew Bible: Genesis 3 and the Cosmic Battle," in The Future of Biblical Archaeology: Reassessing Methodologies and Assumptions; The Proceedings of a Symposium

- August 12-14, 2001 at Trinity International University, ed. J. K. Hoffmeier and A. Millard (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004) 328-56; W. D. Barker, "And Thus You Brightened the Heavens . . .": A New Translation of KTU 1.5 i 1-8 and Its Significance for Ugaritic and Biblical Studies," UF 38 (2006) 41-52; D. I. Block, The Book of Ezekiel: Chapters 1-24 (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997); O. Borowski, Every Living Thing: Daily Use of Animals in Ancient Israel (Walnut Creek, CA: Altamira, 1998); J. J. Collins, Daniel (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); J. S. Croatto, "Las langostas del libro de Joel a la luz de los textos de Mari," RevistaB 61.4 (1999) 249-60; I. de Hulster, Iconographic Exegesis and Third Isaiah (FAT 2/36; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2009); K. J. Dell, "The Use of Animal Imagery in the Psalms and Wisdom Literature of Ancient Israel," SJT 53 (2000) 275-91; J. Egger, "Iconographic Motifs from Palestine/Israel and Daniel 7:2-14" (D.Litt. diss., University of Stellenbosch, 1998); J. M. Ford, "Jewish Law and Animal Symbolism," JSJ 10 (1979) 203-12; T. L. Forti, Animal Imagery in the Book of Proverbs (VTSup 118; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2008); M. Greenberg, Ezekiel 1-20: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (AB 22; New York: Doubleday, 1983); B. Janowski, U. Neumann-Gorsolke and U. Glessmer, eds., Gefährten und Feinde des Menschen: Das Tier in der Lebenswelt des alten Israels (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1993); E. Jenni, "Zur Semantik der hebräischen Personen-, Tier- und Dingvergleiche," ZAH 3 (1990) 113-66; O. Keel, Jahwe-Visionen und Siegelkunst: Eine neue Deutung der Majestätsschilderungen in Jes 6, Ez 1 und 10 und Sach 4 (SBS 84/85; Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1977); G. A. Klingbeil, "Agriculture and Animal Husbandry," DOTHB 1-20; idem, "rkš and Esther 8, 10.14: A Semantic Note," ZAW 107 (1995) 301-3; idem, "Sun and Moon in Psalm 121:6: Some Notes on Their Context and Meaning," in To Understand Scriptures: Essays in Honor of William H. Shea, ed. D. Merling (Berrien Springs, MI: Institute of Archaeology, Siegfried H. Horn Archaeological Museum, Andrews University, 1997) 33-43; idem, "Methods and Daily Life: Understanding the Use of Animals in Daily Life in a Multi-Disciplinary Framework," in Life and Culture in the Ancient Near East, ed. R. Averbeck et al. (Bethesda, MD: CDL, 2003a) 401-33; idem, "'Man's Other Best Friend': The Interaction of Equids and Man in Daily Life in Iron Age II Palestine as Seen in Texts, Artifacts, and Images," UF 35 (2003b) 259-90; idem, "Metaphors and Pragmatics: An Introduction to the Hermeneutics of Metaphors in the Epistle to the Ephesians," BBR 16 (2006) 273-93; idem, Bridging the Gap: Ritual and Ritual Texts in the Bible (BBRSup 1; Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2007a); idem, "'Rocking the Mountain': Text, Theology, and Mission in Daniel 2," in "For You Have Strengthened Me": Biblical and Theological Studies in Honor of Gerhard Pfandl in Celebration of His Sixty-Fifth Birthday, ed. M. Pröbstle, G. A. Klingbeil and M. G. Klingbeil (St. Peter am Hart: Seminar Schloss Bogenhofen, 2007b) 117-40; M. G. Klingbeil, "Metaphors That Travel and (Almost) Vanish: Mapping Diachronic Changes in the Intertextual Usage of the Heavenly Warrior Metaphor in Psalms 18 and 144," in Metaphors in the Psalms, ed. P. van Hecke and A. Labahn (BETL 231; Louvain: Peeters, 2010) 115-35; J. K. Kuntz, "Growling Dogs and Thirsty Deer: Uses of Animal Imagery in Psalmic Rhetoric," in "My Words Are Lovely": Studies in the Rhetoric of the Psalms, ed. R. L. Foster and D. M. Howard Jr. (LHBOTS 467; London: T & T Clark, 2008) 46-62; E. C. Lucas, "The Source of Daniel's Animal Imagery," TynBul 41 (1990) 161-85; A. A. Macintosh, Hosea (ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1997); E. A. Martens, "Yahweh's Compassion and Ecotheology," in Problems in Biblical Theology: Essays in Honor of Rolf Knierim, ed. H. T. C. Sun et al. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997) 234-48; C. L. Meyers and E. M. Meyers, Haggai, Zechariah 1-8: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (AB 25B; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1987); K. Nielsen, "I Am Like a Lion to Ephraim: Observations on Animal Imagery and Old Testament Theology," ST 61 (2007) 184-97; E. O. Nwaoru, Imagery in the Prophecy of Hosea (ÄAT 41; Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 1999); D. L. Petersen, "Rethinking the Nature of Prophetic Literature," in Prophecy and Prophets: The Diversity of Contemporary Issues in Scholarship, ed. Y. Gitay (SBLSS; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1997) 23-40; P. Riede, Im Spiegel der Tiere: Studien zum Verhältnis von Mensch und Tier im alten Israel (OBO 187; Fribourg: Universitätsverlag; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2002); E. Schwab, "Die Tierbilder und Tiervergleiche des Alten Testaments: Material und Problemanzeigen," BN 59 (1991) 37-43; B. Seifert, Metaphorisches Reden von Gott im Hoseabuch (FRLANT 166; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1996); Y. Shemesh, “‘And Many Beasts’ (Jonah 4:11): The Function and Status of Animals in the Book of Jonah,” JHScr 10.6 (2010) <http://www.arts.ualberta.ca/JHS/Articles/article_134.pdf>; R. A. Simkins, Yahweh’s Activity in History and Nature in the Book of Joel (ANETS 10; Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen, 1991); R. L. Smith, Micah-Malachi (WBC 32; Dallas: Word, 1984); H.-J. Stipp, “‘Alles Fleisch hatte seinen Wandel auf der Erde verdorben’ (Gen 6,12): Die Mitverantwortung der Tierwelt an der Sintflut nach der Priesterschrift,” ZAW 111 (1999) 167-86; B. A. Strawn, What Is Stronger Than a Lion? Leone Image and Metaphor in the Hebrew Bible and the Ancient Near East (OBO 212; Fribourg: Universitätsverlag; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2005).

G. A. Klingbeil

APOCALYPTICISM, APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE

Within scholarship, the term apocalypse typically refers to a specific literary genre that employs prophecies and *visions concerning the end of time. Those literary works that conform to these standards are considered members of apocalyptic literature; the worldview or ideology associated with these books often is labeled apocalypticism, and the word apocalyptic is the adjective used to describe something that characterizes this worldview.

While the book of *Daniel stands out as the quintessential example of an apocalyptic book in the OT and is frequently, though not uniformly, considered part of the prophetic corpus, several decidedly prophetic books do exhibit clear apocalyptic characteristics, such as Isaiah, Ezekiel, Zechariah and Joel. In fact, many argue that prophecy birthed the apocalyptic phenomenon found in the Bible. Therefore, a discussion of the ideas related to apocalypse and its relationship with the prophetic corpus is essential to grasping a more complete understanding of the OT Prophetic Books and their influence.

1. Essential Definitions and Terms
2. Proposed Origins of Apocalypse
3. Theology or Function of Apocalypse
4. Early Apocalyptic in the Prophets
5. Summary

1. Essential Definitions and Terms.

1.1. Definitions.

1.1.1. Defining Apocalypse. Going back to 1832, scholars have struggled with how both to consistently define and to categorize the concept of apocalypse (J. Collins 1998, 3). The term apocalypse is of Greek origin, drawn from the word apokalypsis, which is the first word in the NT book of Revelation and typically is translated as “revelation.” In some ways, the book of Revelation serves as a kind of exemplar for a book conforming to the literary genre of apocalypse, and fidelity to Revelation’s literary characteristics commonly has served as a kind of litmus test to which all other potential apocalyptic candidates are measured. As a result, denoting books as apocalyptic has been more of a post-NT phenomenon. However, many works predating the book of Revelation, the vast majority of which are not found in either the Jewish or the Christian biblical canons, seem to accord with many, though not all, of Revelation’s literary features, therefore leading scholars to conclude that a more precise working definition was needed. To meet that need, a study group from the Society of Biblical Literature (SBL) was charged to develop a more detailed and systematic framework for determining which books could be accurately categorized as apocalyptic. J. Collins, who was a key architect within that group and is today the most influential figure in the discipline of apocalyptic studies, noted that the group’s primary effort in determining whether a book could be classified as apocalyptic was to discern “whether a group of texts share a significant cluster of traits that distinguish them from other works” (J. Collins 1998, 4). To that end, the study group produced the following working definition: “a genre of revelatory literature with a narrative framework, in which a revelation is mediated by an otherworldly being to a human recipient, disclosing a transcendent reality which is both temporal, insofar as it envisages eschatological salvation, and spatial insofar as it involves another, supernatural world” (J. Collins 1979, 9). Beyond this dense definition, the study group composed a detailed “master paradigm” that serves to unpack the definition even further (J. Collins 1979, 5-8).

1.1.2. SBL Study Group Master Paradigm. Assuming the centrality of revelation, this paradigm divides into five sections, each of which lists various characteristics that define that section. Under the first section, “manner of revelation,” various mediums by which the revelation is communicated are listed as well as several features associated both with the mediator and the human recipient. The two largest sections are dedicated to the content of the revelation; one treats temporal elements such as protology, history, present salvation and the eschatological milieu, and the other addresses the spatial, otherworldly components. The fourth section briefly addresses the parenesis flowing from the mediator to the recipient of the revelation, and the concluding section lists both instructions to the recipient and the presence of a narrative conclusion.

1.1.3. Other Scholarly Approaches to Defining Apocalypse. While most in the academy tend to accept this rather comprehensive working definition, not all fully embrace it. Even after the SBL study group's groundbreaking work was completed, several lamented that it did not go far enough to clarify which books are most clearly apocalyptic, and others suggested that it went too far. Writing after the study group's work, R. Webb still referred to apocalyptic as a "slippery term" and offered a helpful survey of four main approaches to defining apocalyptic. First, the "traditional" approach is represented by K. Koch's work, which compiles lists of apocalyptic characteristics and compares prospective works to those characteristics (Koch, 18-35). It emphasizes the content of an apocalypse, such as that found in apocalyptic eschatology as compared with prophetic eschatology (see 1.2.4 below), but neglects important features such as history. Second, the "literary-form" approach emphasizes the literary features of an apocalypse, in particular, the simple presence of a revelation. C. Rowland's work best exemplifies this approach (Rowland 1982, 14), and it is criticized for being too inclusive because it displaces the central role of apocalyptic eschatology. Third, the "essentialist" approach of E. P. Sanders combines the traditional and the literary-form approaches by combining the place of a revelation with the content of hope for restored circumstances (Sanders, 458). It is also considered vulnerable to being overly inclusive. Fourth, Webb describes the work of the SBL group as an "eclectic" attempt to incorporate recurring traits while simultaneously elevating those traits traditionally limited to apocalypses, such as apocalyptic eschatology. One can see that integration within the paradigm itself as "revelation" is central in both its "manner" and its "content." In the end, Collins felt that "transcendence" serves as the core characteristic of the master paradigm, defining both the literary form and the content of a prospective apocalyptic work (J. Collins 1979, 10-12). To date, despite many challenges to it, the work of the SBL study group has yet to be eclipsed and continues to serve as the benchmark for defining what the term apocalypse means and how it is manifested in both biblical and extrabiblical works.

1.2. Terms.

1.2.1. Apocalypticism. The term apocalypticism can be construed as "the ideology of a movement that shares the conceptual structure of the apocalypses" (J. Collins 1998, 3). It is generally accepted that something of an apocalyptic movement existed in the period between the second century BC and the second century AD, from which apocalyptic works abound and during which, one might say, apocalypticism flourished. Several examples emerging from this period support this notion. Apocalyptic fervor can be found in many pseudepigraphal works, such as the several books of Enoch and Baruch and various Testaments. Apocalyptic features also influence the deuterocanonical books, such as in Maccabees and perhaps the Wisdom of Solomon. In addition, the Qumran community that produced the Dead Sea Scrolls is widely recognized as an apocalyptic group producing several works indicating that apocalypticism defined much of the life, writings and culture of this group. Apocalyptic impulses seem to enter into the LXX as well. For example, Job is described as being resurrected in LXX Job 42:17, whereas no such mention is found in the MT of Job. Naturally, apocalyptic ideas heavily season all of the NT, not the least of which is found in Jesus' teachings in Matthew 24—25; Mark 13 and Paul's teachings (e.g., 1 Thess 4), and some even suggest that James 5 evinces apocalyptic ideas.

1.2.2. Eschatology. The term eschatology generally refers to the study of all matters concerning the end times, which, as seen in the SBL master paradigm, play a significant role in defining a legitimate work of apocalypse. However, a distinction is often made between prophetic eschatology and apocalyptic eschatology. P. Hanson usually is credited with making the distinction as part of his immensely important study examining the origins of apocalypses, which will be considered in greater detail below.

1.2.3. Apocalyptic Eschatology. Hanson defined the term apocalyptic eschatology as “a religious perspective which focuses on the prophetic announcement to the nation of the disclosure (usually esoteric in nature) to the elect of the cosmic vision of Yahweh’s sovereignty—especially as it relates to his acting to deliver his faithful—which disclosure the visionaries have largely ceased to translate into the terms of plain history, real politics, and human instrumentality due to a pessimistic view of reality growing out of the bleak post-exilic conditions within which those associated with the visionaries found themselves. Those conditions seemed unsuitable to them as a context for the envisioned restoration of Yahweh’s people” (Hanson 1979, 11-12).

1.2.4. Prophetic Eschatology. Hanson defined the term prophetic eschatology as “a religious perspective which focuses on the prophetic announcement to the nation of the divine plans for Israel and the world which the prophet has witnessed unfolding in the *divine council and which he translates into the terms of plain history, real politics, and human instrumentality; that is, the prophet interprets for the king and the people how the plans of the divine council will be effected within the context of their nation’s history and the history of the world” (Hanson 1975, 11).

1.2.5. Vaticinia ex Eventu. As seen in Hanson’s definitions, the one word that most readily distinguishes apocalyptic eschatology from prophetic eschatology is history. The prophets did not lose sight of events related to their own immediate world, whereas the practitioners of apocalypses were more concerned with the cosmic, transcendent “otherworldly” realm. Nevertheless, history plays a highly important role in apocalypses, especially as it relates to predicted events. Much of scholarship tends to accept the notion that the authors of apocalypses projected into the future certain so-called predictions about events that had already occurred in history. This practice is known as vaticinia ex eventu. Hanson describes this phenomenon as “retrospect” whereby the writers would “verify the visionary’s insights into the sovereignty of Yahweh” (Hanson 1975, 28). Naturally, not all scholars hold to this view, complaining that such a practice would represent a kind of uncomfortable deception not in accord with the Bible’s claims. The classic example of the debate between the two approaches is bound up in the dating of the book of Daniel. Most of scholarship holds to a second-century BC date despite the book’s self-depiction to have been written during the time of the exile in the sixth century BC. While most would share J. Collins’s view that the book of Daniel is fictive and therefore does not necessarily accurately depict actual history (J. Collins 2002, 14), others, such as E. Lucas maintain a more nuanced view, suggesting that based on literary and linguistic analyses, no final conclusion can be made concerning the dating of Daniel, and that both a second-century BC date and a sixth-century BC date could be equally substantiated while simultaneously holding to the inspiration and authority of the Bible (Lucas, 312) (see Daniel: Book of). Similar debates influence the dating of those specific sections of the prophets that seem to be affiliated with apocalypses, such as Isaiah 24–27, where many would not date this section to the time of Isaiah ben Amoz, preferring instead a postexilic date well over a century after Isaiah’s ministry.

2. Proposed Origins of Apocalypse.

2.1. Wisdom as Source of Apocalypse. Until G. von Rad’s paradigm-shattering hypothesis that apocalypses grew out of the Wisdom literature, scholarship tended to accept the notion that prophecy birthed apocalypse. Von Rad argued that unlike the prophets, the authors of apocalypses viewed history as determined and were therefore more naturally akin with the sages who produced the books contained in the Wisdom literature, such as Proverbs, Ecclesiastes and Job (von Rad 1965, 2:301-8). While the intersection of apocalypse and wisdom had been examined in the nineteenth century and early twentieth century, it was likely the massive influence of von Rad himself that forced scholarship to reconsider the theory. Von Rad argued, “The decisive factor, as I see it, is the incompatibility between apocalyptic literature’s view of history and that of the prophets. The prophetic message is specifically rooted in the saving history, that is to say, it is rooted in definite election traditions. But there is no way which leads from this to the apocalyptic view of history” (von Rad 1965, 2:303). In addition to the differing views of history, von Rad argued that “knowledge based on a universal Jahwism” was an essential connection between wisdom and apocalypse (von Rad 1965, 2:308). Von Rad's later work on the Wisdom literature further developed the central place of determinism as a formative link between wisdom and apocalypse, arguing that history was subordinate to divine determination, and that determinism, even more so than eschatology, was pivotal to an apocalypse (von Rad 1972, 278). Von Rad's inability to produce a biblical book that clearly demonstrated the transition from wisdom to apocalypse contributed to scholarship's resistance to his thesis. More recent research into the apocalyptic impulses prevailing in the book of Job may provide a starting point for reengaging von Rad's view (Johnson, 170). Nevertheless, von Rad's theory stimulated further research into the possibility of wisdom being the source for apocalypse.

2.2. Mantic Wisdom as Source of Apocalypse. Picking up where von Rad left off, H. Müller refined the theory, arguing that Mesopotamian mantic wisdom instead of Jewish wisdom was a more likely candidate as the source of apocalypse. Employing the book of Daniel as an archetype, Müller argued that Daniel 1—6 represented the kind of mantic wisdom typically affiliated with Mesopotamian sages, according nicely with Daniel's purported provenance. Müller argued the latter half of Daniel (Dan 7—12) represented the transformation from mantic wisdom into an apocalyptic ethos marked by eschatology, pseudepigraphy and special enlightenment. M. Fishbane also perceived mantic influences in Daniel. However, accepting that mantic influences can be found throughout Daniel, and in several other prophetic books such as Isaiah, Ezekiel, Jeremiah and Zechariah, Fishbane argued that the author of Daniel strategically assembled older prophecies that resulted in introducing the reader to the "mental world of the wise believers" who were able to produce "an atmosphere of confidence in the inevitability of the apocalyptic forecast" (Fishbane, 493-94). Building on Fishbane's work, paying particular attention to Zechariah 9—13, K. Larkin's study reinforces the possibility that mantic wisdom served as an important source of apocalypse. She concludes that "formal wisdom can have an influence on the production of eschatology, and this is demonstrated in Zechariah 9-13, a mantological anthology which pays respect to prophetic and historical traditions as well as to cultic traditions" (Larkin, 253).

2.3. Prophecy as Source of Apocalypse. Returning to scholarship's traditional view that prophecy was the source of apocalypse, Hanson's influential work continues to represent one of the most accepted defenses within scholarship. Dispensing with those who argued that apocalypses emerged from either Persian Zoroastrianism or various forms of ancient Near Eastern wisdom, Hanson considered various ancient Near Eastern influences "late" and "limited in their influence to peripheral embellishments" (Hanson 1975, 7-8). Instead, Hanson argued that apocalyptic eschatology owes itself to an "unbroken development from pre-exilic and exilic prophecy." Prior to the fall of Jerusalem in 587 BC, the prophetic trajectory is described by Hanson as marked by an effort to integrate Yahweh's cosmic rule with the Jewish historical and political situation. However, after 587 BC, the Jews' barren political landscape produced a change whereby the prophets were replaced by "visionaries" who, while sharing the prophetic practice of receiving visions, began to "abdicate the other dimension of the prophetic office, the translation from prophetic into historic events" (Hanson 1975, 16). Hanson then seeks to discover biblical works that reveal this transition from prophets to visionaries, which, he asserts, is most ideally located in Isaiah 55—66. He argues that the supposed postexilic context demonstrates a more pessimistic period wherein the hope for restoration was waning, and that the "political-historical realm was overcome by evil, and was no longer a realm over which they had any control" (Hanson 1975, 26). He concludes with the following four assertions concerning the source of apocalyptic eschatology: (1) it is "solidly" in the prophetic tradition of Israel; (2) it occurred in the sixth to fifth centuries BC; (3) its essential characteristic is the "abandonment of the prophetic task of translating the vision of the divine council into historical terms"; (4) a struggle within the community in the Second Temple period existed between the visionary and the "hierocratic" elements, which refers to those of the Zadokite priesthood, which served "as the sole custodian of the central cult for the remainder of the Persian period, and was in position to mold the character of postexilic Judaism along the lines of its temple theology" (Hanson 1975, 29). Naturally, not all concur that Hanson's conclusions are definitive, and, in particular, Hanson's central tenet of a dualist polarization existing within Judaism is frequently challenged as reductionist. While Hanson's historical reconstructions surely influence his hermeneutics and have received much-needed critical responses, his primary contribution was to reestablish the hypothesis that apocalypses emerged from prophecy. At the same time, one of his most lasting contributions to the study of apocalypses has been to identify several prophetic works under the category of "early apocalyptic" dating to the late sixth and early fifth centuries BC that represent various stages of development between prophecy and apocalyptic as a way to "escape from the harsh realities of this world which were contradicting the covenant promises" (Hanson 1975, 27). He lists several examples that will be examined below.

3. Theology or Function of Apocalypse.

3.1. Rejected and Accepted. Because of the fantastic images and seemingly unintelligible language commonly associated with apocalypses, many deride this category of biblical literature as being too dangerous to integrate into meaningful theological reflection. For some, the apparent presence of overly mythic and violent features demands that the message of apocalypses cannot be taken seriously. At the same time, heightened popular appreciation for apocalypses in nearly every generation dissuades theologians from retreating too far away. Rare is the culture where some contemporary apocalyptic discourse concerning the end of time is lacking.

3.2. Exhortation and Consolation. In seeking to address what purpose may lay behind an apocalypse, D. Hellholm offered a corollary to the SBL's working definition, adding that apocalypses were "intended for a group in crisis with the purpose of exhortation and/or consolation by means of divine authority" (Hellholm, 27). J. Collins concurs: "The illocutionary functions and consolation can generally be maintained for Jewish apocalypses" (Collins 1998, 41). A. Collins supports the notion that apocalypses were designed to bridge the gap between the transcendent world and the earthly realm by seeking to "influence both the understanding and behavior of the audience by means of divine authority" (A. Collins 1986, 7). Accordingly, in times of crisis, whatever action was promoted by the writer was deemed credible because God's voice was added, thereby establishing the message as authoritative.

3.3. Resistance Literature. A. Portier-Young recently argued that the first Jewish apocalypses arose as literary forms of resistance to the prevailing empire. Because empires exerted tremendous influence over culture, dominating every facet of life, resisting this suffocating influence "required challenging not only the physical means of coercion, but also the empire's claims about knowledge and the world" (Portier-Young, xxii). Building on the work of R. Albertz, Portier-Young concentrates her study on Hellenistic apocalypses and identifies two forms of resistance to empire: resistance action and resistant discourse, the latter being capable of replacing the "logic of empire" with an "alternative vision of reality" where God's hidden power and providence are revealed (Portier-Young, 44). Therefore, as resistance literature, the Hellenistic apocalypses "asserted a threatened identity and covenant and empowered their readers for resistance" (Portier-Young, 382).

3.4. Hope in the Future. Hanson emphasizes the importance of hope in apocalypses, arguing that those who are in despair of their earthly circumstances look to the work of God's future plan as both an inspiration to endure and a source of comfort (Hanson 1987, 28). This hope and comfort are situated on the "central confessions of Yahwistic, and, especially, prophetic faith." God is just, compassionate and sovereign and will not forsake his people as he directs history towards its divine purpose where evil cannot prevail (Hanson 1987, 42, 64).

3.5. Perseverance in Suffering. Other research in apocalyptic literature suggests that a central message is that of persevering in one's faith in the midst of suffering (Johnson). Apocalypses clearly were written during times of crisis, whether during the Babylonian captivity in the sixth century BC, or under the threatening hand of Antiochus Epiphanes in the second century BC, or during the persecutions of Christians in the first century AD. In whatever context, the authors of the biblical apocalypses championed one central message: never lose faith in God, even in the midst of desperate suffering, for God will reward the faithful and punish the wicked. For example, in Daniel 12:12 the angel regards those as blessed who are able to persevere during the period when the regular burnt offerings are taken away and the time of the abomination of desolation is established. In Revelation 14:12 we read, "Here is a call for the endurance of the saints, those who keep the commandments of God and their faith in Jesus" (ESV).

4. Early Apocalyptic in the Prophets.

4.1. Early Apocalypses. If Hanson is correct that prophecy is the parent of apocalypses, then we should not be surprised to find examples of nascent apocalypses in the prophetic corpus. Hanson has pointed to several of these sections within the prophetic corpus that he labels either "proto-apocalyptic" or "early apocalypse." Having reviewed many of the most salient features associated with apocalypses, we may find it helpful to examine some of those prophetic sections in light of what scholarship has come to identify as apocalyptic.

4.2. Isaiah 24—27. *Isaiah's third set of oracles is often called the "Isaiah Apocalypse." Many have considered the overtly eschatological themes contained within these four chapters to be the primary witness to an early form of apocalypse. As noted earlier, Hanson considers this section of Isaiah to be a late sixth-century or early fifth-century BC example of "early apocalyptic." While others, such as J. Motyer (Motyer, 162) and J. Watts (Watts, 310), are less inclined to do so, arguing instead that treating these chapters as apocalyptic merely on their eschatological features is a stretch, the material does seem to lend itself to several other apocalyptic characteristics that suggest that it is indeed akin to apocalypses. The section's opening words portend the eschaton: "Behold, the LORD will empty the earth and make it desolate, and he will twist its surface and scatter its inhabitants" (Is 24:1 ESV). A global final judgment appears to be in view, which is reiterated on several occasions—for example, "Therefore the inhabitants of the earth are scorched, and few men are left" (Is 24:6 ESV). The earth itself suffers during this conflagration: "The earth is utterly broken, the earth is split apart, the earth is violently shaken" (Is 24:19 ESV). Despite this calamitous description of the end, hope continues to reside in the Lord of hosts, who will "make for all peoples a feast of rich food. . . . He will swallow up death forever; and the Lord God will wipe away tears from all faces" (Is 25:6-8 ESV). Keeping with the theological motif of enduring in the midst of suffering, Isaiah declares with a hint of triumphalism, "It will be said on that day, 'Behold, this is our God; we have waited for him, that he might save us. This is the LORD; we have waited for him; let us be glad and rejoice in his salvation'" (Is 25:9 ESV). Resurrection is possibly suggested as an example of this hope: "Your dead shall live; their bodies shall rise. You who dwell in the dust, awake and sing for joy!" (Is 26:19 ESV). Symbolizing the death of evil, in God's final judgment he will punish "Leviathan the fleeing serpent, Leviathan the twisting serpent, and will slay the dragon that is in the sea" (Is 27:1 ESV). Finally, Israel will then "blossom and put forth shoots and fill the whole world with fruit," and "in that day a great trumpet will be blown, and those who were lost in the land of Assyria and those who were driven out to the land of Egypt will come and worship the LORD on the holy mountain at Jerusalem" (Is 27:6, 13 ESV). One can readily identify many apocalyptic themes in this section of Isaiah that correlate nicely with several elements listed in the SBL master paradigm such that it would be difficult not to construe Isaiah 24—27 as anything other than an early form of apocalyptic.

4.3. Ezekiel 38—39. Referring to a future invasion of Israel, this exilic prophecy identifies the mysterious Gog of Magog as a chief adversary that God will ultimately destroy. L. Allen refers to it as protoapocalyptic and cites P. Grech, who wrote that *Ezekiel was "an example of apocalyptic taking off but still touching the runway" (Allen, 210). Further confirming its apocalyptic flavor, Gog and Magog resurface in Revelation 20 at the end of Jesus' millennial reign: "And when the thousand years are ended, Satan will be released from his prison and will come out to deceive the nations that are at the four corners of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them for battle; their number is like the sand of the sea" (Rev 20:7-8 ESV). Allen also indicates that the Gog unit in Ezekiel "colored the prediction of the end of Antiochus Epiphanes" in Daniel 11:40-45, and then, perhaps referring to the Jewish tractate "Succos," Allen asserts that these chapters "became a firm part of Jewish eschatology in rabbinic tradition" (Allen, 210). For example, Ezekiel 38:16 states, "In the latter days I will bring you against my land, that the nations may know me, when through you, O Gog, I vindicate my holiness before their eyes" (ESV). God's sovereignty even over Gog's motivation for invading Israel demonstrates that he has complete control over historical events. The identity of Gog and Magog has perplexed scholars, and no consensus has emerged; however, the overt references to a final battle and Israel's complete restoration clearly reveal an early form of apocalypse.

4.4. Zechariah.

4.4.1. Zechariah 1—8. Even though Hanson did not consider Zechariah 1—8 to be a source of early apocalyptic, several others have seen clear apocalyptic indicators in this section and would argue that the first part of Zechariah* is an extremely important representation of protoapocalypse (Cook, 125-27). For example, in Zechariah 1:8 we are immediately introduced to Zechariah's vision of horsemen that transports us to similar images of eschatological judgment in both Zechariah 10 and Revelation 6: "I saw in the night, and behold, a man riding on a red horse! He was standing among the myrtle trees in the glen, and behind him were red sorrel, and white horses" (Zech 1:8 ESV). All four horsemen and their chariots are sent to patrol the earth in Zechariah 6. Other key apocalyptic images include the presence of Satan in Zechariah 3, lampstands in Zechariah 4, and personified "Wickedness" being judged in Zechariah 5. In addition, S. Cook considers the seemingly dualistic distinction between the present age and the coming age as a reflection of "the coming millennial era" in Zechariah 8 (Cook, 129).

4.4.2. Zechariah 9—14. Hanson argued that Zechariah 9—14 represents a protoapocalyptic work communicating oracles from the same visionary tradition found in Isaiah 55—66 (Hanson 1979, 286). With the prospect for a transformed society unlikely, Hanson argues that the writers adopted the myth of divine warrior for their apocalyptic projection of the future in order to "keep faith alive" (Hanson 1987, 115-16). This apocalyptic vision required a new creation to defeat evil and allow justice and peace to flourish (Hanson 1987, 116-17). Although apocalyptic features certainly exist in these six chapters, only in Zechariah 14 can a full-blown apocalypse be found (Smith, 285). The ultimate battle is prophesied in Zechariah 14:2-4;

"For I will gather all the nations against Jerusalem to battle. . . . Then the LORD will go out and fight against those nations. . . . On that day his feet shall stand on the Mount of Olives" (ESV). Yahweh is portrayed as coming with his "holy ones" to rescue his people, and some see this as a reference to the so-called rapture in 1 Thessalonians 4:13-17 (Zech 14:5 ESV). Ushering in the new era of peace, the final day will discover that "living waters shall flow out from Jerusalem. . . . And the LORD will be king over all the earth (Zech 14:8-9 ESV). Even the topography will be changed, as the whole land will be transformed into a plain (Zech 14:10 ESV). Jerusalem will be secured and never again have to exist in insecurity (Zech 14:10-11 ESV).

4.5. Joel 2:28—3:2. This brief passage functions as part of Joel's* second oracle that addresses how God will restore his people and subjugate their enemies. It is packed with apocalyptic imagery, including "wonders in the heavens and on the earth, blood and fire and columns of smoke" all happening "before the great and awesome day of the Lord comes" (Joel 2:30-31 ESV). Judgment defines the book, and D. Stuart recognizes that two "Days of Yahweh" exist in Joel, one directed to the timeframe of Joel, and one directed to the future. The time between the two judgments is uncertain, but a "more distant end" seems to be of great concern for the writer (Stuart, 231).

5. Summary.

While not claiming to have the final word, the SBL study group's definition of apocalypse and its accompanying master paradigm have been widely accepted as the standard for discerning whether or not a particular work could be considered an apocalypse. When one applies this to certain passages in the prophetic corpus, several embryonic forms of apocalypse represented in a variety of prophetic books can easily be identified.

The presence of so many protoapocalyptic sections testifies to the ongoing importance of investigating the relationship between apocalypse and prophecy. The numerous witnesses of this particular generic intersection have led many prominent scholars to conclude that prophecy is the most natural source for apocalypse. While much research prefers mantic wisdom as an alternative source for apocalypse, perhaps not enough attention has been given to von Rad's proposal that Jewish wisdom is the source. Research into the apocalyptic impulses woven throughout the book of Job suggests that a fresh analysis of von Rad's thesis is merited (Johnson).

Identifying the source greatly impacts one's decision regarding the social context from which apocalypse grew, which in turn influences decisions about dating, provenance and purpose. All of these naturally weigh into how one interprets apocalyptic texts. To date, prophecy is the regnant hypothesis, but enough alternatives exist to suggest that more research is required.

See also DANIEL: BOOK OF; DANIEL: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION; ESCHATOLOGY; PROPHECY, HISTORY OF; PROPHECY AND WISDOM; VISIONS, PROPHETIC.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. L. Allen, Ezekiel 20-48 (WBC 29; Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 1990); A. Y. Collins, "Introduction: Early Christian Apocalypticism," Semeia 36 (1986) 1-12; J. J. Collins, "Introduction: Towards the Morphology of a Genre," Semeia 14 (1979) 1-20; idem, The Apocalyptic Imagination: An Introduction to Jewish Apocalyptic Literature (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); idem, "Current Issues in the Book of Daniel," in The Book of Daniel: Composition and Reception, ed. J. J. Collins and P. W. Flint (2 vols.; Boston: Brill Academic, 2002) 1:1-15; S. Cook, Prophecy and Apocalypticism: The Postexilic Social Setting (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995); M. Fishbane, Biblical Interpretation in Ancient Israel (Oxford: Clarendon, 1985); P. Hanson, The Dawn of Apocalyptic: The Historical and Sociological Roots of Jewish Apocalyptic Eschatology (rev. ed.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); idem, Old Testament Apocalyptic (Nashville: Abingdon, 1987); D. Hellholm, "The Problem of Apocalyptic Genre and the Apocalypse of John," Semeia 36 (1986) 13-64; T. J. Johnson, Now My Eye Sees You: Unveiling an Apocalyptic Job (HBM 24; Sheffield: Sheffield Phoenix, 2009); K. Koch, The Rediscovery of Apocalyptic: A Polemical Work on a Neglected Area of Biblical Studies and Its Damaging Effects on Theology and Philosophy, trans. M. Kohl (London: SCM, 1972); K. Larkin, The Eschatology of Second Zechariah: A Study of the Formation of a Mantological Wisdom Anthology (CBET 6; Kampen: Kok Pharos, 1994); E. Lucas, Daniel (ApOTC 20; Leicester: Apollos, 2002); J. A. Motyer, Isaiah: An Introduction and Com- mentary (TOTC; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1999); H. P. Müller, "Mantische Weisheit und Apokalyptik," in Congress Volume: Uppsala 1971 (VTSup 22; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1972) 268-93; A. E. Portier-Young, Apocalypse against the Empire: Theologies of Resistance in Early Judaism (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2011); C. Rowland, The Open Heaven: A Study of Apocalyptic in Judaism and Early Christianity (New York: Crossroad, 1982); E. P. Sanders, "The Genre of Palestinian Jewish Apocalypses," in Apocalypticism in the Mediterranean World and the Near East: Proceedings of the International Colloquium on Apocalypticism, Uppsala, August 12-17, 1979, ed. D. Hellholm (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1983) 447-59; R. Smith, Micah-Malachi (WBC 32; Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 1984); D. Stuart, Hosea-Jonah (WBC 31; Waco, TX: Word, 1987); G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, trans. D. M. G. Stalker (2 vols.; New York: Harper & Row, 1965); idem, Wisdom in Israel, trans. J. D. Martin (Nashville: Abingdon, 1972); J. D. W. Watts, Isaiah 1-33 (WBC 24; Waco, TX: Word, 1985); R. L. Webb, "Apocalyptic: Observations on a Slippery Term," JNES 49 (1990) 115-26. T. J. Johnson

APOCRYPHA, PROPHETIC. See DEAD SEA SCROLLS.

ARAMAIC LANGUAGE

In contrast to the Aramaic of the book of Ezra, which appears in official letters from the Achaemenid (Persian) period (see DOTHB, Aramaic Language), the Aramaic of the book of *Daniel appears in stories and visions (i.e., in literary texts) set in the Neo-Babylonian and Achaemenid periods (Dan 2:4b–7:28). The Aramaic of Daniel differs slightly from that of Ezra and, like that of Ezra, can be placed in the Achaemenid period. However, Standard Literary Aramaic, to which the Aramaic of Daniel belongs, developed from Official Aramaic and continued throughout the ancient Near East until after the Greek conquest (Kaufman, 115). Aramaic literary texts from Qumran were composed in forms of Standard Literary Aramaic, not in Palestinian Aramaic. Consequently, the Aramaic of Daniel shares some features with the Aramaic found in Qumran literary texts (see Dead Sea Scrolls).

The versification of the MT differs in places from that of the English translations: MT 3:31-

33 = ET 4:1-3; MT 4:1-34 = ET 4:4-37; MT 6:1 = ET 5:31; MT 6:2-29 = ET 6:1-28. Due to its technical nature, this article will be referenced according to the MT.

This article does not include a discussion of the question of an Aramaic original for Daniel 1, which purportedly was translated into Hebrew (Collins, 38). The presence of an Aramaism such as ʾāser lāmmā (Aram dlmh, “lest” [Dan 1:10]) does not prove translation from Aramaic to Hebrew, but it does demonstrate Aramaic influence on Hebrew.

Aramaic, a West Semitic language with a datable history of some three thousand years, served as the lingua franca for the empires of Assyria, Babylonia and Persia. According to Genesis, the patriarchs of Israel had Aramean roots. Arameans such as Balaam the son of Beor and the Aramean kingdoms of Aram-Zobah and Aram-Damascus played notable roles in the history of biblical Israel. (For a fuller discussion of Aramaic and the importance of Aramaic in the world of ancient Israel, see Lund, 50-53.)

1. Sources
2. Bilingualism in Daniel
3. Vocabulary of the Aramaic of Daniel
4. The Function of the Qere in Relation to the Kethib in the MT of Daniel
5. Orthography and Phonology of the Aramaic of Daniel
6. Morphology of the Aramaic of Daniel
7. Morphosyntactic Functions of the Verb
8. Syntax of the Aramaic of Daniel
9. Suggested Emendations for Critical Evaluation

1. Sources.

The MT and fragmentary texts from Qumran (1Q71; 1Q72; 4Q112; 4Q113; 4Q115) serve as the sources for our knowledge of the Aramaic of Daniel. 1Q71 contains fragments of Daniel 2:4-6; 1Q72 contains fragments of Daniel 3:23-31; 4Q112 contains fragments of Daniel 2:9—7:28; 4Q113 contains fragments of Daniel 5:10—7:28; 4Q115 purportedly contains fragments of Daniel 3:24-25; 4:6, 13-15; 7:16-17.

2. Bilingualism in Daniel.

The book of Daniel is written partly in Hebrew (Dan 1:1—2:4a; 8:1—12:13) and partly in Aramaic (Dan 2:4b—7:28). Rather than being due to amalgamation, a bilingual author deliberately used both languages to express change in point of view; in the Hebrew sections the author writes from an ideological internal position, while in the Aramaic section he is more detached (Arnold, 9-13). The Aramaic section, Aramaic being the language of the world, focuses on the eternal and universal rule of God over the nations (Albertz, 175-79), while the Hebrew sections, Hebrew being the language of Israel, focuses on how the stories and visions relate specifically to Israel. The use of Aramaic in Daniel lends authenticity to stories set in foreign lands (see Snell, 43).

3. Vocabulary of the Aramaic of Daniel.

Vocabulary choice in the Aramaic suggests a time of composition in the Persian period, despite the use of Greek words for musical instruments, which some herald as evidence of a Greek time period.

3.1. Greek Words. Three Greek words, all names of musical instruments, appear in the Aramaic of Daniel: qitrōs (Qere qatrōs or qatrōs), “kithara” (Dan 3:5, 7, 10, 15); sūmēpōnēyā (Dan 3:5, 15) or sīppōnēyā (Qere sūppōnēyā) “bagpipe, drum” (Dan 3:10) (see Mitchell and Joyce, 25-26); and pēsantērīn (Dan 3:5, 10, 15) or pēsantērīn, “harp” (Dan 3:7). Whereas once this was trumpeted as a clear indication of a late date of the Aramaic of Daniel, Greek influence is widely attested in the Near East already in the eighth through sixth centuries BC, so that such a claim is dubious in and of itself (Kitchen, 44-50).

3.2. Persian Words. Persian terms, specifically Old Persian terms (Kitchen, 43), to describe functionaries in Nebuchadnezzar’s court appear to be substitutions for Babylonian terms and indicate composition in the Achaemenid period: ʾāḥašdarpan, “satrap”; ʾādargāzar, “counselor”; gēdābar, “treasurer”; dētābar, “law official”; and tiptāyē (sg. form uncertain), “magistrates” (Dan 3:2). The adjective ʾazdā, “certain,” also appears (Dan 2:5).

3.3. Aramaic Glosses. The phrase bēnoghā, “at dawn,” appears to be a gloss of bišparpārā, “at dawn” (Dan 6:20). The fact that both phrases apparently occur in 4Q113 and are represented in Theodotion’s LXX text would point to a very early textual development (see Text and Textual Criticism). J. Collins suggests that in Daniel 4:12 the phrase baʿāšab ʾarʾā, “in the grass of the earth,” is a gloss of bēdītʾā dī bārā, “in the grass of the field,” since it is omitted in

Daniel 4:20, where the rest of the sentence is repeated with a slight change (Collins 210, 227). Yet, it seems strange that a gloss would be so far removed from what it glosses.

3.4. The Form daḥwān. The translation of the enigmatic feminine plural form daḥwān (Dan 6:19) as “diversions” offers a reasonable compromise between the contextual guesses “foods,” “musical instruments,” “musicians,” and “dancing girls”—pleasures and amusements fit for a king. The translation “concubines” requires emendation to lēḥēnān.

3.5. The Form kaśdā. The form kaśdā, “Chaldean,” with the sibilant ś, appears in the Aramaic of Daniel, whereas the form kaldū, “Chaldea,” (< kaśdu*), with the liquid l, appears in a Neo-Assyrian royal inscription, written in Standard Literary Babylonian. In Standard Literary Babylonian the combination sibilant + dental (here ś + d) becomes l + dental (here l + d).

3.6. The Root šdr. The root šdr means “to strive”: hāwā’ mištaddar lēḥaṣṣālūtēh, “he was struggling to rescue him” (Dan 6:15). This root is cognate with later Aramaic ištaddal, “to strive, struggle,” and later Hebrew hištaddel, “to strive, struggle,” the letters rēš and lāmed being liquids.

3.7. Complementary Verbal Roots.

3.7.1. The Root yhb. The root yhb, “to give,” is used for the suffix conjugation, the active participle, and the imperative, while the root ntn, “to give,” is used for the prefix conjugation and, in Ezra, the infinitive.

3.7.2. The Root ykl. The root ykl, “to be able,” appears in the suffix conjugation, the prefix conjugation, and the active participle; the root khl, “to be able,” appears only in the active participle.

4. The Function of the Qere in Relation to the Kethib in the MT of Daniel.

W. Morrow and E. Clarke proposed that the Qere (reading tradition) of Daniel reflects an early spoken Palestinian dialect dating to AD 200-600. S. Fassberg criticized their thesis on methodological grounds, demonstrating that they ignored relevant comparative data, the omission of which skewed their results. Fassberg dates the Qere of Daniel much earlier than do Morrow and Clarke. In fact, for one feature at least—the morphology of the middle weak participle—comparative material attests the form of the Qere of Daniel earlier than the Kethib of Daniel (Fassberg, 11). This section will present how the Qere differs from the Kethib without arguing why. Diachronic difference in dialect is not the only possible solution.

4.1. To Record Alternate Phonology.

4.1.1. The Attached Second-Person Singular Pronoun to Masculine Plural Nouns and to Prepositions. With masculine plural nouns, the Kethib records the ending -ayik, while the Qere reads -āk: lē’abdayik is written, lē’abdāk is read, “your servants” (Dan 2:4); lēśānē’ayik is written, lēśānē’āk is read, “to those who hate you” (Dan 4:16). The prepositions l and qdm also exhibit this same variation: ‘ālayik is written, ‘ālāk is read, “concerning you” (Dan 5:14); qādāmayik is written, qādāmāk is read, “before you” (Dan 6:23).

4.1.2. The Feminine Absolute Form or Determined Masculine Singular Form of Ordinals, Gentilics, and Adjectives ending in -āy. The Kethib records the ending as -āyā’, while the Qere records it as -ā’ā: tēlītāyā’ over against tēlītā’ā, “a third [kingdom]” (Dan 2:39); rēbī’āyā’ in contrast to rēbī’ā’ā, “a fourth [kingdom]” (Dan 7:23); kaśdāyā’ set against kaśdā’ā, “the Chaldean king” (Dan 5:30); pārēsāyā’ versus pārēsā’ā, “[Cyrus] the Persian” (Dan 6:29); ‘illāyā’ against ‘illā’ā, “the Most High [God]” (Dan 3:26).

4.1.3. The Determined Masculine Plural Form of the Gentilic. The Kethib records the ending of the masculine plural form of gentilics as -āyē’, while the Qere records it as -ā’ē: kaśdāyē’ over against kaśdā’ē, “the Chaldeans” (Dan 4:4).

4.1.4. Middle Weak Active Participle Masculine Plural. The Kethib reads zā’ā’in, while the Qere reads zāyē’in, “trembling” (Dan 5:19).

4.2. To Distinguish a Feminine Third Person Plural Morpheme in the Suffix Conjugation. The Qere preserves a distinct feminine plural morpheme -ā, while the Kethib uses the masculine plural morpheme -ū for both masculine and feminine: nēpaqū is written, nēpaqā is read (subject ’ešbē’an, “fingers”), “came out” (Dan 5:5); ’et’āqarū is written, ’et’āqarā is read (referent “horns”), “they were plucked up” (Dan 7:8); ūnēpalū is written, ūnēpalā is read (referent “horns”), “and they fell” (Dan 7:20).

4.3. To Record an Alternative Form of the Second-Person Singular Personal Pronoun. The Qere reads ’ant over against the Kethib, which reads ’antā, “you” (Dan 2:29). The form ’antā also appears in Aramaic texts from Qumran.

4.4. To Correct a Hebrew Form into an Aramaic Form.

4.4.1. The Form ʾalpīn. The Qere ʾalpīn, “thousands” (Dan 7:10), an Aramaic form, corrects the Kethib ʾalpīm, a Hebraism (the corresponding Hebrew vocalization is ʾālāpīm). However, the Masoretes did not correct the Hebrew form ʾanāsīm, “men” (Dan 4:14).

4.4.2. The Forms tikkūl and tikkūl. The Qere readings tikkūl and tikkūl, “you are able” (Dan 5:16), correct the Hebrew form tūkal twice, perhaps unnecessarily, since the Hebrew form yūkal appears in Daniel 2:10. Yet the Aramaic form yikkūl also appears (Dan 3:29). A bilingual author could mix languages.

4.5. To Correct Spelling.

4.5.1. The Form ʾeštannī. The Qere ʾeštannī, “was changed,” a singular form, corrects the Kethib ʾeštannū, a plural form, to make it agree with the singular subject šelemʾanpōhī, “the visage of his face” (Dan 3:19); that is, read yōd for wāw.

4.5.2. The Form šālū. The Qere šālū, “error,” corrects the Kethib šlh (meaning uncertain) (Dan 3:29); that is, read wāw for hē.

4.6. To Record a Ben Asher Reading. The Qere ribēbān, “myriads,” records a reading of Ben Asher against the Kethib ribbēwān (Dan 7:10).

4.7. To Delete a Superfluous Letter. In Daniel 4:14 the Qere deletes what the Masoretes viewed as a superfluous wāw in the Kethib ʾnwšʾ, reading ʾanāsāʾ, “[the kingdom of] men” (the same Qere/Kethib appears in Daniel 4:13 without the notation “superfluous”). Official Aramaic does have one attestation of ʾnwšʾ, however, meaning “household” (TAD D 8.4:24), so it could be a legitimate Aramaic form in Daniel. In Dan. 2:39 the Qere ʾāraʾ, “lower,” an absolute form, deletes the final ʾālep of the Kethib ʾarʾāʾ, a determined form (Dan 2:39).

5. Orthography and Phonology of the Aramaic of Daniel.

The orthography and phonology of the Aramaic of Daniel fit nicely into Standard Literary Aramaic, a dialect arising from the Official Aramaic of the Persian Empire. The representation of */d/ by d and */d/ by ʿ, the use of š as opposed to s, dissimilation by nūn, the open final long /ā/ in the word kēmā as over against later kmn, and the spelling of the causative and reflexive conjugations with both h and ʾ demonstrate this.

5.1. *Consonantal Representation of /d/. Extra-biblical Aramaic texts from the fifth and fourth centuries BC—the Achaemenid texts from Egypt, the legal texts from Wadi Daliyeh, and the Idumean Ostraca—almost always use zī (“of, who, which, that”), although dī also appears (TADA 2.3; 2.4; B 3.4; 3.12). The Aramaic of both Daniel and Ezra use only dī. The Aramaic of Daniel uses the noun dēhab, “gold” (Dan 2:32), in contrast to zhb, widely attested in the Aramaic texts from Egypt. However, TAD B 3.1:9 has the spelling dhh too. In the past, some have argued for a later dating of Biblical Aramaic based on this phenomenon, but the external evidence no longer warrants this deduction. The earliest dated document that has d instead of z dates from 483 BC: lmʾhd, “to seize” (TAD B 4.4:17). The form dh, “this” (TAD A 2.5:7), appearing in a text from Hermopolis, may be as early as the late sixth century BC.

5.2. *The Consonant ʿ Represents /d/. The Aramaic of Daniel, like that of Ezra, uses ʿ to represent */d/, not the chronologically earlier q preserved in the Aramaic texts from Egypt, the Samaritan papyri from Wadi Daliyeh, and the book of Jeremiah. Daniel reads ʾarʾāʾ, “the land” (Dan 2:35), as against ʾarqāʾ, “the earth” (Jer 10:11), and ʾāʾāʾ, “wood” (Dan 5:4, 23), as opposed to ʿq.

5.3. The Consonant š Does Not Change to s as in Later Dialects. The Aramaic of Daniel retains the spelling with /š/, not replacing it with s as in later dialects: šaggiʾ, “abundant” (Dan 4:9); šām (+ ʾēʿem), “give an order” (Dan 6:14). This feature characterizes Standard Literary Aramaic: šgyʾyn, “great” (4Q207 1, 4); šm, “set” (11Q10 XXXVIII, 5), but contrast symw, “place” (11Q10 XXI, 5); šymʾ, “be situated” (1Q20 XXII, 10).

5.4. Dissimilation by Nūn. The progressively assimilated root ydʿ, “know,” producing gemination is dissimilated by nūn: *maddaʿ > madaʿ, “intelligence” (Dan 5:12). The root ʿll, “enter,” also exhibits dissimilation by nūn in the causative suffix conjugation: hanʿel, “brought in” (Dan 2:25). These phenomena also appear in the Aramaic documents from Egypt. With regard to the verb slq, “go up,” the hapʿel infinitive of the causative conjugation substitutes nasalization for gemination (Rosenthal, §21): lēhansāqā, “[the king commanded] to bring [Daniel] up [from the pit]” (Dan 6:24).

5.5. Representation of Final Long /ā/. Final long /ā/ can be represented by ʾālep or hē without distinction, as demonstrated by *kētābā*⁷ and kētābā, “writing” (Dan 5:24, 7). Final long /ā/ is not closed with a nūn as in some later Aramaic dialects: *bē‘ēnā*⁸, “we requested” (Dan 2:23), and *rēmēnā*⁹, “we threw” (Dan 3:24). Compare *b’dyn’ šm’n*¹⁰, “with our ears we heard” (11Q10 XIII, 3). Contrast kēmā, “how” (Dan 3:33), with kmn found in the later 1Q20 XXII, 29 (1Q20 also attests *km*¹¹ [1Q20 XX, 4]).

5.6. Spelling of the Causative and Passive/Reflexive Conjugations.

5.6.1. Causative. While the Aramaic of Daniel overwhelmingly prefers to mark the causative with h, it also uses ’: hanpēq, “[which Nebuchadnezzar] brought” (Dan 5:2); ’attarū, “strip off [its leaves]” (Dan 4:11), < ntr.

5.6.2. Passive/Reflexive. While the Aramaic of Daniel allows marking of the passive/reflexive in ’, it prefers the marking h: hitgēzeret (4Q112: ’tg[zrt]), “[a stone] was cut out” (Dan 2:34); bēhitbēhālā (4Q113: b’tbh[lh]), “anxiously” (Dan 6:20).

5.7. *Consonantal Representation of /t/. The consonant t represents */t/: tēkēl, “sheqel” (Dan 5:25, 27); tēqiltā, “you have been weighed” (Dan 5:27). By contrast, Hebrew represents this historical phoneme by š.

6. Morphology of the Aramaic of Daniel.

This section will include a discussion of the morphology of the pronoun, the noun, the verb, the adjective, and the adverb, with a view to better understanding the text.

6.1. Pronouns.

6.1.1. Independent Personal Pronouns. ’ānā, “I” (Dan 2:8); ’antā = ’ant (masc. sg.), “you” (Dan 2:29 [issue of Kethib versus Qere]); *hū*¹², “he” (Dan 2:47); *hī*¹³, “she” (Dan 2:44); ’ānaḥnā = *’ānaḥnā*¹⁴, “we” (Dan 3:16-17); ’antūn (masc. pl.), “you” (Dan 2:8); ’innūn, “those, them” (Dan 2:44 [see demonstrative pronouns, Dan 6:25]); ’innīn (fem. pl.), “they” (Dan 7:17); himmōn, “them” (Dan 2:34-35; 3:22), by contrast with Ezra, which has himmō (Ezra 4:10), as do the Achaemenid period Aramaic texts from Egypt. Independent personal pronouns in the third person may be used as demonstrative pronouns (see 6.1.3 below) or as the copula: *’antā hū’ rēšā dī dahābā*¹⁵, “you are the head of gold” (Dan 2:38); hālā’ dā’ hī’ bābel, “is this not Babylon?” (Dan 4:27).

6.1.2. Suffixed Personal Pronominal Elements. These elements can be suffixed to nouns, prepositions and verbs. Official Aramaic (Muraoka and Porten, 26) and the Aramaic of Ezra (Lund, 55) attest both final mēm and final nūn with pronominal elements of the second- and third-person plural; the Aramaic of Daniel according to the MT attests only the chronologically later nūn. 4Q112, however, attests forms in mēm: mnhm, “part of them” (Dan 2:42). Attested forms are as follows: -ēh as in gīsmēh, “his body” (Dan 4:30); -hī after long vowels, as in ṭiprōhī, “his nails” (Dan 4:30); -k as in ’ābūk, “your father” (Dan 5:11), and ’ēlāhāk, “your God” (Dan 6:21) (the corresponding element -kh, in ’bwxh and ’lhkh found in the Qumran manuscripts of Daniel, appears to be a Hebraism); -ī as in mandē’ī, “my reason” (Dan 4:33); -nī with verbs, as in lēhōdā’utanī, “to tell me” (Dan 2:26); -hōn as in lēhōn, “to them” (Dan 3:14); -hm as in mnhm, “part of them” (4Q112; Dan 2:42); -hēn as in bēnēhēn, “among them” (Dan 7:8 Qere); -kōn as in ’ēlāhākōn, “your God” (Dan 2:47); *-nā*¹⁶ as in *hōdā’tenā*¹⁷, “you told us” (Dan 2:23). The relative pronoun dī immediately followed by the preposition l + attached personal pronoun expresses possession: *hokmētā’ ūgēbūrētā’ dī lēh-hī*¹⁸, “wisdom and power are his” (Dan 2:20).

6.1.3. Demonstrative Pronouns. dēnā (masc. sg.), “this” (Dan 4:15); dā’ (fem. sg.), “this” (Dan 4:27); dikkēn, “that” (Dan 2:31); ’illēn, “these” (Dan 7:17); ’illēk, “those” (Dan 3:12). Personal pronouns also can serve as demonstratives: *hū’ šalmā*¹⁹, “that statue” (Dan 2:32); malkayyā’ innūn, “those kings” (Dan 2:44).

6.1.4. Demonstrative Element h. What at first blush looks like a proleptic pronominal suffix attached to a preposition derives from a demonstrative element hā (Rosenthal, §40). Two syntagms appear: preposition with demonstrative element + determined noun, and preposition with demonstrative element + preposition with determined noun. The pseudopronominal suffixes differ in gender, the masculine being -ēh, and the feminine being -ah.

6.1.4.1. Preposition with Demonstrative Element + Determined Noun. *bēh zimmā*²⁰, “at that very time” (Dan 3:7); *bah ša’ātā*²¹, “at that very moment” (Dan 4:30); minnah malkūtā, “from this very kingdom” (Dan 7:24).

6.1.4.2. Preposition with Demonstrative Element + Preposition with Determined Noun. *bēh bēlēlyā*²², “on this very night” (Dan 5:30); bēh bēdāniyē’l, “in this very Daniel” (Dan 5:12).

6.1.5. Interrogative Pronouns. man, “who, whom”

(Dan 3:15; 4:29), mā, “what” (Dan 4:32).

6.2. The Morphology of the Noun.

6.2.1. The Masculine Plural Emphatic Phoneme.

The masculine plural emphatic phoneme is -ayyā, as in malkayyā, “kings” (Dan 2:44), and gubrayyā, “men” (Dan 3:27), except in gentilics where the Kethib has -ayē but the Qere has -ā, as in kaśdāyē (Qere kaśdā’ē), “Chaldeans” (Dan 4:4). The plural foreign word tiptāyē, “magistrates” (Dan 3:2-3), projects a singular absolute ending in -ay like gentilics (so Porten and Lund, 309; contra Rosenthal, §58).

6.2.2. The plural construct of yōm. The plural construct of yōm, “day,” is yōmē (Dan 5:11), not yōmāt as in Ezra (Ezra 4:15, 19).

6.2.3. The noun ra’yōn. The noun ra’yōn, “thought” (Dan 2:30), with the affirmative -ōn instead of -ān, reflects the influence of Hebrew on Aramaic. By contrast, Syriac, a later Aramaic dialect, attests the cognate lexeme re’yān.

6.3. The Morphology of the Verb.

6.3.1. Infinitive. The pe’al infinitive has a mēm preformans, as in lēmiknāš, “to gather” (Dan 3:2), while those of the derived stems do not, as in lēkappātā, “to bind” (Dan 3:20), and lēhayētāyā, “to bring” (Dan 5:2). In the derived stems, the form ending in -ā appears as the absolute form, while the form ending in -ūt (or -ut) appears as the construct form when a pronoun is affixed: lēhaškāhā, “to find” (Dan 6:5); lēšēzābūtēh, “to rescue him” (Dan 6:15). Where a noun follows as the object (only attested once), the construct form ends in -at: ’ahāwāyat ’ahīdān, “explaining riddles” (Dan 5:12); compare lēhanzāqat malkin, “to injure kings” (Ezra 4:22).

6.3.2. Internal Passive. The internal passive characterizes the Aramaic of Daniel, which can place it in the Achaemenid period, as evidenced from the fifth-century BC Aramaic texts from Egypt (Muraoka and Porten, §30) (the texts from Hermopolis [TAD A 2] may date to the late sixth century BC) and from the book of Ezra (Lund, 56). However, Standard Literary Aramaic texts from Qumran also employ the internal passive: wšbyqt ’nh ’brm bdylyh’ wl’ qtylt, “and I Abram was spared because of her and I was not killed” (1Q20 XX, 10), which would allow for a later date. Only suffix conjugation forms are attested in Daniel.

6.3.2.1. Internal Passive of the Simple Conjugation. ’ēdayin lēdāniy’el bēhezwā’ dī lēlyā’ rāzāh gālī, “then the mystery was revealed to Daniel in a vision of the night” (Dan 2:19); gubrayyā’

’illēk kēpītū, “those men were bound” (Dan 3:21); ūmin ’ānāšā’ terīd, “and he [Nebuchadnezzar] was driven away from human society” (Dan 4:30; cf. 5:21); tēqiltā bēmo’zanyā’, “it has been weighed on the scale” (Dan 5:27); hāzēh hāwēt ’ad dī mērītū gappayh unēḫilat min ’ar’ā’ . . . ūlēbab ’ēnāš yēhīb lah, “and I was looking while its [the first beast’s] wings were plucked off and it was taken up from the earth . . . and a human heart was given it” (Dan 7:4).

6.3.2.2. Internal Passive of the Causative Conjugation. wēhussaq dāniyē’l min gubbā’, “and Daniel was brought up from the pit” (Dan 6:24); bē’dayin dāniyē’l hu’al qōdām malkā’, “then Daniel was brought before the king” (Dan 5:13); ūkē’an hu’allū qādāmay hakkimayyā’, “and now the sages have been brought before me” (Dan 5:15); wē’al raglayin ke’ēnāš hōqīmat, “and it was made to stand upon legs like a human” (Dan 7:4); wēhūbad gišmāh, “and its [the beast’s] body was destroyed” (Dan 7:11).

6.3.3. Prefix Conjugation of the Verb hwh. The prefix conjugation of hwh (“to be”) takes a lāmed preformative to indicate third-person masculine, whether indicative, subjunctive or jussive in function: ūmin nišbētā’ dī parzēlā’ lehēwē’ bah, “and some of the hardness of iron will be in it” (Dan 2:41); tē’em dī bēkol šaltān malkūtī lehēwōn zā’ā’in wēdāhālīn min qōdām ’ēlāhēh dī dāniyē’l, “a decree that in all my royal dominion they should tremble and fear before the God of Daniel” (Dan 6:27); lehēwē’ šēmēh dī’ēlāhā’ mēbārak, “May the name of God be blessed” (Dan 2:20). The Aramaic texts from Egypt have yōd, not lāmed, yet Ezra too has lāmed. Literary texts from Qumran attest lāmed as well.

6.4. Morphology of the Adjective. The patterns kattīb, kattāb and kittāb appear: ’attīq, “ancient” (Dan 7:9); šallīt, “sovereign” (Dan 4:14); qayyām, “enduring” (Dan 6:27); hiwwār, “white” (Dan 7:9); ’illāy, “highest” (Dan 3:26). Passive participles serve as adjectives: bērīk, “blessed” (Dan 3:28); mēsattar, “hidden” (Dan 2:22). Some adjectives take the -ān affix: ’ēmētān, “terrible” (Dan 7:7), and tinyān, “second” (Dan 7:5).

6.5. Morphology of the Adverb. Adverbs end in -āt, -ūt, -ā and the masculine singular absolute state: tēwāt, “[he spent the night] fasting” (Dan 6:19); tinyānūt, “a second time” (Dan 2:7); ’ēzēh yattīrā’, “[and the furnace] was heated excessively” (Dan 3:22); ūqēšap šaggi’, “and he became very angry” (Dan 2:12).

7. Morphosyntactic Functions of the Verb.

From a text-linguistic point of view, the suffix conjugation is the primary verbal form of narration, while the prefix conjugation is the primary verbal form of discourse (Shepherd, 71). Morphosyntax goes further in interpreting how forms are used to express tense, aspect, and modality.

7.1. Morphosyntactic Functions of the Suffix Conjugation. The suffix conjugation primarily expresses simple past time but preserves the earlier anterior/resultative function as well (Li, 38).

7.1.1. Simple Past Function. bē'dayin qērēb nēbūkadneššar, “then Nebuchadnezzar approached” (Dan 3:26).

7.1.2. Anterior/Resultative Function.

7.1.2.1. Present Anterior/Resultative Function. gubrayyā' illek lā' sāmū 'ālāk malkā' tē'em, “these men have not shown proper deference to you, O king” (Dan 3:12).

7.1.2.2 Past Anterior/Resultative Function. Pluperfect subordinated to a simple past: ūnēbūkadneššar malkā' šēlah lēmiknaš la'āhaš darpēnayyā' . . . lēmētē' laḥnukkat šalmā' dī ḥāqēm nēbūkadneššar malkā', “And Nebuchadnezzar the king sent to gather the satraps . . . to come to the dedication of the statue that Nebuchadnezzar the king had set up” (Dan 3:2). The form ḥāqēm is anterior in time to the form šēlah. Present perfect or simple past subordinated to a future: ūlēšelem dahābā' dī ḥāqēm tā lā' nisgud, “and we will not worship the statue of gold that you have set up” (or “you set up”) (Dan 3:18). The form ḥāqēm tā is anterior in time to the form nisgud, which expresses future time in this context.

7.1.3. Modal Past: Hypothetical Condition. lā' nēhaškah lēdānīyē' l dēnā kol 'illā' lāhēn haškahnā' 'ālōhī bēdāt 'ēlāhēh, “We will not find any pretext against this Daniel unless we find it against him in the law of his god” (Dan 6:6). The form haškahnā' expresses a hypothetical condition.

7.2. Morphosyntactic Functions of the Prefix Conjugation. The prefix conjugation expresses future, general present, past imperfective and modality (Li, 98-99).

7.2.1. Prefix Conjugation to Express Simple Future. ḥēwētā' rēbī'āyitā' malkū rēbī'āyā' tehēwē' bē'ar'ā' dī tišnē' min kol malkēwātā' wētē'kul kol'ar'ā' utēdūšinnah wētaḏqinnah, “As for the fourth beast, there will be a fourth kingdom on the earth which will be different from all the kingdoms, and it will devour all the earth, and it will trample it [the beast], and it will pulverize it [the beast]” (Dan 7:23).

7.2.2. Prefix Conjugation to Express General Present. ūlēman dī yišbē' yittēninnah ūšēpal 'ānāšim yēqīm 'ālāyyah, “and to whomever he [the Most High] wishes he gives it [the kingdom of man], and the lowest of men he [the Most High] sets up over it [the kingdom of man]” (Dan 4:14).

7.2.3. Prefix Conjugation to Express Past Imperfective. 'elep 'alpīm yēšammēšūnēh wēribbō ribbēwān qādāmōhī yēqūmūn, “A thousand thousands were serving him and a myriad myriads were standing before him” (Dan 7:10); wē'isbā' kētōrīn yē'kul ūmīṭtal šēmayyā' gīsmēh yištabba', “and he would eat grass like oxen, and his body would be drenched with the dew of heaven” (Dan 4:30).

7.2.4. Prefix Conjugation to Express Modality. wē'oḥōrān lā' 'itay dī yēhawwinnah qōdām malkā', “and there is no other who can reveal it before the king” (Dan 2:11).

7.2.5. Prefix Conjugation to Express Jussive. kē'an dānīyē' l yitqērē ūpišrā yēhahāwēh, “now let Daniel be summoned and let him declare the interpretation” (Dan 5:12).

7.3. Morphosyntactic Functions of the Active Participle.

The active participle expresses present time: yāda' 'ānā dī 'iddānā' antūn zābēnīn, “I know that you are buying time” (Dan 2:8); hū' gālē' 'ammīqātā' ūmēsattērātā', “he reveals the deep and the hidden” (Dan 2:22). Its use in past narration expresses the historic present, bringing readers into the past as though they were there: bē'dayin mitkannēšīn 'āhašdarpēnayyā' . . . weqā'āmīn lāqōbēl šalmā' . . . wēkārōzā' qārē', “Then the satraps assemble . . . and stand opposite the statue . . . and the herald proclaims” (Dan 3:3-4). The formulaic use of the active participle of the verb 'mr to introduce direct speech may also fit here: 'ānō tinyānūt wē'omrīn, “they answered a second time and say” (Dan 2:7). The active participle also functions as a past progressive: wēqarnā' dikkēn 'ābēdā qērāh, “and this horn was waging war” (Dan 7:21). Once, it expresses future: wēlāk tārēdīn min 'ānāšā', “and they will drive you away from humanity” (Dan 4:22 [see 8.5 below]).

Often, the periphrastic construction, the combination of a finite form of hwh (“to be”) and the active participle, expresses progressive action: mēhallēk hāwā', “he was walking about”

(Dan 4:26); hāwō bā‘ayin, “[the presidents and satraps] were seeking” (Dan 6:5); dī lehēwōn . . . yāhābīn lēhōn ta‘mā, “that they might be giving account to them” (Dan 6:3).

7.4. Morphosyntactic Functions of the Nonactive Participle. The passive participle functions primarily as a verbal adjective, while the t-stem participle functions as the passive counterpart to the active participle (Li, 59).

7.5. Morphosyntactic Functions of the Imperative. The imperative functions as a directive and as an optative: helmā’ ūpišrēh haḥāwonī, “tell me the dream and its interpretation” (Dan 2:6); malkā’ lē‘olmīn ḥēyī, “O king, may you live forever” (Dan 2:4).

7.6. Morphosyntactic Functions of the Infinitive. The infinitive can serve as the complement of a verb: wa‘amar lēhōbādā lēkol ḥakkīmē bābel, “and he commanded to destroy all the sages of Babylon” (Dan 2:12). With a preposition, it can function adverbially: ūbēhitbēhālā . . . ‘āzal, “and he went . . . hastily” (Dan 6:20). The infinitive may also appear in a temporal clause introduced by a preposition similar to Hebrew: ūkēmiqrēbēh [variant ūbēmiqrēbēh] lēgubbā’ lēdānīyē’l bēqāl ‘āšib zē‘iq, “and when he approached the den, he cried out to Daniel with a sad voice” (Dan 6:21). The phrase lā’ lēhašnāyā (Dan 6:9, 16) means “not for changing,” that is, “immutable.”

8. Syntax of the Aramaic of Daniel.

This section includes a discussion of the function of the definite article, expressions of the genitive relationship, the position of the demonstrative pronoun in relation to its nominal head, government of the verb and expression of the indefinite subject.

8.1. Function of the Definite Article. The definite article expresses determination in contrast to the absolute state, which expresses indeterminateness. Contrast hēwētā’ rēbī‘āyitā’, “the fourth beast” (Dan 7:23), with malkū rēbī‘āyā’, “a fourth kingdom” (Dan 7:23).

8.2. Expressions of the Genitive Relationship. The second noun in the syntagm called by grammarians the nomen rectum (“governed noun”) qualifies the first noun in the syntagm called by grammarians the nomen regens (“governing noun”) in simple constructs as well as in constructs with dī.

8.2.1. Simple Construct.

8.2.1.1. Simple Construct with Determined nomen rectum. wē‘ešbē‘āt raglayyā’, “the toes of the feet” (Dan 2:42); ‘ēlāh šēmayyā’, “the God of heaven” (Dan 2:44); mēdinat bābel, “the province of Babylon” (Dan 2:49); ‘attīq yōmayyā’, “the Ancient of Days” (Dan 7:22).

8.2.1.2. Simple Construct with Indefinite nomen rectum. malkūt ‘ālam, “an everlasting kingdom” (Dan 7:27).

8.2.2. Constructions with dī. Akkadian influence on Aramaic led to the use of dī meaning “of” in Official Aramaic; Old Aramaic texts of the tenth through the eighth centuries BC do not use dī in this way.

8.2.2.1. The Syntagm Noun Determined by Definite Article + dī + Geographic Name. bēnē gālūtā’ dī yēhūd, “the exiles of Yehud” (Dan 5:13); ḥēkal malkūtā’ dī bābel, “the royal palace of Babylon” (Dan 4:26); ‘ābīdā’ dī mēdinat bābel, “the business of the province of Babylon” (Dan 2:49).

8.2.2.2. The Syntagm Noun Determined by Definite Article + dī + Noun Determined by Definite Article. rēšā’ dī dahābā’, “the head of gold” (Dan 2:38); šēbībā’ dī nūrā’, “the flame of fire” (Dan 3:22); passā’ dī yēdā’, “the palm of the hand” (Dan 5:24); lēgubbā’ dī ‘aryāwātā’, “the den of lions” (Dan 6:17); sōpā’ dī millētā’, “the end of the matter” (Dan 7:28).

8.2.2.3. The Syntagm Noun Determined by Definite Article + dī + Noun Determined by Pronominal Suffix. ūlēmā’ nāyyā’ dī baytēh, “the vessels of his house” (Dan 5:23).

8.2.2.4. The Syntagm Noun Determined by Proleptic Pronominal Suffix + dī + Noun Determined by Definite Article or Proper Noun. šēmēh dī ‘ēlāhā’, “the name of God” (Dan 2:20); ūbēyōmēhōn dī malkayyā’ ‘innūn, “and in the days of those kings” (Dan 2:44); ‘ēlāhēh dī dānīyē’l, “the God of Daniel” (Dan 6:27); wa‘ākalū qaršēhōn dī yēhūdāyē’, “and they maligned the Jews”; literally, “and they ate the pieces of the Jews” (Dan 3:8).

8.2.2.5. The Syntagm Noun in Absolute Form + dī + Noun in Absolute Form. šēlem dī dēhab, “a statue of gold” (Dan 3:1); ūbē‘ēsūr dī parzel ūnēhās, “and with a band of iron and bronze” (Dan 4:12); gappīn ‘arba’ dī ‘ōp, “four wings of a bird” (Dan 7:6); wēsinnayīn dī parzel lah rabrēbān, “and it had large teeth of iron” (Dan 7:7); nēhar dī nūr, “a river of fire” (Dan 7:10).

8.2.3. Construction with lāmed. Lāmed introduces the genitive noun in the date formula: bīšnat ḥādā lēbēl’šašsar [read lēbēl’sa’šsar] melek bābel, “in the first year of Belshazzar king of Babylon” (Dan 7:1).

8.2.4. Constructions of the Type Noun in Construct + Preposition + Noun. bēhezwī ‘im lēlyā’, “in visions of the night” (Dan 7:2), equivalent to bēhezwē lēlyā’ (Dan 7:7, 13); malkēwāt tēhōt kol šemayyā’, “the kingdoms under the whole heaven” (Dan 7:27).

8.3. Position of the Demonstrative Pronoun in Relation to Its Nominal Head.

8.3.1. Bipartite Constructions.

8.3.1.1. Nominal Head + Demonstrative Pronoun. rāzā’ dēnā’, “this mystery” (Dan 2:30); gubrayyā’ ’illēk’, “those men” (Dan 3:12).

8.3.1.2. Demonstrative Pronoun + Nominal Head. dēnā helmā’, “this dream [I was seeing]” (Dan 4:15, contra NRSV).

8.3.2. Tripartite Constructions.

8.3.2.1. Demonstrative Pronoun + Nominal Head + Adjective. ’illēn hēwātā’ rabrēbātā’, “these great beasts” (Dan 7:17).

8.3.2.2. kl + Demonstrative Pronoun + Nominal Head. kol’ ’illēn malkēwātā’, “all these kingdoms” (Dan 2:44).

8.4. Government of the Verb: Marking of the Direct Object.

8.4.1. The Letter lāmed to Mark the Direct Object. Lāmed can mark the direct object, as in Official Aramaic (Muraoka and Porten, §74d), especially with persons: malkā’ lēdāniyē’ l rabbī’, “the king exalted Daniel” (Dan 2:48); lehakkīmē bābel’ ’al tēhōbēd’, “do not destroy the sages of Babylon” (Dan 2:24); ūmēhāt lēšalmā’, “and it [the stone] struck the statue” (Dan 2:34).

8.4.2. The Particle yāt to Mark the Direct Object. The particle yāt marks the direct object once in Daniel, the direct object being an attached personal pronoun: dī mannītā yātēhōn’, “whom you appointed” (Dan 3:12).

8.4.3. No Marker for the Direct Object. The direct object does not need to be marked: bēlša’ššar malkā’ ’abad lēhem rab’, “Belshazzar the king made a great feast” (Dan 5:1); ūmalkā’ hāzēh pas yēdā’, “and the king was seeing the palm of the hand” (Dan 5:5); goddū’ ’ilānā’, “cut down the tree” (Dan 4:11).

8.5. Expression of Indefinite Subject. The third-personal masculine plural of the finite verb expresses the indefinite subject: wīqārā he’diyū minnēh’, “and they removed glory from him” (Dan 5:20), better rendered in English as “and his glory was taken from him”; wēlāk tārēdīn min’ ’anāsā’, “and they will drive you away from humanity” (Dan 4:22), better rendered as “you will be driven away from humanity.”

9. Suggested Emendations for Critical Evaluation.

Readers should evaluate for themselves the following suggested emendations. (1) Two emendations have been offered for wē’al malkūtī hotqēnat’, “it was established over my kingdom” (Dan 4:33): wa’alay malkūtī hotqēnat’, “and my kingdom was restored to me,” or wē’al malkūtī hotqēnēt’, “and I was reestablished over my kingdom.” (2) Read bēlša’ššar (“Belshazzar”) for bēl’ššar in some textual witnesses of Daniel 5:1 and in Daniel 7:1 (metathesis of ’alep and šīn). (3) Emend bēgō’ nidneh’, “in its sheath” (Dan 7:15), to bēgīn dēnāh’, “on account of it” (Collins, 275). First, if one were to emend the text, the emendation should read bēgō’ dēnāh because bēgīn is attested only in the later Jewish Palestinian Aramaic, and bēgō’ appears elsewhere in the language of Daniel. Second, a close parallel appears in IQ20 II, 10, wnšmty lgw ndnh’, “and my breath within its sheath,” which speaks in favor of not emending the text. Third, the referent in the text is rūhī’, “my spirit,” which is feminine, so one might expect the form nidnah. Rosenthal prefers to vocalize the form as nēdānah (Rosenthal, §190), deriving the lexeme from Persian nidāni.

See also DANIEL: BOOK OF; HEBREW LANGUAGE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Albertz, “The Social Setting of the Aramaic and Hebrew Book of Daniel,” in The Book of Daniel: Composition and Reception, ed. J. Collins and P. Flint (2 vols.; VTSup 83; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2002) 1:171-204; B. T. Arnold, “The Use of Aramaic in the Hebrew Bible: Another Look at Bilingualism in Ezra and Daniel,” JNSL 22 (1996) 1-16; J. J. Collins, Daniel (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); E. M. Cook, “Word Order in the Aramaic of Daniel,” Afroasiatic Linguistics 9.3 (1986) 1-16; P. W. Coxon, “The Syntax of the Aramaic of Daniel,” HUCA 48 (1977) 107-22; S. E. Fassberg, “The Origin of the Ketib/Qere in the Aramaic Portions of Ezra and Daniel,” VT 39 (1989) 1-12; M. L. Folmer, The Aramaic Language in the Achaemenid Period: A Study in Linguistic Variation (OLA 68; Leuven: Peeters, 1995); S. A. Kaufman, “Aramaic,” in The Semitic Languages, ed. R. Hetzron (Routledge Family Language Descriptions; New York: Routledge, 1997) 114-30; idem, “Comprehensive Aramaic Lexicon” (<http://call.cn.huc.edu>); K. Kitchen, “The Aramaic of Daniel,” in Notes on Some

Problems in the Book of Daniel, by D. Wiseman et al. (London: Tyndale, 1965) 31-79; T. Li, The Verbal System of the Aramaic of Daniel (SAIS 8; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2009); J. A. Lund, "Aramaic Language," DOTHB 50-60; A. R. Millard, "Daniel 1-6 and History," EvQ 49 (1977) 67-73; T. C. Mitchell and R. Joyce, "The Musical Instruments in Nebuchadnezzar's Orchestra," in Notes on Some Problems in the Book of Daniel, by D. Wiseman et al. (London: Tyndale, 1965) 19-27; W. S. Morrow and E. G. Clarke, "The Ketib/Qere in the Aramaic Portions of Ezra and Daniel," VT 36 (1986) 406-22; T. Muraoka and B. Porten, A Grammar of Egyptian Aramaic (HO 32; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1998); S. J. Pfann, "4Q Daniel^d (4Q115): A Preliminary Edition with Critical Notes," RevQ 17 (1996) 37-71; B. Porten and J. A. Lund, Aramaic Documents from Egypt: A Key-Word-in-Context Concordance (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2002); B. Porten and A. Yardeni, Textbook of Aramaic Documents from Ancient Egypt (4 vols.; Jerusalem: Hebrew University, 1986-1999); F. Rosenthal, A Grammar of Biblical Aramaic (Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 1968); M. B. Shepherd, The Verbal System of Biblical Aramaic: A Distributional Approach (SBL 116; New York: Peter Lang, 1995); D. C. Snell, "Why Is There Aramaic in the Bible?" JSOT 18 (1980) 32-51; M. Sokoloff, The Targum of Job from Qumran Cave XI (Ramat-Gan: Bar-Ilan University, 1974); Z. Stefanovic, The Aramaic of Daniel in the Light of Old Aramaic (JSOTSup 129; Sheffield: JSOT, 1992); E. Ulrich, "The Text of Daniel in the Qumran Scrolls," in The Book of Daniel: Composition and Reception, ed. J. Collins and P. Flint (2 vols.; VTSup 83; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2002) 2:573-85.

J. A. Lund

ASSYRIA, ASSYRIAN PERIOD. See ISRAELITE HISTORY.

ATONEMENT. See SACRIFICE AND ATONEMENT.

B

BAAL WORSHIP. See IDOLS, IDOLATRY, GODS.

BABYLON

This ancient city located in southern Mesopotamia lay nearly sixty miles southwest of modern Baghdad (Klengel-Brandt, 251). Babylon sat on the banks of a canal of the Euphrates River, the Arakhtum, sometimes identified simply as the Euphrates itself. The city played a significant role in biblical times. Because of Babylon's political and cultural importance, it gave its name to the region, Babylonia, which at certain periods of history covered all of southern Mesopotamia, extending from the point near modern Baghdad where the Tigris and Euphrates rivers flow closest to each other southeastward to the marshes of the Persian Gulf.

The city and region gave rise to one of the greatest empires of preclassical antiquity. The Babylonians incorporated and expanded the culture of their third-millennium predecessors in the region, the Sumerians, and may themselves be credited with nearly countless innovations and contributions to human civilization. They left a permanent mark on history in literature, art, science and religion. The Babylonians are most notable in the Bible as the seemingly all-powerful nation used to punish ancient Israel for its failure to maintain the covenant with God. In biblical imagery, the city of Babylon itself eventually came to represent all that was evil.

1. Babylon and Babylonia in the First Millennium BC
2. Babylon and Babylonia in the Old Testament Prophets

1. Babylon and Babylonia in the First Millennium BC.

The name "Babylon" is of unknown origin and meaning, and the city itself was of little significance politically in the third millennium BC (Arnold 2004, 2, 32-33). In the first half of the second millennium, however, the city and region rose to prominence under Hammurabi's dynasty, which saw Babylon become the center of an empire for the first time. Within a few centuries, Babylon rose from relative obscurity to become the political center of all Mesopotamia and then an empire of such magnitude that it left an indelible mark on the rest of human history. Its inhabitants were largely Amorite and, later in the millennium, Kassite. A millennium later, during the biblical period, Babylonians were a mixture of these older groups together with Arameans, Chaldeans and many others. By the time of the Neo-Assyrian period, when the Israelite prophets appear on the scene, Babylon was already an ancient and venerated city, considered the cultural capital of all Mesopotamia. Its political significance was derived partly from this perception as an ancient holy city, making it an important symbol of power and prestige. Its political history during the time of the OT prophets may be summarized in two periods, the Early Neo-Babylonian (1155-625 BC) and the Neo-Babylonian (625-539 BC).

The sociopolitical history of Babylonia during the early Iron Age is complex. No single political entity or royal dynasty dominated the area, and several people groups of diverse ethnic and regional backgrounds populated Babylonia. The whole of southern Mesopotamia was characterized from the mid-twelfth century BC to approximately 800 BC by a lack of political continuity. On the other hand, the cultural history of Babylonia during this period is not as complex. Preservation of Babylonia's great literary classics continued among the scribes, while production of new literature in Akkadian continued, even after the simpler alphabetic Aramaic became available (Arnold 2004, 81-82). In general, the early Neo-Babylonian period was a time of intense interest in the past with a commitment to preserving the great literary accomplishments of Babylonia's heritage and especially the salient features of the second-millennium culture. The cultural and religious significance of Babylon was accompanied by the rise of Babylon's god, Marduk, reflected in one of the greatest literary accomplishments of the ancient world, the Enuma Elish. Probably composed originally in the second millennium with a different deity as its hero, the Enuma Elish was updated and adapted in the early Neo-Babylonian period with Marduk as the hero to reflect the significance of the city of Babylon and its god. Although routinely also known as the "Creation Epic," the composition has as its central theme the exaltation of Marduk and the justification of his supremacy at the head of the Babylonian pantheon. As such, this great literary piece reflects an era when the city of Babylon had risen politically above all other cities in southern Mesopotamia as the traditional locus of divine power in the world. At the beginning of the Iron Age, a new sense of nationalism emerged with Babylon at the center of a world empire. Theologically, this nationalism may also have reflected a significant religious innovation: the idea of Marduk not only as creator of the world but also as personally stronger than all other powers combined (Goldstein, 27-31). This exaltation of Marduk was not as exclusive as the exaltation of Yahweh in ancient Israel, but it provides an important backdrop for the ideological divide between Israel's prophets and the scribes and priests of ancient Babylonia.

The ancient Near East witnessed dramatic political changes around 1200 bc, especially in the Levant and the Mediterranean rim. The collapse of Bronze Age culture coincides with the collapse of the dominant empires of the Mediterranean world—the Hittites of Asia Minor and the Mycenaean civilization on the mainland of Greece—as well as most of the city-states in the Levant. Within a fifty-year period at the turn from the thirteenth to the twelfth centuries, nearly every city in the eastern Mediterranean world collapsed, marking the beginning of hundreds of years of political struggle and uncertainty in the region. The first causes of this political upheaval are difficult to discern, but the arrival of so-called Sea Peoples certainly contributed to the changes. Rather than mass national folk migrations, we should think of the immigration of dozens of small groups from the Aegean who likely were raiders hoping to sack royal centers (Arnold 2004, 75-77). These newcomers were one factor in the transition from Bronze Age to Iron Age around 1200 bc. Babylonia remained relatively stable at first, experiencing little direct impact from the carnage in the west. Ultimately, however, the events in the eastern Mediterranean led to the arrival of Arameans in Babylonia. Their appearance, together with other climatic and natural causes, contributed to a period of decline in Babylonia in the early first millennium. Most cities were drastically reduced in population, and the surrounding countryside gave way to pressure from new tribal groups.

The first centuries of the first millennium bc saw a resurgence of the Assyrian Empire in the north, which resulted in Assyro-Babylonian conflict as the characteristic feature of Mesopotamian history during this period. Even during periods of Assyrian dominance Babylonian culture was more influential across the ancient world, being older and perceived as more sophisticated, especially compared to the relatively provincial Assyria. Cuneiform tablets from Babylonia and Babylonian scribal expertise were coveted by Assyrian rulers, illustrating the interesting love-hate relationship that Assyria had with Babylonia during these centuries.

During its long history Babylonia frequently was ruled by newly arrived foreign elements (Amorites in the Old Babylonia period, Kassites during the Middle Bronze period and Chaldeans in the Neo-Babylonian Empire). But around the turn of the first millennium, Babylonia was ruled by a succession of several dynasties featuring native Babylonian rulers, so that the period 1158-812 bc may be called "Babylonia for the Babylonians" (Brinkman, 278). After a relatively strong dynasty known as the Second Dynasty of Isin (1158-1026 bc), Babylonia was ruled by a succession of three brief and undistinguished dynasties: the Second Sealand Dynasty, the Bazi Dynasty and the Elamite Dynasty, taking us to approximately 980 bc (Arnold 2004, 79-81). The next century and a half left few sources for reconstructing a detailed history. Both Assyria and Babylonia frequently were occupied with a common threat arriving in Mesopotamia from the west, Aramean tribal groups, which eventually would play an important political role in the region. Babylonia thus was marked by political instability, continued Aramean and Chaldean infiltrations, and the superiority of Assyrian military might to the north. After the Assyrians captured and deported Babylonian rulers in 813 BC and again in 812 BC, the region entered a period of anarchy for over a decade.

For the next two centuries a new political power, the Chaldeans in southern Babylonia, would compete with Assyria for control of the region. Chaldean tribal groups were settled in the swamps and lakes of the lower courses of the Tigris and Euphrates Rivers and were distinct culturally and ethnically from the Arameans in northern Babylonia. They adapted quickly to Babylonian culture, controlling the trade routes of the Persian Gulf area and accumulating considerable wealth, with which they paid tribute to the Assyrians, while they also grew in number and strength. Chaldeans became contenders for the Babylonian throne by the middle of the eighth century BC. The first Chaldean monarch, Eriba-Marduk, was honored in later tradition as the one who restored political stability to Babylonia in the 760s, and was capable of repairing Babylon's temples and engaging in other building activities. From the time of Nabonassar (c. 747-734 BC), ancient Babylonian scholars began keeping systematically precise records of historical events. Beginning with his reign, the Neo-Babylonian Chronicle Series provides valuable historiographic data for this period, recording outstanding events of each year (Arnold 2006). Greek astronomers recognized the Nabonassar era as a turning point in the history of science, and the term "Chaldean" came to mean "astronomer" in Hellenistic times (Rochberg-Halton, 115). Conflict with Assyria in the north continued, however, and with the rise of Tiglath-Pileser III in 745 BC, Nabonassar remained in power only by collaborating with the north while nevertheless providing enough stability for economic recovery in Babylonia.

After Nabonassar, Babylonia was weakened considerably by internal revolts. Eventually Tiglath-Pileser himself assumed the throne of Babylon, attempting to consolidate his control of the south and becoming the first Assyrian monarch in four centuries to unite Assyria and Babylonia in a dual monarchy. This would constitute official Assyrian policy for the next century. Soon after the reign of Sargon II began in Assyria, another Chaldean, Merodach-baladan II, seized the Babylonian throne and succeeded at uniting the previously fragmented Chaldean tribes. Merodach-baladan is most notable for his ability to forge military alliances in his anti-Assyrian efforts, as he did with Babylon's neighbor to the east, Elam. He attempted to draw Hezekiah of Judah into this international coalition against Assyria, as we know from 2 Kings 20:12-19 and Isaiah 39 (see 2.2 below). As an adroit strategist, Merodach-baladan was able to rule Babylonia free of Assyrian interference for a decade (721-710 BC). Ultimately, however, the overwhelming military might of Assyria proved too much for him. In 710 BC, Sargon II of Assyria removed Merodach-baladan and resumed a dual monarchy over Assyria and Babylon. For the next century Assyrian monarchs expended considerable energy trying to control Babylonia, with varying levels of success. Sennacherib used the most aggressive tactics, resulting eventually in the devastation of Babylon, leaving it to languish without royal leadership for eight years. His son Esarhaddon abandoned this approach and resumed instead the dual monarchy, during which time Babylonia experienced gradual economic growth and moderate prosperity. Upon his death, he divided Assyria and Babylonia between his sons, Ashurbanipal and Shamash-shum-ukin respectively, as sibling kingdoms in an attempt to perpetuate peace. Tragically, however, this only resulted in civil war (652-648 BC), in which Assyria recaptured Babylon (Manasseh of Judah may have collaborated with the anti-Assyrian forces [see 2 Chron 33:11-13; Arnold 2004, 91]). Even as Babylonia lost this conflict, the vulnerability of the Assyrian Empire became apparent. While the Assyrian Empire had expended enormous resources to defeat Babylon, southern Mesopotamia itself recovered from the conflict rapidly. The Assyrian threat to Babylonian nationalism had galvanized and unified tribal groups in Babylonia in anti-Assyrian sentiment, and a foundation was thereby established for one final native Semitic empire with Babylon as its capital.

A new period of Babylonian history was in-augured by the dynasty of Nabopolassar (625-605 bc) and his son and successor, Nebuchadnezzar II (604-562 bc). The former contributed to the defeat of the Assyrians and restored Babylon to a time of renewed grandeur unmatched since the great Hammurabi a millennium earlier. And Nebuchadnezzar's legendary pride (Dan 4:30) is not without justification, as he transformed Babylon into the greatest city of the ancient world. This is known as the Chaldean Empire or, better, the Neo-Babylonian Empire (625-539 bc). The Chaldean roots of the empire are evident for readers of the OT prophets, where "Chaldea" and "Chaldean" are frequent synonyms for "Babylon" and "Babylonia." The significance of the Neo-Babylonian Empire may be described best against the backdrop of other events in Mesopotamia during the first millennium, which was dominated by a series of imperial powers, primarily the Assyrian Empire, the Persian Empire, and later the arrival of Alexander the Great and Greek rule. For a much briefer period during the seventh and sixth centuries, Babylon rose to premier international status and enjoyed a spectacular period of strength and prosperity. The Neo-Babylonian Empire may be thought of as a mere interlude between the Assyrians and Persians, a period of extremely brief duration. Yet the grandeur of this empire, especially under Nebuchadnezzar II, and its legacy in the biblical and classical sources left an indelible mark on subsequent history, making this one of the most important and interesting periods of ancient Babylonian history.

At the death of Ashurbanipal, Nabopolassar seized the throne of Babylon and established the new dynasty. His reign was devoted to driving the Assyrian army from Babylonian soil and consolidating local rule in Babylon. After the fall of the city of Ashur, he established an alliance with his new powerful neighbors in the north, the Medes. They agreed to share power, the Medes in northern Mesopotamia, leaving Nabopolassar free in central and southern Mesopotamia, as well as in Syria. Upon Nabopolassar's death in 605 bc, the crown prince, Nebuchadnezzar, assumed the throne, having recently led Babylonian forces in an impressive victory against the Egyptians at Carchemish (Jer 46:2). The new king quickly fell heir to most of the former territories of the Assyrian Empire. He reestablished Babylonia as the leading power in the ancient world, rivaling that of Hammurabi in strength and size. Unfortunately, Jehoiakim of Judah made the fatal mistake of believing that Egypt was the stronger of the two powers, assuming a policy for Judah that would have devastating consequences. Conflict between Jerusalem and Babylon resulted first in the siege of Jerusalem in 597 bc, duly noted in the Neo-Babylonian Chronicle Series, reflecting the strategic importance of Jerusalem among Babylon's western holdings (Arnold 2006, 417 [chronicle 5, lines rev 11-12]). A second, more devastating destruction of Judah's capital occurred in 586 bc, which constitutes a central and defining moment in biblical history. The trauma of the Babylonian destruction of Jerusalem left an unmistakable imprint on the survivors in exile and, arguably, on the very shape of the OT itself. The macrostructure of the Hebrew Bible may be said to revolve around the narration of this event as its apex; the loss of city, temple and monarchy is the conclusion of the primary history, the center point of the Latter Prophets and the Writings (Freedman, 6-7). Nebuchadnezzar's defeat of Jerusalem included deportation of Judean populations in 597, 586, 582 bc and perhaps others, marking the distinction between homeland and Diaspora, between life in the land and exile.

Culturally, ancient Israel shared many similarities with Babylon. These included a religiously dominated culture vis-à-vis today's secularizing materialism, the principle of association that governed intellectual processes, and the basic conservatism of both societies (van der Toorn, 1-9). Also like the Israelites, ancient Babylonia produced literature of high quality. The Babylonians left us hundreds of thousands of texts comprising a scribal curriculum, sometimes called a literary "canon," which was fixed probably somewhere around 1200 bc (Oppenheim, 13; Reiner, 294-95). These cultural similarities, however, only throw into bold relief the religious dissimilarities, which became the focal point of the critique of the OT prophets.

2. Babylon and Babylonia in the Old Testament Prophets.

The historical and political realities of the Iron Age led several Israelite prophets to characterize Babylon as the quintessential place of religious hubris and idolatry, which was considered tantamount to a refusal to worship or acknowledge the rightful place of deity. Characteristic of most of these texts is a pejorative tone typical of references elsewhere in the Bible, which includes nearly five hundred references to Babylon, the region of Babylonia or its inhabitants, counting those in both Testaments (Arnold 2004, 10). Because of its political and cultural significance beginning with Hammurabi's dynasty in the early second millennium BC, and its role later in destroying Jerusalem and deporting large numbers of Israelites, Babylon came to carry theological significance in the Bible. The prophets of Israel had especially pointed criticisms of Babylonian religion and imperialism (Vanderhooft, 115-202).

2.1. Babylon and Babylonia in Oracles "Against the Nations." Both Isaiah and Jeremiah include Babylon among their collections of oracles "against the nations" (Is 13—14; Jer 50—51). Isaiah's oracle against Babylon is the first of a series of such sermons against several nations (Is 13—23). Isaiah announces that Yahweh will use the Medes to destroy Babylon, and that the city will be completely uninhabited, abandoned forever (Is 13:17, 19-20; 14:22-23). The downfall of the king of Babylon is celebrated in terms that came to symbolize the destruction of any hostile enemy of God (Is 14:4-21). Rather than the first of a group, as in Isaiah's oracles against the nations, Jeremiah's prediction of Babylon's downfall is the climax of his collection, arranged geographically, starting with Egypt and sweeping across the Fertile Crescent west to east, culminating with Babylon (Jer 46—51 [although the LXX has a significantly different arrangement]). Jeremiah especially delights in the anticipated shame of Babylon's deity, Marduk, or simply "Bel" (Jer 50:2; 51:44). Babylon, the great conqueror of all nations will itself be conquered, and like Isaiah's prophecy, Jeremiah anticipates a day when Babylon will become an utter desolation, unfit for human occupation (Jer 50:3, 13; 51:29, 37). Indeed, Babylon will become like Sodom and Gomorrah, uninhabitable (Jer 50:39-40; cf. Is 13:19). And again like Isaiah, Jeremiah identifies the Medes as Babylon's destroyer (Jer 51:11, 28). Babylon's destruction will also mark the end of the exile; all the peoples of both northern Israel and southern Judah will be reunited at Zion by an everlasting covenant with Yahweh (Jer 50:4-5, 19). Ezekiel too has oracles against the nations (Ezek 25—32). Although Ezekiel does not single out Babylon for its own destruction, his judgment oracles concerning the nations identify Babylon as the instrument by which God punishes all the rest. King Nebuchadnezzar himself is summoned by God against Tyre and Egypt, his armies are strengthened especially against Egypt, and he will put an end to Egypt's multitudes (Ezek 30:10). Nebuchadnezzar and the Babylonians are "the most terrible of the nations" and are used by Yahweh to bring ruin upon Egypt (Ezek 30:11; cf. Ezek 26:7; 29:18-19; 30:24-25; 32:11).

In addition to Babylon's role in these oracles "against the nations," the city is the focus of many other prophetic texts, as the following list illustrates.

2.2. Isaiah. The threat to ancient Israel and Judah during the lifetime of eighth-century BC Isaiah was Assyria, not Babylon. Yet even Isaiah foresaw the danger that Babylon would present in the future, especially as narrated in Isaiah 39. Sometime around 713 BC, emissaries of Merodach-baladan II, a Chaldean prince who had seized the Babylonian throne and unified the previously fragmented tribes of Babylonia, arrived in Jerusalem to pay Hezekiah a visit (Arnold 2004, 90). The good king naively hosted the Babylonian visitors and gave them a tour of all his possessions (Is 39:2-4). But Isaiah warned that, having survived the Assyrian threat, Judah eventually would fall to descendants of these very Chaldean visitors (Is 39:5-7).

In the prophecies most often accredited to an anonymous follower of Isaiah in the sixth century BC (Is 40—55), Babylon becomes a symbol of the evil oppressor when described as a beautiful woman reduced to slavery, and the prophet celebrates her humiliation (Is 47:1-7). The long awaited return from exile in Babylonia is described as a miraculous event comparable to the crossing of the Red Sea (Is 51:9-11). The prophet's acerbic critique of idolatry clearly has Babylonian religious practices in view. The artisans who fashion such *idols will be shamed because they create a worthless and lifeless object that can neither see nor know (Is 44:9-11). The ironsmiths and carpenters who work on the Babylonian idols grow tired or hungry or cold. They foolishly take the same wood used for the idols to cook food or warm themselves by the fire, and so they are incapable of perceiving the futility of their idol making (Is 44:12-20; cf. Is 40:19-20). Similarly, the Babylonians transported humanoid images of their chief deities, Marduk and Nabu ("Bel" and "Nebo"), on beasts and cattle who grow weary carrying them (Is 46:1-2). The Babylonian deities are incapable of moving themselves or even supporting their own weight.

2.3. Jeremiah. We have more biographic information for Jeremiah than any other Israelite prophet. He lived through the period of Israel's history that prophets before him only warned about. He witnessed the premature and tragic death of King Josiah, the ignominious decade-long rule of Jehoiakim, the disastrous rule of Zedekiah, the capture and destruction of Jerusalem at the hands of the Babylonians and the exile of God's people (for historical details, see Cogan, 262-69). Jeremiah is rightly known as "the weeping prophet" (cf. Jer 9:1; Lam 2:11).

This period was characterized by bitter debate over whether Judah ought to submit to the Babylonian yoke or attempt to maintain independence, most often linked to dependence on Egypt as an ally. Jeremiah was unequivocally committed to the strategy of surrendering to Nebuchadnezzar because he believed that punishment was inevitable after the loss of Josiah and his reform agenda, and because he wanted to minimize the effects of the punishment. Jeremiah insisted instead upon accepting vassalage to Babylon as a means of survival. His message was assiduously rejected as pro-Babylonian by Jerusalem's ruling establishment, and he personally suffered for his position. Yet his message was consistent that Babylon would be used by Yahweh to punish Judah: "I am going to bring upon you a nation from far away, O house of Israel, says the LORD. It is an enduring nation, it is an ancient nation, a nation whose language you do not know, nor can you understand what they say" (Jer 5:15). The nation used as an instrument of divine wrath is a distant one of strange and incomprehensible speech, a distant and foreign nation of long duration.

At times, Jeremiah refers to Babylonia cryptically when he warns that disaster will break forth "out of the north" (Jer 1:14; 6:1, 22-23) (Arnold, NIDB). Seven times in Jeremiah and four times in Zechariah this ominous title is used for the geographic regions north of ancient Israel, specifically Syria and northern Mesopotamia, and by extension, Babylonia. Several topographical features of Syria-Palestine give it a decidedly north-south orientation, in particular the Mediterranean Sea to the west and the desert to the east and southeast, so that the international highways run north and south. This means that typically, enemies from Western Asia of necessity brought their armies into southern Syria-Palestine from the north, even the Babylonians and Assyrians in the extreme east and northeast. Whether or not the identity of Jeremiah's foe from the north country may be positively identified with any specific historical group has been a matter of scholarly debate, but the Babylonians clearly came to be so identified after 586 BC, and it seems reasonable to assume that even before that date, the foe from the north could be any Mesopotamian imperial power looming on the horizon (Vanderhooft, 136-49). In Jeremiah's *call narrative, evil itself is announced as imminent, about to break forth from the north against Judah (Jer 1:13-16). In Jeremiah 4—6 the prophet reveals Yahweh's plan to bring great destruction from the north against Judah. This destruction will be the result of a nation skilled with "bow and spear," a cruel nation that will show no mercy to *Zion (Jer 6:22-23; 10:22; 25:9). Ironically, at the conclusion of the book, the prophet is comforted by the knowledge that Babylon will one day encounter its own enemy from the north, the Medo-Persian forces, another great and mighty nation arriving from the north country to bring destruction and vengeance, this time against Babylon itself (Jer 50:3, 9, 41-42).

At other times, Babylon is referred to in mysterious cryptograms as a way of hiding the specific reference and therefore establishing plausible deniability but still clearly condemning the city; such is the case with "Sheshach" and "Leb-qamai" (Jer 25:26; 51:1, 41) (Arnold 2004, 10). Other designations for Babylon are not intended to be cryptic but rather illustrate the rhetorical impact that the city had on the imagination of Israel's prophets—for example, Merathaim, meaning "double rebellion," and Pekod, named for one of the prominent Aramean tribes of Babylonia, the Puqudu (Jer 50:21).

2.4. Ezekiel. Using especially acute language, Ezekiel identifies Babylon as Yahweh's instrument for punishment against the nations (Ezek 25—32) as well as against Judah itself. The prince of Jerusalem and the city's inhabitants will be caught in Yahweh's snare and brought to Babylon (Ezek 12:10-13). The prophet compares Babylon to a great eagle that came to cut off the top of an impressive cedar (Jehoiakim) and planted in its place a twig to sprout and grow (Zedekiah). But the young tree was also rebellious, so he went into exile to Babylon, where Yahweh entered into judgment with him there for treason (Ezek 17). Through the prophet Ezekiel, Yahweh even prepares a path for Babylon to come to Jerusalem to put the city to siege, with carefully marked signposts so the enemy king can find the city easily (Ezek 21:18-23). The king of Babylon has two choices, symbolized by the cities of Rabbah in Ammon and Jerusalem in Judah. Nebuchadnezzar is portrayed using divinatory practices loathsome to the Israelites—extispicy (examination of animal entrails), belomancy (shaking of arrows) and the use of idols or teraphim—to determine which city to attack. But despite the uncertainty of the Babylonians and their illegitimate practices for discerning divine will, Yahweh summons them directly to Jerusalem for punishment rather than Rabbah.

Oholibah, representing Jerusalem, lusted after male figures in wall carvings, the Babylonians dressed in their brightly colored fine clothes, and she invited them to share her bed and defiled herself with them (Ezek 23:14-18). As a result, Yahweh turned from her in disgust, as he had earlier turned from her sister, Oholah, representing Samaria, and used her erstwhile lovers, the Babylonians, "from the north" to punish her (Ezek 23:22-30).

2.5. Habakkuk. We know little of the historical circumstances of Habakkuk's ministry. For this reason, the single reference to the Chaldeans in the book (Hab 1:6) is open to interpretation, although it probably denotes the imminent arrival of the Babylonian army. The term "Chaldeans" (sometimes translated "Babylonians" [e.g., NLT]) may have been a metaphor for some other entity, and yet the description of them in Habakkuk 1:6-11 collaborates everything we know about Israelite perceptions of Babylonia during this period. Babylonia is a "fierce and impetuous nation" marching throughout the earth to take possessions at will (Hab 1:6). Justice in Babylonian society has no external constraints (Hab 1:7). Their army is terrifying, led by swift horse-drawn chariots that come for violence and destruction (Hab 1:7-9). No realm or fortification can stop them; they are enamored with their own strength (Hab 1:10-11). What drives the prophetic message forward in this book is the conviction that Yahweh himself is arousing this fierce Babylonian army to march against Judah (Hab 1:5-6). Habakkuk is tormented by the realization that, on the one hand, Judahite society is unjust, wicked and deserving of punishment (Hab 1:2-4), and, on the other hand, God is about to use the dreaded Babylonian army as the instrument of that punishment (Hab 1:12-17). Habakkuk's ministry is focused on Yahweh's use of the Babylonians to punish the more righteous people of Judah, and he longs for the Babylonians to get their own day of judgment. From his perspective, Babylon may be compared to Sheol, for just as Sheol's appetite for the dead is insatiable, so is the greed of the Babylonian Empire for other nations (Hab 2:5, 8). The Babylonian Empire was founded on violence and iniquity (Hab 2:12). And like Isaiah, this prophet derides the idolatry of the Babylonians, who create "a teacher of lies" out of wood and then cannot understand why the image does not wake up and answer them (Hab 2:18-19). By contrast, the whole earth—presumably including the Babylonians—must learn to keep silence before Yahweh, who resides in his holy temple (Hab 2:20). This truth is enough to comfort the prophet, who is reminded of Yahweh's great salvation of old (Hab 3:2-15) and pledges to endure faithfully the traumatic circumstances of the imminent future while he waits patiently for Yahweh to bring judgment on the Babylonians (Hab 3:16-19).

2.6. Zechariah. In the vision-oracle section of Zechariah 1—6, Babylon is again the agent of divine discipline. Yet the city exceeded its divine calling and therefore is deserving of its own punishment. The superscriptions at Zechariah 1:1, 7 identify the period of Darius the Great of Persia as the time of Babylon's just punishment. The fulfillment of earlier prophetic expectations and hopes that Babylon would be punished came not at the relatively peaceful capture of Babylon by Cyrus in 539 BC, but rather with the harsher policies of Darius following Babylonian rebellions against Persia in 522 BC and 521 BC (Boda, 30-41). Zechariah thus identifies Darius as the one who fulfills the prophetic hope for Babylon's punishment.

2.7. Daniel. The role of Babylon in Daniel 1—5 is that of a ferocious human empire capable of many atrocities, yet vulnerable and ultimately doomed because of God's opposition. Nebuchadnezzar's siege of Jerusalem in 605 BC provides the backdrop for the events of Daniel 1, including the capture and deportation of Daniel and his three friends (on the historical difficulties, see Provan, Long and Longman, 381n112). The forced acculturation of the Hebrew lads, intentionally indoctrinating them as Babylonians complete with new names, symbolizes the experiences of all Jews of the Babylonian exile. The Babylonian court of Nebuchadnezzar is the setting of Daniel 2—4 and that of Belshazzar in Daniel 5. These stories of Daniel and his friends in Babylonia emphasize the results of royal opposition to God's will. No matter how powerful, intimidating or seemingly invincible, human power can quickly be reduced to insane ridicule when confronted by the truth of God's faithful witnesses. If the royal pride of Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar is self-destructive and temporary, this certainly is true for any number of lesser ancient kingdoms.

Babylon's rebellious pride and vulnerability are also evident in the book's sequence of four earthly kingdoms (Dan 2; 7). Rather than a collection of oracles against the nations, as in other OT prophets (e.g., Is 13—23), Daniel envisions four powerful world empires, followed by a fifth, eternal kingdom. These are not oracles against Israel's enemies, but rather visions of future empires that oppose God and oppress God's people. Babylon serves in this scenario as the prototype of human pride and rebellion, functioning in Daniel's stories and visions as the human anti-kingdom to God's coming kingdom of peace and sovereignty. Specific identity of the four world empires in Daniel 2; 7 is a moot question (i.e., Babylon/Media/Persia/Greece or Babylon/Medo-Persia/Greece/Rome), but the message is not: all earthly kingdoms, no matter how powerful, are ephemeral and prone to self-destruction. Ultimately, the Son of Man will usher in the eternal kingdom of the Ancient of Days (Dan 7:13-14), and God's people, the "saints of the Most High," will do well to wait faithfully for that great day.

See also EXILE; ISRAELITE HISTORY; NATIONS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. B. T. Arnold, Who Were the Babylonians? (SBLABS 10; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2004); idem, "The Neo-Babylonian Chronicle

Series," in The Ancient Near East: Historical Sources in Translation, ed. M. Chavalas (BSAH; Oxford: Blackwell, 2006) 407-26; idem, "North Country, The," NIDB 4:282; M. J. Boda, "Terrifying the Horns: Persia and Babylon in Zechariah 1:7-6:15," CBQ 67 (2005) 22-41; J. A. Brinkman, "Foreign Relations of Babylonia from 1600 to 625 B.C.: The Documentary Evidence," AJA 76 (1972): 271-81; M. Cogan, "Into Exile: From the Assyrian Conquest of Israel to the Fall of Babylon," in The Oxford History of the Biblical World, ed. M. Coogan (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998) 242-75; D. N. Freedman, The Unity of the Hebrew Bible (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1991); J. Goldstein, Peoples of An Almighty God: Competing Religions in the Ancient World (ABRL; New York: Doubleday, 2002); E. Klengel-Brandt, "Babylon," OEANE 1:251-56; A. L. Oppenheim, Ancient Mesopotamia: Portrait of a Dead Civilization (rev. ed.; Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1977); I. W. Provan, V. P. Long and T. Longman III, A Biblical History of Israel (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 2003); E. Reiner, "First-Millennium Babylonian Literature," CAH 3/2 (1992) 293-321; F. Rochberg-Halton, "New Evidence for the History of Astrology," JNES 43 (1984) 115-40; D. S. Vanderhoof, The Neo-Babylonian Empire and Babylon in the Latter Prophets (HSM 59; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1999); K. van der Toorn, Sin and Sanction in Israel and Mesopotamia: A Comparative Study (SSN 22; Assen: Van Gorcum, 1985). B. T. Arnold

BABYLONIAN EXILE. See EXILE; ISRAELITE HISTORY.

BABYLONIAN PERIOD. See BABYLON; ISRAELITE HISTORY.

BLESSINGS AND CURSES

Blessings and curses are predominantly linked to *covenant, and primarily to the covenant relationship between God and Israel. Curses, in the form of defeat and *exile, follow disobedience. However, God's purpose is to restore his people, renew the covenant and reestablish the covenant blessings, seen predominantly in material well-being and the spiritual renewal necessary for the covenant to be sustained, and also through his people to extend those blessings to all *nations and the whole earth.

1. Terminology and Usage
2. Theological Significance

1. Terminology and Usage.

1.1. Blessings. References to blessing or being blessed in the OT usually are linked with the Hebrew root brk, including bērākā (“blessing”) and bārūk (“blessed”). Sometimes words from this root occur in the context of blessing God (Dan 2:19-20; 3:28; 4:34; Zech 11:5; cf. Is 66:3), with the sense of offering grateful praise to God for his goodness.

More commonly, brk relates to blessing received from God. Within the Prophetic Books there are no direct examples of one person pronouncing a blessing on another (although cf. Is 65:16; Jer 17:7; 31:23). Another term, ’ašrē, refers to being in a “blessed” or “happy” state (e.g., Is 32:20; 56:2; Dan 12:12; Mal 3:2). This word may be used in a secular context, and so it is not synonymous with bārūk, which indicates the state of one who is blessed as a result of being in receipt of God’s blessing (Brown, 763-64). Nevertheless, the terms overlap in meaning, particularly in the Prophetic Books of the OT, where the reason for being “happy” is closely linked with the bestowal of divine favor.

The Assyrian king’s invitation to the people of Judah to “make a blessing [bērākā] with me” (Is 36:16) may, because of the link between blessing and covenant, point to an agreement that is of mutual benefit (Murtonen, 174). However, as part of a speech that challenges confidence in God (Is 36:18-20) and suggests that the king of Assyria can give the *peace and prosperity elsewhere associated with God’s future rule (Is 36:16; cf. Mic 4:4; Zech 3:10), it might also be a call to trust Assyria, rather than God, as the source of hope and blessing.

1.2. Curses. There are three main Hebrew roots relating to “curses,” “cursing” or “being cursed” in the OT (’rr, ’lh, ql), and their usage in the prophetic literature broadly corresponds to their usage in the OT as a whole. These are frequently mentioned alongside blessing as its antithesis (Jer 17:5-8; 20:14-15; Zech 8:13; Mal 2:2; 3:9-10). There is considerable overlap of the semantic ranges of these terms, particularly in the context of the relationship between God and human beings; and when these terms are used in the OT, Gordon questions the view that a distinction may be made between them (Gordon, 492; cf. Scharbert, TDOT 1:415; Brichto, 215-18). However, although the terms may be used in the same or similar contexts and may sometimes be interchangeable, each also has its own particular function and emphasis.

The root ’rr occurs, frequently, in the curse formula “cursed be . . .” or “let . . . be cursed,” formed with the Qal passive participle, ’ārūr, followed by the object of the curse. Although Jeremiah uses this formula in a personal context to curse the day of his birth (Jer 20:14-15), that use is exceptional in the OT, where the expression is used primarily in relation to the consequences of transgressing the requirements (specific or implied) of Israel’s covenant relationship with God (Jer 11:3; 17:5; Mal 1:14). This formula plays an important part in connection with the legal requirements set out in Deuteronomy (Deut 27:15-26; 28:16-19); and it is not surprising that the expression is used most frequently by Jeremiah, who appears to have been significantly influenced by Deuteronomic theology. However, while in Deuteronomy the curse is pronounced by the Levites, and elsewhere it may be pronounced by other figures in authority (e.g., Josh 6:26; 1 Sam 14:24), in the prophetic literature the ’ārūr formula is always put into the mouth of God, perhaps reflecting the prophets’ lack of confidence in existing secular and religious institutions to uphold covenant faithfulness (e.g., Jer 23:9-11). The invocation of such a curse would have the effect of excluding offenders from the covenant community, and so both distancing the community as a whole from the offenses described and also acting as a deterrent to future disobedience.

The most frequent form of ’lh in the prophetic literature, as in the OT as a whole, is the noun ’ālā; the associated verb appears only in the infinitive (Hos 4:2; 10:4), where again it is used as a noun. These terms are associated predominantly with the curse that binds participants in a treaty or covenant to the obligations demanded by their relationship, and which is invoked when the conditions of that relationship are broken. By entering into a solemn, sworn commitment, parties effectively put themselves under the curse (’ālā) that accompanies that commitment; and this close identification of oath and curse is reflected in the fact that ’ālā is also translated “oath” (e.g., Ezek 16:59; 17:13-19; cf. Hos 10:4). There is some overlap here with the more common word for “oath,” šebû’ā, although the terms are not synonymous, and where ʾālā is used, the main focus continues to be less on the oath itself and more on the consequences of breaking the sworn commitment. In this context there is also a close link between ʾālā and bērīt (“covenant”). In Hosea 10:4 ʾālōt refers to the oaths or curses that accompany covenant making (though in this case instead of acting as a solemn bond that holds the parties together, the commitment is criticized as being without substance). Similarly, in Ezekiel 17:13 making a covenant is paralleled with putting a person under the ʾālā that is associated with it. Conversely, breaking the covenant is equivalent to despising the ʾālā (Ezek 16:59; 17:16, 18-19). Elsewhere, ʾālā refers to the curse that comes on the people and the land as a result of breaking their covenant obligations to God (Is 24:6; Jer 23:10; Dan 9:11; Zech 5:3).

While ʾrr and ʾlh are set predominantly in the context of covenant, qll has a wider semantic range. It is used, for example, in the context of cursing those who are perceived to be the cause of distress (Is 8:21) or who, like Jeremiah, are viewed as a source of annoyance (Jer 15:10). However, in the prophetic literature, particularly the book of Jeremiah, qll is also linked with the divine judgment that follows the people’s sin. The people will become “a curse” or “an object of cursing” (e.g., Jer 24:9; 25:18; 26:6; 42:18; 44:8, 12, 22; Zech 8:13), pointing to the severity of judgment and perhaps implying that their fate will be something that others wish on their enemies when pronouncing a curse (cf. Jer 29:22) (Brichto, 196; Mitchell, 59-60; Scharbert, TDOT 13:41). Although there is no specific reference to bērīt in these verses, the related occurrence of the covenant formula “they will be my people and I will be their God” (Jer 24:6) and the frequent link between cursing and disobedience (Jer 25:8; 26:4; 42:13; 44:10), which echoes Deuteronomic theology, set this judgment too within the context of breaking covenant obligations. This further indicates the overlap in meaning of these three terms, and the use of ʾālā rather than qēlālā in Jeremiah 29:18 also indicates that under some circumstances the terms may be interchangeable (this is evident too in the occurrence of all three roots in the covenant curses in Deut 27–30).

2. Theological Significance.

2.1. The Power of Words. There has been debate about whether the declaration of blessings and curses in Israel was seen, as elsewhere in the ancient Near East, as a magical formula, carrying with it the effective power to bring about the consequences described (see, e.g., the summary by Thiselton). The suggestion that this may have been an earlier understanding in the OT (Scharbert, TDOT 1:265; TDOT 2:303; TDOT 13:43; Westermann, 56-59) may also be questionable (Thiselton, 296); in any case, it seems widely acknowledged that in the prophetic literature, which seeks to separate true worship of Yahweh from the mechanistic practices associated with other religious systems, blessings and curses have no magical power. It is possible that by burning Jeremiah’s scroll, Jehoiakim thought he could remove the implicit curse of defeat and exile by the Babylonians (Jer 36:29), and that might represent the popular theology. However, that threat of judgment received its power from God, and it seems reasonable to assume that all such blessings and curses are effective, not because of the power of the words themselves, but because God, who is the source of the declaration, will ensure that they are carried out; “In the Bible, good fortune and misfortune . . . are traceable to God, and prayers or imprecations invoking these are, even when not made explicit in the text, addressed to the Deity” (Brichto, 218; see also Mitchell, 173-76; Thiselton, 295-96). The fact that God may choose to reverse either the promises of blessing or the curses that would otherwise be expected to fall on the people (e.g., Mal 2:2; 3:9-10; cf. Jer 18:7-10) further indicates that the effective power lies with God and is not inherent within the blessings or curses themselves.

2.2. Treaty Curses. As already noted, curses in the Prophetic Books may be associated with breaking a covenant. Blessings and curses were associated with ancient Near Eastern treaties, and several studies have noted parallels between curses found in treaties, particularly from Syria and Mesopotamia from the ninth to seventh centuries BC, and imprecations within the prophetic writings (see Fensham; Hillers; Johnston). In such treaties gods of the parties involved were invoked to fulfill the curses associated with failure to comply with treaty obligations. In one such treaty, made between Nebuchadnezzar and Zedekiah, king of Judah, Zedekiah was required to swear by God (2 Chron 36:13). And, when the king of Judah broke the covenant, even though it was a political agreement and probably made under duress, God defended it and threatened judgment on Zedekiah (Ezek 17:11-21). However, the imprecations do not bind God to act in a particular way. So (as suggested by Johnston, 417), Nahum can urge defiance of the curses associated with breaking the vassal treaty with Assyria and offer assurance that God not only will protect Judah but also will bring those covenant curses back onto Assyria. This different divine response may also reflect Assyria's brutality toward its vassals and the probability that the initial treaty included the acceptance of foreign gods (2 Kings 16:10).

2.3. Blessings and Curses and God's Covenant with Israel. The link between curses and breaking covenant is particularly significant in the context of God's covenant with Israel. In the Prophetic Books, as elsewhere in the OT, God's blessing is closely associated with the physical well-being of the people, including freedom from oppression, which leads to peace and security in the *land, and material prosperity in the form of rainfall and plentiful harvests (e.g., Is 32:18-20; 65:20-25; Ezek 34:26-29; Hag 2:19; Zech 8:10-13; Mal 3:10-12). This blessing reflects God's covenant commitment to his people in the book of Deuteronomy as they prepare to enter the promised land: divine blessing, including prosperity and continued possession of the land, will follow obedience (e.g., Deut 11:13-15, 26-29; 28:1-14). However, the corollary is also true: disobeying the requirements of the covenant relationship between God and his people will bring God's curse, which will be evident in the withdrawal of divine blessing, the results of which might include drought, failing harvests, defeat by enemies and eventual expulsion from the land (e.g., Deut 11:16-17, 26-29; 28:15-44). That is the situation envisaged by the prophets. Despite continual warnings, the increasing apostasy of the people has resulted in the disasters threatened in the covenant curses befalling the nation (Jer 11:3; 23:10; Dan 9:11; Zech 5:3). Thus, Jeremiah reminds the people of the choice put before them (Jer 11:3-5) and goes on to note that their persistent failure to fulfill the requirements of their covenant relationship has resulted in God's curse, in the form of defeat and exile (Jer 11:7-8). There are also several passages that appear to depict God bringing a legal case against Israel (e.g., Jer 2:4-13; Hos 4:1-3; Mic 6:1-5; cf. Is 1:2-3; 3:13-15). These so-called covenant lawsuits may have their origins in the context of international law where a party to a treaty could be held accountable for failure to meet its covenant obligations.

Isaiah 24:5-6 also refers to a curse that follows breaking the "everlasting covenant" (bērît 'ôlām), which probably is a reference to the covenant with Noah. That covenant was made, following the flood, with all life on earth, and breaking it results in a curse that is also universal, consuming the earth. This curse echoes the devastation of the flood (Is 24:18b) and suggests a return to something like the chaos of Genesis 1:2 (cf. Jer 4:23; Zeph 1:2-4).

2.4. Future Blessings. Although sin leads to God's curse, judgment is not God's final word, and renewed obedience opens the way to God's blessing. Thus, the lack of prosperity that persisted after the return from exile will be reversed as the people renew their commitment to God by rebuilding the *temple (Hag 2:18-19; Zech 8:9-13), which was a symbol of God's presence among them and of their continuing covenant relationship with him, and by giving God his due in the form of tithes and offerings (Mal 3:10; cf. Ezek 44:30).

In other passages God's blessings appear to be associated with a more distant future age, which will follow God's direct intervention to deliver and restore his people and establish his reign. C. Westermann notes a close relationship between deliverance and the age of peace and prosperity that ensues, and divine blessing, and sees both as key elements in God's promises about the future (Westermann, 34). The blessings of that coming age are still described in terms of material well-being, including lasting peace and security under the Davidic messiah (Ezek 34:23-31; cf. Is 11:1-9), the subservience of the nations (Is 61:5), longevity (Is 65:20-22) and increased prosperity (e.g., Is 65:8-10; cf. Joel 3:18). There is also an important spiritual dimension. God's purpose is to establish a new and lasting covenant with his people (Is 61:8; Ezek 34:25; cf. Jer 31:31-34; Hos 2:16-19), and in order to enable the obedience necessary for that covenant to be maintained, the hearts of the people will be changed (Jer 31:3). In that context, material prosperity in terms of the renewed fruitfulness of what was barren desert becomes also a metaphor for the inward transformation of God's people through the pouring out of his *Spirit (Is 32:15-20; 44:3-5; cf. Ezek 36:24-30).

In this coming consummation, divine blessings are available also to non-Israelite *nations. There is tension here with the apparent subservience of the nations (e.g., Is 49:23; 60:10-16). Nevertheless, Isaiah 19:24-25 portrays Egypt and Assyria (which may be seen as representatives of warring nations formerly opposed to Israel) standing alongside Israel as equal participants in divine blessing. This is further indicated in Jeremiah 4:2, which echoes God's promises to Abraham (Gen 12:3) and to the Davidic king (Ps 72:16) and emphasizes Israel's agency. As the nations see the extent of the divine blessing received by a renewed and restored Israel, they will want to share in it and in the relationship with God that makes it possible (Zech 8:13, 20-23; cf. Is 2:2-4; 25:6-8; 56:3-8).

Future blessings are also described in terms of a new creation. The promise in Isaiah 61:8 of a bērît ʿôlām ("everlasting covenant") echoes the language of Isaiah 24:6. However, in contrast to that earlier passage, where breaking the covenant threatens to return the earth to precreation chaos, in the coming age God will reaffirm his victory over chaos and bring about both the recreation of his people (see Is 51:1-3, 9-11) and the creation of a new world order (Is 65:17-25) in which God's blessings extend to the whole earth.

See also COVENANT; PEACE, REST; RETRIBUTION; WRATH.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H. C. Brichto, The Problem of "Curse" in the Hebrew Bible (Philadelphia: Society of Biblical Literature, 1963); M. L. Brown, "ברך," NIDOTTE 1:757-67; F. C. Fensham, "Common Trends in Curses of the Near Eastern Treaties and Kudurru-Inscriptions Compared with Maledictions of Amos and Isaiah," ZAW 75 (1963) 155-75; R. P. Gordon, "Curse, Malediction," NIDOTTE 4:491-93; D. R. Hillers, Treaty-Curses and the Old Testament Prophets (BibOr 16; Rome: Pontifical Bible Institute, 1964); G. H. Johnston, "Nahum's Rhetorical Allusions to Neo-Assyrian Treaty Curses," BSac 158 (2001) 415-36; C. W. Mitchell, The Meaning of BRK "To Bless" in the Old Testament (SBLDS 95; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1987); A. Murtonen, "The Use and Meaning of the Words L'barak and B'raka^h in the Old Testament," VT 9 (1959) 158-77; J. Scharbert, "אלך," TDOT 1:261-66; idem, "אָרר," TDOT 1:405-18; idem, "ברך," TDOT 2:279-308; idem, "קלל," TDOT 13:37-44; A. C. Thiselton, "The Supposed Power of Words in the Biblical Writings," JTS 25 (1974) 281-99; C. Westermann, Blessing in the Bible and the Life of the Church (OBT; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978). R. L. Routledge

BURIAL. See DEATH.

C

CALL/COMMISSION NARRATIVES

The term call narrative (or commission narrative, vocation account, Berufungsbericht) is a form-critical term denoting a specific literary genre “in which a prophet or the prophetic tradition refers to the initiatory commission of the prophet” (Sweeney, 542). Complete call narratives appear only in the Major Prophets: Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel (Is 6:1-13; Jer 1:4-19; Ezek 1:1—3:15). Other prophetic books, including Hosea, Amos and Jonah, contain only more limited references to a call experience (Hos 1:2; Amos 7:14-15; Jon 1:2).

1. Biblical Sources
2. History of Scholarship
3. Life Setting and Tradition History

1. Biblical Sources.

Because the idea that Yahweh calls and commissions both individuals and groups for specific tasks is integral to the theological outlook of many OT writers, the motif of the call can be found throughout the OT. In addition, a number of texts that can be described as narratives of a call are generally not considered as examples of the call narrative genre proper (e.g., Abraham’s call in Gen 12:1-2; Joshua’s commissioning in Josh 1:1-9; Samuel’s call in 1 Sam 3:1—4:1). This is an interesting state of affairs and raises important questions about how call narratives have been defined. The list of call narratives proper is made up of a group of texts that exhibit significant formal similarities. These narratives exist both inside and outside the Prophetic Books.

1.1. Call Narratives Outside the Prophetic Books. Call narratives outside the Prophetic Books that are important for understanding those within the Prophetic Books include the call of Moses (Ex 3:1—4:7), the call of Gideon (Judg 6:11-17, 36-40) and the anointing of Saul (1 Sam 9:1—10:16). In addition, the narrative of Micaiah ben Imlah’s conflict with Ahab and Zedekiah in 1 Kings 22:1-28 (esp. vv. 19-23), while not properly a call narrative, has figured prominently in scholarly discussion. The description of the divine court’s deliberations to which Micaiah is privy in this passage resembles the encounters in the divine throne room in Isaiah 6 and Ezekiel 1:1—3:15.

Leaving aside 1 Kings 22:1-28 as a special case, a number of similarities among these narratives are important for understanding the call narratives of the prophets. First, each contains a direct proclamation by Yahweh or his envoy to the called person announcing his special status (Ex 3:1-6; Judg 6:12; 1 Sam 9:20). Second, in each narrative the person called expresses his inadequacy for the task assigned to him. Gideon and Saul are from “insignificant” tribes and families (Judg 6:15; 1 Sam 9:21). Moses offers a series of four reasons for his inadequacy (Ex 3:11, 13; 4:1-2, 10). Third, in each narrative Yahweh responds with some reassurance. Finally, in all of them some sign is given to the called person.

1.2. Call Narratives Within the Prophetic Books.

1.2.1. Hosea, Amos and Jonah. Although none of them contains a call narrative in its fullest sense, Hosea, Amos and Jonah contain limited references to a call experience that may be contrasted with the more elaborate narratives of Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel (see Hos 1:2; Amos 7:14-15; Jon 1:2). In the book of Jonah, the prophet simply is instructed, “Arise and go to the great city Nineveh and call out unto it” (Jon 1:2). Commentators acknowledge that this call to go to Nineveh may mark the beginning of Jonah’s prophetic activity, but most agree that it more likely represents not a call to the prophetic office but rather an instruction to perform a specific task. In Hosea the reference is more ambiguous: "When Yahweh began to speak with Hosea, Yahweh said to Hosea, 'Go take for yourself a wife of whoredom'" (Hos 1:2). This phrase may indicate "a reference to a dramatic call to prophetic service" (Andersen and Freedman, 45). Or, it may not be an "account of an initiation connected with a prophetic call" at all (Wolff, 13). Although the book of Amos likewise does not contain a typical call narrative, it does refer to Amos's call during the narration of his conflict with the priest Amaziah. After Amaziah accuses Amos of prophesying for money, Amos responds that he is not a nābî ("prophet") or a ben-nābî ("son of a prophet"), but rather is specially commissioned by Yahweh. "Yahweh took me from following the flock, and Yahweh said to me, 'Go prophesy to my people Israel'" (Amos 7:14-15).

1.2.2. Jeremiah. Though not without literary critical problems, Jeremiah's call narrative (Jer 1:4-19) is most similar to those of Moses, Gideon and Saul, but it exhibits a particularly close resemblance to Moses' narrative. Jeremiah receives a commission from Yahweh that uses strong language of selection and appointment (Jer 1:4-5). Yahweh has chosen Jeremiah from the womb and given him a special task. Like each of the earlier figures, Jeremiah offers a reason for his inadequacy: he does not know how to speak, for he is only a youth (Jer 1:6). Yahweh offers reassurance (Jer 1:7-8), promising to be with Jeremiah. It has been suggested that Yahweh's response, extending a hand and touching Jeremiah's mouth, constitutes the sign, though it is important to note that unlike the earlier narratives, no sign is explicitly promised or requested. As with Moses, Yahweh does emphasize that Jeremiah will speak his words (Jer 1:9). The commissioning component of the call narrative is joined to a series of two *visions that explain the message of destruction that Jeremiah is to proclaim (Jer 1:13-16), reassure Jeremiah that Yahweh would carry out his word (Jer 1:11) and remind him not to be afraid (Jer 1:17). These visions may be regarded as further signs to Jeremiah (Holladay, 31).

1.2.3. Isaiah. The book of Isaiah also contains a narrative of the prophet's commissioning and exhibits some features similar to other call narratives. Like Jeremiah and Ezekiel, the prophet has divine action or words associated with his mouth (Is 6:6-7). He expresses his inadequacy (Is 6:11, according to Habel), and receives reassurance (Is 6:11-13, again according to Habel). The sign, however, is absent, and on further consideration, we can see that Isaiah's expression of inadequacy has nothing to do with his task; indeed, it occurs before one is assigned to him. Moreover, the way in which the divine charge is presented is unusual. It is not really a charge at all; rather, it is a question directed to the divine council that the prophet overhears (Is 6:8). The instruction "Go" comes later (Is 6:9). M. Sweeney notes that Kaplan, Knierim, Kaiser, Wildeberger and Steck do not consider Isaiah 6 a call narrative (Sweeney, 135). To this list we can add C. Seitz, who agrees with Steck that Isaiah 6 is not an inaugural call to the prophetic office but rather a narrower commission to a specific task (Seitz, 54). Sweeney himself does believe that Isaiah 6 functions as a call narrative, even though it does not fit the expected pattern (Sweeney, 136). The decisions of all these scholars raise important questions about the definition and function of call narratives.

1.2.4. Ezekiel. Ezekiel's call narrative has also presented issues for form critics, the most significant of which is the relationship between the commissioning narrative (Ezek 2:1-3:15) and the lengthy vision that precedes it (Ezek 1:1-28). W. Zimmerli has argued persuasively on form-critical and tradition-historical grounds that the visionary material of Ezekiel 1 cannot be easily separated from the commissioning episode. The commissioning component of Ezekiel's call narrative contains some of the features common to preprophetic call narratives. Ezekiel is approached by Yahweh and is told that he is being sent by Yahweh (Ezek 2:3-5). He is given reassurances by Yahweh (Ezek 2:6) and is told that Yahweh will enable him to withstand the resistance that he will encounter (Ezek 3:7-11). However, it is very difficult to identify the element of the narrative that functions as a sign, and there is no expression of inadequacy within the traditional boundaries of the narrative. N. Habel identifies the sign as the feeding of Ezekiel with the scroll (Ezek 2:8-3:3) (Habel, 313-14). By contrast, M. Greenberg claims that no sign is either asked for or given, indicating a discontinuity with the call narratives of Moses and Gideon (Greenberg, 81).

2. History of Scholarship.

R. Kilian's 1967 article traces the history of critical scholarship on call narratives. Because the bulk of sustained work on these narratives considered as a group occurs between 1935 and 1971, the present discussion will focus on that formative period; however, it will also be important to note a few things about earlier and subsequent work.

2.1. From Calvin to Duhm. Prior to the rise of form-critical scholarship, call narratives within the Prophetic Books were understood in the main as biography, presenting in a relatively simple and direct way the lived experience of the prophet. This certainly is true of premodern commentators such as John Calvin, who reads the call narrative of Jeremiah as a report of the prophet's encounter with God, a report that then becomes instructive for understanding the call of a Christian minister (Calvin, 38). Critical scholars of the late nineteenth century, though they eschewed the premodern search for messianic texts in the prophets, shared the premodern interest in the prophets as historical personalities (Blenkinsopp, 27-28). They wanted to understand the prophets' uniqueness in the history of Israelite religion and saw their call narratives as helpful to this task (see Prophecy, History of). As Kilian notes, no one up to this point really had paid any attention to the form in which these call narratives appeared, mainly because they were interested in other questions (Kilian, 357). Driven by J. Herder and the romantics, the focus was on the prophetic personality, and the call narrative was seen as a way to gain insight into this personality, in particular its spirituality and *psychology.

2.2. Gunkel, Schmidt and Form Criticism. With H. Gunkel came a fuller realization of the problem of the distance between the actual lives of the prophets and their writings collected centuries afterward (Gunkel 1915, xxxviii). It is Gunkel who, in his 1915 introduction to H. Schmidt's Die grossen Propheten (Gunkel 1915, xlv-lxix) and then more thoroughly in his own Die Propheten (Gunkel 1917, 104-40), begins to examine these writings more closely by identifying genres found within them (see Form Criticism). But it was Schmidt himself who first applied Gunkel's methods to call narratives. He was convinced that the call narratives of Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel exhibited remarkable formal similarity. This could not be coincidence, nor could it be explained simply by arguing for a common experience. Rather, said Schmidt, it showed that there must have existed a carefully designed form that was used for the narrative presentation of these call experiences (Schmidt, 391). Although Schmidt's observation laid the groundwork for later work on call narratives, it would be years before this work would begin in earnest (Kilian, 357).

2.3. The 1960s. The fifteen years between 1956 and 1971 witnessed a proliferation of publications on the call narratives, eventually reaching a point where scholars felt the need to apologize for the presumption that anything new could be added to the discussion (Habel, 297).

2.3.1. Ernst Kutsch. In 1956, E. Kutsch, as a result of a study of the call of Gideon (Judg 6:11-24), argued that one could detect in the Gideon narrative a carefully constructed "schema" that was repeated in the Elohist call story of Moses (Ex 3:10-12), in the call of Jeremiah (Jer 1:5-10) and in the anointing of Saul (1 Sam 10:1-7). This schema Kutsch identified simply as the preprophetic call schema (vorprophetisches Berufungsschema). He noted four elements of this schema: the announcement of the assignment by Yahweh; the refusal of the called person; the overcoming of the refusal by Yahweh; and a sign as proof that the assignment had come from Yahweh (Kilian, 359).

2.3.2. Walther Zimmerli. Another contribution to the discussion came at about the same time (1955) as a part of Zimmerli's commentary on Ezekiel (ET 1979). Zimmerli argued that there were in fact two distinct types of call narratives evident in the OT, either of which would have been regarded as a typical form. In addition to the form outlined by Kutsch above, "there is a second expanded type of call narrative" that Isaiah and Ezekiel employ (Zimmerli, 99). In Isaiah and Ezekiel, Yahweh's word of commissioning arises in the context of an overwhelming vision of the divine throne room. In the context of the divine court, Zimmerli notes, there is a greater distance between Yahweh and the prophet. Unlike the story of Jeremiah, which allows room for reluctance and even objection on the part of the prophet, in the narratives of Isaiah and Ezekiel there is “no room left for refusal” (Zimmerli, 99). With regard to form, Zimmerli concludes, “The differences serve to make clear that we are not dealing with a fixed formula” (Zimmerli, 99). Rather, the words of the commission from Yahweh can be combined with a vision of his throne room with “remarkable freedom;” this variation of the form arises in the ninth to eighth centuries BC (Zimmerli, 100). Zimmerli’s suggestion that there may be multiple kinds of call narratives helps make sense of some of the divergences noted earlier.

2.3.3. Norman Habel. Habel published the earliest systematic study of call narratives available in English and so exerted an early influence on English-speaking scholars who did not have access to the German literature. Habel examined the call narratives of Gideon, Moses, Jeremiah, First Isaiah, Ezekiel and Second Isaiah in order to offer some conclusions about where the form originated and how it developed over time. Like Zimmerli, Habel believed that prophetic call narratives arose from a prophet’s experience filtered through earlier traditions. Unlike Zimmerli, however, Habel argued for just a single type of call narrative shared among all the prophets. Moses’ call narrative (itself a template for Gideon and others) is used as a paradigm that “the classical prophets . . . appropriate and develop” in order to establish “a specific link with the past history of Israel” (Habel, 316). Further, in contrast with Kutsch’s four elements, Habel identified a generally consistent set of six elements that usually appear in a particular order: a divine confrontation, the introductory word, a commission, an objection, a reassurance and a sign. Although Habel’s six elements often are acknowledged in contemporary discussions, his thesis that all prophetic call narratives are of a single type is not as broadly accepted.

2.3.4. Wolfgang Richter and Klaus Gouders. Two further studies from this period are important to note. First is the work of Richter, who in two detailed monographs examined the preprophetic call narratives (Gideon, Moses, Saul). Richter’s preprophetic call narrative schema resembles Kutsch’s; however, he adds a “description of the need” at the beginning (the Israelites are being oppressed by enemies: Egyptians, Philistines, Midianites) and a “savior formula” at the end (the called person in each case is told that they will “save” the Israelites) (Richter, 142-67). After a thorough investigation of these narratives and a comparison with the call narratives of the Major Prophets, Richter concludes that the form of the call narrative originates during the period of the judges. The calls of Gideon and Saul represent the earliest form of this genre (Richter, 176).

The 1971 published dissertation of Gouders offers a thorough study of the call narratives of Moses and the three Major Prophets. Gouders’s conclusions about the type(s) and elements of the call narrative echo those of Zimmerli. There are indeed two types of call narrative, an Isaianic type and a Jeremianic type, with Ezekiel’s call narrative being a mixed form. Contrary to Richter, Gouders concludes with G. von Rad that the call narrative genre originates with the prophets, and that this genre then exerts influence on the call narratives of Moses and the judges via later redactors and/or authors (Gouders, 199-201). For Gouders, the prophets’ articulation of their call is essential both to their personal identity and to their legitimation before Israel (Gouders, 244).

2.4. Contemporary Work on Call Narratives. Since the 1970s, scholarly work on call narratives as a distinct genre has diminished significantly. Instead, scholars tend to focus on call narratives as components of the biblical books of which they are a part. B. Long has advised that the best way to understand a call narrative is to investigate the relation of the unique features of each prophet’s call narrative to the larger literary themes of the book (Long, 11). Examples of this approach are available in the best commentaries (e.g., Sweeney on Isaiah, Childs on Exodus) and also in exegetical articles and essays dealing with the passages in question (e.g., Wilson; Sharp). Alternatively, some studies have examined how some of the commonly expected components of the call genre can be found in other parts of the book (Jeppesen; Phinney) and what this might mean for the book’s editorial history. One notable exception to the trend away from the consideration of the genre as a whole is H.-C. Schmitt’s article highlighting evidence for the influence of wisdom traditions on prophetic call narratives (Schmitt, 214-15).

3. Life Setting and Tradition History.

Important questions face all form-critical discussions of call narratives. If the call narrative is a distinct genre, what is its origin? How did it develop over time? For what purpose was any given call narrative written down? What is the relationship between the call narratives found in the Prophetic Books and those found outside them? Though not exhaustive or systematic, the following discussion highlights some of the more notable attempts to answer these questions.

3.1. The Uniqueness of the Call Narrative. It has been suggested that the call narrative is sui generis; its origin is not related to any previous Israelite form or life setting, but rather is intimately connected with the rise of prophetism. As G. von Rad puts it, "The prophetic call [experience] gave rise to a new literary category, the account of a call" (von Rad, 2:54). On this view, the call narrative forms developed during the Israelite monarchy, the Isaiah form earlier (ninth to eighth centuries BC) and the Jeremiah form later (seventh century BC), and primarily served as a way to authenticate the prophet before his audience and to demonstrate that the message that the prophet spoke was from Yahweh (Gouders, 188). Call narratives "were not characteristic of the representatives of Jahwism from the very beginning" (von Rad, 2:54). The call narratives of Moses (Ex 3) and those found in the Deuteronomistic History (Gideon, Samuel) represent the tradition's later reflection on those figures in light of the experiences/narratives of the prophets of the monarchic period. Proponents of this view do not necessarily deny the experiences of these earlier figures; rather, they argue that the way those experiences are portrayed literarily is heavily influenced by the prophetic call narratives.

3.2. Development from the Commissioning Speech. Another alternative, offered by Habel, accepts the legitimating function of the call narrative but suggests that the form itself derives from court messenger practices in the ancient Near East (Habel, 317). Building on C. Westermann's work on the prophet as Yahweh's messenger, Habel cites Genesis 24:35-48, in which Abraham's servant recounts to Laban the narrative of his own commission by Abraham. This, Habel says, is an example of what must have been a typical pattern of credential presentation used by "ambassadors or messengers on a special mission," and it is this pattern that the prophets emulate (Habel, 322). In following the pattern, the messengers "not only spelled out the reason for their coming, but also repeated the commission ceremony from their master" (Habel, 322). Unlike von Rad, Habel believes that the prophetic call narratives "appropriate and develop the call traditions reflected in the structure of the calls of Moses and Gideon" (Habel, 316). Development runs from Moses to Ezekiel, not vice versa.

3.3. Bidirectional Canonical Influence. In his Exodus commentary B. Childs offers a kind of mediating position between the preceding two views, acknowledging that there is a complex relationship between the tradition associated with Moses and the later office of the prophet. On the one hand, Childs notes, "The tradition linked Moses' call as Yahweh's messenger with the later phenomena of classical prophetism. It recognized correctly that a new element entered with Moses which set [this later period] apart from the patriarchal period. The patriarchs received revelation in theophanies, but had no commission to transmit a message to others. Moses' call recounts the deep disruptive seizure of a man for whom neither previous faith nor personal endowment played a role in preparing him for his vocation" (Childs, 56). However, Childs continues, "It is also clear that the later prophetic office influenced the tradition of Moses' call. Particularly in the expanded form of the present text, the series of questions raised by Moses in objection to being sent echo the inner and outer struggles of the prophets of Israel" (Childs, 56). The call of Moses influences the prophets, but literary influence runs the other way as well.

3.4. Development from a Priestly Oracle of Salvation. The idea that the prophets were closely connected with the cult (see Liturgy and Cult) arises first with the work of S. Mowinkel, but it is H. Reventlow who asserts that the call narratives themselves are liturgical components of real cultic rituals in which cultic officials formally ordain the prophet to his office (Reventlow, 76-77). The call narratives of Ezekiel and Isaiah certainly show evidence of cultic influence, and Jeremiah comes from a priestly family; however, most today are convinced that Reventlow overestimated the connection between prophets and the cult (Blenkinsopp, 32).

3.5. The Prophet as the Vizier of Yahweh. K. Baltzer has suggested that a close form-critical cousin of the call narrative can be found in narratives recounting the appointment of Egyptian viziers, high-ranking officials in Egypt to whom the authority of the king was directly delegated (Baltzer 1975, 136-49). On this basis, he argues that the prophets understood themselves as Yahweh's viziers rather than as mere messengers. The prophet-as-messenger idea simply does not "explain the claims which men like Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel made with respect to the rank of their office" (Baltzer 1968, 570). Perhaps the best biblical analogy is in 2 Kings 18, where the Rabshakeh, clearly a Babylonian royal official, also serves as a messenger of Sennacherib.

3.6. Call Narratives and Prophetic Legitimation. Until relatively recently, one common view of the function of prophetic call narratives was that they served to legitimate the prophet as an authentic messenger of Yahweh before a skeptical audience. The conclusion was based in part on the autobiographical form of the narratives and also on evidence for resistance to the prophet's messages. However, several recent works that emphasize the function of call narratives as components of individual books rather than as examples of a larger genre have offered alternative views. B. Long, after assessing anthropological work done on intermediary figures in so-called primitive societies, questions whether call narratives ever function primarily to authenticate the messenger. And J. Robson, in his recent work on Ezekiel, suggests that Ezekiel's call narrative functions not to authenticate the prophet, but rather to portray him as an example of the obedience that Yahweh would have of all his people.

3.7. Ways Forward. When we consider the variety of challenges associated with a strictly form-critical approach to the genre as a whole, it seems that the contemporary tendency to focus on call narratives within the context of their particular books is a wise one (see Sweeney and Ben Zvi). Although certain call narratives exhibit a great deal of formal similarity with each other, and all call narratives exhibit some, it may be that there is still too much diversity to argue for a consistent literary form. Rather, we have narratives that are united by their subject matter, broadly considered, and, as Childs has suggested, by the fact that they are theologically shaped by a shared tradition.

See also DIVINE COUNCIL; FORM CRITICISM;

LITURGY AND CULT; PROPHECY, HISTORY OF; VISIONS, PROPHETIC.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. F. I. Andersen and D. N. Freedman, Hosea (AB 24; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1980); K. Baltzer, "Considerations Regarding the Office and Calling of the Prophet," HTR 61 (1968) 567-81; idem, Die Biographie der Propheten (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1975); J. Blenkinsopp, A History of Prophecy in Israel (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1983); J. Calvin, Commentary on the Book of the Prophet Jeremiah and Lamentations (trans. J. Owen; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans 1950); B. S. Childs, The Book of Exodus: A Critical, Theological Commentary (OTL; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1974); K. Gouders, Die prophetischen Berufungsberichte Moses, Isaias, Jeremias und Ezechiel: Auslegung, Form- und Gattungsgeschichte, zu einer Theologie der Berufung (Bonn: Rheinische Friedrich-Wilhelms-Universität, 1971); M. Greenberg, Ezekiel 1-20 (AB 22; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1983); H. Gunkel, introduction to Die grossen Propheten, by H. Schmidt (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1915) ix-lxx; idem, Die Propheten (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1917); N. C. Habel, "The Form and Significance of Call Narratives," ZAW 77 (1965) 297-323; W. L. Holladay, Jeremiah 1: A Commentary on the Book of the Prophet Jeremiah Chapters 1-25 (Hermeneia; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); K. Jepsen, "Call and Frustration: A New Understanding of Isaiah 7:21-22," VT 22 (1982) 145-57; R. Kilian, "Die Prophetischen Berufungsberichte," in Theologie im Wandel: Festschrift zum 150-jährigen Bestehen der Katholisch-Theologischen Fakultät an der Universität Tübingen, 1817-1967 (TTR 1; Munich: Wewel, 1967) 356-76; E. Kutsch, "Gideons Berufung und Altarbau Jdc 6,11-24," TLZ 81 (1956) 75-84; B. O. Long, "Prophetic Authority as Social Reality," in Canon and Authority: Essays in Old Testament Religion and Theology, ed. B. Long and G. Coates (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977) 3-20; D. N. Phinney, "The Prophetic Objection in Ezekiel 4:14 and Its Relation to Ezekiel's Call," VT 55 (2005) 75-88; H. Reventlow, Liturgie und prophetisches Ich bei Jeremia (Gütersloh: Mohn, 1963); W. Richter, Die sogenannten vorprophetischen Berufungsberichte: Eine literaturewissenschaftliche Studie zu 1 Sam 9,1-10, 16, Ex 3f. und Ri 6,11b-17 (FRLANT 101; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1970); J. Robson, Word and Spirit in Ezekiel (LHBOTS 447; New York: T & T Clark, 2006); D. Rudman, "Is the Rabshakeh Also Among the Prophets? A Rhetorical Study of 2 Kings XVIII 17-35," VT 50 (2000) 100-110; H. Schmidt, Die grossen Propheten (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1915); H.-C. Schmitt, "Das sogenannte vorprophetische Berufungsschema: Zur 'geistigen Heimat' des Berufungsformulars von Ex 3,9-12; Jdc 6,11 und 1 Sam 9,1-10,16," ZAW 104 (1992) 202-15; C. Seitz, Isaiah 1-39 (IBC; Louisville: John Knox, 1993); C. J. Sharp, "The Call of Jeremiah and Diaspora Politics," JBL 119 (2000) 421-38; M. A. Sweeney, Isaiah 1-39: With an Introduction to Prophetic Literature (FOTL 16; Grand Rapids, Eerdmans, 1996); M. A. Sweeney and E. Ben Zvi, eds., The Changing Face of Form Criticism for the Twenty-First Century (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003); G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology (trans D. Stalker; 2 vols.; Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1965); R. R. Wilson, "Prophecy in Crisis: The Call of Ezekiel," Int 38 (1984) 117-30; H. W. Wolff, Hosea (trans. G. Stansell; Hermeneia; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978); W. Zimmerli, Ezekiel 1: A Commentary on the Book of the Prophet Ezekiel Chapters 1-24 (trans. R. Clements; Hermeneia; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979). D. N. Phinney

CANON, CANONIZATION

When the word canonization is used in common parlance, people often have in mind ecclesiastical bodies that made unilateral decisions about whether books should be included or excluded from a divinely inspired collection of books. Unfortunately, the evidence for such councils is meager in the ancient world, especially with reference to the OT. Even the terms canon and canonization used in reference to authoritative collections of books were coined long after the biblical period. Athanasius, in his Thirty-Ninth Festal Letter, is the first to use the terms to signify an explicit list of divinely authoritative books (AD 350). This has not deterred scholars from searching for such evidence, but nonetheless it is clear that the canonization process is mysteriously obscured, perhaps intentionally to emphasize the sacred authority of the documents themselves.

1. Terminology
2. Internal Evidence
3. External Evidence
4. Jewish and Christian Canonical Traditions

1. Terminology.

When dealing with the canonization of the prophets, it is important to clarify terms. In the Jewish tradition the "Former Prophets" refers to the historical books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel and Kings, which are matched with the "Latter Prophets," referring to the writing prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel (the Major Prophets) and the *Twelve (the Minor Prophets). For the purposes of this article, the major focus will be on the canonization of the writing prophets.

2. Internal Evidence.

Even though the terms canon and canonization came into specific usage later to describe a divinely authoritative collection of books, the concept of such a list was present at a much earlier time. In fact, the inscribing of the Ten Commandments at Sinai is probably the first seminal canon in ancient Israel. Moses, viewed as the ultimate prophet in Israel (Ex 34:5-7; Num 12:6-8; Deut 34:10-12), was the person to whom the first canonical text—the ten words inscribed by the finger of God—was entrusted to be placed at the very center of community life as the will of God for the entire nation, both present and future (Ex 25:22; Deut 10:5). In fact, further divine revelations to the community came through Moses, and a prophetic institution was established as a successor to Moses so that the role of Sinai as the decisive revelation of the divine will was continued in Israel. One might even say that prophetic succession "institutionalized" or "contemporized" Sinai (Deut 18:15-22).

In stories about the prophets and in their sayings the focus is on their speech, which is viewed as divinely authoritative. The prophets are seen as visionaries and as messengers. Indeed, one of the hallmarks of prophecy is the introduction of their speech with the words "Thus says Yahweh." Young Samuel is one whose words do not fail to be fulfilled (1 Sam 3:19). A dead prophet's bones resurrect a corpse (2 Kings 13:20-21). A prophet's words resurrect a dead nation (Ezek 37:1-14). Prophetic words have power and authority; they are like a fire, a hammer that shatters rock (Jer 23:29), making the prophet trembling and drunk (Jer 23:9) and inspiring him with dread and fear before an awesome God (Amos 3:8). These words are not mere information; rather, they “pluck up and tear down, build and plant” (Jer 1:10) and accomplish what the divine will intends (Is 55:11). That there would be an interest in inscribing the prophets’ words and preserving them for future generations seems a logical step.

The first evidence of such activity is found in Isaiah, when the prophet is urged in a particularly dark period to ensure that his prophetic words will be preserved for a future generation as a witness of their truth (“Bind up the message and seal the instruction with my disciples” [Is 8:16]). Meanwhile, the prophet and his disciples are to wait patiently for the Lord to act. Later, the prophet is urged to write down a prophecy on a tablet so that the people might have it in future days “as a witness forever” (Is 30:8) (see Writing and Prophecy). It probably was such early texts that became the nucleus of the later book of Isaiah. Similarly, later, during Jeremiah’s time, the prophet is urged to produce a scroll that contained all his prophecies and to read them to the people at worship in the *temple. The comprehensive nature of the prophecies read out to the people at one time was intended to produce *repentance and renewed commitment to God (Jer 36:1-3). The divine word on a scroll becomes separate from its human author and takes on a life of its own as the word of God. This is demonstrated in one particular example when Ezekiel is called to be a prophet during the *exile (Ezek 2:8—3:4). In a *vision, God hands him a scroll filled with the divine word for him to ingest. Here the scroll exists before the prophet has even spoken its words or his scribe had written down the words.

Moses, as the supreme prophet, came to be associated with the Torah, the first five books of the OT, in particular the last book of Deuteronomy. From early times these books, especially Deuteronomy, were regarded as the divine revelation for all generations of Israelites. When the book of Deuteronomy fell into disuse, was lost and was later recovered, its divine authority was recognized by Josiah and his courtiers, who tore their garments after hearing its words read to them, having been convicted of their nation’s idolatrous ways (2 Kings 22). This text of the Torah became the basis of a renewed *covenant between the people and God and inspired a radical religious and social revolution. The divine authority of the Torah was powerfully demonstrated. But what is important for prophecy in particular is that nearly a generation later, the same divine authority was shown for a prophetic scroll. In a text already mentioned, Jeremiah the prophet was told to make a scroll of his prophecies and read them to the people in order to produce the same effect that the Torah scroll had on an earlier generation, but the representative of the new generation, King Josiah’s son, would have nothing to do with any reform (Jer 36). Instead of ripping up his garments, he tore apart the prophetic scroll and threw it into a fire in what may have been the first book-burning incident in recorded history. The moral difference between the two kings, father and son, could not have been greater. But the important point for canonization is that the prophetic text should have registered the same impact as the Torah text. Both texts thus had “canonical” authority prior to the exile of Judah. Almost in passing, it is mentioned in Jeremiah that the destroyed prophetic scroll was reproduced, with more prophecies added (Jer 36:32). This shows in some ways the indestructible character of the prophetic word. It emerged from the fire to do its own work in history.

The prophetic charism naturally led to the words of the prophet being transcribed not only as a witness to the truth of the prophecies to later generations but also as a word that transcended its first temporal historical context. Prophecy in the nature of the case represented divine revelation, and when transferred to a textual medium, it carried all the theological freight of divine authority now made permanent and transcending its original historical context. It thus had a prima facie case for canonicity. In fact, the final edition of the prophetic writings in the HB reflect this divine authority. In each of the major prophecies of Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel prominence is given to a divine call in which is emphasized the role of the prophet as a mediator of the divine will (Is 6; Jer 1; Ezek 1—3). All previous social relationships fall into the background before this new communicative task. The divine words placed in the prophetic mouth are especially conspicuous, and by the time of Ezekiel, as already mentioned, a prophetic scroll that the prophet must ingest is dramatically in focus.

When the prophetic scrolls were finally produced, the evidence suggests that their final editors saw them as having “canonical authority.” The titles of their works stressed the importance of prophetic authority, divine authority communicated with specific prophetic terminology (“saw,” “vision,” “word of the LORD,” “oracle”) and generally in a historical context (during the reign of certain kings). This common terminology suggests that the prophetic scrolls were viewed as part of a collection that obviously was authoritative (Is 1:1; Jer 1:1-4; Ezek. 1:1-3; Hos 1:1; Joel 1:1; Amos 1:1; Obad 1; Jon 1:1; Mic 1:1; Nah 1:1; Hab 1:1; Zeph 1:1; Hag 1:1; Zech 1:1; Mal. 1:1).

Despite the various differences among them, there is a consistent claim to divine authority using technical terms for divine revelation. Thus, although the words are dated to a particular time and to a particular person, the person is important only inasmuch as he is a vehicle for the divine word. For example, the words of Amos are important because they are the words of God. Sometimes, particular effort is made to validate the prophetic authority, as in the dating of the prophecies, occasionally even in specific terms (e.g., “two years before the earthquake” [Amos 1:1b]). The preservation, editing and transmission of these oracles demonstrate the sacred authority of these writings and their relevance for future generations.

The use of the oracles of earlier prophets in later times shows their divine authority. For example, Micah’s electrifying words to a complacent audience in Jerusalem that the temple would be destroyed and the holy city decimated are remembered a century later in Jeremiah’s time, when the earlier prophecy is cited virtually verbatim (Mic 3:12; Jer 26:18). One of the later prophets, Zechariah, prophesying in the exile, clearly refers to the divine authority of earlier prophetic words. The prophets who spoke them have been long since dead, but the words that they spoke have been alive and well, bringing about judgment (Zech 1:1-6; 7:7-14). This shows clearly that in Zechariah’s time the words of earlier prophets have been remembered and preserved. In the later section of Zechariah (Zech 9—14) there is much dependence on early prophetic texts, which shows their authority (cf., e.g., Zech 14:2-3 with Ezek 38—39; Zech 14:5 with Amos 1:2; Zech 14:8 with Ezek 47; Zech 14:10 with Is 2:1-5).

In particular, the writing of the revelations of the so-called Minor Prophets on one scroll, which later became known as The Twelve, whose terminus ad quem would have been the early postexilic period, suggests the time when these writings were integrated into a collection with the Torah. From details such as these, D. N. Freedman argues that the Prophets were canonized during this period.

Finally, there is some evidence that suggests that canonical tradents or editors may have “stamped” these documents with a canonical “imprimatur.” At the end of the Torah there is an extraordinary emphasis on Moses as the prophet par excellence, and at the end of the Prophets in certain early orderings there is an extraordinary emphasis on both Moses as the representative of the Torah and Elijah as the representative of the Prophets, suggesting that these two complexes of literature have been integrated into a whole, the Law and the Prophets, and are to be read in harmony, not in dissonance (cf. Deut 34:10-12; Mal 4:4-6). Both texts may also suggest that the age of prophetic revelation has come to an end, and that the important task is to study and observe and wait in anticipation of a future great prophetic revelation that would coincide with the appearance of Elijah, the prophet most like Moses in the OT.

3. External Evidence.

3.1. The End of Prophetic Inspiration. It is clear that after the postexilic period there was a growing awareness in some broad streams of Judaism that the age of canonical prophecy had ceased. In a number of texts that specifically deal with divine authority and sacred writings the term prophet is conspicuous. Josephus writes about a closed corpus of divinely inspired scriptures that is divided into three categories: law, prophets, and hymns and other books (Josephus, Ag. Ap. 1.37-42). This corpus consists of five books of the law, thirteen books of prophets and four of a nonprophetic genre. Based on Josephus’s use of Scripture in his works, it is probable that all the traditional prophetic books would have been included in the second division, plus other historical books that would have been regarded as being written under prophetic inspiration. Josephus is absolutely clear that the age of canonical revelation ceased with the last of the biblical prophets during the Persian period.

The belief that it was particularly prophetic inspiration that produced Scripture is also attested in the NT when the entire OT revelation can be termed “all that the prophets spoke” (Lk 24:25). Similarly, the second-century AD apocryphal work Gospel of Thomas can describe the OT simply as the collection of “the twenty-four prophets” (Gos. Thom. 52). The number “twenty-four” referred to the complete number of books in the Hebrew Bible.

Josephus and other writers probably believed that prophetic inspiration could still sporadically occur, but that canonical prophets such as Isaiah, Ezekiel, Jeremiah and the Twelve were in a different category altogether. The prophetic cessation of these types of prophets is seen in a number of statements like this one from 1 Maccabees: “So they tore down the altar and stored the stones in a convenient place on the temple hill until there should come a prophet to tell what to do with them” (1 Macc 4:45b-46 [cf. 1 Macc 9:27; 14:41]). It is perhaps possible to understand these statements in a way that does not reflect the absence of the activity of prophecy, but it is certainly not a natural reading of these texts.

Signs of this belief can be seen among the rabbis of the Mishnah, where the prophets are regarded as preceding the rabbis (m. 'Abot 1:1; cf. m. Pe'ah 2:6). A reference in the Tosefta makes explicit this understanding: “When the latter prophets died, that is, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, then the Holy Spirit came to an end in Israel. But even then they made them hear through an echo” (t. Sotah 13:3 A, B). Other examples from rabbinic sources describe the cessation of a prophetic age: “Until then, the prophets prophesied by means of the holy spirit. From then on, give ear and listen to the words of the sages” (S. 'Olam Rab. 30 [cf. 2 Bar. 85:3; b. Sotah 48b; b. Sanh. 11a]).

Another clear indication of the prevalence of a belief in the end of a prophetic epoch is the proliferation of pseudepigrapha. There is a virtual myriad of books written under pseudonyms, such as Apocalypse of Adam, Apocalypse of Abraham, Apocalypse of Elijah, 1-3 Enoch, Testament of Moses, 4 Ezra, Joseph and Aseneth, Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs. The most reasonable explanation of the use of pseudonyms is to secure “canonical authority” for the literature by dating it to a period during the exact succession of the prophets.

But this idea of a long-lost prophetic age is also shown by important devout works that were not written pseudonymously but nonetheless lacked the important qualification. A statement in the Tosefta reads, “The books of Ben Sira and all books written thenceforward do not impart uncleanness to hands” (t. Yad. 2:13b). All of these texts suggest that a canonical epoch has come to an end, and literature written after this canonical epoch was not written by canonical prophets and therefore could not be part of the canon of Scripture. The assumption is that the prophetic books have long been canonized.

Among rabbinic traditions there is mention of the need by some rabbis “to store away Ezekiel.” This was a serious concern because that meant that the book’s canonical status was in doubt as it was to be removed from daily use and caused to perish, even though it might still be respected. In the Talmud there is mention of a famous rabbi who burned three hundred barrels of late-night oil successfully reconciling the contradictions between Ezekiel’s vision of the temple and the Torah’s vision of the tabernacle (b. Sabb. 13b). However, the problems that harmonization presented showed that the book itself was already considered canonical. Another rabbinic tradition suggests that to remove Ezekiel probably meant “to remove it from liturgical use.” The story was told of a child who was reading the first chapter probably flippantly, and the fire from the heavenly vision leapt from the page and consumed him (b. Hag. 13a). Evidently, the desire for removal stemmed from a desire to avoid the danger of profanization or blasphemy. But the book’s canonization was never in doubt.

Other traditions seem to confirm this. In the Mishnah (m. Meg. 4:10; m. Hag. 2:1) there is a note that the chariot vision should not be read by someone who is not a sage. Jerome makes reference to the following Jewish tradition: “The beginning and ending of Ezekiel, the third of the four, are involved in so great obscurity that like the commencement of Genesis they are not studied by the Hebrews until they are thirty years old” (Epist. 53).

3.2. The Identity of the Prophets. The book of Sirach shows clearly that by 180 BC at the latest all of the prophets were considered in the biblical canon. First, Ben Sira reflects on the biblical heritage of Jews and their biblical role models in the section commonly referred to as “In Praise of the Fathers” (Sir 44–49). He begins by providing an impressive list of heroes who are virtually household names to his audience, beginning with Adam and ending with Nehemiah. The prophets are mentioned in particular: "But they called upon the Lord, who is merciful, and stretched out their hands toward him; and immediately the Holy One heard them out of heaven, and delivered them by the ministry of Isaiah"; "They burnt the chosen city of the sanctuary, and made the streets desolate, according to the prophecy of Jeremiah"; "It was Ezekiel who saw the glorious vision, which was showed him upon the chariot of the cherubim"; "And of the twelve prophets let the memorial be blessed, and let their bones flourish again out of their place, for they comforted the people of Jacob, and delivered them by assured hope" (Sir 48:20; 49:6, 8, 10). Here it is significant that the twelve Minor Prophets are viewed as a "booked entity," placed at the end of a prophetic collection, which is preceded by the sequence of Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel.

Second, there is a direct quotation from the ending of the book of Malachi, the last prophet of the Twelve, regarding the coming of Elijah, who would "turn the heart of the father unto the son, and to restore the tribes of Jacob" (Sir 48:10). This shows that the final words of the book of the twelve Minor Prophets were there, indicating a completed collection.

Two generations later, when Ben Sira's grandson wished to translate his grandfather's book into Greek, he indicated twice that his grandfather's book was essentially an attempt to make relevant an authoritative body of literature named "the law, the prophets and the other books." He also stressed that the translation of his father's book into Greek would inevitably result in loss of the original meaning, just as was true when the Bible—the law, the prophecies and the rest of the books—was translated into Greek. Not only can a major division of the Bible be called "the prophets" or "the prophecies," but also it is apparent that these prophets have been translated into Greek by the LXX translators, since the Greek translation of Sirach was heavily indebted to the LXX.

Around the same time as Ben Sira (180 BC), the book of Tobit mentions several prophets in particular (Amos [Tob 2:6], Nahum [Tob 14:4, Codex Sinaiticus], Jonah [Tob 14:4, Codices Vaticanus and Alexandrinus]) but also speaks of the prophets as a collective entity. The dying

Tobit's last words contain advice for Tobiah to flee Nineveh, where the coming judgment announced by a prophet will soon occur. But beyond the judgment there is hope, as God will restore his people once again, and the temple will be rebuilt "just as the prophets of Israel spoke" (Tob 14:5). The prophets probably are viewed together as a collective entity.

Throughout literature written during the late pre-Christian period, the prophets are so significant that they constitute part of the title for the Hebrew Bible. Thus, the biblical corpus is most frequently called "the law and the prophets." This title or a variant is found not only in the prologue to Sirach but also in the following works. In 2 Maccabees, before a major battle Judas comforts his soldiers from "the law and prophets" (2 Macc 15:9). In 4 Maccabees the writer encourages his audience with the example of the father of the famous martyrs who taught his children from "the law and the prophets" (4 Macc 18:10). At Qumran, not only were all the prophetic books used, particularly Isaiah, but also commentaries were written on some of them, and the entire scriptural corpus was named variously "books of the law . . . and the words of the prophets" (CD-A VII, 15-17) or "Moses and the prophets" (1QS I, 1-3) or the "book of Moses [and] the book[s of the pr]ophets and Davi[d]' (4Q397 14-21, 10) (see Dead Sea Scrolls). Similar titular formulae were used in the NT, with fourteen references to "the law and the prophets" (e.g., Mt 5:17; 7:12; 22:40; Lk 16:16; Jn 1:45; Acts 13:15; 24:14; Rom 3:21). Although Philo makes little reference to the prophetic writings, he does refer to an ascetic group that regularly studied a corpus of literature called "laws, oracles delivered by prophets, psalms and anything else that fostered piety" (Contemp. 25).

This common nomenclature for the Hebrew canon shows how significant the term prophets was. Clearly, there were nonprophetic books included in this category as some texts indicate, but they could be grouped together with the prophetic writings under their name.

4. Jewish and Christian Canonical Traditions.

The prophets are confined to the second division of the Hebrew Bible, with the earliest attested order based on chronology: Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, the Twelve (Sirach). This chronological order is preserved in Jerome and is dominant in the Hebrew manuscript tradition of the Middle Ages, beginning with the Cairo Codex (AD 896) and the Aleppo Codex (AD 925).

However, a literary order is found in an early text (AD 125-150): Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Isaiah, the Twelve (b. B. Bat. 14b). This may be based on the decreasing size of the books, but the rabbis gave theological reasons for this order. The four literary prophets are paired with four former prophets: Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings. And since Kings ends on a note of judgment and Jeremiah begins on such a note, it was thought fitting to keep them together, with the remaining books producing a momentum of hope: "Let us see again. Isaiah was prior to Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Then why should not Isaiah be placed first? — Because the Book of Kings ends with a record of destruction and Jeremiah speaks throughout of destruction and Ezekiel commences with destruction and ends with consolation and Isaiah is full of consolation; therefore we put destruction next to destruction and consolation next to consolation" (b. B. Bat. 14b). In the later Hebrew tradition, this sequence is reflected in a series of manuscripts dated to the twelfth century AD and later, but it is not nearly as common. There is also evidence of a third sequence, reflected in a few manuscripts beginning in the twelfth century AD: Jeremiah, Isaiah, Ezekiel, the Twelve.

One important feature of the above Jewish tradition, however, is the exclusion of *Daniel from the prophetic books. It is placed uniformly in the third division of the canon, the Writings. The traditional explanation for its exclusion from the prophetic division is that it was not written until much later (165 BC), and since the prophetic division was already closed, it had to be relegated to the third division of the canon, which was not closed until the end of the first century AD. For two reasons, this view is no longer tenable. First, it cannot be determined that the third division was closed until a later time. Second, there was a tradition that Daniel was a wisdom book, and that he was an interpreter of dreams, to be distinguished from a "prophet" or "seer," titles for prophets that never were used to describe him.

However, there is another ancient Jewish tradition reflected in Josephus in which Daniel was regarded as part of the Prophets. This tradition is preserved in Christian lists beginning with Melito (AD 170), where the sequence near the end of his list is Isaiah, Jeremiah, the Twelve, Daniel, Ezekiel (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 4.26.13-14). A similar order is attested by Origen (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.25). But by far the more common order among the early Christian Greek lists is as follows: the Twelve, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel. Another feature of these lists is the tendency of these literary prophets to migrate toward the end of the OT. This escalates their eschatological function in anticipating and preparing the way for the coming of the Messiah as announced in the NT, but it is impossible to say whether this is a distinct Christian contribution or another pre-Christian Jewish order that early Christians adopted and adapted. At any rate, by a later period the prophets are uniformly placed at the end of the OT, and the sequence of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Lamentations, Ezekiel, Daniel and the twelve Minor Prophets has become fixed in the Christian OT. The influence of the LXX, in which Jeremiah is regarded as the author of Lamentations, has attracted the latter to Jeremiah.

See also CANONICAL CRITICISM; FORMATION OF THE PROPHETIC BOOKS; TWELVE, BOOK OF THE; WRITING AND PROPHECY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. E. Aune, Prophecy in Early Christianity and the Ancient Mediterranean World (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1983) 103-4; J. Barton, Oracles of God: Perceptions of Ancient Prophecy in Israel after the Exile (New York: Oxford University Press, 2007); R. Beckwith, The Old Testament of the New Testament Church (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1985); J. Blenkinsopp, Prophecy and Canon: A Contribution to the Study of Jewish Origins (Notre Dame, IN: Notre Dame University Press, 1977); P. Brandt, Endgestalten des Kanons: Das Arrangement der Schriften Israels in der jüdischen und christlichen Bibel (BBB 131; Berlin: Philo, 2001); S. Chapman, The Law and Prophets: A Study in Old Testament Canon Formation (FAT 27; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2007); J. H. Charlesworth, The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha, 1: Apocalyptic Literature and Testaments (New York: Doubleday, 1983); B. S. Childs, Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); S. G. Dempster, "From Many Texts to One: The Formation of the Hebrew Bible," in The World of the Aramaeans, 1: Biblical Studies in Honour of Paul-Eugène Dion, ed. P. M. Michèle Daviau, J. W. Wevers and M. Weigl

(JSOTSup 324; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 2000) 19-56; idem, "The Prophets, the Canon and the Canonical Approach: No Empty Word," in Canon and Biblical Interpretation, ed. C. G. Bartholomew et al. (SHS 7; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2007) 293-329; D. N. Freedman, "The Law and the Prophets," in Congress Volume: Bonn, 1962 (VTSup 9; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1963) 250-65; M. G. Kline, "The Correlation of the Concepts of Canon and Covenant," in New Perspectives on the Old Testament, ed. J. B. Payne (Waco, TX: Word, 1970) 265-79; S. Z. Leiman, The Canonization of Hebrew Scripture: The Talmudic and Midrashic Evidence (2nd ed.; New Haven: Connecticut Academy of Arts and Sciences, 1991); L. M. McDonald, The Formation of the Christian Biblical Canon (rev. ed.; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1995); idem, The Biblical Canon: Its Origin, Transmission, and Authority (3rd ed.; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2007); L. M. McDonald and J. A. Sanders, eds., The Canon Debate (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2002); S. A. Meier, Themes and Transformations in Old Testament Prophecy (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2009); J. Sailhamer, Introduction to Old Testament Theology: A Canonical Approach (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1995); O. H. Steck, "Der Kanon des hebräischen Altens Testaments: Historische Materialien für eine ökumenische Perspektive," in Vernunft des Glaubens: Wissenschaftliche Theologie und kirchliche Lehre; Festschrift zum 60. Geburtstag von Wolfhart Pannenberg, ed. J. Rohls and G. Wenz (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1988) 231-52; A. C. Sundberg Jr., "The Old Testament of the Early Church' Revisited," in Festschrift in Honor of Charles Speel, ed. T. J. Sienkewicz and J. E. Betts (Monmouth, IL: Monmouth College, 1996) 88-110; G. Tucker, "Prophetic Superscriptions and the Growth of the Canon," in Canon and Authority: Essays in Old Testament Religion and Theology, ed. G. W. Coats and B. O. Long (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977) 56-70. S. G. Dempster

CANONICAL CRITICISM

The term canonical criticism denotes a family of modern biblical interpretive methods and approaches that advocate attention to the final shape and/or shaping of the canon as a remedy to the crisis in biblical theology occasioned by the distancing between historical analysis and theological reflection. To understand why its proponents defend it as the most comprehensive in the academy (Seitz) requires an understanding of the work of Brevard S. Childs, whose diagnosis of this crisis (Childs 1970) led to his formulation of a canonical approach (Childs 1979), and of James A. Sanders, who coined the term canonical criticism (Sanders 1972; 1987).

1. The Work of James A. Sanders and Brevard S. Childs
2. The Prophetic Canon
3. The Law and the Prophets
4. The Prophetic Corpus in the Masoretic Text, the Septuagint and the Christian Canon
5. The Canon, Liturgy and Mystagogy
6. Conclusion

1. The Work of James A. Sanders and Brevard S. Childs.

1.1. James A. Sanders. Sanders, a pioneer of research on ancient canons, advocates canonical criticism as a corrective to post-Enlightenment scholarship's decanonizing of Scripture. This scholarship, he argued, liberated the Bible from the pulpit but chained it to the scholar's desk. Nonetheless, as biblical scholars eventually showed the biblical texts to have originated in faith-filled study and worship, clarification of these origins required refocusing biblical interpretation around two foci: canonical process and canonical *hermeneutics.

Canonical process denotes how the canon in all its multiplicity was shaped. Since the meaning given to the whole transcends combinations of its precursors, the forces that shaped the whole must be ferreted out by canonical hermeneutics: biblical thinkers depolytheized what they learned from others, monotheized it, Yahw(eh)ized and then Israelitized it. Monotheizing nurtures the ability to affirm God as the God of death as well as of life (1 Sam 2:6), to suffer defeat, and to see God's bias for the weak, as illustrated by prophetic narratives (e.g., 1 Kings 17—19). The canon shifts the reader's focus from human-centered moralism to God-centered theology. To moralize is to focus on the self. To theologize is to focus on what God does with the sinful likes of the reader mirrored in the text. If one has to moralize, one ought to imitate God not as redeemer of one's privileged group, but rather as creator of all, and this is the mark of true as opposed to false prophets (Sanders 1977; 1987, 101, 188).

1.2. Brevard S. Childs. Childs typically begins commenting on a text by reviewing what historical-critical methodologies reveal about its historical and literary layers, and then he shows how these methodologies fail to account for the text's final shape. Since the axiom of historical-critical scholarship of prophetic literature impels its proponents to reconstruct and prioritize the original words and/or figures of the prophets, they invariably devalue whatever is secondary as homily or theology. Repudiating this axiom as uncritical, Childs advocates the final text as what its tradents intended to transmit as Scripture for future readers. Childs elucidated the many ways in which they did this for the prophetic corpus (Childs 1979). These he summarized (Childs 1978) as follows.

The original prophetic message was integrated into a larger framework that either transcends the historical doom-laden perspective of the prophet and offers hope beyond destruction, as illustrated by Amos 9:8b-15, or interprets the original message metaphorically to refer it to a different audience, as illustrated by the reconfiguration of Hosea's sign acts condemning northern Israel's adulterous *worship of Baal to condemn southern Judea's idolatrous practices as religious adultery. Rather than weakening the original messages of judgment, the prophetic oracles may either be placed within interpretative rules of faith that serve to remind the people that they stand under Moses' law, as illustrated by Malachi and its appendices, or arranged around dominant motifs illustrating the pattern or typology of God's coming rule, as exemplified by Isaiah's and Micah's oracles of judgment and salvation. Collections of original oracles may also be either cloaked in the language of a larger body of canonical literature to present their authors as divinely sent Mosaic followers, as done for Jeremiah by Deuteronomy, or detached from their original historical context, subordinated to a new one, and dehistoricized in the process to make the book as a whole address all later generations, as is the case with Deutero- and Proto-Isaiah. Alternatively, the historical oracles could be preserved but given eschatological focus by reordering and framing, as done by introducing and concluding Nahum and Habakkuk, respectively, with a hymn. Ezekiel illustrates that such refocusing is unnecessary where the eschatological framework is original.

Nonetheless, symbolic oracles may be given radically new eschatological interpretations by shifting the referent within the original oracles to a still future event, as illustrated by Zechariah's *visions and language in which references to the return from the *exile as a second exodus are reeschatologized and projected into a still future escape and redemption.

Throughout his analysis, Childs reiterates that the exegete must struggle to discern the authoritative final shape of the canon and appreciate that it derives from Israel's participation in the transmission of the divinely inspired prophetic word—that is, in tradition. To ignore this and concentrate on hypothetical reconstructions of original words, figures and events is to obscure how prophecy works and why the prophetic corpus was received by the NT.

1.3. Sanders and Childs Compared. Both Sanders and Childs focus on the canon as a corrective to post-Enlightenment decanonization of Scripture. This commonality exposes them to the anxiety that they subordinate scholarship to confessional norms. In facing this criticism, Sanders concludes that since most biblical scholars are religious, they would be more scientific by admitting instead of hiding the role of religious norms in their work. This response shields Sanders from the charge of relativism. The same obtains for his fourfold canonical hermeneutics, which, despite its left leanings, aims to establish norms for biblical interpretation. His commitments to the canonical process allow him to value all past and present canons and traditions of interpretation but, by the same token, preclude him from granting definitive authoritative status to a single final text. He judges such granting to be one of Childs's key faults (Sanders 1987, 167-69).

The fundamental difference between the two scholars is that while Sanders sees his "canonical criticism" to be in continuity with historical-critical methodology, Childs stresses the discontinuity between the latter and his "canonical approach." The gap between the two revolves around Childs's notion that the tradents of prophetic texts obscured their traces and switched the text's historical referents. This gap in turn makes many historical-critics and religious conservatives worry that he bypasses questions about Scripture's historical validation (Barr). Scholars who may yet agree with the notion that the tradents obscured their traces and switched the text's historical referents might nonetheless charge Childs with failure to explain these phenomena by reference to politics or ideology. The obscuration could, for example, be referred to the wish of the priestly and scribal representatives of the law to subordinate and domesticate the law (Blenkinsopp) or, conversely, to an attempt by the representatives of the prophets to keep the law alive and free of distortion (Brueggemann). The difference between these positions and that of Childs lies in their focal points: the former focus on history, ideology and transformation of tradition; Childs focuses on the final text (see Seitz).

2. The Prophetic Canon.

Childs noted textual linkages between prophetic books, as between Nahum and Habakkuk, and Isaiah and Micah, but his reflection on the manuscript variations of the order in these books led him to focus on the individual books and dismiss their order's significance (Childs 1979, 309-10, 434, 454). The significance of the canonical shape(s) of the prophetic corpus, especially that of the *Twelve, has, nonetheless, become a topic of interest.

A variety of literary devices has been discerned to integrate the Prophets so as to adapt their words to later audiences (see Watts and House; Nogalski and Sweeney). Textual allusions link Malachi 3:22 (the end of the Latter Prophets in the Jewish MT tradition) to Joshua 1:2, 7 (the beginning of the Former Prophets in the Jewish tradition), Zechariah 14 to Isaiah 2 and Isaiah 66 (the beginning and the end of the first book of the Latter Prophets), and Zechariah 13:9 to Hosea 2:25 and Malachi 3:3 (the beginning and the end of the Twelve in both the LXX and the MT (Nogalski 1996). Turning to the MT version of the Twelve, one may note that Hosea introduces the theme of God's patience by *intertextual links in the names of his children ("Not My People," "No Compassion") to the foundational account of Moses and God at Sinai after the incident of the golden calf and their dialogue about whose people the murmuring Israelites are and on the nature of divine compassion (Ex 33—40) (Seitz, 234). Hosea then ends with a call to repentance with which the next book, Joel, begins. Joel ends with a pronouncement of judgment against the nations, which theme is then taken up by Amos. Since Joel precedes Amos in the HB, the citation of Joel 4:16 (ET 3:16), "The LORD roars from Zion," at Amos 1:2 broadens Amos's oracle into one of universal divine judgment. The citation of the first two imperatives of Hosea 4:15 in Amos 4:4, but focusing Hosea's words on the sins of Judah, serves to prevent Judean readers from understanding Hosea's message to have been addressed only to Israel (Jeremias). The reversal in Joel 4:10 (ET 3:10) of the well-known pacific prophecy of Isaiah 2:4 // Micah 4:3 ("they shall beat their swords into plowshares") precludes mechanical readings. This, then, is the burden of the permutation of the divine formula at Exodus 34:6-7 regarding the dialectic between divine wrath and mercy, which links the "who knows whether . . . ?" of Joel 2:12-14 and Jonah 3:9, and the doxology of Micah 7:18-20, which concludes the first half of the Twelve in the MT. Given that the formula belongs to the context of Moses' intercession at Exodus 34, the recurrent and central use of this formula suggests an overarching theology of divine judgment on both the north and the south that sought (1) to affirm that God, while not being held hostage to evil, was free to forgive any who repent, and (2) to call the wise to know God's ways in preparing for the coming great *Day of the Lord (Seitz, 209). Since Joel's images of fertility, plague, drought and locust attack continue to be reinterpreted in the Twelve, interest has peaked in ascertaining how Joel, with its distinct position in the LXX and the MT, may help to identify the transcended "historical" paradigm that shaped and defined the overall outlook of each version of the Twelve (Nogalski 2000; Sweeney 2005, 189-209). The Twelve conclude with Malachi. Malachi's opposition to divorce and insistence on the covenant echo Hosea's use of the divorce metaphor to represent Israel's disrupted relationship with Yahweh. Parallel motifs in Isaiah 1 and Isaiah 65—66 serve to frame the contents of Isaiah as well (Seitz, 213).

3. The Law and the Prophets.

The Prophets are also linked to the Torah at their seams. The Torah concludes by establishing Joshua as Moses' successor as a prophet (Deut 34:9). The Former Prophets commence by establishing the Torah as the measure of prophetic genuineness (Josh 1:8-9). The Latter Prophets conclude by enjoining the audience to remember the Torah of God's "servant" Moses, warning them of the coming of the terrible Day of the Lord, but also reassuring them of the prior coming of Elijah, with his healing ministry (Mal 3:22-24 [ET 4:4-6]). Attention to these links fosters sensitivity to linkages at lower levels. Thus, the Torah is given eschatological drive by pivotal divine prophecies: God's promise to Abraham to bless all the nations through him, and God's promise to Israel to send another prophet like Moses (Deut 18:15-18). In light of the Torah's concluding description of Moses as the "LORD's servant" who remains unrivaled in divine intimacy and saving efficacy among the prophets to date (Deut 34:10-12), neither Elijah, despite his communion with God at Horeb and ascent to heaven at death, nor Jeremiah, despite his receiving the prophetic word from the hand of God and prophesying a new covenant written on the heart, fulfills this expectation. If the *servant herald of a new *exodus announced in Isaiah 40—66 is the servant-prophet of Deuteronomy 18, evidently he is yet to come (Dempster).

Such readings suggest that the Torah and the Prophets are a joint dialogical construct of promise and fulfillment, protology and eschatology. S. B. Chapman has developed this thesis to the extent of repudiating the linear theory of canon formation that stipulates that the Law, the Prophets and the Writings developed in successive stages, tracing this theory to a rabbinic subordination of the Prophets to the Torah. Noting the way in which the Law and the Prophets are joined by presenting Moses as both covenant mediator and model prophet, and the parallelism of terms such as "law" and "word," or expressions such as "my servants the prophets," Chapman sees in such textual phenomena a coordination of two mutually interactive authorities that he identifies as the source of a (bipartite) canon and traces to the Deuteronomists. Although this approach leads him to emphasize the fluidity of the canon in its process of development from a bipartite to a tripartite form, he consciously sees himself to be working in continuity with Childs by explaining that the canon was transmitted from the start as a recognizable statement of ideals (presenting guidelines for self-indictment and search for the good of the other) rather than as a propagandistic ideology.

4. The Prophetic Corpus in the Masoretic Text, the Septuagint and the Christian Canon.

The notion that the Torah and the Prophets represent two focal points of a dialogical construct raises important questions about how the prophetic corpus was/is appropriated in the Christian and Jewish canons. The Christian canon generally orders the OT books chronologically and concludes the OT with the Prophets. This may be seen in OT lists of all the Eastern and Western church fathers from the fourth century AD onward (barring Jerome, Rufinus and Codex Vaticanus of the LXX) (see McDonald, 438-44). This allows the OT to pave way for the NT. This effect is strengthened in current Catholic and Protestant Bibles, which adapt the Masoretic order of the Prophets to conclude the OT with Malachi (McDonald, 443-44), enabling one to identify Malachi's Elijah and new servant/Moses with Matthew's John the Baptist and Christ, respectively. On the other hand, the rabbinic tradition espoused in the MT and also adopted by Jerome, Rufinus and Codices Sinaiticus and Alexandrinus (McDonald, 441-42) place the Prophets (Nebiim) between the Torah and the Writings (Ketubim), creating a structure known by acronym as the Tanak.

The conceptions behind these two different ways of ordering the Prophets in the Scriptures are evidently in need of explanation. For M. A. Sweeney, the middle position of the Prophets in the Tanak serves to explain the disruption between the Mosaic vision of Israel completing God's purposes for creation by keeping the covenant, as narrated in the Torah, and the reconstitution of that ideal by the rebuilding of the *temple and observance of the Torah in the land and world at large, as set out in the Writings. In M. A. Sweeney's reading, this lends the Tanak an antieschatological thrust vis-à-vis the eschatological thrust given to the canon in Christian bibles, which conclude the OT with the Prophets (Sweeney 1997).

Although the assumption that the Writings and therefore the Tanak serve antieschatological (i.e., priestly and theocratic) ideological interests is contentious (see Chapman, 210-40, esp. 210n6), it is instructive for reflections on the origins and shapes of the canons of the MT and of the Christian OT (chiefly in its LXX forms) and the place therein of the Prophets.

Sweeney takes the prophetic corpora of both the MT and the LXX to be ultimately concerned with the disruption and restoration of God's covenantal relation with his people. The Prophets in the MT conclude with the Twelve, in the arrangement of whose first six books Sweeney discerns the clue to the differences between the MT and LXX. In the MT these books are Hosea, Amos, Micah, Joel, Obadiah, Jonah. In the LXX they are Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah. The LXX of the Twelve, as of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, betrays a tendency to focus first on Israel and then on Judah, as if to make the former a model for the latter, and only then on the nations and on their punishment and restoration in Jerusalem. The MT, by contrast, interweaves focus on Israel and the nations and emphasizes the role of Jerusalem for both.

Sweeney infers that these structural differences relate the LXX not to Ptolemaic and Alexandrian but rather to late monarchic concerns, and the MT to later Persian ones. His reading concurs with others that judge the LXX to hold value not just as a translation of and a reordering of the final Hebrew text* (pace Seitz, 204n24), but as a witness of an alternate and possibly equally important parent Hebrew text (Tov, 54), implying that the development of the Hebrew text was not linear but branched, and so allowing reference to alternate "final" texts of Scripture (as Sanders and Chapman would advocate against Childs). The significance of the point here lies in Sweeney's inference that the LXX's concern with Israel and the nations fits in well with the Christian understanding of prophecy (Sweeney 2005, 188). This implies that the eschatological thrust of the LXX order of the Twelve is not simply a Christian reconfiguration of early or late Jewish conceptions but rather an adaptation of early Jewish/Israelite ones.

If the fit between the LXX shape of the Twelve and Christian conceptions of prophecy was extrapolated over wider stretches of the prophetic corpus, one could opine that the placement of the Prophets in the Christian LXX derives from Jewish traditions rather than from Christian reconfigurations thereof. In lieu of ancient manuscript testimony to corroborate this proposal, Chapman's thesis continues to offer a viable solution to the issue inasmuch as the discrepancy between the placement of the Prophets in the LXX and the Tanak may be resolved by positing that the tripartite canon is a late development of an original bipartite construction (Trebolle Barrera).

5. The Canon, Liturgy and Mystagogy.

Recalling that the canonical approach serves to correct post-Enlightenment attempts at decanonization of the Scriptures, we may find that an alternative way of relating the Prophets to the Torah and the Writings and vice versa, versus the proeschatological or antieschatological prism offered by Sweeney, is situated in attempts to understand how the liturgy, as represented by Psalms (and the Writings), and supposedly representing priestly, theocratic concerns, serves to mediate and foster bridges between the Law and the Prophets, protology and eschatology. The prophets can speak typologically and eschatologically of a new exodus only because they presuppose the historical importance of the original exodus. As the canon uses historical events and material realities as signs of future events and divine realities, the eschatological senses are grounded on the literal and historical. But if the canon aims to bring the believer into covenant relationship with God, its aim is one with the liturgical readings of the Scriptures that aim to bring the believer into living contact with the saving divine works narrated in those Scriptures. One could then identify this mystagogic principle, grounded on the historical and literal sense, as reflecting the basic contours of Scripture's prophetic canonical shape (Hahn, 228-29).

6. Conclusion.

Despite Childs's neglect of the prophetic corpus as a whole and of its multiple versions, recent work on the Prophets, especially the Twelve, vindicates his central notion that the tradents masked their footprints and switched historical referents to turn the words of the prophets into time and space-transcending Scripture. Via Sweeney and Chapman, one could split the argument between Childs and Sanders about the unity or multiplicity of the canon and/or the importance of the synchronic as opposed to the diachronic approach by arguing with Sanders that Childs was wrong to ignore the versions, but, by arguing with

Chapman, that because the canon originates in a unified dialogical construct, of Torah and the Prophets, there is an organic connection between its original and final canonical forms whereby not every multiplicity has the same authenticity and value. As for Childs's and Sanders's argument about whether or not the historical-critical method can adequately grasp the final shape of the canon, the shift toward canon consciousness in recent work on the Prophets, because much of it is rooted in *literary-structural approaches, might initially seem to vindicate Sanders's position. Whether it does so fully, however, depends on whether or not Sanders's position, in aspiring to grasp Scripture as Scripture, as God's word, and preserve continuity with historical-critical methodology, can really escape the critique of the essential shortcomings of historical-critical methodologies in dealing with the final form of Scripture. As C. Seitz has shown, G. von Rad, a champion of historical-critical methodology who admitted that real theological interpretation of history comes into sharpest profile in the combination of sources (as when J's fall is read in the light of P's "very good"), ultimately failed to perceive in the final form of the canon anything more than a preservation of traditions whose sense could not have been the originally intended meaning (Seitz, 173). Seitz can find no other practitioner of historical-critical methodology whose work overcomes this failure (see the analogies that he draws between von Rad, Blenkinsopp and Barton [Seitz, 142-46, 172]). To grasp the prophetic canon as it is transmitted, and to read it seriously, seems to necessitate a different conception of prophecy and hermeneutics, as well as of history and time, than are available to approaches whose secular assumptions necessitate the decanonization of the Scriptures and/or whose theological assumptions, also borne by von Rad, impede engagement with the "final form" of the OT because this may contradict the voice of the NT (Seitz, 174-78).

See also CANON, CANONIZATION; EDITORIAL/ REDACTION CRITICISM; FORMATION OF THE PROPHETIC BOOKS; HERMENEUTICS; INTERTEXTUALITY AND INNERBIBLICAL INTERPRETATION; LITERARY APPROACHES; TEXT AND TEXTUAL CRITICISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Barr, "Childs' Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture," JSOT

16 (1980) 12-23; C. G. Bartholomew et al., eds., Canon and Biblical Interpretation (SHS 7; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2006); J. Blenkinsopp, Prophecy and Canon: A Contribution to the Study of Jewish Origins (Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1977); W. Brueggemann, Hopeful Imagination: Prophetic Voices in Exile (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); S. B. Chapman, The Law and the Prophets: A Study in Old Testament Canon Formation (FAT 27; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2000); B. S. Childs, Biblical Theology in Crisis (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1970); idem, "The Canonical Shape of the Prophetic Literature," Int 32 (1978) 46-55; idem, Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); S. G. Dempster, "The Prophets, the Canon and a Canonical Approach: No Empty Word," in Canon and Biblical Interpretation, ed. C. G. Bartholomew et al. (SHS 7; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2006) 293-332; S. W. Hahn, "Canon, Cult and Covenant: The Promise of Liturgical Hermeneutics," in Canon and Biblical Interpretation, ed. C. G. Bartholomew et al. (SHS 7; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2006) 207-35; J. Jeremias, "The Interrelationship between Amos and Hosea," in Forming Prophetic Literature: Essays on Isaiah and the Twelve in Honor of John D. W. Watts, ed. J. W. Watts and P. R. House (JSOTSup 235; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996) 171-86; L. M. McDonald, The Biblical Canon: Its Origin, Transmission, and Authority (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2007); L. M. McDonald and J. A. Sanders, eds., The Canon Debate (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2002); J. D. Nogalski, "Intertextuality in the Twelve," in Forming Prophetic Literature: Essays on Isaiah and the Twelve in Honor of John D. W. Watts, ed. J. W. Watts and P. R. House (JSOTSup 235; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1996) 102-24; idem, "Joel as 'Literary Anchor' for the Book of the Twelve," in Reading and Hearing the Book of the Twelve, ed. J. D. Nogalski and M. A. Sweeney (SBLSymS 15; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2000) 91-109; J. D. Nogalski and M. A. Sweeney, eds., Reading and Hearing the Book of the Twelve (SBLSymS 15; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2000); R. Rendtorff, The Canonical Hebrew Bible: A Theology of the Old Testament, trans. D. E. Orton (TBS 7; Leiden: Deo, 2005); J. A. Sanders, Torah and Canon (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1972); idem, "Hermeneutics of True and False Prophecy," in Canon and Authority: Essays in Old Testament Religion and Theology, ed. G. W. Coats and B. O. Long (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977) 21-41; idem, From Sacred Story to Sacred Text: Canon as Paradigm (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987); C. Seitz, Prophecy and Hermeneutics: Toward a New Introduction to the Prophets (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2007); M. A. Sweeney, "Tanak versus Old Testament: Concerning the Foundation for a Jewish Theology of the Bible," in Problems in Biblical Theology: Essays in Honor of Rolf Knierim, ed. H. T. C. Sun et al. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997) 353-72; idem, Form and Intertextuality in Prophetic and Apocalyptic Literature (FAT 45; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2005); E. Tov, "The Septuagint as a Source for the Literary Analysis of Hebrew Scripture," in Exploring the Origins of the Bible: Canon Formation in Historical, Literary, and Theological Perspective, ed. C. A. Evans and E. Tov (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2008) 31-56; J. C. Treballe Barrera, "Origins of a Tripartite Old Testament Canon," in The Canon Debate, ed. L. M. McDonald and J. A. Sanders (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2002) 128-46; J. W. Watts and P. R. House, Forming Prophetic Literature: Essays on Isaiah and the Twelve in Honor of John D. W. Watts (JSOTSup 235; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1996).

G. Y. Glazov

CHAOS

In the Hebrew Bible the concept of chaos refers broadly to cosmic disorder—conditions contrary to God's design for all things. For the biblical writer, the world as humanity experiences it was set in order by God but is constantly threatened by forces in opposition to that order (Murray, 17, 21). Wisdom and poetic literature of the Hebrew Bible is replete with references to a divine struggle against chaos and death (Mabie, 41-54). This struggle often is depicted as combat between God and the primordial sea, or a monstrous dragon from that sea, which is subdued and restrained by divine power. The prophets draw upon these depictions and their themes both to identify Israel's enemies with the forces of chaos and to look forward to a time when the dragon, the chief symbol of chaos, will finally be vanquished and eradicated (Is 27:1).

1. Background to Chaos Imagery in the Prophets
2. Chaos Imagery in the Prophets

1. Background to Chaos Imagery in the Prophets.

1.1. Ancient Near East.

1.1.1. Mesopotamia. The concept of a primeval struggle between a god and a sea monster to produce an ordered world is well known in Mesopotamian literature. The principal example is that of Enuma Elish, a Babylonian myth wherein the chief deity of the pantheon, Marduk, defeats the sea dragon Tiamat. Having defeated Tiamat, Marduk splits her corpse in two to produce the ordered heaven and earth known to humans. A landmark study in 1895 by H. Gunkel introduced readers to the Chaoskampf ("struggle against chaos") motifs in this literature. Gunkel forcefully proposed that the Mesopotamian material was the source for OT texts that described a battle between Yahweh and the sea and creatures such as Leviathan (Ps 74:12-17; Is 27:1) and Rahab (Ps 89:5-14; Is 51:9). Subsequent scholarship, however, has diverted much of this discussion away from Mesopotamia toward the literature of Canaan, specifically Ugarit, since the parallels from that material are much more explicit (Tsumura). Recent scholarship has also made it clear that Chaoskampf should be understood as a subset of divine conflict portrayals ("theomachy") in the ancient Near East (Walton, 49).

1.1.2. Ras Shamra (Ugarit). The literature of Ugarit provides secure conceptual links to the OT description of God's struggle against the forces of chaos. The Baal Cycle features a cosmic battle between Baal (Baal-Hadad) and the sea deity Yamm (cf. Heb yām ["sea"]). Yamm is represented as a sea monster. One name for this chaos monster is "Tunnan" (KTU 1.3 iii:39-42; Heb tannîn ["dragon"]), called the "twisted serpent" (bṭn ʿqltn; Heb nāḥās ʿāqallātōn) or "fleeing serpent" (bṭn brh; Heb nāḥās bārīah). Another is Litānu (KTU 1.5 i:1-3; Heb liwyātān ["Leviathan"]). In Ugaritic religion it is this battle that determines who will serve as the ruler of the pantheon under the supreme but distant god, El. With the help of the goddess Anat, Baal emerges victorious (KTU 1.16 iii:5-9; 1.2 iv:5-10), earning the titles ʿly(n) ("Most High"; Heb ʿelyōn) and rkb ʿrpt ("Rider/Charioteer of the Clouds"; Heb rōkeb bāʿārābōt and similar phrases). Baal also wins a house (a temple) of his own (KTU 1.3-4), and his dominion is cast as everlasting (KTU 1.2 iv:10). In addition to the overlap between Ugaritic Yamm (“Sea”) and Hebrew yām (“sea”), the two languages and their literature share other terms involving water that speak of the primordial waters, such as the deity nhr (“River,” another name of Yamm; cf. Heb nāhār [“river”]). Most scholars view the cosmic struggle between Baal and Yamm as pointing to kingship and temple building (the broader theomachy theme). While those outcomes are obvious, cosmological connections to the ordering of creation are also present (Fisher).

1.2. Old Testament.

1.2.1. Old Testament Wisdom Literature and Genesis 1. The OT often connects the forces of chaos with the sea (Heb yām). The reasoning is understandable. Terrestrial humanity would naturally view the vast, raging ocean as uncontrollable and always potentially deadly, filled with bizarre, terrifying creatures. It is therefore not surprising that a monstrous sea serpent was a common mythopoetic symbol in the ancient Near East (Mabie, 45-46; Wakeman; Kloos; Day; Watson). The clearest examples of God subduing a chaos sea monster to bring about an ordered creation are found in the OT Wisdom literature (Job 7:12; 26:12-13; 41; Ps 74:12-17; 89:5-14; 93). Other passages describe the waters at the creation of the world under control without a battle motif (Gen 1:2, 6-10; Ps 33:7-8; Prov 8:24, 27-29).

Although most scholars no longer would follow Gunkel's views of literary borrowing, many would agree that Genesis 1 is in some respects a response to Babylonian (Marduk-Tiamat) mythology. This connection would in turn suggest an exilic composition or redaction of Genesis 1 that was either contemporaneous with or a precursor to the major texts in prophetic literature that repurpose chaos imagery (see 2 below). With respect to Genesis 1:2, 6-10, tēhôm (“the deep”) is already subdued when God sets to work in ordering the heavens and earth. That is, Yahweh is already in control of the forces of chaos. Either a battle has already taken place or it is unnecessary due to the superiority of Israel's God. Nevertheless, chaos will come to an end, as the prophets forecast (Is 27:1) and the book of Revelation confirms (Rev 21:1, “the sea was no more”). Ultimately, for the OT writer, the subjugation and defeat of chaos concerns both mastery and maintenance of the created order and the celebration of the kingship of Yahweh (Levenson, 123-27; Walton, 54-63).

1.2.2. Historicization of Chaos in the Pentateuch.

The motifs of the subjugation of chaos and the celebration of the kingship of Yahweh are dramatically combined in Exodus 15, the Song of Moses after the Red (Reed) Sea crossing. The description is echoed in the prophets.

In Exodus 15 the deliverance from Egypt is portrayed as divine combat between Yahweh, the “man of war” (Ex 15:3), and his foes. Even though water covered the land and the Egyptians, Exodus 15:12 declares that Yahweh stretched out his right hand, and “the earth” (’eres) swallowed the Egyptians. The word ’eres is used in Jonah 2:6 to describe the prophet in the depths of the sea in the belly of the great fish, but it clearly points to the cosmic underworld, as the place of Jonah's lament is the land “at the roots of the mountains” where “bars” make escape impossible. At this victory, the Song of Moses celebrates Yahweh's dominion over other gods: “Who is like you, Yahweh, among the gods [’elim])?” Isaiah also casts Yahweh's mastery of the waters, creating a conduit for his children to pass to safety but violently destroying the army of Egypt, in terms of a victory over the watery chaos and its chaos monster: “Was it not you who cut Rahab in pieces, who pierced the dragon? Was it not you who dried up the sea, the waters of the great deep, who made the depths of the sea a way for the redeemed to pass over?” (Is 51:9-10). Just as the waters of chaos are subdued at creation, so Isaiah later portrays Egypt as the stifled chaos beast, Rahab (Is 30:7).

2. Chaos Imagery in the Prophets.

2.1. The Dragon and the Sea Historicized. The biblical prophets employ a range of naturalistic metaphors to denote the cosmic nature of the struggle between Yahweh, Israel and their mutual enemies (Geyer 1987; 1999). Imagery of watery chaos is part of that repertoire. The sea and the chaos monster metaphorically characterize Pharaoh and Egypt (Is 30:7; 51:9-10; Ezek 29:3; cf. Ezek 32:2). Isaiah also apparently describes *Babylon in similar terms (Is 13:5, 8) (Geyer 1987). In like manner, Isaiah forecasts that Judah will be swept away by the torrents of the flooding Euphrates, a metaphor for Assyria (Is 8:5-8).

The rationale of these literary portrayals is as much to align the enemies with cosmic disorder, the primeval state of affairs contrary to Yahweh's intentions, as it is to portray Yahweh as superior to the deities of the enemy nations. The OT writers saw the Gentile nations and their lesser gods as allotted to each other by the decision of the superior Yahweh (Deut 4:19-20; 32:8-9 [with Qumran and the LXX]) (Heiser). Opposition to and conquest of Israel, Yahweh's own nation and sacred space, was akin to chaos breaking free, if only for a moment. The gods of the nations will be permanently destroyed in the eschaton (Ps 82 [esp. vv. 6-8]) along with the chaos dragon (Is 27:1).

Egypt is specifically targeted with this language in several passages. Isaiah cleverly links the defeat of the primeval chaos monster with the events associated with the deliverance of Israel from Egypt from death at the Red/Reed Sea (Boyle): "Awake, awake, put on strength, O arm of the LORD; awake, as in days of old, the generations of long ago. Was it not you who cut Rahab in pieces, who pierced the dragon? Was it not you who dried up the sea, the waters of the great deep, who made the depths of the sea a way for the redeemed to pass over?" (Is 51:9-10).

Ezekiel also applies primeval chaos imagery to Egypt, casting Pharaoh as a great dragon (tannîn) that Yahweh will capture and feed to the birds of heaven (Ezek 29:1-5; 32:1-8).

Isaiah utilizes the motif of watery chaos to describe another of Israel's mortal enemies, Assyria (Is 17:12-14; cf. Is 8:5-8). Maltreatment of Israel reflects the attempt of chaos to break the bonds imposed by the God of Israel. Yahweh may loosen his restraint of these forces in an act of judgment, but that is the only rationale for foreign oppression of Israel for the prophets. Only Yahweh controls and wields chaos; it must do his bidding. The forces of chaos, restrained since creation, can neither act with impunity nor be manipulated by apostate Israel. Hence comes Isaiah's mockery of Israel's solicitation to Egypt for protection (Is 30:1-7). Pharaoh is a feckless aid because Egypt is "Rahab, who sits still" (Is 30:7 [emending the MT] (Day, ABD 2:228).

The prophets Jeremiah and Habakkuk utilize motifs of chaos to describe the threat of the Babylonians. In Jeremiah 51:34 Nebuchadnezzar is cast as the "dragon" (Heb tannîn) that swallows up Judah. In Jeremiah 51:44 the prophet tells his readers that Yahweh will punish Bel (a dragon deity in Babylonian religion) by removing from his mouth what he has swallowed. Chaos will again be subdued. Habakkuk conveys the same message. Just as Yahweh came from the south (Teman) into Canaan—an allusion to the journey to the promised land after the defeat of Egypt at the sea (Heb yām)—so will God act to deliver his people from the Babylonians. To conjure the image of Egypt's decimation under the plagues before their downfall at the sea, Habakkuk portrays Yahweh moving into Canaan with an entourage that includes foreign deities as his servants, described in Habakkuk 3:5 as naturalistic forces of "pestilence" (Heb deber) (del Olmo Lete) and "plague" (Heb rešep) (Xella). Yahweh shakes the mountains as he moves (Hab 3:6), promising a violent, decisive judgment of Babylon (Hab 3:8), just as his wrath "was against the rivers [nēharîm]" and his indignation "against the sea [yām]".

2.2. The Dragon and the Sea Eschatologized.

The operative hermeneutic within the biblical canon is that all things will reach final resolution in conformity to Yahweh's original intention for them at the beginning (Urzeit and Endzeit). As such, the symbolism of primeval chaos involving the dragon and the sea feature prominently in eschatological discourse.

The eschatologization of chaos imagery is most transparent in the so-called Little Apocalypse (Is 24—27): "In that day the LORD with his hard and great and strong sword will punish Leviathan the twisting serpent, Leviathan the crooked serpent, and he will slay the dragon that is in the sea" (Is 27:1). The parallels to the Baal Cycle are explicit. The message is equally clear: Leviathan's final destruction by Yahweh will coincide with the eschatological restoration of Israel (Is 27:2). Yahweh will have a people on earth as it was intended in Eden.

This eschatological message is dramatically reiterated in Daniel 7. Scholars have long recognized that Israelite adaptation of material from the Baal Cycle illuminates much of Daniel 7 (Emerton; Collins, 286-94). The chapter begins with the stormy winds stirring up the raging sea, out of which emerge four beasts (Dan 7:1-8). That the beasts are not aquatic creatures but nevertheless come from the sea shows clearly that the reader is confronted with chaos metaphors. The divine council meets (Dan 7:9-10) in the presence of God (Ancient of Days), and the beasts are sentenced to death, one of them immediately (Dan 7:11-12). At the judgment of the chaos monsters from the sea, one “like a son of man” comes upon the clouds of heaven and is exalted to everlasting dominion and kingship by the Ancient of Days (Dan 7:13-14). Both the flow of the chapter and its major constituent elements show the familiar utilization of Canaanite mythopoetic language to exalt the supreme God of Daniel, Yahweh, over the cosmos.

The eschatological language of the prophet Daniel is also significant in that the victory over chaos is linked to a second deity figure (the “son of man”) later identified with Jesus in the Gospels (Mt 26:57-68). The result is a prophetic connection of primeval victory over the forces of chaos with messianic kingship. This connection works its way into the Gospels in other ways as well, where Jesus rebukes the sea (Lk 8:22-25) and treads upon it (Mt 14:28-33; cf. Ps 89:5-10, 20-27). One may also compare Revelation 12, where Michael defeats a seven-headed dragon, identified with the devil. Another multiheaded beast rises from the sea (Rev 13:1-5) to oppose God and Christ before its final destruction (Rev 20:10). The new Eden appears where there is no more disruption from chaos—there is no more sea (Rev 21:1).

See also COSMOLOGY; DEATH.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. O. Boyle, “In the Heart of the Sea: Fathoming the Exodus,” JNES 63 (2004) 17-27; J. J. Collins, Daniel: A Commentary on the Book of Daniel (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); J. Day, God's Conflict with the Dragon and the Sea: Echoes of a Canaanite Myth in the Old Testament (UCOP 35; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985); idem, “Dragon and Sea, God's Conflict With,” ABD 2:228-32; J. A. Emerton, “The Origin of the Son of Man Imagery,” JTS 9 (1958) 225-42; L. Fisher, “Creation at Ugarit and the Old Testament,” VT 15 (1965) 313-24; J. Geyer, “Twisting Tiamat's Tail: A Mythological Interpretation of Is. XIII 5 and 8,” VT 37 (1987) 164-79; idem, “Desolation and Cosmos,” VT 49 (1999) 49-64; H. Gunkel, Creation and Chaos in the Primeval Era and the Eschaton: A Religio-Historical Study of Genesis 1 and Revelation 12, trans. K. Whitney (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2006 [1895]); M. S. Heiser, “Deuteronomy 32:8 and the Sons of God,” BSac 158 (2001) 52-74; C. Kloos, Yhwh's Combat with the Sea: A Canaanite Tradition in the Religion of Ancient Israel (Amsterdam: G. A. van Oorschot; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1986); J. Levenson, Creation and the Persistence of Evil: The Jewish Drama of Di- vine Omnipotence (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1988); F. J. Mabie, “Chaos and Death,” DOTWPW 41-54; R. Murray, The Cosmic Covenant: Biblical Themes of Justice, Peace, and Integrity of Creation (London: Heythrop, 1992); G. del Olmo Lete, “Deber,” *DDD*² 231-32; D. Tsumura, Creation and Destruction: A Reappraisal of the Chaoskampf Theory in the Old Testament (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2005); M. K. Wakeman, God's Battle with the Monster: A Study in Biblical Imagery (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1973); J. H. Walton, “Creation in Genesis 1:1-2:3 and the Ancient Near East: Order Out of Disorder after Chaoskampf,” CTJ 43 (2008) 48-63; R. S. Watson, Chaos Uncreated: A Reassessment of the Theme of “Chaos” in the Hebrew Bible (BZAW 341; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2005); P. Xella, “Resheph,” *DDD*² 700-703.

M. S. Heiser

CHILDBEARING. See WOMEN AND FEMALE IMAGERY.

COMFORT. See LAMENT, MOURNING.

COMPOSITION OF PROPHETIC BOOKS.
See FORMATION OF THE PROPHETIC BOOKS.

CONFESSION. See PRAYER; REPENTANCE.

CONVERSATION ANALYSIS

Conversation analysis (hereafter CA) is a social-scientific method to understand how naturally occurring language works in everyday conversation and in institutional settings. CA has been used in relationship to literature, including some biblical texts.

1. History
2. Basic Observations
3. Application to Literature
4. Conversation Analysis and Jonah
5. Potential Application to Prophetic Literature

1. History.

Early forms of sociology, like most of the social sciences, were primarily interested in two areas: the major institutions that shape human society—that is, government, religion, kinship relations—and that which was understood to be abnormal. However, this emphasis has certain problems. For example, how can we know what is “deviant” behavior if we do not understand what is “normal” behavior? How can we understand major institutions if we do not understand everyday interactions? These kinds of questions led UCLA sociologists E. Goffman and H. Garfinkel to seriously question how sociology was practiced and to create the branch of sociology called “ethnomethodology,” the study of the “ethnic” methods (i.e., the participants’ own commonsense skills and abilities) that enable participants to produce and recognize meaningful social interaction in everyday life. In other words, even everyday life has institutional structures that should be carefully studied. Before Goffman and Garfinkel, sociologists generally assumed that they knew what was “normal,” so that what was “normal” did not need to be studied, only that which was “abnormal” or institutional.

One of Goffman’s and Garfinkel’s doctoral students, H. Sacks, accepted their insights into the study of everyday life and applied it to everyday language. Sacks understood that social interaction was extremely dependent on language, so if all social interaction is institutionalized in some way (as Goffman and Garfinkel taught), then conversation must also be institutionalized. This line of inquiry led Sacks to assert that there must be “order at all points” in conversation, which leads to the question “Why that now?” for all aspects of talk-in-interaction, including previously unstudied items such as nonlexicals (e.g., “oh”), laughter and pauses, all of which had been dismissed by linguists as inconsequential in the assumed messiness of everyday conversation.

Upon completion of his dissertation, Sacks joined the UCLA sociology faculty. Sacks and his early doctoral students, especially E. A. Schegloff and G. Jefferson, established some of the basic observations of CA that have now significantly influenced various disciplines, especially sociology, anthropology, linguistics and communications theory.

Building upon the basic observations of CA concerning everyday conversation, later conversation analysts have studied the interrelationship between language and institutions—for example, doctor-patient interactions, courtroom speech, 911 calls and retail service encounters. These studies have demonstrated how necessary knowledge of everyday conversation is to the study of institutional talk, because institutional talk consists of adaptations of the practices of everyday conversation. Such studies of institutional talk have led to various practical insights, so that now some trained conversation analysts teach in law schools, medical schools, ESL programs and other professionally oriented disciplines.

Although the early history of CA was dominated by studies limited to English and then other Indo-European languages, the basic observations of CA have been confirmed many times with some revisions by studies in languages in many linguistic families, including but not limited to Native American languages, Aboriginal languages of Australia, various East Asian languages and Semitic languages. Therefore, the universality of the basic observations of CA for human language appears to be justified.

2. Basic Observations.

J. Heritage has expressed the four basic assumptions underlying CA as a discipline as follows:

- (1) interaction is structurally organized;
- (2) contributions to interaction are both context-shaped and context-renewing;
- (3) these two properties inhere in the details of interaction so that no order of detail in conversational interaction can be dismissed a priori as disorderly, accidental or interactionally irrelevant; and
- (4) the study of social interaction in its details is best approached through the analysis of naturally occurring data (Heritage, 22). These methodological assumptions have led to two basic observations of CA: turn-taking and sequence organization.

2.1. Turn-taking. In their 1974 article Sacks, Schegloff and Jefferson observe the following about conversation: (1) turn-taking occurs, (2) usually only one speaker talks at a time, and (3) turns often occur with little or no gaps. These three observations, when taken together, strongly suggest that there must be some systematic way of determining when a turn at talk begins and ends and who has the floor to speak. This seminal article outlines the turn-taking system that operates in conversation so that speakers can take turns at speech with little or no gap between turns and little overlapping speech. Turns at talk are constructed in ways that enable participants to project when a turn will be completed. Turns can be allocated to the next speaker by the current speaker and, if not, then by self-selection. A hierarchical set of practices further helps the participants to proceed in the conversation in an orderly fashion or, when these practices are violated, to interpret the potential conflict. This article convincingly demonstrated how complex, flexible and efficient the structures of everyday conversation are, despite our naïve assumption about how simple everyday conversation must be.

2.2. Sequence Organization. Turns at talk often occur in sequences, such as question/answer and offer/refusal. Such sequences, called “adjacency pairs,” can be characterized as follows:

Adjacency pairs are sequences of two moves (verbal or non-verbal) that are:

- (i) adjacent or containing an insertion sequence (for example, a clarifying question between question and answer)
- (ii) produced by different individuals
- (iii) ordered as a first part and a second part
- (iv) typed, so that a particular first part has a range of second parts, those which are linguistically preferred and those which are linguistically dispreferred (Person 1996, 16).

Thus, adjacency pairs occur in two types: (1) those with preferred second parts; (2) those with dispreferred second parts. Preferred seconds are generally brief utterances given without delay and are unmitigated. In contrast, dispreferred seconds generally contain the following four characteristics: (1) a delay; (2) a preface; (3) an account for why the dispreferred response is being done; (4) a declination component, which often is indirect or mitigated. Compare the following transcription of two adjacency pairs from actual conversations (Atkinson and Drew, 58).

Adjacency pair with preferred second (invitation/acceptance):

- A: Why don't you come up and see me some//time?
B: I would like to.

Adjacency pair with dispreferred second (invitation/refusal):

- A: Uh, if you'd care to come and visit a little while this morning, I'll give you a cup of coffee.

- B: (pause) Well, that's awfully sweet of you. I don't think I can make it this morning, (pause) Uhm, I'm running an ad in the paper and, and, uh, I have to stay near the phone.

The preferred response is brief and, in this case, occurs even before the turn has been completed (the beginning of B's turn is represented by the slash lines // and indentation). The dispreferred response occurs after a brief pause, which is followed by a preface (in this case, “Well” and an appreciation), a mitigated refusal (“I don't think”), and an account for why B is not accepting the invitation (“stay near the phone”). Similar structures are found in other adjacency pairs in English, such as:

First part	Preferred second	Dispreferred second
Request	Acceptance	Refusal
Offer	Acceptance	Refusal
Question	Expected answer	Unexpected or no answer
Blame	Denial	Admission

Note that what is linguistically preferred (i.e., preferred within societal norms) may not be what the individual speaker of the first part wants to hear. For example, when someone blames someone else, admission of guilt may be what the individual wants to hear. However, the linguistic/societal expectation is that denial is the preferred second. Also, although the structure of adjacency pairs is universal, the content within specific adjacency pairs may differ; for example, in some cultures refusal may be the preferred response to an invitation, at least until the invitation is repeated a certain number of times.

3. Application to Literature.

Few conversation analysts have applied CA to written texts, and even fewer to literary texts, probably because of the insistence on naturally occurring data in CA in opposition to the dominance of written texts in earlier forms of linguistics that denigrated conversation as an acceptable object of study. However, J. Atkinson expresses the justification for CA study of written texts thus: "An adequate understanding of how texts are produced and responded to may remain elusive so long as the issue is pursued without making close comparative reference to how talk works" (Atkinson, 230).

Some literary scholars have found CA useful in their analyses (see the review of literature in Person 1999b, 12-14). These scholars have demonstrated that the representation of dialogue in literature follows the same set of practices found in everyday conversation. In other words, literary discourse is a form of institutional talk adapted from the set of practices found in everyday conversation.

R. F. Person has applied CA to a variety of literary texts, including Homeric epic, Shakespeare, the Bible, and modern English-language short stories and novels. He has demonstrated that despite certain limitations of its graphic medium, literature can represent to some extent all aspects of the complexity of everyday talk in interaction, including nonlexical items (such as "uh-huh"), body movement (such as gaze and gesture), silence, and prosody (such as intonation, rate of speech). Furthermore, the literary representation of everyday conversation provides structures in the literary text that guide readers as they coproduce the meaning in the "conversation" that occurs between the readers and the text (Person 1999a). In his study of the "became silent to silence" formula in Homeric epic, Person demonstrated the relationship of this formula to the surrounding narrative context and how the "became silent to silence" formula acts as a preface for dispreferred seconds and how other formulae in its narrative context often provide other characteristics of dispreferred seconds (e.g., accounts). In his study of Wiederaufnahme (resumptive repetition) in biblical and ancient Near Eastern literature, he demonstrated that this "literary" device appears to be an adaptation of a conversational device called "restarts," which often occurs when a speaker has regained control of the turn-at-talk. In his study of "oh" in Shakespeare, he demonstrated that the English spoken four hundred years ago during the time of Shakespeare used "oh" in all of the various sequences identified in recent CA studies as well as some analogous sequences that have not yet been identified in CA literature on "oh" in everyday conversation.

4. Conversation Analysis and Jonah.

Person's most comprehensive study of applying CA to a single piece of literature is his 1996 monograph, In Conversation with Jonah. After providing an introduction of CA and a rationale for applying CA to the literary representation of dialogue, he offers a commentary on the book of Jonah, demonstrating how the narrative develops in relationship to the adjacency pairs of the conversations between the characters, whether explicitly represented by the narrator or not. He then demonstrates how this knowledge of how adjacency pairs function in the narrative sequence contributes to the construction of the different narrative elements of plot, character, atmosphere and tone. For example, concerning characterization, all of the characters in the narrative, except Jonah, produce the preferred response of acceptance to divine commands; therefore, the prophet Jonah is placed in a category of himself—that is, one who engages in conflict talk. For example, concerning the satirical tone, the narrator manipulates the readers by not giving Jonah's account for his refusal in Jonah 1:3, but by referring to it later in Jonah 4:2. This delay of Jonah's account makes his actions appear more ridiculous, thereby adding to the satirization of Jonah as petty.

After providing this discussion of the various narrative elements, Person develops a reader-response approach by adapting the work of W. Iser in light of his own observations from CA concerning how conversational structures inform the narrative. Applying this approach to the Jonah narrative, he then provides another commentary, this one explicating the role of the implied reader of the narrative.

The implied reader of Person's commentary is, of course, only as competent a reader as Person himself is. Therefore, he provides a discussion of how a multitude of various historical readers have interacted with the Jonah narrative in those places where the narrator omitted dialogue (at least in the form of direct speech), where the narrator changed the order of reported events and in the identification of the satirical tone of the narrative. These actual readers are found in commentaries, sermons, creative fiction based on Jonah, children's Bible stories, rabbinic sources, and even in Person's recounting of how the narrative asserted itself on himself, requiring him to change his understanding of the interaction of the characters in the narrative world. His explication of these various readings of Jonah demonstrates once again how the basic observations of CA can be useful, this time in the history of interpretation.

5. Potential Application to Prophetic Literature.

Recent applications of CA to literature show promise for future applications of CA to literature, including prophetic literature. Person's work on the book of Jonah certainly provides a model that could be applied, in part or as a whole, to other narrative texts—for example, the biographical narratives in the book of Jeremiah or the prophetic stories in the books of Samuel and Kings.

Since most of the material in the Latter Prophets consists of prophetic oracles, a slightly different approach would be necessary. However, even what on the surface appear to be monologues in literature involve dialogues with imagined conversants or within one's own persona. Therefore, the poetic oracles could be analyzed to discern the implied adjacency pairs between the prophet and the addressee(s) in judgment oracles (e.g., Amos 9:1-5), between the prophet and God in laments (e.g., Jer 20:14-18), between the prophet and God in call narratives (e.g., Ezek 1:4—3:27), and so forth. Such an approach could lead to a better understanding of prophetic speech in general, especially if it includes comparative analyses of prophetic literature from the wider ancient Near East (see the essays in Nissinen).

See also FORM CRITICISM; RHETORICAL CRITICISM; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. M. Atkinson, "Two Devices for Generating Audience Approval: A Comparative Study of Public Discourse and Texts," in Connectedness in Sentence: Discourse and Text, ed. K. Ehlich and H. van Riemsdijk (Tilburg Studies in Language and Literature 4; Tilburg: Tilburg University, 1983) 199-236; J. M. Atkinson and P. Drew, Order in Court: The Organisation of Verbal Interaction in Judicial Settings (London: MacMillan, 1979); J. Heritage, "Current Developments in Conversation Analysis," in Conversation: An Interdisciplinary Perspective, ed. D. Roger and P. Bull (Intercommunication 3; Philadelphia: Multilingual Matters, 1989) 21-47; I. Hutchby and R. Woffitt, Conver- sation Analysis: Principles, Practices and Applications (Cambridge: Polity, 2008); M. Nissinen, ed., Prophecy in Its Ancient Near Eastern Context: Mesopotamian, Biblical, and Arabian Perspectives (SBLSymS 13; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2000); R. F. Person Jr., "The 'Became Silent to Silence' Formula in Homer," Greek, Roman, and Byzantine Studies 36 (1995) 327-39; idem, In Conversation with Jonah: Conversation Analysis, Literary Criticism, and the Book of Jonah (JSOTSup 220; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1996); idem, "A Reassessment of Wiederaufnahme from the Perspective of Conversation Analysis," BZ (1999a) 241-48; idem, Structure and Meaning in Conversation and Literature (Latham, MD: University Press of America, 1999b); idem, "'Oh' in Shakespeare: A Conversation Analytic Approach," Journal for Historical Pragmatics 10 (2009) 84-107; H. Sacks, E. A. Schegloff and G. Jefferson, "A Simplest Systematics for the Organization of Turn-Taking for Conversation," Language 50 (1974) 696-735.

R. F. Person Jr.

COSMOLOGY

Generally defined, cosmology is the study of the origin and structure of the cosmos/universe and how it functions. With the rise of modern archaeology over the past 150 years or so, our understanding of ancient Hebrew cosmology has become better informed. This is directly connected to the unlocking of cognate literatures from the ancient Near East (e.g., Sumerian, Akkadian, Egyptian, Ugaritic). The ubiquitous ancient Near Eastern accounts of the origins of the universe and how it operates have been covered at length in an earlier volume of this dictionary series and need not be rehearsed here (see Lucas). Naturally, when one thinks of cosmology, Genesis 1—2, Job 38—42, Proverbs 8 and Psalm 104 immediately come to mind as opposed to the prophetic corpus. However, through a close analysis of the prophetic texts one can learn a lot about their cosmological worldview (e.g., Is 45:18).

Today, due to modern science and intergalactic space probing, modern readers of the OT tend to wrestle more with competing cosmogonic perspectives (i.e., arguments about the origin of the universe), such as theistic evolution, creationism and evolution, as opposed to how the cosmos functions (perhaps with the exception of certain branches of science such as quantum physics [see Lennox]). For the OT prophets and ancient Near Eastern peoples, these concepts often were blurred due to their belief that the universe originated and functioned at the hands of the god(s). Of course, for each ancient culture one finds competing polemical accounts as to how exactly the god(s) created the universe. For example, in the Babylonian creation myth, Enuma Elish, Marduk creates the heavens and the earth by slaying and dividing the goddess Tiamat (ANET 67-68, 501-2, tablets IV, V), whereas in certain Egyptian creation accounts, such as “The Repulsing of the Dragon and Creation” (ANET 6-7), creative acts take place through spitting and masturbation by the chief god, Khepri (note that Egyptian creation myths vary widely). The Hebrew creation account is no less polemical when it focuses on one God, who creates both by speaking (Gen 1) and through a more “hands-on” fashioning of specific parts of his created order (e.g., Adam is fashioned [yāšar] from the dust of the ground [Gen 2:7]).

One area where the prophets differed from their ancient Near Eastern counterparts was in their developing monotheistic perspective (e.g., Is 37:19; 44:6; Jer 5:7; 10:11; 14:22; 16:20; Dan 5:23) (for an overview on the rise of monotheism in ancient Israel, see Lang 1983; 1986). For the OT prophets, Yahweh alone was both creator and sovereign over that *creation (e.g., Is 37:16; 40:12, 22-28; 42:5; 44:24; 45:12, 18; 48:13; Jer 32:17; Amos 9:5-6; Jon 1:9). Moreover, by the very nature of their callings as *covenant enforcers, it was only natural for the prophets to see Yahweh working through his created order not only to reach out to a wayward nation but also as a means of indicting both them and their neighbors for sin and rebellion. From prophet to prophet one can trace how each used cosmology, not so much as a means of presenting a detailed cosmological picture per se, but rather as a way of showcasing the sovereign rule of Yahweh. Nevertheless, in many cases the prophets referenced what appears to be a three-tiered cosmos where heaven and Sheol served as polar extremes (e.g., Is 7:11; Amos 9:2). By doing such, the prophets promoted the belief that there was no place where humankind could escape from Yahweh’s sovereign hand, a reality also echoed by the psalmist (Ps 139:8).

1. A Canonical Methodology
2. Isaiah
3. Jeremiah
4. Ezekiel
5. Daniel
6. The Book of the Twelve (Minor Prophets)
7. The Sacred Mountain and the Divine Warrior
8. Conclusion

1. A Canonical Methodology.

Tracing the prophets’ use of cosmology from century to century, though valid and perhaps a rewarding undertaking, would prove more cumbersome than need be, especially in light of the debates surrounding the dates of a given prophet and his work (e.g., Isaiah, Obadiah, Joel). For this reason, a canonical approach to the subject will be adopted here, even though a prophet such as Hosea or Amos may in fact predate the prophet Isaiah. In this way, one can study how a particular book/tradition viewed cosmology and used it for didactic purposes.

2. Isaiah.

The book of Isaiah has the most references to cosmology within the prophetic corpus. Arguably, this could be due in part to the possible time spanned within the book (eighth through sixth centuries BC). Isaiah refers to what can be understood as either a two-tiered (heaven and earth [Is 37:16; 42:5; 45:12, 18; 51:16; 65:17; 66:1, 22]) or an implied three-tiered cosmos (i.e., the merismus: the heavens and the lower parts of the earth, and then all that is in between on the earth itself—e.g., mountains and trees [Is 44:23]). It is the three-tiered cosmos alluded to in Isaiah 44:23 that is unique insofar as it moves away from the picture presented in Genesis. Genesis 1:1 depicts a general bipartite designation for the created cosmos: God created “the heavens and the earth” (haššamayim wē’et hā’āreš [for a similar division, see Neh 9:6]). The phraseology in Genesis accounts only for two main parts to the cosmos, but there is other biblical evidence of a further subdividing of the earthly tier into upper and lower portions (i.e., the inhabited world and the underworld [e.g., Ex 20:4; Deut 5:8; Job 38:4-38; Ps 115:16-17; Prov 8:22-31; Amos 9:1-3; see also Ps. 135:6; Prov 3:19-20]). This tripartite designation also appears in ancient Ugarit

("The Baal Cycle" [ANET 132, i:40; 135, vii:45-52; 138, ii:1-20]), Egypt ("Hymn to the Nile" [ANET 372, xii:5]), and Babylon ("The Creation Epic" [ANET 67, 501-2, tablet IV lines 130-146, tablet V lines 23-60]). While many of the Prophetic Books do not address such a systematized cosmos or have any cosmological references at all for that matter (e.g., Obadiah), Isaiah tends to use a more developed picture of the cosmos than do his counterparts as a means of proving the omnipotence and transcendence of Yahweh (e.g., Is 44:23).

In Isaiah 40:22 the prophet paints a picture of God's sovereign and transcendent perspective of the earth: "It is [God] who sits above the vault/circle [hûg] of the earth, and its inhabitants are like grasshoppers; he is the one who stretches out the heavens like a veil [dôq] and spreads them out like a tent ['ôhel] to dwell in." There are at least two ways of understanding hûg hâ'āreš ("circle of the earth") in this context. First, L. Koehler and W. Baumgartner suggest that hûg hâ'āreš comes from the belief that the earth was "conceived of as a disc" (HALOT² 1:295). However, The Old Testament Hebrew-English Dictionary sheds further light on this first definition by noting that "the reference to a circle would have been understood in ancient Near Eastern cosmology as implying a flat, disk-shaped earth, bounded by its circular horizon. Alternatively, and in keeping with some ancient cosmologies, the earth was considered to be delimited above by a hemispherical dome, which contained the 'windows' or 'floodgates of heaven,' which God would open to allow the rains, or other calamities or blessing, to fall (cf. Gen. 7:11; Isa. 24:18; Mal. 3:10)" (Lint, 2:58) (so too BDB 295; Clines, 3:169).

The context of the passage stresses, in hyperbolic terminology, the sovereignty and omnipotence of God over mere idols. Yahweh is pictured as a gargantuan being who measures the waters in the hollow of his hand (Is 40:12); the nations are mere dust before him (Is 40:15). Furthermore, the author goes on to note that the entire nation of Lebanon is insufficient as a sacrifice before him (Is 40:16). Poetically, these terrestrial objects are nothing in comparison to so great a God. In keeping with this theme, the author thus conceives of God as transcendent and dwelling above or over the vault (hûg) of the heavens (cf. Job 22:14; 26:10; Prov 8:27; Amos 9:6). Indeed, not only does the verse begin by identifying the area above the vault as the place where Yahweh dwells, but also the author uses the same participial form of the verb yāšab to juxtapose God's dwelling place with those who dwell on the earth far below.

In Isaiah 40:22b the author continues the description of Yahweh's power by using the poetic word pair dôq ("veil") and 'ôhel ("tent") as a metaphor for Yahweh's creative act of "spreading out" the heavens (cf. Is 42:5; 44:24; 51:13) like a veil (dôq) or tent ('ôhel) (cf. a similar metaphor in Is 34:4). The word dôq generally means "thin transparent cloth" (CBL, 258; BDB 201; HALOT² 1:229; TWOT 1:194), which in this context can be understood to represent the sky, especially at night, when the celestial lights appear to sparkle through a thin, see-through veil. However, when it is combined poetically with 'ôhel, the author appears to be more focused on the "spreading out" (mātaḥ) action as opposed to the former understanding (cf. Is 45:12 and alternate language in Is 48:13). J. Goldingay therefore likens Yahweh's cosmological "tent" to a Bedouin who freely spreads a pavilion anywhere and then sits in the doorway "in sheikhly dignity and authority" (Goldingay, 56). Yahweh thus presides over the cosmos while the earth rests secure (cf. Ps 27:5) (Stadelmann, 50). Interestingly, in Isaiah 40:23 the prophet furthers the cosmological language when he notes that in light of Yahweh's sovereignty the judges are reduced to "nothing" (tôhû) (cf. Is 40:17; 45:18; Jer 4:23), a cosmological term reminiscent of Genesis 1:2, where the earth is said to be "formless and void" (tôhû wābôhû).

The author of Isaiah also addresses the celestial bodies, which are naturally a part of every ancient cosmology (e.g., Is 13:10). Isaiah uses the stars (kôkâbîm), moon (yārēaḥ) and sun (šemeš) as objects of blessing and cursing (cf. Is 30:26; 34:4). These cosmological chess pieces are also at the bidding of the sovereign Yahweh (Is 38:8; 40:26), mere objects to be disposed of in the eschaton (Is 60:19-20). Throughout the ancient Near East the sun and moon often were worshiped as gods (e.g., the Egyptian sun-god Ra; the Babylonian moon-gods Nanna, Suen [= Sîn] and Ashimbabbar; the Ugaritic moon-god Yarikh/Yarikhu [see, e.g., KTU 1.18 iv:9; 1.41:27]). Because of this, the author of Deuteronomy warns against the worship of these celestial bodies (Deut 4:19; 17:3). Isaiah and many of the OT prophets direct a number of their prophetic indictments against Israel for acting out what the author of Deuteronomy condemns (e.g., Is 1:13-14; 47:13; Jer 7:18; 8:2; 19:13; 32:29; 44:17-19, 25; Ezek 8:16; Dan 8:10; Amos 5:26; Zeph 1:5). King Manasseh epitomizes this detestable practice among the Israelites (see 2 Kings 21:3-5), thus drawing the ire of the biblical writers and prophets (e.g., 2 Chron 33:1-11; Jer 15:4 [note also King Hoshea's sin in 2 Kings 17:16 and Josiah's reforms in 2 Kings 23:5]). Therefore, to combat the futility of such acts, the prophets often stressed the subservient and transient nature of this cosmological level to the sovereignty of Yahweh (e.g., Is 13:10; 30:26; 34:4; 38:8 [paralleled in 2 Kings 20:10-11]; 40:26; 60:19-20; Jer 31:35; 44:25; Ezek 32:7; Joel 2:10, 31; 3:15; Amos 5:8; 8:9; Hab 3:11). It is not at all surprising that the Israelites often veered into idolatry in this area, given that most of their feasts and festivals were closely linked to seasonal cycles, especially of the moon (e.g., Num 29:6; Neh 10:33; Ezek 45:17; 46:3). Therefore, the prophets emphasized the timekeeping function of the celestial realm over and against the ancient Near Eastern perception of their deification (cf. Jer 31:35).

Closely associated with the celestial realm are meteorological phenomena such as clouds, precipitation and storms. Isaiah makes note of precipitation in a number of contexts (e.g., bārād, "hail" [Is 28:2]; šēleg, "snow" [Is 55:10]; tal, "dew" [Is 26:19]; māṭār, "rain" [Is 55:10]; zerem, "storm" [Is 28:2]; riāḥ, "wind" [Is 7:2; 17:13]; sûpâ, sē'arâ, sa'ar, "storm wind" [Is 5:28; 21:1; 29:6; 40:24; 41:16; 66:15]). Interestingly, whereas the book of Malachi addresses the cosmological perspective of precipitation falling from the "windows of heaven" (see 6 below), Isaiah makes note of these "windows" ('ārubbôt) only once (Is 24:18). Isaiah instead tends to focus on these phenomena as being under the sovereign control of Yahweh to be used as a means of blessing (Is 30:23; 44:3, 14) and cursing (Is 5:6; 24:18).

As is the normal practice throughout the prophetic corpus, Isaiah references the earthly tier both in generic terms (Is 1:2; 4:2; 5:26; 6:3; 8:9; 11:4; 12:5; 14:7) and in oracles of judgment (Is 11:4; 18:3; 28:2). Inevitably, many references often stress the sovereign and omnipotent nature of Yahweh through his creative acts in forming the heavens and the earth (Is 13:13; 40:12, 22; 42:5; 44:24; 45:12, 18; 48:13; 51:13, 16). There are also references to the role that the foundations of the earthly realm play. In the book of Isaiah Yahweh is presented not only as laying the foundations of the earth (Is 51:13), but also as the one who will shake the foundations of the earth (môšēdê 'āreš) to their core in the *Day of the Lord (Is 24:18). The protoapocalyptic language of Isaiah 24:19-20 thus describes the feebleness of the very earth itself when Yahweh acts in judgment (cf. Is 2:19, 21; 13:13; 24:1-21; 41:5; 51:6).

The third level of the cosmos, Sheol (šē'ol [note also taḥtiyyôt 'āreš, "the lower parts of the earth," in Is 44:23]), also sheds light on Isaiah's cosmology (see also the metaphor in Is 26:19). Sheol appears both independently and as part of poetic couplets whereby the Pit (bôr) is presented as synonymous (Is 14:15; 38:18). While Sheol appears in a general sense throughout Isaiah (Is 28:15; 38:10, 18; 57:9), it is the author's use of it to show Yahweh's omnipotence that dominates. A sovereign God must have the power of life and death over his subjects, and he must be able to condemn to Sheol. Throughout the book of Isaiah this is indeed the picture presented, especially in light of Isaiah 14:15-27, where Yahweh condemns the king of Babylon to a miserable existence there (see also Is 5:14; 28:18) (see Afterlife).

In Isaiah 14 two cosmological extremities—the heights of heaven and the depths of Sheol—are juxtaposed in metaphorical terms (see also Is 51:13). Isaiah 14:13-15 records a sequence of poetic phrases reflecting mythological concepts depicting the heights to which the king of *Babylon sought to elevate himself and the depths to which he ultimately fell. Although no one phrase can be taken to designate a particular location for Yahweh's throne or abode (i.e., is it in heaven generally speaking, or above the stars, or on the mount of the assembly, or above the clouds?), it does suggest to the reader that Yahweh's abode is viewed as existing in a place of elevation, the heavens. Interestingly, the reference to the "mountain of the assembly" (har mō'ed) in Isaiah 14:13 (cf. a similar usage in Ugaritic, phr.m'd, "assembly of the gods" [KTU 1.2 i:14]) does have a possible cosmological connection. Ancient Near Eastern peoples sometimes understood the entire cosmos to be likened to a cosmic mountain. Much like a mountain climber, the king of Babylon is said in Isaiah 14:13 to have desired to metaphorically "ascend/scale" ('alâ)

the heavens and the clouds. However, the king of Babylon fails to attain his desired outcome (for competing ancient Near Eastern interpretations of this passage, see Childs, 126; Stadelmann, 90; Watson, 394). Whatever mythological connections lie behind the text, the cosmological concepts are clear. Isaiah speaks in well-known mythological and cosmological terms to show the hubris of the king of Babylon who actually thought that he was a god who could ascend above the created order to the position of the sovereign Yahweh. Instead, he is brought to the depths of Sheol.

3. Jeremiah.

Jeremiah's polemical tirades against idols open the door for general cosmological comments relating to the creative powers of Yahweh. Jeremiah shows the sovereignty of Yahweh by noting that he alone, not the idols worshiped by Judah, has created the heavens and the earth (Jer 10:11). Much like the book of Isaiah, Jeremiah seeks to show Yahweh's sovereign purposes in judging his people through cosmological themes. For example, in Jeremiah 4:22-29 the prophet pronounces judgment upon Judah using a de-creation process whereby the organized cosmos is presented as being "formless and void" (tōhū wābōhū [Jer 4:23]), an obvious allusion to Genesis 1:2. Or consider Jeremiah's use of meteorological events such as rain (gešem, "rain"; yōreh, "spring rains"; malqōš, "latter rain") and showers (rēbībīm) as a means of showing Yahweh's *blessing and cursing (Jer 3:3; 5:24; 14:22). He also likens Yahweh's judgment to storm winds of various types (e.g., rūaḥ qādīm, "east wind"; sūpā, "whirlwind"; sē'ārā, "storm wind"; sa'ar, "storm" in general [Jer 4:13; 18:17; 23:19; 25:32; 30:23]) coming from the "four corners" ('arba' qešōt) of the cosmos (Jer 49:36).

Jeremiah draws several verbal pictures of his cosmology. He presents the wind as being held in "storehouses" ('ōšār), no doubt in the upper cosmological tier (Jer 10:13; 51:16). He notes that Yahweh has delimited the terrestrial seas by the sands of the shores (Jer 5:22) and has established the world by his wisdom and stretched out the heavens through his understanding (Jer 51:15). The prophet also uses a cosmological merism in Jeremiah 31:37 in the midst of a series of rhetorical statements related to cosmological functions and realities (Jer 31:35-37). In every case the prophet makes it clear that it is Yahweh who created and controls the universe and its functions. For example, he posits, if someone "can measure the heavens" or can search the "foundations of the earth," then Yahweh would reject his people (see also Jer 33:20-21, 25-26). Surprisingly, apart from these references to the foundations of the earth, Jeremiah makes no mention of Sheol or the Pit in his prophecies, even though he frequently speaks of the deaths of those who reject God. Instead, Jeremiah speaks only of a bipartite cosmos (Jer 32:17; cf. Jer 33:2).

Finally, Jeremiah declares that the very voice of Yahweh causes a tumult in the celestial waters (Jer 10:13; 51:16). Jeremiah's comments may come from the cosmological perspective that there existed above the dome of the heavens a "celestial ocean" (see Gen 1:6-7; Ps 148:4; also called the mabbûl mayim, "flood of water" [e.g., Gen 6:17; 7:6, 7, 10, 17; Ps 29:10]). Although the prophets move away from ancient Near Eastern creation mythology in the strictest sense of the term, the cosmological parallels here are telling. In Babylonian creation mythology the god Marduk splits the goddess Tiamat's body and uses one half of it to make a solid shell-like dome to hold back the celestial waters (ANET 67-68, 501-2, tablets IV, V). Similarly, in Egyptian cosmology, the goddess Nut is pictured with an elongated body with fingertips and toes on the ground. Her body is arched upward, being supported by the air-god Shu (ANEP 183, fig. 542). The arched-bodied Nut and halved Tiamat thus serve a similar function as the semi-circular dome (hûg) implied here and noted above in the discussion on Isaiah.

4. Ezekiel.

Ezekiel too employs cosmological concepts in order to show the sovereignty of Yahweh. Although Ezekiel identifies the three tiers of the cosmos throughout his work, nowhere does he list them together. Perhaps the most detailed of his cosmological descriptions comes in the opening verses and chapters of his book. It is here that the reader gets a glimpse into the heavenly realm.

Ezekiel's opening vision of Yahweh's glory (kābôd) by the river Chebar highlights the heavenly level above which Yahweh dwells. This level Ezekiel calls the rāqia' ("expanse" or "firmament" [Ezek 1:22, 23, 25, 26; see also Ezek 10:1]). Next to Genesis 1, which uses rāqīa' nine times, Ezekiel has the most occurrences of this particular term (see also Ps 19:2; 150:1). Within scholarly circles there still remains some debate as to what rāqīa' means both here and elsewhere. Some feel that the concept of a “solid” surface comes from a later period through the influence of translations of rāqīa', like the Vulgate’s firmamentum or the LXX’s stereōma (TWOT 2:862). Ezekiel describes this rāqīa' as being “like the awesome eye/gleam of ice” (Ezek 1:22) but does not specifically identify its solidity. The verbal root rq' often reflects the idea of the beating or spreading out flat of a piece of metal into plates (Ex 39:3; Num 16:38-39; 2 Sam 22:43; Is 40:19; Jer 10:9) or the stamping of feet (Ezek 6:11; 25:6). However, it is also used to designate Yahweh’s creative acts of spreading out “the earth or the sky like a layer” (Lint, 6:599) (see Is 42:5; 44:24), thus making a dome or the vaulted heavens which holds up the celestial waters (BDB 956). In the Mosaic tradition of Genesis 1, rāqīa' seems to be used interchangeably between the atmospheric level where birds fly and the planetary level (Gen 1:14, 17, 20) (TWOT 2:862). However one interprets rāqīa' elsewhere, here it seems to be a solid surface that holds up the throne of Yahweh. One could argue that this may in turn have some connection to the area above Isaiah’s dome (hūg).

Ezekiel uses several atmospheric and planetary phenomena to show Yahweh’s glory and sovereignty over his creation and in the context of judgment (e.g., Ezek 32:7-8). To begin with, the dreaded east wind (rūaḥ haqqādīm or rūaḥ sē'ārôt) is applied in oracles against Yahweh’s people (Ezek 13:11, 13; 17:10; 19:12) and the *nations (Ezek 27:26). Furthermore, the use of cloud(s) (ānān, āb) as metaphors for Yahweh’s glory (Ezek 1:4; 10) and the hubris of the nations (Ezek 31:3, 10, 14) is also attested. Finally, the prophet warns that rain (gešēm, mātar) will be withheld as judgment upon Judah (Ezek 22:24) and will fall excessively to judge both Israel and the nations (Ezek 13:11; 38:22).

Ezekiel also references the second level of the cosmos using the terms 'ereš (“earth”) and ādāmā (“land”) synonymously for the land of Israel (e.g., Ezek 6:14; 7:2, 7, 23, 27; 8:12, 17; 9:9; 11:15, 17; 12:19, 20, 22; 13:9; 14:15; 15:8; 17:13; 21:2, 3), Babylon (Ezek 1:3; 16:29; 17:4, 5) and Egypt (Ezek 20:5, 6, 9; 23:19). Cosmologically, Ezekiel does draw a distinction between the heavens and earth at various junctures (Ezek 1:15, 19, 21; 7:21; 10:16, 19; 12:6, 12; 19:12; 28:17; 29:15; 32:4; 34:6, 28; 35:14; 39:18) and even points out the atmospheric space “between” (bēn) these two cosmological extremes (e.g., Ezek 8:3; cf. 1 Chron 21:16; Zech 5:9); this latter example no doubt is reflective of Ezekiel’s desire to show the ethereal nature of the event. On two separate occasions Ezekiel shows the power of Yahweh over the cosmos by noting that God will cause the mountains to shake (Ezek 38:20) and the earth to shine with his “glory” (Ezek 43:2).

The lower level of the earth, which houses the abode of the dead, appears frequently in select chapters of Ezekiel. Ezekiel utilizes this level as a means of showing Yahweh’s sovereignty over people’s destiny. Although it is only implicit that Ezekiel saw this region as a separate cosmological tier from the earthly realm, it is evident that the prophet did see a distinct difference between the two. Ezekiel uses both “Sheol” (šē'ōl [Ezek 31:15-17; 32:21, 27]) and “Pit” (bôr [Ezek 26:20; 31:14, 16; 32:18, 23-25, 29, 30]) as names for this lower region, sometimes interchangeably (Ezek 31:16). He also identifies this region as the “earth beneath” ('ereš taḥtīt [Ezek 26:20; 31:14, 16, 18]). Interestingly, much like Jonah, Ezekiel intimates that Sheol is below the great watery depths (tēhôm [Ezek 31:15]).

5. Daniel.

Quite clearly, the author of Daniel sought to present Yahweh as sovereign by making an obvious cosmological distinction between the heavenly and the earthly realms (e.g., Dan 4:17, 25; 5:21; 7:27). However, perhaps with the exception of a few apocalyptically nuanced references (e.g., Dan 8:10), the book of Daniel records very few direct cosmological analogies. Yahweh is presented as the “God of heaven” ('ēlāh šēmayyā'* [Dan 2:18, 19, 37; 5:21, 23]), the “Most High” ('illāyā' [Dan 3:26; 4:2, 17, 24, 25, 32, 34; 5:18, 21; 7:25]), the “Highest One” ('elyōnīn [Dan 7:18, 22, 25, 27]), the “Lord of Heaven” (mārē' šēmayyā' [Dan 5:23]), and in one instance he is even presented metaphorically as “Heaven” (šēmayyā') itself (Dan 4:26). Also, angelic messengers are presented implicitly descending from the heavenly realms to deliver messages (Dan 4:23; 9:21-27; 10:9-21; 12:5-13). Finally, in a synonymous parallel bicolon the author of Daniel parallels the brightness of the rāqiaʿ and the stars (kôkâbîm) of the heaven (Dan 12:3). The author here appears to make a direct connection between the expanse (rāqiaʿ) and the celestial level where the planets and luminaries reside—a very “Mosaic” concept (see 4 above).

Unlike Ezekiel and Isaiah, Daniel records no references to atmospheric phenomena apart from his visionary experience where he sees the “one like a son of man” coming in the clouds (Dan 7:13). Furthermore, the only tangential reference to Sheol is possibly Daniel 12:2, where the text reads that the righteous will arise from the dust of the ground or, more literally, from the “land of dust” (ʿadmat ʿāpār). However, this cryptic reference offers little insight into the cosmological thinking of the author concerning a lower tier to the cosmos.

6. The Book of the Twelve (Minor Prophets).

The Book of the Twelve, also known as the Minor Prophets, varies widely in its presentation of cosmological facets, with some books remaining completely silent on the topic (e.g., Obadiah). As with the Major Prophets, when the Minor Prophets do use cosmology within their oracles it is for the purpose of showing the sovereignty of Yahweh over his creation. No one prophet offers a complete vignette of his cosmology, but each prophet does offer a glimpse into the cosmological worldview of his day. Zechariah and Jonah, for example, present a bipartite description of the cosmos (Jon 1:9 [much like Nehemiah, Jonah includes the seas as a separate designation]; Zech 12:1 [see also comments in 4 above concerning the possibility of an area between the heavens and the earth in Zech 5:9]), whereas Amos, being the most detailed in his cosmological descriptions, presents the clearest picture of a three-tiered cosmology, especially the heavenly tier. In showing the far-reaching judgments of Yahweh, Amos puts forward the cosmological limits of Sheol, the heavens and various levels of the earthly realm as areas controlled by Yahweh (Amos 9:2-3). Moreover, in Amos 9:6 the prophet points out that it was Yahweh who built the upper chambers and the vaulted “dome” (ʿāguddā, a synonym for rāqiaʿ [see NIDOTTE 3:1198]) over the earth, a similar picture noted by Isaiah.

The Minor Prophets were also instrumental in indicting the nation for covenant violations that included meteorological and cosmic disturbances. For example, the rains (gešēm) and dew (tal) became an effective weapon in the prophetic arsenal for blessing and cursing (e.g., Hos 6:3; 13:15; Joel 2:23; Amos 4:7, 9; Nah 1:3; Zech 8:12; 10:1; 14:17-18; Mal 3:10; see also Gen 7:11; 8:2; Lev 26:19; Deut 11:13-14; 28:23-24; 1 Kings 8:35-36; 2 Kings 7:2, 19; 2 Chron 6:26; Job 5:10; Ps 78:23). Malachi 3:10 picks up on the blessings of rain and adopts the metaphor of the “windows of heaven” (ʿārubbôt haššamayim) pouring forth this bounty (see also the Egyptian concept of the “doors of heaven” from the period of Thut-Mose III in ANET 446; cf. Ps 78:23). Interestingly, we find no other clear reference in the ancient Near East to the idea of “windows” in heaven, perhaps with the exception of the window constructed in Baal’s house (see Walton, Matthews and Chavalas, 384; ANET 134, vi:1-10). Even though the OT authors recognized that rain came from the clouds (e.g., 1 Kings 18:44; Is 5:6; Zech 10:1), Malachi and Isaiah (see 2 above) adopt the metaphor of cosmic windows as a way of explaining the natural phenomenon. Given a geographical region so heavily reliant upon seasonal rains, there is little wonder why this particular meteorological event was an effective means of judgment.

In a similar vein, storm winds (sûpā) were most often utilized in oracles of cursing (Hos 8:7; 13:15; Zech 7:13). Just as the psalmists attributed these meteorological phenomena to Yahweh (Ps 18:7-15; 29:3-9), the prophets intimate that Yahweh is to be likened to the awesome power of the thunderstorm, with its flashing arrows of fire and the roar of thunder (Jer 10:13; 25:30; 51:16; Hab 3:9-11; Zech 9:14). That is not to say that the OT prophets pictured Yahweh in a similar fashion as the Canaanites pictured their storm god Baal (see Pritchard, plates 136, 140), but rather that the natural phenomenon of the storm was an easily adapted metaphor for Yahweh’s sovereign and majestic nature. As L. Stadelmann concludes, “The fundamental difference between Yahweh and Baʿal lies in the fact that Baʿal personifies the meteorological phenomena, whereas Yahweh controls them” (Stadelmann, 125).

At the terrestrial level, the Minor Prophets generally focus on Yahweh as the creator of heaven and earth (e.g., Amos 4:13; 5:8; 9:6; Jon

1:9; Nah 1:3-6; Zech 12:1), with the purpose of showing his sovereignty over his creation (e.g., Hab 3:4-6, 9-10; 3:11-15; Zeph 1:2-3). They also reference the earthly tier in general terms (e.g., Mic 7:13; Hab 2:14; Zeph 1:18; Zech 1:10-11; 4:10) but make it clear that Yahweh is, and will be, the lord of that creation (Zech 6:5; 14:9). For example, Yahweh is depicted as causing the sun and the moon to be darkened at his bidding (Joel 2:10, 15, 30; Amos 8:9; Zeph 1:15), with them standing still before his glory (Hab 3:11). Several of the Minor Prophets also note the trembling and cataclysmic changes of the heavens and the earth when Yahweh appears (Joel 2:10; 3:15; Amos 9:5; Mic 1:3-4; Hag 2:6; Zech 14:3-8).

At various points in the OT the *mountains appear to be presented as the foundations/pillars (mōsād) that bore up the heavenly dome (cf. Job 26:10-11; 2 Sam 22:8). In Akkadian tradition this mythological mountain range was known as Māšû (see ANET 88, tablet 9, col. 2). In the Minor Prophets the “roots” (qešeb) of the mountains also stretched into the third cosmological tier, the netherworld, thus offering a firm foundation for both the earth and the firmament (Jon 2:6; Mic 6:2; see also 1 Sam 2:8; 1 Chron 16:30; Job 9:6; 38:4-6; Ps 18:7, 15; 75:3; 82:5; 104:5; Prov 8:29; Is 24:18; 51:13; Jer 31:37). During the covenant indictment speech in Micah 2 the prophet uses poetic parallelism to identify the enduring qualities of the mountains as the “foundations” (mōsādīm) of the earth, but he does not go beyond this basic connection to the underworld. The belief that the mountains in some way connected the three cosmic tiers may explain why they attracted sacred importance.

The Minor Prophets offer very little insight into the concept of Sheol and the subterranean realm of the dead. Hosea, Amos, Jonah and Habakkuk are the only ones who make any clear reference to Sheol (Hos 13:14; Amos 9:2; Jon 2:2, 6; Hab 2:5). Hosea and Habakkuk use Sheol as a metaphor for death, whereas Jonah and Amos connect it to the lower cosmological tier. Jonah, in his descent into the abyss of the sea, likens his experience to a journey into Sheol. He notes that his experience paralleled that of descending to the “roots of the mountains” (qīšbē hārīm [Jon 2:6]). Although Sheol often is personified in the OT as “swallowing” people (2 Sam 22:6; Ps 18:5; 69:15; 141:7; Prov

1:12; 27:20; 30:16; Is 5:14; Hab 2:5), there is no evidence that it is to be likened to the Ugaritic god of the underworld, Mot, who does battle with his foes (Stadelmann, 168; ANET 138-39). Furthermore, in ancient Near Eastern thinking the path to Sheol or the underworld was at the western horizon. It was here that the shades would be taken to the netherworld by the setting sun. Although Numbers 16 suggests that Korah and his cohorts were swallowed alive into Sheol (see also Ex 15:12), the prophets do not make it clear exactly how one descends to the realm of the dead.

7. The Sacred Mountain and Divine Warrior.

Two other concepts appear throughout the prophetic corpus that shed light on prophetic cosmological perspectives: (1) the role of the sacred mountain; (2) Yahweh as the divine warrior protecting his cosmological space: the temple and Israel.

OT and ancient Near Eastern peoples viewed select mountains as sacred (e.g., Ex 3:1; 1 Kings 19:8; Ps 2:6; note also Mount Zaphon in Ugarit [see ANET 133, v:85] and the sacred ziggurat at Ur and the massive ziggurat Etemenanki beside Marduk’s temple at Esagila in Babylon). There is no doubt that cultic rites on the mountains/high places played a dominant role in Israel, for it is against these pagan practices that the prophets spoke vociferously (e.g., Is 15:2; 36:7; Jer 7:31; 17:2-3; 19:5; Ezek 16:39; Hos 4:13; 10:8). However, the prophets did not completely jettison the sacred importance placed upon select mountains as found in both the Torah and Former Prophets (e.g., Horeb in Mal 4:4; see also Ex 3:1; 1 Kings 19:8). They tended to stress the centrality of Mount *Zion, the *temple and the city of Jerusalem in light of Yahweh’s plans and purposes (e.g., Is 2:2; Mic 4:1; Zech 14:10). Therefore, it is no surprise that the OT and the Apocrypha present Mount Zion/Jerusalem as the “navel of the earth” (ṭabbūr hā’āreṣ [Ezek 38:12; see also Is 28:16; Ezek 5:5; Jub. 8:19; 1 En. 26:1]). Ancient Near Eastern cultures such as Babylon, Assyria, Persia, Egypt and Greece equated prominent religious cities with the “center” of their nations as well (see Stadelmann, 147-53) (note also the role of Mount Gerizim in the religious life of the Samaritans [Josephus, Ant. 11.310; 18.85]). Paradigmatically, Isaiah and his contemporary Micah saw Mount Zion as elevated above all the mountains in the last days as a center of Yahweh worship (Is 2:1-4; Mic 4:1-5; see also Dan 9:16, 20; 11:45; Joel 2:1; Hag 2:6-9).

The central cosmological role of Yahweh as creator and defender of his people plays out in several prophetic texts as Yahweh roars forth from Mount Zion and his temple as the divine warrior (Is 24:23; Ezek 38—39; Joel 3:9-21; Amos 1:2; Mic 2:13; Nah 1:2; Zeph 2:11-13; 3:16-17; Zech 2:13; Mal 1:4-5). Joel and Zechariah in particular make it clear that the cosmological chaos in the *Day of the Lord will be directly connected to Yahweh's defense of his land and people (e.g., Joel 2:1-17, 32; 3:16-17; Zech 12:7-9; 14:1-4). Furthermore, as the divine warrior, the sovereignty of Yahweh is also highlighted by his control of the wellspring of the cosmos, the chaotic sea (yām)—something common throughout the OT prophets (Is 17:12-13; 23:11; 50:2; Ezek 27:25; 32:2-3; Jon 2:4). This harks back to Genesis 1, where the sea is in need of "conquering." For the prophets, Yahweh's control and conquering of the sea shows not only his omnipotence but also his control of the primal cosmological entity. There is no question that in certain places the prophets are recalling ancient Near Eastern mythology whereby a patron deity battles the *chaos of the primordial sea (in the OT known as Rahab [e.g., Is 51:9; Hab 3:8; see also Job 9:8; 26:12; Ps 77:16-20; 89:10]). Although the imagery is reminiscent of Marduk's battle with Tiamat (Babylon) and Baal's struggle with Yam (Ugarit), the remnants of the mythological concept are subservient to the sovereignty of Israel's God (see Warfare and Divine Warfare).

8. Conclusion.

One of the key purposes for the prophetic use of cosmological motifs is to prove that Yahweh, as creator, is indeed sovereign over not only the cosmos but also those who inhabit it. Due to the prophetic impetus, it is also natural for this usage to focus primarily on judgment upon Israel and the nations. Throughout the prophetic corpus the prophets show that Yahweh uses his cosmos not only as a means of blessing (e.g., Jer 5:24) and judgment (e.g., Jer 3:3; 14:1-4) but also as the stage upon which Yahweh shows his omnipotence (Hab 3). For the covenant people and those dependent upon the natural order of the cosmos, such as the seasonal cycles, these motifs prove effective. For the nations and those who reject the message of the prophets, the realm of the dead—Sheol and the Pit—serve as a just, ultimate punishment for unfaithfulness and hubris, and this message resonates not only throughout NT theological thought but also in many circles even today.

See also CHAOS; CREATION THEOLOGY; DEATH; MOUNTAIN IMAGERY; ZION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. B. S. Childs, Isaiah (OTL; Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 2001); D. J. A. Clines, ed., The Dictionary of Classical Hebrew (8 vols.; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1996); J. C. de Moor, An Anthology of Religious Texts from Ugarit (Nisaba 16; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1987); J. Goldingay, The Message of Isaiah 40-55: A Literary-Theological Commentary (London: T & T Clark, 2005); C. H. Gordon, Ugaritic Textbook: Grammar, Texts in Transliteration, Cuneiform Selections, Glossary, Indices (AnOr 38; Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1965); R. S. Hess, Israelite Religions: An Archaeological and Biblical Survey (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2007); B. Lang, Monotheism and the Prophetic Minority: An Essay in Biblical History and Sociology (SWBA 1; Sheffield: Almond, 1983); idem, "Zur Entstehung des biblischen Monotheismus," TQ 166 (1986) 135-42; J. C. Lennox, Seven Days That Divide the World: The Beginning According to Genesis and Science (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2011); G. A. Lint, ed., The Complete Biblical Library: The Old Testament Hebrew-English Dictionary (7 vols.; Springfield, MO: World Library, 1995); E. C. Lucas, "Cosmology," DOTP 130-39; J. W. McKay, "Helel and the Dawn Goddess: A Re-examination of the Myth in Isaiah XIV 12-15," VT 20 (1970) 451-64; J. B. Pritchard, ed., The Ancient Near East: An Anthology of Texts and Pictures (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2011); B. B. Schmidt, "Moon," DDD 585-93; L. I. J. Stadelmann, The Hebrew Conception of the World: A Philological and Literary Study (AnBib 39; Rome: Pontifical Biblical, 1970); D. Stuart, "Malachi," in The Minor Prophets: Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi, ed. T. E. McComiskey (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1998) 1245-1396; J. H. Walton, The Lost World of Genesis One: Ancient Cosmology and the Origins Debate (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2009); J. H. Walton, V. H. Matthews and M. W. Chavalas, The IVP Bible Background Commentary: Old Testament (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2000); W. G. E. Watson, "Helel," *DDD*² 392-94; H. Wolf, "dōq," TWOT 194-95; I. Zatelli, "Astrology and the Worship of the Stars in the Bible," ZAW 103 (1991) 86-99.

B. N. Peterson

COURT TALES. See DANIEL: BOOK OF.

COVENANT

The concept of covenant is fundamental in understanding biblical history, theology and the intertwining of the two. The Hebrew word translated as "covenant" is bērit, and its etymology is complex. While the word cannot be attached with confidence to any Hebrew verbal root, it seems that the word can best be related to the Akkadian word biritu, which means "clasp, fetter." If so, the covenant might be thought of as a bond. Another Akkadian reference is the word birit, meaning "between," and thus it sees the covenant as an arrangement between two or more parties. Lastly, the Akkadian word barû ("to see") may indicate that the word could be translated as "obligation" (see Weinfeld 1973; Kalluveettil, 7-16; McConville).

While a covenant can be a simple pact or treaty between two people (Gen 21:27; 1 Sam 18:3), God's covenants with his people are broader in focus, and generally they contain promises that God makes on behalf of his people. The concept of covenant is not unique to Israel; rather, the concept was fundamental in ancient Near Eastern cultures from the beginning of recorded time. Indeed, some OT covenants follow the structure of the Hittite suzerain-vassal treaty: preamble, historical prologue, stipulations, provision for deposit in the temple, list of witnesses, and curses/blessings (Mendenhall, 31-34; McCarthy, 37-81, Niehaus, 81-141). The concept of covenant is not late in Israel's history and theological development; it was part of religious, social, and political spheres as early as the fifteenth century BC (contra Nicholson; see Kitchen 1989, 121-32). In the OT the concept of covenant is clearly outlined in the Pentateuch. The word first appears in Genesis 6:18 in God's covenant with Noah (for a detailed description of the covenant with creation motif, see Dumbrell, 33-39). The covenants could be divided into universal, ancestral and national. The universal covenant refers to the covenant that God established with creation after the universal flood recorded in Genesis 6—9. The ancestral covenants refer to the covenants that God made with Abraham (see Williamson, DOTP 139-55).

The prophets speak directly about the specific covenants, or they allude to them extensively throughout their writings. This article focuses on the Abrahamic, Mosaic, Davidic and new covenants as addressed by God's servants, the prophets. The term "covenant" appears fifty-five times in the Major Prophets of the Hebrew canon (13x in Isaiah; 25x in Jeremiah; 17x in Ezekiel), seven times in Daniel, and fifteen times in the Minor Prophets. Of the occurrences in the Minor Prophets, nine times it refers to the Mosaic covenant (Hos 6:7; 8:1; Zech 9:11; 11:10; Mal 2:4, 5, 8, 10; 3:1), once to a future covenant (Hos 2:18), once to covenants that people make with each other (Hos 10:4), once to a covenant that Israel makes with Assyria and Egypt (Hos 12:1), once to a "covenant of brotherhood" that the people of Tyre did not keep (Amos 1:9), once to an alliance of Edom (Obad 1:7), and once to a covenant between a husband and a wife (Mal 2:14). However, the covenant motif appears much more often in both the Major and the Minor Prophets, especially in conjunction with the people's disobedience to the covenant stipulations as they were set forth in the Ten Commandments.

1. The Abrahamic Covenant
2. The Mosaic Covenant
3. The Davidic Covenant
4. The New Covenant

1. The Abrahamic Covenant.

1.1. Major Prophets. In the Abrahamic covenant (Gen 12; 15; 17) God promised Abraham a great name, a great nation and a great land. These promises had been partly fulfilled by the time of Moses and Joshua. But Abraham was to be more than just a recipient of divine blessing; he himself was to be a blessing to others. "Through you," God promises, "all the families of the earth will be blessed" (Gen 12:3). By the time of Joseph, God has fulfilled the first two promises to such an extent that the Egyptian Pharaoh feared the people of Israel (Ex 1). The people of Israel will inherit the promised land, but only later, during the time of Joshua. Even so, the prophets use Abraham and God's covenant with him to encourage his people. God through Isaiah exhorts his people not to fear because, after all, they are Abraham's offspring, and thus they are the recipients of God's power and presence (Is 41:8-10). Furthermore, God encourages his people to remember God's faithfulness to Abraham. Just as God blessed and multiplied Abraham, so will he bless and multiply Abraham's descendants (Is 51:1-2).

One way the concept of covenant comes to the forefront is through the use of the covenant formula, which appears in three versions with particular variants: (1) "I will be your God"; (2) "You will be my people"; (3) a combination of the first two (see Rendtorff, 13-28). Within the context of the Abrahamic covenant, the formula appears twice in Genesis 17, where God affirms to Abraham, "I will establish my covenant between me and you . . . to be God to you and to your offspring after you" (Gen 17:7). After the promise of the land, the formula is present again in the promise "I will be their God" (Gen 17:8). Before the establishment of the Mosaic covenant, God reminds his people of the covenant made with Abraham (Ex 6:2-6), and then the covenant formula reappears, "I will take you to be my people, and I will be your God" (Ex 6:7). This promise is given in the context of the land promise, which is not unique to the Abrahamic covenant and will be a recurring theme in other, subsequent covenants (McComiskey, 48-51).

1.2. The Minor Prophets (The Twelve). *Sin, judgment and restoration are the three main themes on which the Minor Prophets focus. The people's sin is particularly tied in with the failure to obey the Mosaic covenant, but the Abrahamic covenant is alluded to in the language of restoration. The restoration that most Minor Prophets speak about relating to the Abrahamic covenant is the promise of the return to the land following the judgment through *exile. In Hosea the Israelites are described as doves returning to their homes from Assyria (Hos 11:11), and in Joel the land of Judah is promised a perpetual inhabitation. Joel describes this land hyperbolically as having mountains dripping with sweet wine and hills flowing with milk (Joel 3:18-20). Obadiah employs merism to describe the totality of the land that the exiles will possess as extending from Zarephath in the north to the Negev in the south (Obad 20). In the last verse of Micah the children of Israel are identified as the descendants of Abraham and Jacob; thus, they are the recipients of God's faithfulness and steadfast love (Mic 7:20). A return to the *land is implied at the end of Zephaniah as well when God promises to bring his people in and to gather them together (Zeph 3:20). The only occurrence of the covenant formula in the Minor Prophets occurs in Zechariah's language of restoration: "I will bring them to dwell in the midst of Jerusalem. And they shall be my people, and I will be their God, in faithfulness and in righteousness" (Zech 8:8). The presence of the promise here is important because it occurs after the return from the Babylonian exile, and thus it could have an important eschatological nuance.

2. The Mosaic Covenant.

2.1. The Major Prophets. The most prominent of the covenants is *God's covenant with Israel that was established at Sinai. When the NT makes reference to the old covenant, it refers to this covenant. It is important to note from the outset that there are many similarities between the Abrahamic and Mosaic covenants. The covenant formula "I will be your/their God and you/they will be my people" appears in both the Abrahamic and the Mosaic covenants, emphasizing the fact that what God desired was a relationship with his people (Gen 17:8; Ex 6:7). The promise of land is also prominently displayed in the Mosaic covenant, affirming that the Abrahamic covenant promises and stipulations do not cease with the Mosaic covenant; rather, they are reemphasized. God's intervention on behalf of Israel in Egypt is done in conjunction with God's promises to the patriarchs (Ex 3:7-8, 16-22; 6:4; 13:5, 11). The Ten Commandments are the first part of a three-part section of the Mosaic *law, and they represent the most important teachings of this covenant. The prophets addressed the people's keeping and breaking of this covenant by referring back to the Ten Commandments (due to his documentary presuppositions, W. Eichrodt fails to see the prophets addressing the Mosaic covenant [Eichrodt, 51-52]). The breaking of the first three commandments in particular had to do with one's relationship with God. This was repeatedly condemned by God through the prophets. In the eighth century BC God speaks through Isaiah that "their land was filled with idols" (Is 2:8) that they worshiped (Is 2:20). But Isaiah also prophesies about a time of repentance when the people will get rid of their *idols (Is 30:22; 31:7). During the ministry of Jeremiah the people were still guilty of breaking the first commandment by worshipping “carved images and foreign idols” (Jer 8:19). Even though these idols were powerless (Jer 10:5, 14), the people “polluted” the land with these “detestable idols” (Jer 16:18). Ezekiel prophesies about the people’s judgment by being exiled because they worshiped idols (Ezek 6:9, 13). The situation worsened during the time of Ezekiel to such a degree that the leaders of Israel practiced idol worship even in the *temple (Ezek 8). But God promises to restore Israel by cleansing them from their idolatry. This restoration anticipates the new covenant, and it will be made possible by the giving of a new heart and by the putting of God’s Spirit within them (Ezek 36:25-26). Daniel speaks in prayer of God keeping his covenant (Dan 9:4) and of God’s “holy covenant” (Dan 11:28, 30, 32), which is opposed, attacked or forsaken (see also Dan 11:22, where a “prince of the covenant” is opposed).

Another important aspect of the Mosaic covenant that is repeated throughout the prophets is the sign of this covenant: the Sabbath (Ex 31:13-17). In Isaiah, those who keep the Sabbath are considered blessed (Is 56:2), they please God (Is 56:4), and will have their *sacrifices accepted on God’s altar (Is 56:6-7). On the other hand, those who fail to keep the Sabbath are said to profane it (Is 56:6) and seek their own pleasure on this holy day (Is 58:13). Through the prophet Jeremiah God reminds his people not to bear a burden on the Sabbath day (Jer 17:21), but to keep it holy (Jer 17:22). Failure to keep the Sabbath holy will bring about God’s judgment in the form of the destruction of Jerusalem (Jer 17:27). Ezekiel speaks of Israel’s rebellion against God in terms of profaning the Sabbath (Ezek 20:13, 16, 21, 24; 22:8; 23:38) or disregarding the Sabbath (Ezek 22:26). On the other hand, Ezekiel prophesies about a future time of restoration when the Levitical priests will keep God’s Sabbaths holy (Ezek 44:24). During this time people will worship during the Sabbath (Ezek 46:3), they will bring sacrifices (Ezek 46:4) and offerings (Ezek 46:12).

If the first four commandments of the Ten Commandments had to do with one’s relationship with God, the last six commandments had to do with one’s relationship with his parents (fifth) and neighbors (sixth through tenth). The prophets list sinful violations of these six commandments throughout their works, but more emphasis is given to the first four commandments. The breaking of the sixth commandment, “You shall not kill,” is addressed in language that includes words such as “blood,” “bloodshed,” and/or “bloodstains.” Through the prophet Isaiah God indicts Israel, saying that their “hands are full of blood” (Is 1:15) or “defiled with blood” (Is 59:3). God, the faithful gardener, plants a vineyard; but instead of it yielding justice, it yields bloodshed (Is 5:7), and those who oppress others “are swift to shed innocent blood” (Is 59:7). Jeremiah uses similar language to describe the people’s rebellion. They have filled the land “with the blood of innocents” (Jer 19:4), and they shed innocent blood (Jer 22:17). In Ezekiel’s time the land was described as “full of bloody crimes” (Ezek 7:23) and “full of blood” (Ezek 9:9). Ezekiel 22 is devoted in its entirety as an indictment on the “city of bloodshed.” Ezekiel is summoned by the Lord to judge the “bloody city” (Ezek 22:2) because of all its abominations. The city is labeled as such because it is a city “that sheds blood” (Ezek 22:3, 9), a city “that became guilty” because of the blood that it shed (Ezek 22:4), and a city whose princes “are bent on shedding blood” (Ezek 22:6). Subsequently, the cry against it is “Woe to the bloody city!” (Ezek 24:6, 9).

The seventh commandment, “You shall not commit adultery,” is one that the prophets address repeatedly. Even though Israel’s rebellion was couched in figurative language when they were accused of spiritual adultery (Jer 3:9; 5:7; Ezek 23:37, 43), the prophets also address the physical aspect of individuals breaking this holy commandment. Adultery is one of the sins listed in Jeremiah’s famous Temple Sermon, in which he lists the sins for which the nation is guilty (Jer 7:9). The false prophets “commit adultery,” the very sin they are called to condemn (Jer 23:14). In his letter to the Babylonian exiles Jeremiah affirms that adultery was one of the sins for which the people were sent into exile (Jer 29:23).

The last three commandments are the least mentioned in the Major Prophets. Jeremiah lists stealing in his Temple Sermon (Jer 7:9), and God accuses the false prophets of stealing sermons from each other (Jer 23:30). Through Isaiah God condemns the prophets who lie (Is 9:15) and the religious leaders “have made lies” their refuge (Is 28:15). Lying is also condemned in general terms, usually in connection with idolatry and bloodshed (Is 57:11; 59:3-4). In Jeremiah the scribes are described as having “a lying pen” (Jer 8:8), the people are deceiving their neighbors (Jer 9:5), and the prophets are prophesying lies (Jer 14:14; 23:14; 23:25-26, 32; 27:10, 14-16; 29:9, 21, 31). Through Ezekiel God continues to condemn the false prophets who are lying to God’s people (Ezek 13:19; 21:29; 22:28).

2.2. The Minor Prophets (The Twelve). The Minor Prophets remind the people of their responsibility to keep the stipulations of the Mosaic covenant, but mostly they condemn the people for breaking the covenant. Hosea compares the people with Adam because they have “transgressed the covenant” (Hos 6:7). This transgression will bring about God’s judgment (Hos 8:1). Furthermore, instead of trusting in Yahweh, the people made a covenant with Assyria and Egypt (Hos 12:1).

The people’s idolatry is constantly condemned by the Minor Prophets because the people’s rebellion represents a clear violation of the first three commandments, which were the backbone of the Mosaic covenant. Hosea condemns the people’s manufacturing and attaching themselves to idols (Hos 4:17; 11:2), idols that generally were manufactured of gold and silver (Hos 8:4; 13:2). The people’s sin is magnified in that the priests, who are supposed to be spiritual leaders, themselves have resorted to idolatry (Hos 10:5-6). Hosea mentions Baal as one of the specific idols worshiped by the people (Hos 11:2), while most prophets speak against worshiping idols in general (Mic 1:7; Hab 2:18; Zech 13:2). The people’s rebellion is emphasized by the fact that the priests fell into the same types of sins (Zeph 1:4). Israel’s idolatry is sometimes couched in language of spiritual adultery, with Israel accused of “whoredom” (Hos 6:10). Hosea writes that Israel “has played the whore” (Hos 2:5; 4:15; 5:3; 9:1), “a spirit of whoredom led them astray” (Hos 4:12), and they “loved a prostitute’s wages” (Hos 9:1).

The people’s failure to keep the Sabbath is not mentioned directly in the Minor Prophets. The Sabbath is mentioned only once by Hosea and once by Amos. In Hosea God promises to put an end to Israel’s Sabbaths (Hos 2:11), while in Amos the people mention the Sabbath only in their desire for it to be over so that they might engage in deceitful business practices (Amos 8:5).

Micah addresses the fifth commandment

when he lists the failure of people to honor their parents among the sins with which God describes the total corruption of the people (Mic 7:5-6). As in the Major Prophets, the Minor Prophets present the people’s failure to obey the sixth commandment, prohibiting murder, in language such as “innocent blood” and “bloodshed.” God uses legal language to condemn Israel. Instead of obedience to the covenant, “bloodshed follows bloodshed” (Hos 4:2), and the people “lie in wait for blood” (Mic 7:2). Israel’s moral fiber had been compromised to such an extent that the men of Israel “commit adultery” (Hos 4:2), and they “go aside with prostitutes” (Hos 4:14), which is a clear violation of the seventh commandment, “You shall not commit adultery.” Israel’s unfaithfulness extends to the women as well: their “daughters play the whore,” and their “brides commit adultery” (Hos 4:13-14). The postexilic prophet Zechariah speaks of a two-sided, flying scroll that may be a reference to the two halves of the Decalogue (Zech 5:1-4). The word “curse” employed in Zechariah 5:3 is the same employed in the Torah (Ex 20:15; Deut 5:19); thus, the curse of Zechariah’s vision could be synonymous with the curse of the law.

2.3. The Priestly Covenant. A less important covenant that is first noted in the Torah is the priestly covenant or the covenant with Levi (Eichrodt, 65). Although covenant terminology is absent at the consecration of the priests (Ex 28—29; Lev 8), covenantal language is present in subsequent texts. During the Israelites’ wilderness wandering Yahweh makes a covenant of peace with Phinehas, a direct descendant of Aaron (Num 25:11-12). This is also called “a covenant of perpetual priesthood” (Num 25:13). The perpetual nature of this covenant is addressed by the book of Jeremiah, which presents the priestly covenant in the same category as the Davidic covenant (Jer 33:21-22). The postexilic prophets confirm the perpetual nature of God’s covenant when Zechariah anticipates a messianic time when a priest will be on the throne of David (Zech 6:9-15). The true priest is the one to come (Leupold, 76). Furthermore, through Malachi God affirms that the covenant with Levi will stand in spite of the priests’ failure to abide by its terms (Mal 2:1-9). Though distinct from the Mosaic covenant, this priestly covenant runs in parallel with the Mosaic, and it is aimed at maintaining the relationship between Yahweh and Israel (Williamson 2007, 105-6).

3. The Davidic Covenant.

3.1. The Major Prophets. Whereas the Mosaic covenant had the structure of a suzerain-vassal treaty, the Davidic covenant is a grant/royal covenant whose promises are articulated in 2 Samuel 7:8-16 (Weinfeld 1970, 184-96). The promises God made in the covenant with David include those that will find realization during David's lifetime (2 Sam 7:9-11a) and those that will find realization after David's death (2 Sam 7:11b-16). During David's lifetime the people will receive a great name (2 Sam 7:9), a great land (2 Sam 7:10) and rest (2 Sam 7:11). After David's death, God promises the people a house (2 Sam 7:11), posterity through a descendant who will always sit on the royal throne (2 Sam 7:12) and an eternal kingdom (2 Sam 7:13). Through the prophet Isaiah God promises to give the people a "Prince of Peace," who will reign from the "throne of David" (Is 9:6-7). This righteous king on whom the Spirit of God will rest is associated with David because he will come forth "from the stump of Jesse," David's father (Is 11:1-2, 10). In an oracle regarding Moab God promises that he will raise "the tent of David one who judges and seeks justice" (Is 16:5). This Davidic king is also foreshadowed in Hezekiah and is addressed by God as "the LORD, the God of David your father" (Is 38:5). The irrevocability of this covenant is understood in the language employed in Isaiah 55:3-5, where God promises to make an "everlasting covenant." Just as David experienced God's loving-kindness, so too will Israel benefit from God's acts of covenant love.

God's covenant with David is addressed by both Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Even though the language of judgment against the Davidic kings is harsh (Jer 13:13-14; 22:2-5, 30), the language of hope speaks of the certainty of the future fulfillment of the royal covenant with David. Indeed, God promises "to raise up for David a righteous branch" who will be both righteous and just (Jer 23:5-6; 33:15). The perpetual nature of the kingship is repeated forcefully in God's promise that "David shall never lack a man to sit on the throne of the house of Israel" (Jer 33:17). The fulfillment certainty of this covenant is as certain as the creation order (Jer 33:20-26). Ezekiel's harsh words for the present shepherds of Jerusalem (Ezek 34:1-10) are contrasted with the assurance that a future Davidic shepherd, God's servant, will shepherd God's people (Ezek 34:23-24; 37:24-25) (see Messiah).

3.2. The Minor Prophets (the Twelve). Hosea, Amos, Micah and Zechariah envisage a future time of restoration in which the royal covenant will be fulfilled by the eternal reign of a Davidic king. During this time of restoration the people will turn back to God by seeking the Lord and "David their king" (Hos 3:5). After prophesying about judgment due to sin, Amos foretells of a time when God "will raise the booth of David that is fallen and repair its breaches" (Amos 9:11). Subsequently, the people will be restored to the former glory before God used the Assyrian and Babylonian exiles to punish his people. Micah anticipates the Davidic king who will be born in Bethlehem, will hail from the tribe of Judah (Mic 5:2), and will shepherd's God's flock "in the strength of the LORD" (Mic 5:4). The fulfillment of the royal covenant with David will bring peace and security, and God's name will be great "to the ends of the earth." Messianic prophecies couched in "servant" and "branch" terminology are similar to that of the Major Prophets. If this is the same "branch" as mentioned in Jeremiah, then he is associated with David (Jer 23:5, 33:15). Later, in Zechariah, this branch reappears as a king who will build an eschatological temple, the future domain of the Messiah (Zech 3:8-10; 6:9-15).

4. The New Covenant.

The expression "new covenant" appears only in the book of Jeremiah (31:31-34), but the concept is present in other Prophetic Books, such as Isaiah, Ezekiel, Hosea and Malachi. Isaiah anticipates the new covenant primarily through the Servant Songs (Is 42:1-9; 49:1-13; 50:4-11; 52:13—53:12). The *Servant of Yahweh, the embodiment of God's covenant, is the agent through whom God's covenant blessing will be extended to all people. God declares that this servant himself will be "a covenant for the people" (Is 42:6). The new covenant is also anticipated by Isaiah through the promise of the eternal covenant of peace (Is 54:10). This covenant will usher the period that will be characterized by the absence of divine wrath. The peace aspect of this covenant is more than just the absence of war or hostility; it also has the connotation of the sum total of covenant blessing. The Servant of Yahweh as described in Isaiah will inaugurate a new covenant that has the Davidic covenant as its basis, thus one that is linked to messianic hopes. This is an everlasting covenant associated with the person and work of the Servant of Yahweh, and will thus result in everlasting joy (Is 55:3; 61:8).

The promises of the new covenant are made explicit in Jeremiah 31:31-34, a passage that is critical to the Book of Consolation (Jer 30—33). The coming days of restoration will usher in this new covenant that Yahweh will make with his people. The language of covenant making is similar to that used with the Abrahamic covenant (Gen 15:18) and the Mosaic covenant (Ex 34:10; Deut 5:2). Even though Yahweh made covenants with people in the past, this covenant is labeled as “new” both to differentiate it from the old ones, especially the Mosaic, and also to indicate that it will have new features not included in the previous covenants (see Kaiser, 11-23). This covenant will be all encompassing since it will be made “with the house of Israel and the house of Judah” (Jer 31:31). Just as both Israel and Judah have been affected by God’s judgment through exile, they will both benefit from the coming restoration available through the new covenant promises.

The fact that the new covenant will be different than the old (Mosaic) covenant can be seen from the expression “not like the covenant I made with their fathers” (Jer 31:32). The need for a new covenant is not because the form or function of the old was flawed (after all, God was its designer), but rather because of the people’s failure to obey it. The people broke the old covenant even though God was their covenant-giving husband (Jer 31:32). Here the covenant breaking is apostasy, and it is analogous to adultery.

The specific stipulations of the new covenant are enumerated in Jeremiah 31:33-34. The Mosaic law was written on tablets of stone (Ex 31:18), and these stones could be broken (Ex 32:19). The law could be lost (2 Kings 22:8), burned (Jer 36:23) or drowned (Jer 51:63), but the law written on the heart is permanent. The central motif of the new covenant is the knowledge of Yahweh (Jer 31:34). This knowledge was first accomplished through the teaching of the law. Moses was instructed to teach this law to the people, and in return they were to teach it to their children (Deut 6). The prophets emphasized that knowing God meant obeying the covenant stipulations. Thus, Hosea rebuked the people for not knowing God (Hos 4:1-2), and this lack of knowledge is synonymous with the lack of knowledge of the law (Hos 4:6). What God desires is both knowledge of and love for him (Hos 6:6).

One of the greatest promises of the new covenant is that the new covenant in general, and the promise of knowing God specifically, are not restricted to a specific social class or age group. Rather, God promises, “They shall all know me, from the least of them to the greatest” (Jer 31:34). This knowledge of God is also tied in with his forgiveness of sin. “I will remember their sin no more” is the last promise of this unbreakable covenant. It is through God’s forgiveness of sin that the universal knowledge of God is possible. The author of Hebrews quotes Jeremiah 31:31-34 in its entirety in Hebrews 8:8-12 to emphasize that this covenant is superior to the old covenant not merely because of better promises, but because of Christ being the mediator. Indeed, the book of Hebrews affirms Jesus’ superiority over Moses, Melchizedek, the priests and the angels.

Like Jeremiah, Ezekiel emphasizes that the institution of the new covenant in the hearts of the people is possible only through the presence of God’s Spirit in the people’s hearts. Twice in the book of Ezekiel God promises to give the people a new heart and to put his Spirit within them (Ezek 11:19; 36:26). Only under such conditions can the people now obey God’s rules and commandments (Ezek 36:27). The new covenant is instituted by Jesus at the establishment of the Lord’s Supper (Luke 22:20; cf. 1 Cor. 11:25) and inaugurated on the cross. All covenants find partial/ultimate fulfillment in the life, death and resurrection of Christ, through whom we have the great name “children of God,” and through whom we have forgiveness of sin and eternal life.

See also BLESSINGS AND CURSES; IDOLS, IDOLATRY, GODS; LAW; SIN, SINNERS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. Brueggemann, The Covenanted Self: Explorations in Law and Covenant (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1999); W. J. Dumbrell, Covenant and Creation: A Theology of the Old Testament Covenants (BTCL; Carlisle: Paternoster, 1997); W. Eichrodt, Theology of the Old Testament, vol. 1, trans. J. A. Baker (OTL; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1961); W. C. Kaiser Jr. “The Old Promise and the New Covenant: Jeremiah 31:31-34," JETS 15 (1972) 11-23; P. Kalluveetil, Declaration and Covenant: A Comprehensive Review of Covenant Formulae from the Old Testament and the Ancient Near East (AnBib 88; Rome: Biblical Institute, 1982); K. A. Kitchen, Ancient Orient and Old Testament (Chicago: InterVarsity Press, 1966); idem, "The Fall and Rise of Covenant, Law, and Treaty," TynBul 40 (1989) 118-35; H. C. Leupold, Exposition of Zechariah (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1971); D. J. McCarthy, Treaty and Covenant: A Study in Form in the Ancient Oriental Documents and in the Old Testament (AnBib 21A; Rome: Biblical Institute, 1978); T. E. McComiskey, The Covenants of Promise: A Theology of the Old Testament Covenants (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1985); G. J. McConville, "ברית," NIDOTTE 1:747-55; G. E. Mendenhall, Law and Covenant in Israel and the Ancient Near East (Pittsburgh: Biblical Colloquium, 1955); E. W. Nicholson, God and His People: Covenant and Theology in the Old Testament (Oxford: Clarendon, 1986); J. J. Niehaus, God at Sinai: Covenant & Theophany in the Bible and Ancient Near East (SOTBT; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1995); T. Rata, The Covenant Motif in Jeremiah's Book of Comfort: Textual and Intertextual Studies of Jeremiah 30-33 (SBL 105; New York: Peter Lang, 2007); R. Rendtorff, The Covenant Formula: An Exegetical and Theological Investigation, trans. M. Kohl (OTS; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1998); M. Weinfeld, "The Covenant of Grant in the Old Testament and in the Ancient Near East," JAOS 90 (1970) 184-203; idem, "Covenant Terminology in the Ancient Near East and Its Influence on the West," JAOS 93 (1973) 190-99; P. R. Williamson, "Covenant," DOTP 139-55; idem, Sealed with an Oath: Covenant in God's Unfolding Purpose (NSBT 23; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2007).

T. Rata

CREATION THEOLOGY

The views of G. von Rad and his contemporaries that the Israelite doctrine of creation developed late in the biblical tradition and is secondary to faith in God's saving action in history has dominated OT scholarship in the twentieth century. This perspective is misplaced, being based more on von Rad's reaction against the nature-religion ideologies of German National Socialism in the 1930s than on the Bible, but it has lingered in both academy and seminary. Von Rad draws heavily on creation texts in Isaiah 40—55 to support his thesis, but in so doing, he evokes a narrow view of what creation is and how it is depicted in the biblical texts (Marlow 2009, 60-66). In contrast, C. Westermann observes that God as Creator is not an article of faith but rather a fundamental premise running throughout the OT: "God's saving action can be an object of belief; Creation cannot" (Westermann, 71). Some scholars have stressed the importance of creation as one of the key theological themes of the OT Wisdom literature, even suggesting that the two are virtually synonymous (Perdue). However, such conflation of *wisdom and creation takes no account of the rich and diverse ways in which creation is depicted in other biblical texts such as the Prophetic Books. The language of creation is very much an integral part of the prophetic understanding rather than a "wisdom idea" introduced into the texts.

1. Creation Vocabulary
2. Cosmic Language
3. Figurative Language
4. Theological Themes
5. Some Key Texts

1. Creation Vocabulary.

The Hebrew verb bārā' ("to create") occurs about fifty times in the OT, almost always with God as the subject. Twenty-nine of these occur in the Prophetic Books, of which twenty-one are found in Isaiah 40—66, and a further eleven occur in the Priestly (P) texts of early Genesis (Gen 1; 5; 6). Von Rad's argument that Israelite creation theology originated in the exilic period is partly based on the view held by many scholars that both P and the later sections of Isaiah derive from the exilic or postexilic period. Although there are good reasons to support this view (see 5.2 below), the basic premise that the presence or absence of belief in God as Creator can be determined by word occurrence alone is flawed. Numerous other terms are used by the biblical prophets to denote God's creative activity, including God as the one who forms (yāsar) the *mountains (Amos 4:13) and light (Is 45:7), makes (ʿāśā) the constellations (Amos 5:8) and founds (yāsad) the earth (Is 48:13; Amos 9:6). These and similar terms may be brought together in a string of God's creative actions and attributes (Is 45:18; Jer 10:12; 33:2). More important are the numerous concepts, metaphors and ideas that “support the belief in YHWH as creator, without stating it explicitly” (Paas, 60) as well as the theological themes related to God’s interaction with the world that presuppose him as Creator of all that is.

2. Cosmic Language.

Cosmic themes and language form an important part of the repertoire of the prophets, and the way in which these are woven into the account of God’s dealing with his people suggests that, for the prophets, the entire cosmos participates as part of God’s creation in human political and social spheres. The terms “the heavens” (haššamayim) and “the earth” (hā’āreṣ) are employed together over sixty times. As well as featuring extensively in descriptions of the creation and its contents, particularly in Isaiah 40–55 (see 5.2 below), the earth and the heavens are appealed to as witnesses to God’s indictment of his people (Is 1:2; Mic 6:1-2) and as joyful participants in God’s *salvation (Is 44:23; 45:8; 49:13). Upheaval in the heavens as well as on earth is a sign of the Lord’s coming (Joel 2:10; see also Nah 1:5) and of his judgment against those foreign nations that challenge his sovereignty, whether *Babylon (Is 13:9-10) or Edom (Is 34:4). Such cosmic disturbance is also the result of Israel’s continued rebellion against their God, as graphically depicted in the prophet Jeremiah’s *lament (Jer 4:19-26).

3. Figurative Language.

The prophets make extensive use of a wide range of metaphorical language taken from creation to describe God and his relation to his people. The book of Hosea is particularly rich in figurative language, including extensive creation imagery. God is depicted as a wild *animal—a lion (Hos 11:10; see also Is 31:4; Jer 49:19; Amos 3:8) and a bear (Hos 13:8)—such imagery stressing the Lord’s supremacy and power and the need to fear him (Marlow 2009, 163-65; see also Strawn). More positively, the Lord is described as a rock, providing shelter and protection in times of trouble (Is 17:10; 26:4; 44:8; Hab 1:12), as the source of water to his people, falling like refreshing dew on Israel (Hos 6:3), and as the fountain of life to them (Joel 3:18). Such imagery for God taken from creation highlights the integral relationship between Creator and creation. As T. Fretheim notes, it “serves to temper a certain anthropocentricity in our talk about God. In fact . . . it could be said that God’s transcendence is given a special lift by the use of such natural metaphors, for among other things they evoke wonder and awe in human beings” (Fretheim, 247).

4. Theological Themes.

The biblical understanding of *God as Creator is primarily concerned not with his creative act of bringing the world into being, but rather with his ongoing involvement in and with his creation. Although the unquestionable belief that the Lord alone is Creator of the world is implicit in much of the prophetic material, a number of other important theological themes concerning God’s relation to his creation permeate the writings of the prophets.

4.1. Sovereignty over Creation. God’s supremacy over the whole of creation is demonstrated in the prophets in a number of ways. Jeremiah describes him as a God who is near and not far off, and one who fills his creation (Jer 23:23-24). God is present in the world that he made, and his relationship to it is neither limited to the human sphere nor mediated solely through human beings (Fretheim, 172). This is demonstrated in the fact that the creation mourns to God (Jer 12:11) and God himself addresses the land directly (Jer 22:29). Both annual and diurnal rhythms are under God’s control; the Lord maintains the “fixed orders” of the world—the cycles of night and day (Jer 31:35-36)—and yet is also able to disrupt them (Is 13:10; Ezek 32:7-8; Joel 3:15). When the Lord summons the creation, it responds in obedience to him (Amos 1:2; 9:5-6), often in contrast to its human inhabitants (Hos 11:1-2). The creation itself reveals something of God—his incomparable greatness and power (Is 40:25-26) and his name “the Lord of hosts” (Amos 4:13). The created world also acts as an agent of God’s judgment (see 4.4 below).

4.2. Provision for Creation. An important part of the notion of God as Creator is his action in sustaining and providing for his creation. In the prophets, it is the Lord who both gives the rain, which is crucial in a land of high summer temperatures and water scarcity (Jer 10:13; Zech 10:1), and withholds it (Is 3:1; Jer 3:3). He governs the weather patterns, on which the success of agriculture depends, giving rain for seedtime and guaranteeing the harvest (Is 30:23; Jer 5:24). For Amos, the failure of the rains is an opportunity for the Israelites to turn back to God, but to no avail (Amos 4:7-8). In the postexilic prophet Haggai, the people's failure to rebuild God's house results in the heavens withholding the rain and the earth its produce (Hag 1:9-11), while Malachi urges the people to bring their tithes and offerings to God in order to guarantee the Lord's provision for them (Mal 3:10-11). As well as literal depictions, the importance of water to life in ancient Israel makes it a powerful metaphor for God's blessing on his people (Is 12:3; 41:17-18) and for their rejection of him (Jer 2:13). In Hosea's extended *marriage metaphor, which graphically portrays Israel's broken relationship with God (Hos 2), the prophet stresses that it is the Lord, not the Canaanite deities, who provides grain, wine and oil—the essential commodities of the day (Hos 2:8). It is the Lord's goodness in giving these necessities that is celebrated in the prophets' messages of hope (Jer 31:10-12; Ezek 36:28-30). Even the actions of a farmer in knowing when to sow seed and how best to harvest are attributed to the Lord's wisdom (Is 28:29).

4.3. Justice, Righteousness and World Order. H. Schmid notes that in the ancient Near East “cosmic, political and social order find their unity under the concept of ‘creation’” (Schmid, 105). The view that the king as the representative of the deity on earth is guarantor of the order of creation, which is particularly associated with the Egyptian concept of maat, is also important in the biblical tradition (e.g., 2 Kings 8; Ps 72). In Isaiah, this royal ideology is combined with concepts of *justice (mīšpāt) and righteousness (šēdāqā) to denote the maintaining or breaking of creation order. Justice and righteousness are associated with the reign of an ideal king (Is 11:1-5; 32:1; see also Jer 23:5) and also with the well-being of the entire created order, not just human society (Is 11:6-9; 32:15-17). In other prophetic texts the terms “justice” and “righteousness,” either individually or combined as a hendiadys or parallelism, are used to denote the well-being of creation, whether by means of God's actions in the world (Jer 9:24; Hos 2:19) or those of human beings (Jer 22:3). Where justice and righteousness are lacking, all that is good and ordered in the world comes under threat (Is 59:8-9, 14; Amos 5:6-7, 10-12).

4.4. Creation and Judgment. In several prophetic texts the appearing of God in judgment on the earth (theophany) has a dramatic effect on the physical world. The whole creation, not just human society, is disrupted when the Lord descends from his heavenly temple (Mic 1:3-5), and his coming is accompanied by storms and clouds (Nah 1:2-5). In Habakkuk's extended theophany (Hab 3:3-15) God's glory shines forth (Hab 3:3-4), but his awesome power shakes his creation to its very core, as both the seas (Hab 3:15) and the nations (Hab 3:12) are trampled in his anger. The messages of judgment that comprise so great a part of the Prophetic Books present an inextricable link between human behavior and the moral order of creation. In Isaiah 24 the whole cosmos, heavens and earth, is disrupted (Is 24:4) and lies polluted because its inhabitants have “transgressed laws, violated the statutes, broken the everlasting covenant” (Is 24:5). The “everlasting covenant” (bērīt 'ōlām) here may evoke, according to R. Murray, an ancient Israelite tradition of a cosmic covenant between God and the world. This *covenant, or ordering of the world (Jer 33:20-26), can be broken by human beings, whose disobedience to God and transgression of the law violate the God-given order of the world. The resultant disorders in human society, in the land and in the cosmos are the consequences of that broken covenant (Is 24:6-13).

A similar pattern can be seen in Hosea 4, where the disloyalty of God's people (Hos 4:1) has devastating effects, not just on society (Hos 4:2), but also on the wider creation (Hos 4:3). Likewise, Jeremiah highlights the connection between the foolishness and faithlessness of God's people and the well-being of creation (Jer 4:22-26; 9:12-13) and lays responsibility for this “unmaking” of creation at the feet of Judah's leaders (Jer 12:10-11) (see Land). Contemporary scientific understanding sees the disruption of the physical world by events such as earthquakes and volcanic eruptions as a natural and essential geological process and cautions us against adopting a simplistic approach to the relationship between sin and natural disaster. Nevertheless, the prophetic understanding of a close interconnection between human behavior and the well-being of creation is very relevant in the light of the environmental issues currently facing the planet (Marlow 2008).

4.5. Restoration of Creation. If the prophets make a strong causal link between disobedience to the Lord and the disruption of the physical world, a similar connection is drawn between renewal of the people's relationship with God and the restoration of creation. The prophets' vision of hope includes the wilderness blossoming in glory and splendor (Is 35:1-2; 41:18-20) and the mountains flourishing (Joel 3:18; Amos 9:13b). Agriculture is again successful, to an extent that surpasses natural expectations (Amos 9:13a). The broken cosmic covenant is reestablished. In Ezekiel this is a covenant of peace that includes the giving of rain and the restoration of fertility (Ezek 34:25), while in Hosea the covenant is with the wild animals (Hos 2:18), a covenant that results in security for God's people (Hos 2:19-20) as well as the flourishing of the earth (Hos 2:21-22). The vision of the prophet in Isaiah 11 is for a kingdom of wisdom and godliness in which justice and righteousness prevail in society (Is 11:3-5) and harmony is restored between humanity and the rest of creation (Is 11:6-9), a vision echoed at the end of the book (Is 65:25). The coming salvation of the Lord is a reason for all creation to rejoice, from shore to shore, from mountain to desert (Is 42:10-12; 44:23).

5. Some Key Texts.

Although the language of creation and theology permeates the writing of the OT prophets, a number of texts give special emphasis to the Lord as Creator and his relationship with the creation.

5.1. Creation Hymns in Amos. The three fragmentary creation hymns, or doxologies, in the book of Amos (Amos 4:13; 5:8-9; 9:5-6) have been the subject of much debate, in particular concerning their origin and purpose (Marlow 2009, 139-46). Each hymn describes God almost exclusively in terms of his creation and control of the cosmos. Each one affirms that the attributes of the Lord to which they refer are part of his essential and unalterable character—his “name”—and in each of them the Lord is depicted as the God who communicates, both to humanity and to the wider creation. Amos 4:13 comprises five phrases, the first two of which highlight the Lord's cosmic power as creator of mountains and wind, while the final two speak of his activity within the world. Sandwiched in the middle of this description of creation and Creator is the enigmatic expression “he reveals to human beings his thoughts.” The central position of the phrase draws attention to the relative insignificance of humankind compared with the power and splendor of creation and with the majesty of God's presence on earth; it also highlights the fact that it is human beings to whom the Lord chooses to reveal something of himself.

The second hymn, Amos 5:5-6, expands the description of the Lord's cosmic power in Amos 4:13 to include the creation of the constellations Pleiades and Orion, and it reiterates the Lord's power over the rhythms of day and night. The third hymn, Amos 9:5-6, echoes some aspects of the second one. Its context suggests the possibility that God's power in creation might be turned against human beings who attempt to hide from his judgment (Amos 9:2-4). God's action, in the second and third hymns, of summoning the waters and pouring them out on the earth may be looking forward to a local flood yet to come or be harking back to the ancient flood tradition. Alternatively, it could signify God's ability to reverse his own acts of creation, in particular the separation of dry land from water (Gen 1:6-10). The evoking of the created world in the context of the Lord's judgment against his people suggests a moral order built into the very structure of creation.

5.2. Creator God in Isaiah 40—55. In all the material of the Prophetic Books, Isaiah 40—55, and in particular Isaiah 40—48, offers the most extensive and carefully developed understanding of God as Creator and his relationship to his creation (Fretheim, 181-94). The reasons for such an emphasis on God as Creator probably lie in the historical situation to which these prophetic oracles are addressed, toward the end of the Babylonian exile (ca. 550-540 BC). With the final conquest of Judah by the Babylonian emperor Nebuchadnezzar in 587 BC, the people of God had lost their temple and their king, much of the population was exiled in a foreign land, and doubt was cast on their status as God's chosen people (the heartache and theological questioning that this catastrophe provoked are graphically depicted in the book of Lamentations). Those in exile undoubtedly faced serious temptation to abandon their Lord and embrace Babylonian idol worship. In this context, as R. Rendtorff notes, “Faith in God the Creator was perceived and experienced as the all-embracing framework, as the fundamental, all-underlying premise for any talk about God, the world, Israel, and the individual" (Rendtorff, 107-8).

Isaiah 40—48 emphasizes the importance of God as Creator, both to offer hope that the Lord has not abandoned his people and to warn against adopting Babylonian religious practices. The extended creation oracle in Isaiah 40:12-31 follows an outpouring of hope and comfort (Is 40:1-5) and explains that God's power as Creator transcends history, in terms of both the historical events that have befallen the weak, disheartened Israelites (Is 40:27-28) and the ever-present hubris of their earthly conquerors (Is 40:21-24). The scale and the splendor of God's creative activity are stressed (Is 40:12, 26), and his might is contrasted with the impotence of human rulers (Is 40:15-17; 41:4-5) and foreign idols (Is 40:18-20). God's power as Creator is closely linked with his actions in Israel's past, in particular the exodus (Is 43:15-17), as well as with his choice of the Persian king Cyrus as the means by which salvation will come to Israel (Is 45:11-13). The understanding of God as Creator of all is also key to the restoration of Israel's sense of identity (Is 43:1-5; 44:1-3) and their calling to be a light to the nations (Is 42:5-7). The relationship between creation, redemption and salvation in Isaiah 40—55 is the subject of much discussion and is beyond the scope of this article; suffice it to note, "For Isaiah 40-55, creation is the beginning, middle, and end of God's work with the world. God originated the cosmos, has continued creative work all through the course of the world's history, and will one day bring a new heaven and new earth into being" (Fretheim, 193).

See also ANIMAL IMAGERY; COSMOLOGY; FLORAL IMAGERY; LAND; MOUNTAIN IMAGERY; WILDERNESS, DESERT.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. T. E. Fretheim, God and World in the Old Testament: A Relational Theology of Creation (Nashville: Abingdon, 2005);

H. Marlow, The Earth Is the Lord's: A Biblical Response to Environmental Issues (Cambridge: Grove Books, 2008); idem, Biblical Prophets and Contemporary Environmental Ethics: Re-reading Amos, Hosea and First Isaiah (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2009); R. Murray, The Cosmic Covenant: Biblical Themes of Justice, Peace and the Integrity of Creation (HeyM 7; London: Sheed & Ward, 1992); S. Paas, Creation and Judgement: Creation Texts in Some Eighth Century Prophets (OTS 47; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2003); L. G. Perdue, Wisdom and Creation: the Theology of Wisdom Literature (Nashville: Abingdon, 1994); R. Rendtorff, Canon and Theology: Overtures to an Old Testament Theology, trans. and ed. M. Kohl (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1994 [1991]); H. H. Schmid, "Creation, Righteousness, Salvation: 'Creation Theology' and the Broad Horizon of Biblical Theology," in Creation in the Old Testament, ed. B. W. Anderson (IRT 6; London: SPCK, 1980 [1973]) 102-17; B. A. Strawn, What Is Stronger Than a Lion? Leonine Image and Metaphor in the Hebrew Bible and the Ancient Near East (OBO 212; Fribourg: Academic Press; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2005); G. von Rad, "The Theological Problem of the Old Testament Doctrine of Creation," in The Problem of the Hexateuch and Other Essays, trans. E. W. Trueman Dicken (London: SCM, 1984 [1936]) 131-43; C. Westermann, Creation, trans. J. Scullion (London: SPCK, 1974 [1971]).

H. F. Marlow

CREATOR. See CREATION THEOLOGY; GOD.

CULT. See LITURGY AND CULT.

CULTIC PROPHECY. See ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN PROPHECY.

CUP OF WRATH. See WRATH.

CURSES. See BLESSINGS AND CURSES.

D

DANIEL: BOOK OF

The book of Daniel has often been the center of debate. Debates about the interpretation of prophecy and historical accuracy have sometimes overshadowed the message of the book. This article outlines the structure and content of Daniel and discusses some general principles of interpretation. It then surveys the current state of the debates about historical and interpretation issues before discussing the date, authorship and composition of the book. It concludes by summarizing its message and its influence on the NT.

1. Structure and Content
2. Literary Forms and Genre
3. Historical Issues
4. Interpretation Issues
5. Date, Authorship and Composition
6. The Message of Daniel
7. Daniel and the New Testament

1. Structure and Content.

1.1. The Hebrew/Aramaic Book. Daniel 1—6 contains stories about Judean exiles in Babylon from 606/5 BC, when the Neo-Babylonian ruler Nebuchadnezzar takes captives from Jerusalem to Babylon, to shortly after the Persian capture of Babylon in 539 BC. They are written in the third person about Daniel and his friends. Daniel 7—12 contains *visions focusing on the persecution of the Jews by Antiochus IV in 167–164 BC, recounted in the first person by Daniel. The book begins in *Hebrew, but when Nebuchadnezzar's advisors begin to speak in Daniel 2:4, the language changes to *Aramaic. It changes back to Hebrew at Daniel 8:1, continuing in Hebrew until the end of the book. The linguistic division does not coincide with the division between stories and visions. This gives Daniel 7 a pivotal role in binding the two halves of the book together, especially since Daniel 2—7 has a striking chiasmic structure.

- (A) A dream about four earthly kingdoms and God's kingdom (Dan 2)
- (B) A story about Judeans who are faithful in the face of death (Dan 3)
- (C) A story about royal pride that is humbled (Dan 4)
- (C') A story about royal pride that is humbled (Dan 5)
- (B') A story about a Judean who is faithful in the face of death (Dan 6)
- (A') A vision about four earthly kingdoms and God's kingdom (Dan 7).

The theme of this section is the faithfulness of the Judeans to God under pagan rulers. Daniel 8:1—12:8 contains the complementary theme of faithfulness under persecution. This is anticipated in the references in Daniel 7 to the persecution of “the saints of the Most High,” again giving this chapter a pivotal role.

Daniel 1 provides an introduction to the whole book. It explains how Daniel and his three friends come to be in exile in the royal court in Babylon and sets the time frame (Dan 1:1, 21). Mention of Daniel's skill in visions and dreams (Dan 1:17) prepares the way for Daniel 7—12. Daniel 12:9–13 forms a conclusion to the whole book. The phrase “those who are wise will understand” (hammāskilīm yābīnū) (Dan 12:10) echoes the reference to “young men skilled [māskilīm] in all wisdom, knowledge and insight [mēbīnē]” (Dan 1:4).

Based on this discussion, one can suggest an outline structure for the book:

Daniel 1	Introduction
Daniel 2—7	Faithfulness under pagan rulers
Daniel 8:1—12:8	Faithfulness under persecution
Daniel 12:9-13	Conclusion

1.2. The Greek Additions. The Greek text of Daniel includes passages not found in the Hebrew/Aramaic text. There is no evidence that they were ever part of it. The Prayer of Azariah and the Song of the Three Young Men are inserted between Daniel 3:23 and Daniel 3:24. These are pious embellishments of the story, giving further glory to God and underlining the divine origin of the Judeans' deliverance from the fiery furnace. The stories of Susanna and of Bel and the Dragon are separate chapters in the Greek form of the book. Susanna is not a court tale. Its central issue is not Jewish identity but rather personal morality. The others resemble court tales, but Daniel's enemies are priests and the populace of Babylon, not sages. They are polemics against idolatry. The Latin Vulgate translation of the OT included these additions, which are accepted as part of the Roman Catholic and Orthodox canons.

2. Literary Forms and Genre.

2.1. Court Tales. The stories in Daniel 1—6 fit into the context of a type of literature that was widespread, both in time and geography, in the ancient Near East. These stories about wise courtiers (sages) are called "court tales" by modern scholars. As well as the biblical stories of Joseph and Esther (the latter with its subplot about Mordecai the courtier), there is the story of Ahiqar from ancient Mesopotamia. An Aramaic version of it has been found among the documents from the Jewish colony at Elephantine (fifth century BC). Several such stories are known from ancient Egypt, the best known being the stories of Sinuhe (c. 1900 BC), Wenamun (c. 1000 BC) and Onchsheshonqy (c. 400 BC). D. Redford listed various common motifs that occur in these stories (Redford, 94-97). L. Wills extended the range of tales studied to include those told by the Greek writer Herodotus (Wills, 55-70).

Scholars have often recognized that the stories in Daniel 3 and Daniel 6 differ from the others in Daniel 1—6. W. Humphreys gave the two types the names "tales of court conflict"

(Dan 3; 6) and "tales of court contest" (Dan 2; 4; 5). J. Collins analyzed the patterns of the two types of tale (which also apply to other stories) (J. Collins 1977, 34-54). In tales of court contest the king is faced with a problem that neither he nor his sages can resolve. The hero is called in and succeeds and is elevated to high position. In tales of court conflict the hero is initially in a state of well-being. Because of some kind of conspiracy, he is endangered and condemned to death or prison. He is eventually released and restored to his position of honor, or even promoted. Daniel 1:8-16 contains a variant of the court contest pattern.

These ancient Near Eastern court tales seem to have been written for three main reasons. First, they are entertaining. They contain humor (e.g., Dan 3:1-7) and satire (e.g., the picture of the king in Dan 6 manipulated by his courtiers and trapped by his own immutable law) and were meant to be enjoyed by the readers or hearers. They express the art of the storyteller rather than simply the concerns of the historian. When, as in Daniel, the humor and satire are turned against the rulers, it gives the story a subversive edge. Second, many court tales aimed at edifying the readers. By drawing the readers or hearers to identify with the characters, good storytelling is an effective teaching method. The stories in Daniel teach theological and moral truths. Third, court tales about courtiers in the service of foreign kings encourage conquered peoples to maintain their sense of ethnic identity and worth and to take a generally positive attitude to their situation. In Daniel the issue of identity centers on faithfulness to the God of Israel. When this clashes with the demands of the ruler, the story has a subversive edge.

2.2. Visions. In Daniel 7:1-2, Daniel's experience is described both as a "dream" and a "vision." The vision accounts in Daniel 7—8 fit the pattern of dream reports in the ancient Near East identified by A. Oppenheim:

Introduction	7:1	8:1
Report of the vision	7:2-27	8:2-25
End of the vision	7:28a	8:26
Daniel's reaction	7:28b	8:27

The accounts in Daniel 9; 10—12 do not fit this pattern.

The visions of Daniel 7—8 are examples of symbolic visions, because images and actions are seen that symbolize something else. The visions in Daniel 9; 10–12 are examples of epiphany visions, in which a supernatural being appears and conveys a message.

The individual images in symbolic visions are not like ciphers in a code, whose meaning is exhausted once the code has been broken. These symbols draw on established cultural images, ideas and stereotypes, as well as the feelings that they evoke. They have a “feel” about them that simple ciphers do not have. As a result, they evoke a “gut reaction” that goes beyond any simplistic “this is that” interpretation. It may be hard for later readers to discern these noncipher aspects of symbols because usually they are specific to the culture in which the symbols became current. The attempt to capture something of the wider significance of the symbols used has produced extensive discussion and debate about the religio-historical background of the imagery used in Daniel 7–8 (Lucas 1990).

2.3. The Literary Form of Daniel 8:23-25; 11:3-45. The form and content of these passages has no parallel in Hebrew prophecy. In 1964 A. Grayson and W. Lambert published some texts which they called “Akkadian Prophecies” and drew attention to similarities between them and Daniel 8:23-25; 11:3-45. Five core texts are now known: the Marduk Prophecy, the Šulgi Prophecy, the Dynastic Prophecy, the Uruk Prophecy, and Text A. Two other texts, Text B and LBAT 1543, have similarities with this group.

The introductions of the Marduk and Šulgi Prophecies present them as speeches by the god Marduk and the king Šulgi of Ur (c. 2094-2047 BC) respectively. The introductions of the other core texts are broken off or too damaged to make sense. All five are purported prophecies in the form of concise surveys of a series of rulers’ reigns. The rulers are unnamed but are referred to as “a king/prince” or as “the king of X.” Plausible correlations can be made between most of the rulers and events alluded to in the texts and known historical rulers and events. On the assumption that the texts originate from soon after the latest event that they record, they can be dated to between the twelfth (the Marduk Prophecy) and the third century (the Dynastic Prophecy) BC.

Daniel 11 has significant points of similarity with these prophecies. There is a similarity of style, which W. Lambert characterizes as a “concise annalistic history with names censored and the verbs in the future tense” (Lambert, 9). There is a semantic similarity in the phrase “(after him) a king shall arise,” which is used as a section divider in the Akkadian Prophecies. Daniel 11 lacks a regular section divider but does use a similar phrase (Dan 11:2, 3, 7, 20, 21; 12:1). The phrases “in his place shall arise” and “a king will arise” do not occur elsewhere in the Hebrew Bible, so influence from the Akkadian Prophecies is plausible. A further reason for suggesting a direct link between Daniel 11 and the Akkadian Prophecies is the lack of comparable material from elsewhere. Another similarity between Daniel and the Akkadian Prophecies is the command to seal up the book in Daniel 12:4. The Dynastic Prophecy ends with a secrecy colophon. So, E. Lucas has suggested that the form of the prophetic surveys of history in Daniel 8:23-25; 11:2-12:4 is best explained if they originated in the Babylonian Diaspora and the author was well acquainted with such Babylonian literature (Lucas 2002, 269-72). The Akkadian Prophecies have close associations with the literature of Babylonian mantic wisdom (the interpretation of omens, dreams and visions) as distinct from the didactic wisdom found in proverbs and related literature (Biggs). Daniel and his friends were skilled in Chaldean literature and wisdom (Dan 1:17-20), and in the stories it is mantic wisdom that is prominent (Lucas 2002, 56, 70). It is also notable that there is increasing recognition that Babylonian mantic wisdom influenced the development of apocalyptic literature (Lucas 2002, 311).

Since they seem to have been written after most of the events that they describe, the purpose of the Akkadian Prophecies was not to predict the course of history but rather to interpret it—in particular, to explain and to legitimate the current situation. In some cases the closing lines seem to look to the immediate future, expressing what the author hoped would happen.

2.4. Prophecy and Apocalypse. K. Koch drew attention to the variety of different definitions of *apocalyptic in use up to 1970. He stressed the need to distinguish the literary genre of apocalypse from the historical apocalyptic movement from which it arose. He also argued that a clear definition of the genre must be arrived at before attempting to understand the movement and listed what he saw as key characteristics of apocalypses. Koch's approach has been refined in two ways. P. Hanson made a distinction between apocalypse (the literary genre), apocalyptic eschatology (a religious perspective) and apocalypticism (the symbolic universe of a religio-social movement).

A seminar of the Society of Biblical Literature produced a definition of the literary genre of apocalypse based on a study of works normally classed as apocalypses from the period 250 BC to AD 250: "Apocalypse is a genre of revelatory literature with a narrative framework, in which a revelation is mediated by an otherworldly being to a human recipient, disclosing a transcendent reality which is both temporal, insofar as it envisages eschatological salvation, and spatial, insofar as it involves another, supernatural world" (J. Collins 1979, 9). The seminar also concluded that apocalypses fall into two subgenres: those with other worldly journeys and those with a review of history. The definition carries the caveat that its intention is only to mark out the boundaries of the genre and not to give a complete or adequate description of the constituent works that fall within that boundary. It covers only the constant core characteristics of apocalypses. Most apocalypses are a composite of several types of literature. This definition has found wide, but not universal, acceptance. Some scholars want to add to it a statement about the function of an apocalypse, usually along the lines that it provides consolation and encouragement to a group in a crisis situation.

Daniel 10–12 is the only section of the OT that this definition fits well. It is an apocalypse with a review of history. In both form and content the book of Daniel as a whole stands out as different from the Prophetic Books of the OT. Its eschatology is apocalyptic rather than prophetic. However, it also differs in form and content from the classic apocalypses. Overall, Daniel lies somewhere on a line of development between the Hebrew prophets and the Jewish apocalypses but appears to be closer in form and content to the apocalypses. It is perhaps best regarded as one of the earliest examples of the apocalyptic genre.

3. Historical Issues.

3.1. Daniel 1:1–2. Jeremiah 25:1 equates the fourth year of King Jehoiakim of Judah with the first year of King Nebuchadnezzar of *Babylon, whereas Daniel 1:1 has Nebuchadnezzar besieging Jerusalem in the third year of Jehoiakim. The two statements can be correlated if Jeremiah is using the Egyptian way of reckoning regnal years, with the months between a king's accession to the throne and the following New Year counted as "year one" of his reign, and Daniel is using the Babylonian system, in which this period was "year zero."

A. Millard shows that if Daniel 1:1 is based on the Babylonian system and an autumnal New Year is assumed (which may have been the case in Judah), then Jehoiakim's third year would have run into October 605 BC (Millard, 69). By then, Nebuchadnezzar had become king and might have been with the army in Syria. In any case, Nebuchadnezzar need not have been present at whatever event may be referred to in Daniel 1:1. It was quite common in the ancient Near East for the actions of subordinates to be attributed to their superiors. Therefore, some punitive action by the Babylonian forces against Jehoiakim, an Egyptian vassal, late in his third year is a possibility.

3.2. Daniel 5. For some ten years of his reign, Nabonidus was absent from Babylon, based at Teima in Arabia. According to the Verse Account of Nabonidus 2.20, when he went to Teima, Nabonidus "entrusted the kingship" to Belshazzar (ANET, 313). The use of the title "king" of Belshazzar in Daniel has been seen as mistaken and unhistorical because he seems not to have enjoyed some royal prerogatives, including the title šarru ("king") (Beaulieu, 185–203). A bilingual inscription on a statue discovered at Tell Fakhariyeh is relevant to this issue (Millard and Bordreuil). The statue depicts a ninth-century BC ruler of Guzan. The Assyrian text describes him as šakin Guzani ("governor of Guzan"), whereas the Aramaic text styles him mlk gwzn ("king of Guzan"). This indicates that mlk in Aramaic had a wider meaning, or was used more loosely, than šarru in Akkadian. So, the use of malaka' in Daniel 5 is neither inaccurate nor unhistorical.

According to Akkadian sources, Belshazzar was the eldest son of Nabonidus. Why, then, is he represented as the son of Nebuchadnezzar in Daniel 5? Three answers have been proposed. First, D. Wiseman argues that Nabonidus, who was a member of Nebuchadnezzar's court, may have married one of his daughters (Wiseman 1985, 10-11). This would make Bels-hazzar Nebuchadnezzar's grandson. In the Semitic languages "father/son" can be used of more distant forebears/descendants. Second, a literary reason could lie behind the linking of Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar. The empire was at its height under the former and met its end under the latter. Third, the story in Daniel 4 was originally about Nabonidus. The application of it to Nebuchadnezzar resulted in the change of parentage for Belshazzar. This possibility is discussed below (see 3.3 below). None of these proposals is entirely convincing, and choosing between them is a matter of weighing probabilities.

3.3. Material Related to Daniel 4—5. There is a considerable scholarly consensus that Nabonidus's absence from his capital lies behind the story of Nebuchadnezzar's madness in Daniel 4. Support for this has been found in an Aramaic text discovered at Qumran, the Prayer of Nabonidus (4Q242 [definitive publication, J. Collins 1996]). There are points of contact with Daniel 4: a Babylonian king is afflicted for seven years, a Jewish diviner is involved, the king writes a letter to honor God, and the narrative is in the first person, with the king speaking. Some scholars see reference to a dream in another piece of the fragment, but others dispute this on good philological grounds (J. Collins 1996, 92). There are, however, notable differences between the two texts: the king's name is different, the king's affliction is different, and the Jewish diviner is not named. Collins concludes, "The fragmentary state of the document does not permit us to claim a direct literary relationship. The stories may be different developments of a common tradition" (J. Collins 1993, 218).

A fragmentary cuneiform text seems to refer to some mental disorder afflicting Nebuchadnezzar, perhaps to his neglecting and leaving Babylon, and tells of repentance for neglect of the worship of the gods. It has been suggested that the latter part of the text refers to Amel-Marduk, but Wiseman (1985, 102-3) gives good reasons for taking all of it as referring to Nebuchadnezzar.

Clearly, caution is in order regarding the consensus that Daniel 4 was originally a story about Nabonidus that has been transferred to Nebuchadnezzar, especially since very little is known from Babylonian sources about the last thirty years of Nebuchadnezzar's life.

3.4. Darius the Mede. Darius the Mede is one of the major enigmas in the book of Daniel. He is not known from any sources outside the Bible. Cyrus the Persian conquered Babylon. There has been a long and complicated debate about the issue of Darius the Mede in the book of Daniel (for a classic review of the debate up until 1934, see Rowley).

Most scholars have concluded that Darius the Mede is a literary construct, not a historical person. There are prophetic oracles about a Median conquest of Babylon (Is 13:17; 21:2; Jer 51:11, 28). The writer of Daniel, not knowing the actual course of events, assumed that the Babylonian Empire fell to the Medes before the rise of Persia. So, the narratives in Daniel 1—6 required a Median king between Belshazzar and Cyrus the Persian (Dan 6:28). Darius the Mede was created to meet this requirement. What is said about the figure of the ram in Daniel 8:3-4 raises a question mark against this. J. Montgomery comments, "The moments of the vision of the horns well represent the relation of Media and Persia in power and time" (Montgomery, 328). Commenting on the same verses, E. Heaton says, "One wonders whether the writer's knowledge of their history is quite as inaccurate as some other references to the Median kingdom suggest" (Heaton, 192).

Some have argued that "Darius the Mede" was another name for the general who captured Babylon on behalf of Cyrus. Cuneiform sources refer to him as "Ugbaru" or "Gubaru," and in classical writings he is called "Gobryas." However, it is now clear that he died not long after capturing Babylon, and that Cambyses was "king of Babylon" under his father for about a year (Grabbe 1988).

Wiseman (1956) proposed that Daniel 6:28 is the key to Darius the Mede's identity. This verse can be translated as "Daniel prospered during the reign of Darius, that is, the reign of Cyrus the Persian." This takes the wāw in this verse as explicative, as it clearly is in 1 Chronicles 5:26, where this kind of construction identifies Pul as being one and the same as Tiglath-pileser. Wiseman also argued that since Cyrus took over the Median Empire and had a Median mother, he could be called a Mede, even "king of the Medes." Moreover, he would have been about sixty-two when he conquered Babylon (Dan 5:31). The statement that Darius's father was Ahasuerus (Dan 9:1) is a problem, since Cyrus's father was named "Cambyses." Wiseman suggested that "Ahasuerus" might have been an old Achaemenid royal title. B. Colless supports Wiseman on literary grounds. He notes that most of the major figures in the book of Daniel have two (or more) designations. He also argues that it is very unlikely that the author was ignorant of the biblical references to Cyrus as the conqueror of Babylon (e.g., 2 Chron 36:20-23; Ezra 1:2-4; Is 45:1). As a "student of prophecy" (Dan 9:1-2), he knew that the Medes should play a part in the destruction of Babylon (e.g., Jer 51:11, 28). Cyrus was partly Median and ruled the Medes as well as the Persians. This is emphasised by giving him the alternative name "Darius the Mede." Wiseman's suggestion seems to provide a plausible answer to the enigma, but it is a case of what is possible and not what is proven.

4. Interpretation Issues.

4.1. The Four Empires and the Small Horn.

This is a hotly debated issue in the study of Daniel. The earliest evidence that we have of the interpretation of Daniel 7 is Sibylline Oracles 3:388-400, dating from about 140 BC. It identifies the fourth kingdom as that of Alexander and his successors. Since at least the time of Josephus (Ant. 10.10.4) there has been a tradition of interpretation identifying the fourth kingdom with the Roman Empire. 2 Esdras 12:11-12, written at about the same time that Josephus wrote, identifies the fourth kingdom as Rome but makes it clear that this is a break with the then accepted interpretation. The choice therefore is between the sequence Babylonian, Median, Persian, Greek and the sequence Babylonian, Medo-Persian, Greek, Roman.

The interpretation in Daniel 8 makes it clear that the ram with two horns represents the combined Medo-Persian Empire. Cyrus II (the Great) of Persia began his reign in 559 BC as a vassal of the Medes. He rebelled, and in 550 BC he defeated the Median king Astyages and incorporated Media and Persia into one empire. The goat represents the Greek Empire, and the single "conspicuous" horn is Alexander the Great. In the years 334-331 BC he won a series of victories over Darius III and became ruler of an empire stretching from Greece to India and Egypt to central Asia. At the height of his power he died of a fever in Babylon in 323 BC, and his empire was divided among his generals. Following a period of infighting, four kingdoms emerged. Two of these were the Seleucid kingdom, which included Syria and Mesopotamia, and the Ptolemaic kingdom in Egypt. They fought for control of the area that included Judea.

4.1.1. The Small Horn. There is general agreement that the small horn in Daniel 8 symbolizes Antiochus IV, who usurped the Seleucid throne from his nephew. He became increasingly megalomaniac. From 169 BC his coins picture his head with the title theos epiphanēs ("god manifest"). He probably saw himself as an incarnation of the god Zeus. In 167 BC he instigated a severe persecution of the orthodox Jews, attempting to stamp out their religion. This provoked the Maccabean Revolt, and in December of 164 BC forces under Judas Maccabeus recaptured the temple and cleansed and rededicated it. Antiochus died at about this time, struck down by a sudden illness while robbing a temple in Persia. The language of Daniel 8:10 is symbolic and draws on Isaiah 14; Ezekiel 28, which speak of earlier rulers (of Assyria and Tyre) whose pride led them to have pretensions of deity. They use imagery found also in the texts from Ugarit, which tell how the god Athtar, the morning star, made a failed attempt to take over Baal's throne.

The imagery of the small horn seems to pick up on the image used in Daniel 7:8, suggesting that the horns in the two visions symbolize the same ruler. There are considerable similarities between the horns in the two visions: both arise out the second stage of a great empire, become great from small beginnings, exhibit blasphemous arrogance, persecute and prevail against the "holy ones" for a set period, and oppose God and are destroyed by God. There are also differences: one grows as an additional horn among ten, while the other grows from one of four horns; one uproots three of the previous ten horns, while the other appears without harming any of the previous four or increasing their number; the actions of the first are centered on "the holy ones of the Most High," while those of the second also include desecration of a "holy place" and halting its sacrifices; one has dominance for "a times, two times, and half a time," but the other for "two thousand three hundred evenings and mornings."

The differences are not contradictory; they are complementary views resulting from differences in focus of the two visions. In Daniel 8 the preceding rulers of the Seleucid Empire are not mentioned. Instead, it focuses on the horn's relationship to the four successor kingdoms of Alexander's empire. This prepares the way for Daniel 11, which will focus on the struggle between two of them, because the Jews get caught up in it. Meanwhile, this vision gives more details of Antiochus's dealings with the Jews, expanding on the single statement in Daniel 7:25 that he planned "to change the set times and the law."

4.1.2. The Fourth Empire as Greece. If the small horns of the two visions both refer to Antiochus, then the fourth empire in Daniel 7 must be Alexander's. Since the vision of the four beasts is a counterpart of the dream in Daniel 2, the same interpretation must apply to the kingdoms of that dream too. The main objection to the sequence Babylonian, Median, Persian, Greek has been that there was no Median Empire between the Babylonian and the Persian, and the Medes never ruled over Judea as did the other empires.

This ignores the possibility that Daniel's viewpoint is not that of a modern historian, but rather that of a Jew exiled in Babylon. The Medes never ruled the territory of Israel or Judah, but they did rule over some Israelites. The Assyrians deported many of the Israelites and settled some "in the cities of the Medes" (2 Kings 17:6; 18:11). The Judeans were interested in the plight of their northern kindred. Judean prophets uttered oracles about the return of these exiles (e.g., Jer 30–31; Ezek 37; Mic 5). The author of Daniel was aware of the prophecies of restoration in Jeremiah (Dan 9:2) and incorporates in Daniel 9 a prayer expressing the distress of Judah, the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and "all Israel, those that are near and those that are far away, in all the countries where you have driven them" (Dan 9:7).

The structure of the visions in Daniel 2; 7 means that the kingdoms are presented sequentially, but there is no reason why they should not be contemporaneous, or overlap. In fact, the Babylonian and Median Empires did overlap, and the Median Empire reached the peak of its power when Babylon's power was waning. So, the sequence in Daniel can be seen as a quite reasonable perception of history from the fall of the Assyrian Empire to an intervention by God to establish his kingdom, presented from the perspective of a Jewish exile in Babylon. During this period those Judeans and Israelites who are experiencing God's chastisement and who will, if they remain faithful, share in the ultimate kingdom, experience the power of Babylon, Media, Persia and Greece.

4.1.3. The Fourth Empire as Rome. Conservative scholars have favored this position partly because it avoided the perceived problem of the Median Empire and partly because it makes the visions in Daniel 2; 7 point to Jesus' coming. The problems raised by identifying Rome as the fourth empire are significant. First, nothing in what is said of the fourth kingdom in the vision of the image suggests it is Rome. What is said about marriage alliances in Daniel 2:43 fits well the use by the Seleucids and Ptolemies of such alliances. Their marriage alliances are prominent in Daniel 11. Second, nothing that is said about the fourth beast points specifically to Rome, whereas the description of it as "different from all the others" (repeated for emphasis [Dan 7:7, 19]) fits with the fact that Greece, under Alexander the Great, was the first nonoriental power to conquer the Near East. Third, if Rome is the fourth kingdom, one has to make a distinction between the small horns of Daniel 7 and Daniel 8. As discussed above, this is unnecessary and unlikely. Finally, if the fourth kingdom is Greece, each of the surveys of history in Daniel 2; 7; 8; 11 has the same terminus, the persecution of the Jews by Antiochus IV. Also, the statement in Daniel 8:25 that the little horn is broken "by no human hand" echoes Daniel 2:34, where a stone "cut out, not by human hand" strikes the feet of the image and destroys it. This suggests that the fourth kingdom of the image and the Greek Empire, which gave rise to Antiochus IV, the small horn, are the same.

4.2. "One Like a Son of Man" and "The Holy Ones of the Most High." In both Aramaic and Hebrew the phrase "son of man" (whether using the root ʾdm or ʾnš) denotes a human being. There is much debate about whom or what is denoted by the human figure in Daniel 7:13.

First, there are "individual" interpretations. A few have suggested a historical deliverer of the Jews such as Judas Maccabeus. The Jewish apocalypses 1 Enoch 37–71 and 4 Ezra 13 clearly interpret Daniel 7:13 in terms of a messianic figure (see Messiah). Christians have applied this to Jesus (e.g., Beasley-Murray). However, there is no Davidic messianic figure elsewhere in Daniel. The cloud imagery has led some to argue that a supernatural, angelic figure is intended, noting that elsewhere in Daniel angels have a human appearance. The figure has then usually been identified with Michael, the angelic “prince” of the Jews (e.g., J. Collins 1993, 310). However, the two figures are not explicitly linked when Michael appears later in Daniel.

Second, there are “collective” interpretations (e.g., Hartman and Di Lella). The figure represents “the [people of the] holy ones of the Most High” (Dan 7:18, 22, 25, 27). They, like the figure in the vision, receive kingship and dominion.

Finally, there are “symbolic” interpretations (e.g., Lucas 2002, 186-87). The scene in the throne room is a continuation of the vision of the beasts, and the human figure seems to stand in contrast to the beasts. They are deprived of kingship and dominion; he receives it forever. They symbolize earthly, human powers; he symbolizes the kingdom of God. He is a human figure because it was to humans made in the image of God that God gave dominion and rule over the earth (Gen 1:26-28).

The distinction between the collective and symbolic interpretations is not clear-cut. Consistency within the context of the vision favors the latter, but “the holy ones of the Most High” might be seen as the historical expression of the kingdom of God on earth. However, their identity is also a matter of debate. When the adjective qēdōšim is used as a noun in the Hebrew Bible, it nearly always refers to heavenly beings. It refers to humans in Psalm 34:9 and possibly in Deuteronomy 33:2; Psalm 16:3. For this reason, some scholars (e.g., J. Collins 1993, 316-18) conclude that “the holy ones of the Most High” refers to the angelic counterpart of Israel. They then take “the people of the holy ones of the Most High” (Dan 7:27) to refer to Israel. Against this others (e.g., Hartman and Di Lella, 89-102) argue that the small horn’s actions against the “holy ones” in Daniel 7:21, 25 fit most naturally with Antiochus’s actions against the Jews. They interpret Daniel 7:27 epexegetically as “the people which consists of the holy ones of the Most High” and argue that the context of Daniel 7 requires the rarer use of qēdōšim to denote humans.

4.3. The Seventy Sevens. J. Montgomery surveyed what he called “the trackless waste of assumptions and theories” that have been used by those seeking to interpret Daniel 9:24-27 in terms of “an exact chronology fitting into the history of Salvation” (Montgomery, 390-401). His discussion can be updated by those by J. Baldwin (172-78) and A. Collins (112-23). Only a few representative interpretations can be considered here.

The word for “sevens” in Daniel 9:24-27 is used in Daniel 10:2-3 to refer to “weeks,” and those seeking a chronological interpretation appeal to Leviticus 25:8, in which the period of forty-nine years leading to the Jubilee Year is spoken of as “seven weeks of years.” Deciding the starting point of a chronological scheme, the time of “the going out of a word to restore and build Jerusalem” (Dan 9:25), is problematic. The context of Daniel reading “the word of Yahweh to Jeremiah the prophet” (Dan 9:2) suggests strongly that this refers to one of Jeremiah’s oracles. The main possibilities are the prophecy about seventy years (Jer 25:12 [605 BC]); the repeat of this in his letter to the exiles (Jer 29:10 [597 BC]); his prophecies of restoration (Jer 30:18-22; 31:38-40 [c. 587 BC]). None are commands to “restore and build Jerusalem,” but Jeremiah 30:18 contains promises that Jerusalem will be “rebuilt on its mound.”

Alternatives are either Artaxerxes’ decree recorded in Ezra 7:12-26 (458 BC?) or Artaxerxes’ warrant given to Nehemiah in Nehemiah 2:7-8 (445 BC). Only the latter clearly relates to rebuilding Jerusalem, though limited to the city wall and gates. It is arguable that had the reference been to a royal decree rather than a prophetic oracle, then a term more specific than “a word” would have been used.

Another issue is the punctuation in Daniel 9:25. The NRSV and most modern English translations follow the MT and put a semicolon or period after “seven weeks.” This results in reference to an “anointed leader” coming after seven weeks, and then in Daniel 9:26 a different anointed leader being “cut off” after a further sixty-two weeks. The NIV follows Theodotion’s Greek translation and the Latin Vulgate in not having this punctuation break. This allows the possibility that one and the same “anointed leader” is referred to in both verses. However, the reference to the period of seven weeks in Daniel 9:25 is left hanging without an explanation. It seems more likely that it marks some significant event.

4.3.1. Messianic Interpretations. These take Daniel 9:25-26 to refer to a single period of sixty-nine weeks and an anointed leader who comes at the end of it. Starting from Artaxerxes' decree given to Ezra, if this is dated to 458 BC (a debatable point), then sixty-nine weeks of years leads to AD 26, a possible (though debatable) date for the beginning of Jesus' public ministry. The stopping of sacrifices and offerings after half a week (Dan 9:27) is taken to be the result of Jesus' death, with AD 30 as a possible (though debatable) date for this. The final half-week is pushed into the indefinite future.

Starting from the more likely date of Artaxerxes' warrant to Nehemiah (445 BC) has the problem that the end point is AD 39. An attempt to solve this problem is made by postulating that the years are "prophetic years" of 360 days only, bringing the date down to AD 32. This is taken to be the year of Jesus' death. The whole of the final week is then postponed to the indefinite future.

There are significant problems with these interpretations. First, there is no clear interest in a messianic figure elsewhere in Daniel. Second, the most likely referent for the "word" in Daniel 9:25 is the prophecies of Jeremiah. Third, the most natural interpretation of Daniel 9:25-26 is that they refer to two different "anointed leaders," the first coming after seven weeks. Fourth, there is nothing in the text to suggest a "time chasm" either before or in the middle of the last week. A. Konkel also argues against this on the grounds that the use of masculine plural in the phrase "seventy weeks," when "weeks" normally has a feminine plural form, indicates a plurality that forms one total, unbroken, quantity. Finally, the appeal to "prophetic years" is unconvincing special pleading. Some ancient Near Eastern calendars did use thirty-day months, but they also included intercalary days to keep the calendar in step with the true year.

4.3.2. Maccabean Interpretations. These take one of Jeremiah's prophecies as the starting point and the "anointed leader" who comes after seven weeks as one of the major figures involved in the first return from exile (Cyrus, Zerubbabel, Joshua). The seven weeks (forty-nine years) can then fit the period in exile

(586/7-539/8 BC). The "anointed leader" who is "cut off" after sixty-nine weeks is taken to be Onias III, the Jewish high priest who was deposed and murdered in 171 BC. The middle of the last week then falls in 167 BC, when Antiochus IV outlawed the Jewish religion, desecrated the temple, and instigated persecution of faithful Jews. This provoked the Maccabean Revolt, and the end of the final week is taken to be the rededication of the temple by Judas in 164 BC.

The problem here is that the period between the return from exile and Onias's murder (367 years) is shorter than sixty-two "weeks" (434 years). This often is explained by assuming that the prophecy is a vaticinium ex eventu ("prophecy after the event"), and that the author had only a vague knowledge of the true chronology. It is, however, questionable whether Jewish writers were ignorant of the chronology of the period (Laato, 213-19).

4.3.3. A Symbolic Interpretation. In 2 Chronicles 36:19-23 Jeremiah's seventy years are understood symbolically. The period from the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple to the first return (forty-nine years) is related to the need for the land to make up its lost Sabbaths. That this is said to be fulfilled by the seventy years implies that the number is understood symbolically as ten Sabbatical cycles. Seven, seventy and ten are numbers associated with completeness (Jenson), so ten Sabbatical cycles, seventy years, is a complete period of rest. Daniel 9:24-27 may be another symbolic interpretation of Jeremiah's prophecy.

There are several verbal and thematic links between Daniel's prayer and Leviticus 26:27-45 (Fishbane, 488-89), a passage about a period of divine wrath measured in Sabbatical cycles. The idea of "weeks of years" probably arises from Leviticus 25:8, which is in a passage about Sabbatical cycles and the Jubilee Year, the time of release from slavery and debt. This provides good grounds for understanding the seventy weeks in symbolic terms involving Sabbatical cycles and Jubilees. Starting with the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, the first seven weeks (one Jubilee cycle) lead to the first release, the initial return from exile. This foreshadows the great release after seventy weeks (ten Jubilee cycles), the end of the Antiochene persecution and the rededication of the temple. What is the significance of the sixty-nine-week period? A figure that is one less than a perfect number (such as six in 666 as the number of the beast in Rev 13:18) can symbolize the antithesis of perfection. So, it is appropriate that the climax of persecution should come after sixty-nine weeks as the prelude to the great release. This is not intended as an exact chronological scheme, though it just so happens that the first seven weeks roughly fits the period between the destruction of the temple and the first return, and the period between Onias's murder and the rededication of the temple was approximately seven years. The scheme is not chronology but rather chronography, a symbolic scheme of history that is intended to interpret major events in it, not to provide a means of predicting them. There are many examples of this in the surviving Jewish apocalypses (see Grabbe 1979). As a theological interpretation of history, the schema of seventy weeks is about judgment for a broken covenant (Sabbatical years and Jubilee Years going unobserved) but also about Yahweh as a redeemer who saves his people from slavery and oppression. This fits well with the preceding context of Daniel's prayer.

4.4. Daniel 11:40-45. Daniel 11:21-45 seems to deal with the career of Antiochus IV Epiphanes. However, Daniel 11:40-45 bears no relation to what is known of his death due to a sudden illness after an unsuccessful attempt to rob a temple in Persia.

Since Jerome, Christians have often seen an antichrist figure (or anti-God figure like Gog in Ezek. 38—39) in these verses. Indeed, some have seen this figure coming to the fore at Daniel 11:36. The weakness of this interpretation is that there is no clear change of subject signaled at Daniel 11:40 or earlier.

Most modern commentators see here evidence that Daniel 11:2-39 is a vaticinium ex eventu, with these verses looking to the downfall of Antiochus. This does not necessarily mean that they are a "false prediction." They make considerable use of phrases from earlier Hebrew prophets, especially Isaiah's prophecies about Assyria's downfall. This could be a way of asserting in general terms the certainty of his downfall, without being intended as a detailed prediction of how it will occur. A new slant is given to this approach if it is accepted that the author is using an existing literary form, that of the Akkadian Prophecies. As noted above, these use the form of a quasi-prophecy to bring out the meaning of a period of history. In one case, the Uruk Prophecy, it ends with a statement of the author's hope for the future expressed in language drawn from Akkadian prayers said for or by the king (Lucas 2002, 293).

4.5. How Long? No satisfactory explanation has been suggested for the answers given to this question in Daniel 8:14; 12:11-12. The "two thousand three hundred evenings and mornings" (Dan 8:14) might refer to that number of days, or it might indicate the number of morning and evening sacrifices and thus refer to 1,150 days. It may be significant that twenty-three is one-third of sixty-nine, a significant number of weeks in Daniel 9:24-27. If so, it may symbolize a fixed period of oppression.

The suggestion that the numbers in Daniel 12:11-12 are successive attempts to "correct" the prediction of 1,150 days in Daniel 8:14 seems unlikely. As each "prediction" was proved wrong, it would have reduced confidence in the book. Their (probably symbolic) significance is now lost to us.

5. Date, Authorship and Composition.

Although most scholars favor a Maccabean date for the final form of Daniel, there are still those who argue for a sixth- or early fifth-century date.

5.1. Linguistic Issues. At the end of the nineteenth century S. R. Driver wrote, "The verdict of the language of Daniel is thus clear. The Persian words presuppose a period after the Persian empire had been well established: the Greek words demand, the Hebrew supports, and the Aramaic permits, a date after the conquest of Palestine by Alexander the Great" (Driver, lxiii).

Three of the musical instruments in Daniel 3 have Greek names. P. Coxon argues that in a specialized area such as music Greek influence might have been marked early on. There is evidence that Greeks had contact with the ancient Near East from the eighth century BC onwards. Coxon concludes that the presence of these words in Daniel is neutral with regard to the question of dating.

K. Kitchen argues that all the Persian loan-words in Daniel are all Old Persian words, belonging to before 300 BC. J. Collins (1993, 19) accepts that Kitchen's evidence "does weigh against the theory that the whole book originated in the second century,” and that a late sixth-century date is compatible with the Persian loanwords. He thinks that a later date is more probable, allowing time for extensive linguistic borrowing.

It is now agreed that the *Aramaic used in Daniel is the Official Aramaic that was in use from about 700 BC to 200 BC. Comparisons of the Aramaic of Daniel with the material from Elephantine (fifth century BC), Samaria (fourth century BC) and Qumran (second century BC and later) suggest that Daniel’s Aramaic is closer to that of the Samaritan papyri than that at Qumran (J. Collins 1993, 17).

The *Hebrew of Daniel is more like the late biblical Hebrew of Ezra, Nehemiah and Chronicles than the exilic Hebrew of Ezekiel. There are clear differences between Qumran Hebrew and the Hebrew of Daniel (J. Collins 1993, 19-23).

Overall, it is clear that Driver’s claim that the linguistic evidence demands a second-century BC date is no longer valid, though it does seem to favor a late postexilic date.

5.2. Other Arguments. The claim that historical inaccuracies in the book militate against an early date has lost much of its force (see 3 above). Daniel is in the third section of the Hebrew canon (the Writings), not in the second (the Prophets). This is sometimes taken as evidence of its late date. The survey of Israel’s history in Sirach 44–49 may indicate that all the books in the Prophets were accepted as Scripture by the early second century BC. However, Baldwin argues that the omission of Daniel from the Prophets is explicable on the basis of its different character rather than its late date (Baldwin, 71).

There is a growing consensus that the stories originate from the Diaspora of the Persian period. Hartman and Di Lella comment, “The many correct references to customs and terms used at the Persian court have often been noted by commentators” (Hartman and Di Lella, 13). The picture that they give of the pagan kings and their relationship to faithful Jews is too positive for stories composed in the second century BC. Two major issues of the Maccabean period are ignored: circumcision and Sabbath observance.

Rationalistic denial of the possibility of predictive prophecy may influence views of the date of Daniel’s visions. For many supporters of a Maccabean date, however, the possibility of such prophecy (“Could God do it?”) is not the issue. More to the point, given the detailed focus on events in the early second century BC in Daniel 7–11, is the question “Would God do it?” J. Goldingay argues that such detailed, long-range, predictive prophecy is not consistent with the picture of God revealed elsewhere in Scripture: “He does not give signs and reveal dates. His statements about the future are calls to decision now; he is not the God of prognosticators. He calls his people to naked faith and hope in him in the present, and does not generally bolster their faith with the kind of revelations that we are thinking of here. He does sometimes grant evidences to those who cannot believe without them, and thus we dare not exclude the possibility that this was the case with the book of Daniel. But the presumption is by no means in favour of this possibility” (Goldingay, 45).

There is also a literary issue. The whole of Scripture comes in the literary forms of the authors’ times and cultures. Pseudonymous quasi-prophecy is a common feature of Jewish apocalypses. We should not reject it as an unworthy literary form simply because we do not understand the psychology of both author and readers involved in its use. B. Metzger comments with regard to Daniel, “Whatever idiom or mode of expression [the author] would use in ordinary speech must surely be allowed him when moved by the Holy Spirit” (Metzger, 22). It may be that he used the genre of the Akkadian Prophecies (see 2.3 above).

Evidence regarding the date of the final form of Daniel is not clear-cut. A reasoned, and reasonable, defense can be made of either an early or a late date. Acceptance of either is consonant with belief in the divine inspiration and authority of the book.

5.3. Authorship and Composition. Since the stories are written about Daniel, acceptance of an early date for the book does not settle the issue of authorship. The book may have been put together by the (anonymous) author of the stories or by a separate editor.

Those who accept a Maccabean date generally assume that the visions and the final form of the book come from among those called “the wise” in Daniel 11:33-35; 12:3. No convincing case has been made for identifying these with any one of the groups known to exist within the Judaism of the time. It is also generally assumed, because of the prominence of the fate of Jerusalem and the temple in the visions, that the book was compiled in Judea. However, Psalm 137; Nehemiah 1; Daniel 1:1-2; 5:23 show that Jews in the Diaspora had a passionate concern about this. What is said of “the wise” in Daniel 11:33-35 does not require them to be Judean Jews. Some of them may have gone to Judea to encourage their compatriots there, or they may have conveyed their encouragement in writing (the book of Daniel?) and expected to face suffering in the Diaspora. Lucas (2000) suggests that the origin of the book was a collection of court tales (Dan 2—6 and maybe an earlier form of Dan 1) composed in Aramaic, as that was the vernacular. These were treasured by a group of educated, upper-class Diaspora Jews who found careers in government service because they provided a vision of how to remain faithful to God in their situation. The Antiochene crisis challenged their generally positive worldview. The visions are the experience of one or more members of the group as they strove to understand what was happening. They were written in Hebrew because that seemed appropriate for more esoteric material. They were combined with the stories that formed the basis of the group’s self-understanding because the apocalyptic worldview of the visions was a development from that of the stories, not a departure from it. Attributing the visions to Daniel was not an attempt to deceive people; it was an expression of the group’s sense of solidarity and continuity with their past traditions.

6. The Message of Daniel.

6.1. Sovereignty: Human and Divine. Nebuchadnezzar’s capture of Jerusalem and looting of the temple to take some of its vessels to the treasury of his gods (Dan 1:1) might imply the superiority of Babylon’s gods. Daniel 1:2 immediately counters this. Yahweh “gave” the king of Judah and the temple into Nebuchadnezzar’s power, for reasons not specified until Daniel 9. Yahweh is the supreme king, who “changes times and eras, removing kings and establishing kings” (Dan 2:21) and has a goal for history. He will “raise up a kingdom that is eternal and will not be destroyed” (Dan 2:44). Eventually Nebuchadnezzar, after his hubris in which he sees himself as the supreme king (Dan 4:30) has been broken and humbled, confesses that Yahweh “does as he wishes with the forces of the heavens, and the inhabitants of the earth” (Dan 4:35), and, importantly, that “all his deeds are right and his ways just” (Dan 4:37).

Yahweh’s rule is not arbitrary; it is morally determined. In the vision in Daniel 7:9-14 the Ancient of Days judges the earthly powers that have become subhuman, bestial, in their arrogant, self-centered exercise of sovereignty. He deprives them of their sovereignty and gives it to “one like a human being.” It is in God’s kingdom, under his sovereignty, that humanity reaches its full potential. Salvation history culminates in the achievement of the purpose that God had when creating the world, a world in which humans exercise sovereignty as his representatives (Gen 1:26-28). This is the significance of the “one like a son of man” receiving sovereignty in Daniel 7:13-14. Daniel 4:10-12 paints a picture of the good that human rulers can achieve. When humans image God, they have the right to rule in his name and will bring peace and wholeness to his creation. Those who recognize God’s sovereignty over them are those who will allow God to rule through them. When they try to be God, they lose the right to rule, and their rule may become subhuman, bestial.

Achieving God’s purpose will not be easy. God’s people will experience suffering before receiving the kingdom (Dan 7:21-22). This raises the question of why God’s purposes sometimes seem to be frustrated and take a long time to come to fruition (note the cry “How long?” in Dan 8:13; 12:6). A partial answer is given in Daniel 9—11. Daniel’s prayer of confession and repentance makes clear that Yahweh gave Judah into the power of Nebuchadnezzar as an act of judgment, visiting on Judah the curses of the covenant that Judah had repeatedly broken. It was a moral act in which Yahweh responded to human behavior, and the prayer assumes that he will respond to confession and repentance. God gives humans a measure of freedom, and this affects the way his purposes are carried out. Daniel 11 contains both allusions to God’s sovereignty (Dan 11:27, 29, 36, 45) and statements that, within limits, a human king can “do as he pleases” (Dan 11:3, 16, 36).

6.2. Faithfulness: Human and Divine. Daniel 1 also introduces the theme of faithfulness. Because God allows rulers enough freedom to become bestial, those who are committed to God sometimes suffer. As a result, they are challenged to adopt a lifestyle of faithfulness. In Daniel 1 the issue is personal integrity. Daniel makes a stand dictated by his own conscience before God in relative privacy and does it diplomatically. The Jews in Daniel 3 have to oppose idolatry openly. The conspirators in Daniel 6 target Daniel's religious practice because that seems like the best way to succeed. He could still pray to God secretly, but since his piety was common knowledge, that would have been to compromise. In each case God is faithful to the faithful Jews. In the stories the Jews are kept safe in the furnace or lions' den, and not just delivered from it, as an angel mediates God's presence to them. In the context of the whole book, the stories are not just simplistic promises of God's deliverance; they prepare the way for the references to the suffering, persecution and martyrdom of the faithful in Daniel 7–12.

The stories encourage the faithful to become involved in the pagan world with the hope of some measure of success and effective witness, even though there are risks. The visions depict a much more difficult situation. God's sovereignty means that the faithful cannot presume on what God's response will be. Belshazzar's blasphemy meets with swift retribution, while that of the small horn is allowed to continue for a considerable time before it is ended. The faithful may be delivered from death in a fiery furnace (Dan 3) or through death in the fires of persecution (Dan 12). The visions encourage the faithful to stand firm until God's purposes triumph. Those given wisdom are encouraged to use it to "give understanding to many" (Dan 11:33) and to "lead many to righteousness" (Dan 12:3). These references to "the wise" and the "many" whom they influence may allude to the Suffering Servant of Isaiah 52:13–53:12. The way to glory for the wise is faithful service despite the suffering that it brings.

God's faithfulness to those who are faithful stretches beyond death. Daniel 12:2-3 contains the only clear statement in the Hebrew Bible of belief in resurrection of the dead. Those who have suffered and died because of their faithfulness are promised resurrection to everlasting life. Those who have opposed God and persecuted them will be raised to "shame and everlasting abhorrence." To "the wise" is promised special glory, as they "will shine like the stars." The language here is allusive, and exactly what is meant by the different destinies is not made clear.

6.3. Angelology. Daniel has the most developed *angelology in the Hebrew Bible. This enables talk about God's involvement in the world while preserving God's transcendence. The struggle between heavenly beings called the "princes" of Persia, Greece and Israel (Dan 10:13, 20) expresses the idea that history has a transcendent dimension, and that there is a synergy between events in heaven and on earth. The same is true of Daniel 7, where the vision of God's throne room follows the vision of the beasts. However, the measure of sovereignty given to humans means that what happens in heaven does not totally determine what happens on earth, and vice versa.

7. Daniel and the New Testament.

There is general agreement that Daniel 7:13 lies behind Jesus' reference to himself as the Son of Man. It links his claim to bring in the kingdom of God with the completing of God's purpose in creating the world. This theological understanding of Jesus' work is expounded in Hebrews 2. The consummation of Jesus' own ministry at his parousia is expressed using the imagery of Daniel 7:13. In Daniel 7 the "one like a son of man" is associated with the suffering "holy ones," and this probably contributed to Jesus' conviction that he must face suffering.

Also related to the coming of the kingdom of God in Jesus' ministry is the saying about the stone in Luke 20:18. It alludes to Isaiah 8:14-15 and Daniel 2:34-35 and identifies Jesus with the stone that crushed the statue.

The major antichrist figure in Revelation is "the beast" that rises out of the sea and is a hybrid of the four beasts of Daniel 7 (Rev 13:1-4). It also shares features with the small horn of Daniel 7–8. The time for which it exercises authority (Rev 13:5) seems based on Daniel 12:7. Revelation reapplies the theological significance of the small horn without any attempt to treat what Daniel says of it as detailed predictions about the antichrist. The Roman Empire is portrayed as the current manifestation of the same arrogant, blasphemous, bestial exercise of human sovereignty against God and God's faithful people.

The fact that discipleship involves suffering is a common theme in the NT. 1 Peter 4:12-14 alludes to the story in Daniel 3 in its assurance that the Spirit of God will be with those who face the "fiery ordeal" of suffering for Christ (see Prophets in the New Testament).

See also APOCALYPTICISM, APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE; ARAMAIC LANGUAGE; DANIEL: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Commentaries: J. G. Baldwin, Daniel (TOTC; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1978); J. J. Collins, Daniel: A Commentary on the Book of Daniel (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); S. R. Driver, The Book of Daniel (CBSC; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1900); M. Fishbane, Biblical Interpretation in Ancient Israel (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1998); L. F. Hartman and A. A. Di Lella, The Book of Daniel (AB 23; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1978); E. Heaton, The Book of Daniel (TBC; London: SCM, 1956); E. C. Lucas, Daniel (AOTC 20; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2002); J. A. Montgomery, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Daniel (ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1927). Studies: G. R. Beasley-Murray, "The Interpretation of Daniel 7," CBQ 45 (1983) 44-58; P.-A. Beaulieu, The Reign of Nabonidus, King of Babylon, 556-539 B.C. (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1989); R. D. Biggs, "The Babylonian Prophecies and the Astrological Traditions of Mesopotamia," JCS 37 (1985) 86-90; B. E. Colless, "Cyrus the Persian as Darius the Mede in the Book of Daniel," JSOT 56 (1992) 113-26; A. Y. Collins, "The Influence of Daniel on the New Testament," in Daniel: A Commentary on the Book of Daniel, by J. Collins (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993) 90-123; J. J. Collins, The Apocalyptic Vision of the Book of Daniel (HSM 16; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1977); idem, "Introduction: Towards the Morphology of a Genre," Semeia 14 (1979) 1-20; idem, "4QPrayer of Nabonidus Ar," in Qumran Cave 4.XVII: Parabiblical Texts, Part 3, by G. Brooke et al. (DJD 22; Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1996) 83-93; P. W. Coxon, "Greek Loan Words and Alleged Greek Loan Translations in the Book of Daniel," TGUOS 25 (1973) 95-121; J. E. Goldingay, "The Book of Daniel: Three Issues," Them 2 (1977) 45-49; L. L. Grabbe, "Chronography in Hellenistic Jewish Historiography," SBLSP 17 (1979) 43-68; idem, "Another Look at the Gestalt of 'Darius the Mede,'" CBQ 50 (1988) 198-213; A. K. Grayson and W. G. Lambert,

"Akkadian Prophecies," JCS 18 (1964) 7-30; P. D. Hanson, "Apocalypticism," IDBSup 28-34; W. L. Humphreys, "A Life-Style for Diaspora: A Study of the Tales of Esther and Daniel," JBL 92 (1973) 211-23; P. P. Jenson, "Seven," NIDOTTE 4:35; K. A. Kitchen, "The Aramaic of Daniel," in Notes on Some Problems in the Book of Daniel, by D. Wiseman et al. (London: Tyndale, 1956) 31-79; K. Koch, The Rediscovery of Apocalyptic: A Polemical Work on a Neglected Area of Biblical Studies and Its Damaging Effects on Theology and Philosophy (trans. M. Kohl; SBT 22; London: SCM, 1972); A. H. Konkel, "Week," NIDOTTE 4:20-24; A. Laato, "The Seventy Yearweeks in the Book of Daniel," ZAW 102 (1990) 212-24; W. G. Lambert, The Background of Jewish Apocalyptic (London: Athlone, 1978); E. C. Lucas, "The Sources of Daniel's Animal Imagery," TynBul 41 (1990) 161-85; idem, "Daniel: Resolving the Enigma," VT 50 (2000) 66-80; B. M. Metzger, "Literary Forgeries and Canonical Pseudepigrapha," JBL 91 (1972) 3-24; A. R. Millard, "Daniel 1-6 and History," EvQ 49 (1977) 67-73; A. R. Millard and P. Bordreuil, "A Statue from Syria with Assyrian and Aramaic Inscriptions," BA 45 (1982) 135-41; A. L. Oppenheim, "The Interpretation of Dreams in the Near East," TAPS 46 (1956) 179-373; D. B. Redford, A Study of the Biblical Story of Joseph (Genesis 37-50) (VTSup 20; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1970); H. H. Rowley, Darius the Mede and the Four World Empires in the Book of Daniel (Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 1935); L. M. Wills, The Jew in the Court of the Foreign King: Ancient Jewish Court Legends (HDR 26; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); D. J. Wiseman, "Some Historical Problems in the Book of Daniel," in Notes on Some Problems in the Book of Daniel, by D. Wiseman et al. (London: Tyndale, 1956) 9-18; idem, Nebuchadnezzar and Babylon (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1985). E. C. Lucas

DANIEL: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION

The book of Daniel has been one of the most influential biblical books on Western culture. Citations of the book and allusions to its content can be found not only in commentaries and homiletical material, but also in political rhetoric, historical reconstructions, artistic representations and even prognostications. Despite its relative brevity (twelve chapters), it has exerted considerable influence upon those who recognize the book of Daniel as Scripture.

1. Early Jewish Tradition
2. New Testament
3. Patristic Period
4. Medieval Period
5. Reformation Period
6. Historical-Critical Study

1. Early Jewish Tradition.

1.1. Qumran. The book of Daniel as represented in the Masoretic tradition would have reached its current form some time during the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes IV (167-164 BC). Although late in development, the Daniel tradition garnered attention as an authoritative source relatively quickly within the Jewish tradition.

The apocalyptic nature of Daniel accorded well in many ways with the theology and worldview of Qumran (see Dead Sea Scrolls). A total of eight Daniel scrolls were discovered at Qumran, dating from the late second century BC to the middle of the first century AD. Of the remaining books in the canon, only Psalms, Deuteronomy, Isaiah, Genesis, Exodus and Leviticus appear there in greater number. Every chapter except Daniel 12 is represented among the eight fragments of Daniel (Ulrich). Daniel 12, however, is attested in 4Q174 in a midrash on the last days, suggesting that the book in its entirety was present in some form to the Dead Sea sect. Moreover, the bilingual nature of Daniel in the MT is retained in the Qumran texts, as seen most clearly in 1Q71 with the shift from Hebrew to Aramaic at Daniel 2:4b.

In addition to the eight biblical manuscripts of Daniel, there are nine nonbiblical scrolls that pertain to the book of Daniel, all written in Aramaic. In varying ways, these either relate to the story of Daniel, or Daniel functions as a primary figure in the text. For example, the Prayer of Nabonidus (4Q242) recounts the fate of a Babylonian king afflicted with sickness for seven years, only to recover with the aid of a Jewish exile. The relationship between the Prayer of Nabonidus and Daniel 4 is difficult to establish, but most likely the Qumran text represents a tradition that stands between the Babylonian accounts of Nabonidus and the account in Daniel 4. The Pseudo-Daniel compositions (4Q243; 4Q244; 4Q245) present Daniel before the king and his court, drawing upon the notion of Daniel as a visionary. 4Q551 arguably alludes to a Susanna-type figure, but this connection remains speculative at best (Flint, 362).

A number of Qumran texts appropriate the language and imagery of Daniel. For example, the notion of eschatological war in the War Scroll (1Q33) appears to draw directly from the language of Daniel 11–12. The periodization of history, as seen in Daniel, appears frequently in Qumran texts (see 4Q180; 11QMelchizedek; Damascus Document). In 11Q13 II, 18 the writer mentions one who is “anointed by the spirit” and suggests that this person is the one about whom Daniel spoke (Dan 9:25-26). Surprisingly, there is no explicit reference to Daniel 12:3 or the notion of a resurrection as presented in Daniel 12. This is all the more striking given the significant influence of Daniel 11–12 on the scrolls, especially the War Scroll (1Q33) and the Community Rule (1QS). A possible exception to this claim is 4Q521, but whether it is a product of the Dead Sea community remains a matter of debate (J. Collins 1995, 121).

The absence in the scrolls of any allusion to Daniel 7 and, more particularly, to the “one like a son of man” in Daniel 7:13 is unexpected, particularly given the frequency with which the label “son of man” is used in subsequent Jewish and Christian texts (see 2.1 below). Although “one like a son of man” does not appear in a Qumran text, 4Q246, frequently referred to as “the son of God text,” does refer to a figure who will be called “son of God” and “son of the Most High.” Although some scholars contend that this figure is negative, representing one of the Seleucid kings, most aver that it represents a messianic figure. Although the prophet Daniel is not mentioned in the text, the language and themes appear derived from the book of Daniel, making 4Q246 “probably the oldest surviving interpretation” or adaptation of Daniel 7 (J. Collins 1995, 166).

1.2. Apocalypse of Zephaniah. Dated from middle of the first century BC to the end of the first century AD, Apocalypse of Zephaniah employs a number of explicit references to the book of Daniel. The version of Daniel in use by the author clearly had the tale of Susanna included, given that in his prayer for deliverance from distress he mentions Susanna, as well as Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego as examples of God’s deliverance (Apoc. Zeph. 6:10). In the same chapter, using language derived from Daniel 10:5-6, the author describes the appearance of a "great angel" that visited him (Apoc. Zeph. 6:11). Elsewhere the author mentions the "Book of the Living" (Apoc. Zeph. 3:7), similar to that envisioned in Daniel 7:10, and in his descriptions of the angelic figures, the author adopts the language of Daniel 7:10 but reconfigures the role of the "thousands of thousands" and "myriads of myriads" of angels (Apoc. Zeph. 4:2).

1.3. Similitudes of Enoch and 4 Ezra. The Similitudes of Enoch (1 En. 37—71) and 4 Ezra (both first century AD) draw from the Daniel tradition. In 1 Enoch 47:3 the visionary writes, "I saw the Head of Days sit down upon the throne," at which point he opened the "books of the living." The Head of Days functions as the Enochic equivalent to Daniel's Ancient of Days (Dan 7). He takes his place upon the throne, opening up the books in judgment (Dan 7:10). In 1 Enoch 46:1 the Head of Days is described as having a head "white like wool," a description found in Daniel 7:9. Unlike the Dead Sea sect, however, those who produced the Similitudes of Enoch made explicit use of the "son of man" concept found in Daniel 7:13, adapting it in new ways. Following 1 Enoch 47, and the depiction of the Head of Days opening the books of the living ones, 1 Enoch 48 introduces the arrival of a new figure, the Son of Man, who in the Similitudes of Enoch resembles the figure of Wisdom in Proverbs 8, a heavenly preexistent figure, as evidenced in 1 Enoch 48:6; 62:7. He functions as the heavenly counterpart of all the righteous on earth, and at the right time he will strike down the kings from their thrones and sit on the throne of glory to judge (1 En. 62:5). In the final chapter of the Similitudes of Enoch, however, the angel reveals to Enoch that he in fact is "the son of man born in righteousness." Whether one follows J. Collins (1993) with the claim that 1 Enoch 70—71 is a later addition, or whether one follows Vanderkam (1992) with the assertion that these chapters suggest that Enoch has a heavenly counterpart, the more pressing point is that the figure of the Son of Man is given a more explicit identity in the subsequent Danielic traditions.

In 4 Ezra 12:10-11 the angel instructs Ezra that the vision that he saw is "the fourth kingdom that appeared in a vision to Daniel your brother." In 4 Ezra 13:1-3 Ezra recounts a dream he had in which "something resembling a man" was brought up from the depths of the sea and the "man was flying with the clouds of heaven," a reference to Daniel 7. The one that resembles a man is said to be of Davidic lineage: "the Messiah whom the Most High has kept until the end of the days" (4 Ezra 12:32). As in 1 Enoch, the Son of Man in 4 Ezra is preexistent, and like the Messiah of Isaiah 11, he will be from the Davidic line. In both instances (Similitudes of Enoch and 4 Ezra) the Son of Man wreaks havoc upon the wicked, exacting judgment upon the nations (Reynolds). The conjoining of these themes, heavenly savior and Davidic messiah, reflects the flexibility of the Son of Man concept in responding to the political and religious crises of the day.

1.4. Josephus. Josephus's comments on Daniel in Jewish Antiquities not only represent another witness to the Daniel tradition from the first century AD, but equally so suggest the prominence already attached to the book in that period. In his recapitulation of Jewish history Josephus clearly has a non-Jewish audience in mind (Ant. 1.10-11), but as L. Feldman has noted, Josephus appears to be addressing a Jewish audience as well (Ant. 1.14). In addition, some scholars (e.g., Daube) have suggested that Josephus understood or at least presented Daniel as a type of himself, a Jewish captive working under the auspices of a foreign power.

In his larger work, Josephus fails to mention prophets such as Amos and Hosea and gives only scant attention to Isaiah and Ezekiel. Perhaps somewhat surprisingly, then, Josephus provides an extensive account of Daniel, concluding that Daniel was "one of the greatest prophets" (Ant. 10.266). According to Josephus, the accuracy of Daniel's predictions are evidence that Daniel must have "conversed with God" about such matters (Ant. 10.267). To highlight the significance of the book of Daniel, even to non-Jewish rulers, Josephus includes an otherwise unknown claim that the book of Daniel was shown to Alexander the Great with regard to the prediction that the Persians would be overthrown by the Greeks (Ant. 11.337).

Although Josephus was recounting the history of the Jewish people, he adapted the story of Daniel for his non-Jewish audience. Josephus employs many of the characteristic features of Greco-Roman literature in his presentation of Daniel. He emphasizes Daniel's noble birth as well as his physical beauty (Ant. 10.186). Similar to Plato's philosopher-king, Daniel exhibits the cardinal virtues of wisdom, courage, temperance, justice and piety throughout Josephus's presentation of Daniel (Feldman, 45-46).

In several places Josephus's rendition of the Daniel narrative appears to lack the more supernatural elements found in the biblical tradition. For example, Josephus reports that the three youths were preserved in part by the providence of God, in that by requiring a vegetarian diet, God had made the bodies of the three youths too strong to be consumed by fire (Ant. 10.190-194). Further, Josephus omits any mention of Gabriel or other such heavenly figures, including the fourth figure in the furnace. Although such features are noticeably absent in Jewish Antiquities, Josephus maintains a sincere belief in divine providence, suggesting that the book of Daniel provides a strong antidote to the Epicurean belief that the universe carries on with "mechanical necessity."

Josephus clearly understood the Roman Empire to be the fourth kingdom (Ant. 10.276), but given his audience, he is reluctant to draw any conclusions about the future of the fourth kingdom, preferring instead to enjoin the Jewish reader to be diligent in "reading the book of Daniel" to discover the fate of that kingdom (Ant. 10.210). Josephus's work demonstrates already a common hermeneutical proclivity of subsequent interpreters: to "extend" the book of Daniel in an effort to interpret contemporary political, social and theological crises.

1.5. Other Sources. The Danielic influence is present in a number of other sources from this period. For example, the hymn of Moses found in Testament of Moses 10 draws heavily from the language and imagery of Daniel 12, developing in particular the notion of resurrection found in Daniel 12:3. In Lives of the Prophets, much like Josephus's Jewish Antiquities, the character of Daniel receives significant treatment, more so than many of the other prophets. Not surprisingly, the stories of the three youths (Dan 3) and the lions' den (Dan 6) are recounted in 3-4 Maccabees.

2. New Testament.

As with the other writings surveyed above from the first century AD, the book of Daniel exerted considerable influence upon the writers of the NT (see Prophets in the New Testament). An appendix in the Nestle-Aland Novum Testamentum Graece (27th ed.), which records both quotations and allusions, cites over two hundred references to Daniel, suggesting that the influence of Daniel on the NT is similar to that of Psalms or Isaiah (Evans, 490). Although exact quotations of Daniel are rather limited (Mt 24:30; 26:64; Mk 13:26; 16:62; Lk 21:27), frequent allusions to the language and imagery of Daniel permeate the entire NT.

2.1. The Son of Man. The influence of Daniel 7 upon NT writers, and in particular the connection between Daniel 7 and the "Son of Man" sayings in the Gospels, has generated a considerable body of literature in the last century alone. Earlier in the twentieth century, interpreters such as S. Mowinckel argued that the notion of a "son of man" figure derived from what he perceived to be a "divine Primordial Man" figure that appeared in Indo-Iranian myths. Mowinckel contended that the "son of man" concept was a Jewish adaptation of that larger ancient Near Eastern concept. Further, Mowinckel contended that "son of man" was actually understood as a title meant to identify a heavenly messiah figure that would come to earth to judge the earth.

More recent scholars (Lindars) rejected both Mowinckel's connection of the term with a divine primordial man and his contention that the phrase functioned as a title in late Jewish eschatological thought. Instead, more recent work has noted the use of the term in late Jewish literature, in particular 4 Ezra and the Similitudes of Enoch, suggesting that this literature appropriates the Danielic "one like a son of man" in new ways, linking it to a reinterpreted notion of a messiah (Reynolds), and even the vindication of a messianic figure (Wright). Among the concepts posited in such texts, the "son of man" is preexistent, messianic, and responsible for the destruction of the wicked. As A. Collins has suggested, these common features imply "that the emergence of an apocalyptic 'Son of Man' need not be seen as a Christian development in response to the experience of Jesus as raised from the dead," but in fact may reinforce the notion that Jesus presupposed these same concepts in his own interpretation of Daniel 7, even as he added his own "innovative twist" to the concept (A. Collins, 90).

The phrase "son of man" is used more frequently than any other phrase to speak of Jesus in the Gospels. Worth noting is that throughout the Gospels, the phrase only appears in the speeches of Jesus (in Jn 12, the crowd quotes the earlier comment of Jesus), and while not titular in nature, the phrase was used as a means of self-designation by Jesus (Marshall). J. Dunn has sought to narrow the connection between the phrase “son of man” and the influence of Daniel 7, suggesting that when the phrase “son of man” appears alongside other terms or ideas from Daniel 7, such as “coming” and “on the clouds of heaven,” then the direct influence of Daniel upon the usage of the phrase is indisputable (Dunn, 529). For example, even as the “son of man” is depicted as “coming with the clouds of heaven” in Daniel 7, so too will the “Son of Man” (Jesus) arrive in the clouds (cf. Mk 13:26; 1 Thess 4:17; Rev 1:7). The fact that the phrase itself fails to appear in later NT writings, however (with the exception of Acts 7:56; Rev 1:13; 14:14), suggests that it was not necessarily titular in nature and, moreover, did not exert a considerable influence upon the Christology of the early church (Marshall; A. Collins; Dunn).

2.2. The Abomination of Desolation. The phrase “abomination of desolation” appears in Daniel 9:27; 11:31; 12:11, as well as 1 Maccabees 1:54, and in all four instances the desecrating actions of Antiochus IV Epiphanes are clearly in view. Within the Synoptic Gospels, the phrase is used explicitly in Mark 13:14; Matthew 24:15, with Matthew making the connection to Daniel explicit: “the desolating sacrilege standing in the holy place, as was spoken by the prophet Daniel (let the reader understand).” Given the significance of the Maccabean period in the collective memory of those in first century AD Palestine, scholars have suggested that the use of the phrase by the Gospel writers must refer to a situation analogous to the events under Antiochus, whether it be events surrounding Caligula in AD 40 or those surrounding the Jewish war in AD 66-70. The suggestion that a military leader or force appears in view is verified in Luke 21:20, where the phrase has been modified thus: “When you see Jerusalem surrounded by armies, then know that its desolation has come near.” The Synoptic Gospels locate Jesus’ use of the phrase within his larger eschatological discourse, as seen in Mark 13 in a manner similar to the way in which Daniel 9:27 was used earlier in Testament of Levi 15:1. The idea of a desolating sacrilege also informs 2 Thessalonians 2.

2.3. The Book of Revelation. Not surprisingly, allusions to Daniel appear throughout the book of Revelation, arguably even serving to structure the book as a whole. G. Beale has suggested that Daniel 2:28-29 has been appropriated in Revelation 1:1, but with a significant modification. In Daniel, the text mentions the things that will happen in the “latter days,” but the writer of Revelation, while using the language of Daniel 2, shifts the horizon of expectation, explaining that the purpose of the book is “to show . . . what things must take place soon [en tachei].” Beale has noted a similar use of Daniel 2 in Revelation 4:1; 22:6b, suggesting that together with Revelation 1:1 these three texts function as a framework for the book in its entirety. The use of Danielic language at key junctures in the book is indicative of the influence that Daniel had upon the writer of Revelation throughout.

A. Collins argues that Revelation 1:9—3:22 appears to have been modeled on Daniel 10:2—12:4. Both sets of texts detail an epiphany of a heavenly being to a human. The human identifies himself and his location and then offers a rich description of the heavenly being. The human falls to the ground, only to be comforted by the heavenly being. In addition to the overall structure of this section, there are more detailed inferences, again with significant modifications. The description of the heavenly figure in Revelation 1:15 resembles that mentioned in Daniel 10:5-6. More explicitly, the writer of Revelation picks up the language of Daniel 7, referring to the “one like a son of man” in Revelation 1:13, but then he merges that figure with the Ancient of Days figure mentioned as well in Daniel 7. In Daniel the two figures are distinct entities, but in Revelation 1 the “one like a son of man” is described as having hair “white like wool,” no doubt an attempt to reinforce the notion of his divine status (Rowland, 101).

The primary antagonist in the book of Revelation, referred to simply as “the beast,” functions as an antichrist figure. The descriptive language of the beast employed in Revelation 13:1-10 derives from the imagery of the four beasts found in Daniel. The beast in Revelation has ten horns, as did the fourth beast in Daniel, yet the beast in Revelation has seven heads, the total number of heads of all the beasts in Daniel. Moreover, Revelation 13 explains that the beast arises from the sea, again drawing from the descriptive language in Daniel 2. In Daniel 7—8 the hubris of the fourth beast is exhibited through arrogant speech; Revelation 13 explains that the beast utters “haughty and blasphemous” speech, clearly drawing from the Daniel tradition.

3. Patristic Period.

Just as the book of Daniel exerted considerable influence upon the writers of the NT, so too did the book upon the early church fathers. Irenaeus (c. AD 130-200) alluded to Daniel throughout his work Against Heresies. The stone not hewn by human hands that crushes the statute in Daniel 2 is understood as a type or figure of Christ (Haer. 3.21.7). The same understanding of a type or figure is found in Irenaeus’s reading of Daniel 3 concerning the fourth individual in the furnace, as well as his reading of Daniel 7 and the “son of man” who comes on the clouds. As J. Gammie has suggested, Irenaeus’s treatment of Daniel 12:4 is most revealing in regard to his own view of Scripture. Whereas Daniel 12:4 recounts that Daniel is instructed to shut up the words and seal them “until the end of time,” Irenaeus contends that this “disclosure” took place at the cross of Christ (Haer. 4.26.1), or, more succinctly put, the Christ event becomes the lens through which to read all of Scripture. In constructing his own millenarian eschatology, Irenaeus draws from Revelation and 2 Thessalonians as well as Daniel 9, suggesting that the antichrist would rule for three and a half years (Dan 9:27), and that at the end of the age, all the saints of the Most High would receive the kingdom of God (Dan 7:27). Unlike the interpreters who follow, however, Irenaeus did not posit dates for the “end of days.”

Hippolytus (c. AD 170-236), a disciple of Irenaeus, wrote the first known Christian commentary on a book from the Hebrew Bible. In his commentary on Daniel he wedded martyrdom theology with the exegesis of Daniel in light of the persecution launched in AD 193 by Emperor Septimius Severus. In his exegesis of Daniel 3, Hippolytus explains that the three youths are a “pattern for all believing people.” Despite the immediate threat of persecution, however, Hippolytus contended that the end was not imminent. Instead, he noted that the age of the world would last six thousand years, followed by the thousand-year reign of Christ. Hippolytus argued that because Jesus came five thousand five hundred years after Adam, there remained considerable time until the arrival of the end. For Hippolytus, this view was substantiated in his understanding of the seventy weeks mentioned in Daniel 9. The birth of Jesus concluded the sixty-ninth week, but the seventieth week refers to the final days, when Elijah, Enoch and the antichrist will appear. As W. Shelton has noted, the removal of any notion of imminent return was intended to reinforce the call to martyrdom (Shelton, 110).

Due to the extensive persecution during the late second and third centuries, a number of writers made use of Daniel as a means for exhortation in a manner similar to Hippolytus. Origen’s Exhortation to Martyrdom was written in AD 235 during the reign of Maximinus Thrax. In his Epistles, Cyprian responded to the expansive persecution under Decius (AD 249-251), three times employing Daniel 3. Those in prison he exhorted to have faith, the “same kind as once did Ananias, Azarias, and Misael, the illustrious youths to whom, when shut up in the furnace . . . the heat of hell could have no power” (Ep. 80.3). Several martyrdom stories emerged from this period, a number of them alluding to Daniel, with particular interest in Daniel 3; 6, including The Martyrdom of Saints Montanus and Lucius and The Martyrdom of Bishop Fructuosus and His Deacons, Augurius and Eulogius.

The most significant commentary from the period was that of Jerome (AD 347-419). In his treatment of Daniel he sought to refute the claims of the Neoplatonist philosopher Porphyry, who not only argued for the pseudonymity of Daniel but also suggested that the book of Daniel had been written some time after the persecution by Antiochus IV Epiphanes. Jerome himself did not jettison a historical reading of Daniel. He followed the Antiochene school of interpretation, rejecting allegorical readings (cf. Origen), preferring instead the more literal and historical reading of the text (see his rejection of Hippolytus’s interpretation of Dan 9:24-27). Despite his penchant for a more “literal” reading, however, Jerome defended a christological interpretation of Daniel

2; 7, as well as a reinterpretation of Daniel 12:1-3, which he believed referred to the resurrection of the faithful following the overthrow of the antichrist.

Theodoret of Cyrus served as bishop of Cyrus, Syria, during the years AD 423-457 and was a prolific writer influenced by the Antiochene approach to interpretation. His commentary on Daniel can be dated to approximately AD 433, and according to his introduction, there were two impetuses for his writing. He explains, "Our friends required of us commentary on this author" (Comm. Dan. 1260). His second reason is to respond to the Jewish claim that the book of Daniel did not belong among the Prophets, but instead among the Writings. Like Jerome, Theodoret offered a christological interpretation for Daniel 2 ("the stone hewn out of a mountain"), as well as the "son of man" text in Daniel and the identification of the seventy weeks in Daniel 9. Unlike Hippolytus, however, the political affairs of the day appear to have little if any impact on the origin of the commentary or on Theodoret's interpretation. Moreover, Theodoret appears to have little interest in providing precise calculations on the "last days" based on the book of Daniel and instead understands Daniel to be a critique against world empires in light of the sovereignty of God.

4. Medieval Period.

4.1. Jewish Interpretation. Rabbinic interpretation of Daniel represented considerable diversity as well. The wisdom and piety of Daniel was frequently noted. It was said of Daniel, "If he were in one scale of the balance and all the wise men of the heathens were in the other, he would outweigh them all" (b. Yoma 77a). In other texts, rabbinic interpreters supplied additional details not found in the biblical story of Daniel. In both Sanhedrin and Pirke Rabbi Eliezer, Daniel is portrayed as not only wise, but also as a eunuch (associating Is 39:7 with the events of Daniel). Other writings suggest that the huge stone that was placed in front of the lions' den was actually a stone that had been rolled from Palestine to Babylon just for this use (Midr. Ps. 66). And after Daniel had spent the night with 1,469 lions, he was found that morning reading the Shema (Midr. Ps. 66). The Chronicles of Jerahmeel (twelfth century) reflects the coalescing of a number of these traditions in the recounting of the Daniel story.

Subsequent Jewish scholars produced a number of works on Daniel concerned with a more literal and exegetical rendering of the text. The apocalyptic nature of Daniel itself did push the writers in their interpretive decisions. The commentary by Rashi (AD 1040-1105) explained that the messianic prophecies were related to the fourteenth century (not his own), thereby downplaying any expectation of an immanent and cataclysmic change during his own time. Ibn Ezra (AD 1091-1167) encouraged readers to refrain from speculating about the dates associated with the prophecies of Daniel, yet he assigned some events to his own day (Dan 7) and others to the events of the second century BC (Dan 8). The last great medieval Jewish exegete of Daniel was Isaac Abravanel (AD 1437-1508). He wrote Wells of Salvation after the Jews had been expelled from Spain, and for Abravanel, the book of Daniel became instructive for Jews living in exile, awaiting the kingdom of God on earth.

4.2. Influence on Medieval Literature. In addition to commentaries and writings, the book of Daniel produced another genre of literature, which demonstrates most clearly the impact of this book on subsequent generations. Many of these writings reflect the Daniel tradition as appropriated in the medieval period. At least twenty-three apocryphal apocalyptic texts were generated from the fourth to eleventh centuries with Daniel as the chief figure in the book. Although these works are not a "midrash" on Daniel, they reflect the belief that the Daniel tradition remained a viable vehicle for theological discourse. A number of these writings reflect the appropriation of the Daniel tradition in light of political and social events of the day. For example, the Syriac Apocalypse of Pseudo-Methodius dates to the seventh century AD and is concerned primarily with the Muslim invasion of the Byzantine Empire.

More popular forms of apocalyptic thought drew from Daniel as well. Joachim of Fiore (c. 1135-1202) cited Daniel 7:27 in his discussions of the third age that will come after the defeat of the antichrist. It was also during this time that the identification of the pope as the antichrist emerged, a theme that carried over into the Reformation period in the writings of Martin Luther. Even more suggestive politically is Daniel's appropriation in the Book of a Hundred

Chapters. Following the death of Frederick I, prophets began to speak of a future Frederick who is to come, who will restore Germany to its glory. And in the Book of a Hundred Chapters the four empires of Daniel are identified as France, England, Spain and Italy, while Germany was to be the fifth and greatest empire, led by this new Frederick.

During this period Nebuchadnezzar is a frequently cited figure, particularly in regard to the notion of madness or the image of the lunatic. At times he is portrayed as the mad sinner, at other times as the unholy wild man, and yet others as the holy wild man. Such a reading of Nebuchadnezzar appears in the thirteenth-century work of Albert the Great (Commentaria in librum Danielis), the Glossa ordinaria (PL 114:282) and numerous other works of the period.

5. Reformation Period.

Martin Luther contends in his preface to the book of Daniel that the Roman Empire is the fourth kingdom. He suggests that the ten horns mentioned in Daniel refer to the ten kingdoms that emerged from the Roman Empire, including Syria, Greece, Italy, England and Germany among others, and he refers to the little horn as "Mohammed," a reference to the Turkish defeat of Greece, Egypt and parts of Asia. Although ten kingdoms emerged from the Roman Empire, Luther is quick to assert that heritage of the Roman kingdom has now been transferred to the German Empire, which shall "remain until the Last Day no matter how weak [the German empire] may be." Although Luther espoused no specific timetable for the last days, his exegesis (see below) suggests that he understood the time to be near.

Luther's hermeneutic, like that of other contemporaries, including Philip Melancthon, George Joye and John Knox, may best be described as an "actualizing exegesis" (Firth). Although Luther's preface to Daniel addresses the narrative of the text, including the praise of Daniel as a virtuous figure, Luther connects the biblical text with more immediate historical events. In his discussion of Daniel 8; 11, Luther does mention Antiochus IV Epiphanes, instead quickly shifting to discussions of the antichrist, identifying the pope with the figure in Daniel 11. In Heerpredigt wider dem Türken (1529), Luther declares the Turks to be the fourth beast and implores the reader to join in the eschatological battle against the foe. Further, he interprets the wars mentioned in Daniel 11 as an allusion to events associated with Jan Huss.

John Calvin's treatment of Daniel remains much more philological. Rather than claiming that the events outlined in Daniel presaged his own era, as did Luther, Calvin asserted that the visions of Daniel pertain to events no later than that of Nero, unconvinced that the last days were imminent. Calvin contends that the seventy weeks in Daniel 9 refer to the coming of Jesus and the destruction of Jerusalem at the hands of Rome.

6. Historical-Critical Study.

With the rise of "higher criticism," a number of issues moved to the fore in discussions related to Daniel. In their commentaries on Daniel, Hugh Broughton (1596) and Hugo Grotius (1642) both dispensed with identifying the antichrist as the pope, preferring instead to recognize the fourth kingdom as Greece. Rather than understanding the book of Daniel as a road map of Western history and politics, critical scholars have wrestled with other matters, including that of genre, social setting, and sources of influence. This is not to suggest, however, that the tendency toward "actualizing exegesis" ceased with the period of the Reformation (see 6.1 below).

6.1. The Continued Use of Actualizing Exegesis.

The Fifth Monarchy movement, an anti-Cromwellian movement, in the 1650s understood themselves to be the fifth kingdom mentioned in Nebuchadnezzar's dream, and William Miller (1782-1849) determined on the basis of Daniel 8:14 that the end of the world would be in 1843, subsequently recalculated to 1844. Both incidents mirror Luther's appropriation of Daniel to contemporary political, theological and ecclesial matters. In the late nineteenth century, the book of Daniel figured significantly in the dispensational movement begun by J. N. Darby (1800-1882). The dispensational approach to Scripture and theology was later "codified" in some sense with the Scofield Reference Bible, released in 1909 by Cyrus Scofield. More recently, the writings of Hal Lindsey (The Late Great Planet Earth) and Tim LaHaye and Jerry Jenkins (the Left Behind series) have popularized a dispensational reading of Scripture.

6.2. Dating of the Book of Daniel. During the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, the question of the date and authenticity of the book of Daniel remained a source of contention. Beginning with Bertholdt (1806), von Lengerke (1835) and Ewald (1850), historical-critical study of Daniel tested the assumptions of a sixth-century dating of the book. Critical study resulted in a near consensus view of a Maccabean date for the book in its entirety, as argued in the earlier commentaries of Bevan (1892), Driver (1900), Marti (1901) and Montgomery (1922), among others. More recent commentaries by Lacocque (1979), Goldingay (1988), J. Collins (1993), and Smith-Christopher (1996) all argue for a second-century BC dating of the book. The sixth century BC date had its proponents in the nineteenth century with writers such as Hengstenberg (1831), Pusey (1864) and Keil (1867), and despite the emerging consensus among most critical scholars for a Maccabean date, the sixth century BC date has been defended in the twentieth century by R. D. Wilson (1917), E. J. Young (1949) and Joyce Baldwin (1978), in particular.

6.3. The Definition of Apocalyptic Literature and the Book of Daniel. Scholars in the twentieth century have worked to agree upon a common set of markers that identify a text more narrowly as an apocalypse. In the 1979 issue of Semeia, J. Collins articulated a description of such literature that has served as the operational definition for all subsequent discussions of genre. The definition emphasized literature that is “revelatory literature within a narrative framework” mediated by an “otherworldly being,” disclosing a transcendent reality. Within the larger corpus of literature deemed an apocalypse (e.g., 1 Enoch, 2 Baruch, 4 Ezra, Apocalypse of Zephaniah), the book of Daniel, in particular Daniel 7–12, has been recognized as a “historical apocalypse,” with features more nearly resembling those in the Animal Apocalypse and the Apocalypse of Weeks found in 1 Enoch, as well as 4 Ezra and 2 Baruch. A considerable body of research has emerged in recent decades analyzing the connections between Daniel and the apocalyptic literature found at Qumran, as well as the larger corpus of literature from the Second Temple period (see the representative articles in Collins and Flint).

6.4. Roots of Apocalypticism. A number of studies in the last half of the twentieth century explored the roots of apocalypticism. J. Collins (1977) noted the influence of mythological themes found in Canaanite texts and their influence on the book of Daniel. Similar studies have been carried out by S. Paul and J. Walton. N. Cohn, however, has suggested that themes such as supernatural evil and resurrection, among other apocalyptic themes, are of Persian origin. S. Cook has challenged this position, arguing that such a view robs the literature of its own imaginative power, while failing to recognize that the chief influence on Daniel appears to be the prophetic corpus in the Hebrew Bible. Arguably, the tales have an anthological style, with frequent allusions to and reinterpretation of biblical texts, while the visions contain explicit references to the prophetic corpus (Dan 9).

The renewed interest in apocalyptic writings in general within the last century has led to a more refined definition of the genre and consequently a more robust discussion concerning the similarities and differences between Daniel and other apocalypses from the same general period. Abandoning the predictive claims in Daniel suggested by earlier interpreters, recent interpreters have focused instead on the historical, theological and rhetorical elements of the book, given the social milieu, and in particular the oppressive reign of Antiochus IV Epiphanes.

The history of interpretation suggests that communities of faith through the centuries have found the book of Daniel to be a fertile source for constructive theological reflection. A casual review of such a history might highlight only the more sensational or bizarre interpretations, but critical engagement with the literature reinforces the seriousness with which the people of faith took the interpretive process in light of the world around them.

See also APOCALYPTICISM, APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE; DANIEL: BOOK OF; HERMENEUTICS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. G. K. Beale, The Use of Daniel in Jewish Apocalyptic Literature and in the Revelation of St. John (Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1974); K. Bracht and D. S. du Toit, eds., Die Geschichte der Daniel-Auslegung in Judentum, Christentum, und Islam: Studien zur Kommentierung des Danielbuches in Literatur und Kunst (BZAW 371; New York: de Gruyter, 2007); N. Cohn, Cosmos, Chaos, and the World to Come: The Ancient Roots of Apocalyptic Faith (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1993); A. Y. Collins, "The Influence of Daniel on the New Testament," in Daniel: A Commentary on the Book of Daniel, by J. Collins (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993) 90-123; J. J. Collins, The Apocalyptic Vision of the Book of Daniel (HSM 16; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1977); idem, ed., Apocalypse: The Morphology of a Genre (Semeia 14; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1979); idem, Daniel: A Commentary on the Book of Daniel (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); idem, The Star and the Scepter: The Messiah of the Dead Sea Scrolls and Other Ancient Literature (New York: Doubleday, 1995); J. J. Collins and P. W. Flint, The Book of Daniel: Composition and Reception (2 vols.; VTSup 83; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2002); S. L. Cook, The Apocalyptic Literature (Nashville: Abingdon, 2003); D. Daube, "Typology in Josephus," JJS 31 (1980) 18-36; M. Delgado, K. Koch and E. Marsh, Europa, Tausendjähriges Reich und Neue Welt: Zwei Jahrtausende Geschichte und Utopie in der Rezeption des Danielbuches (SCRK 1; Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 2003); L. DiTommaso, The Book of Daniel and the Apocryphal Daniel Literature (SVTP 20; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2005); J. D. G. Dunn, "The Danielic Son of Man in the New Testament," in The Book of Daniel: Composition and Reception, ed. J. J. Collins and P. W. Flint (2 vols.; VTSup 83; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2002) 2:528-49; El'azar ben Asher ha-Levi, The Chronicles of Jerahmeel (trans. M. Gaster; BibH 6; New York: Ktav, 1971); C. A. Evans, "Daniel in the New Testament: Visions of God's Kingdom," in The Book of Daniel: Composition and Reception, ed. J. J. Collins and P. W. Flint (2 vols.; VTSup 83; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2002) 2:490-527; L. H. Feldman, "Josephus' Portrait of Daniel," Hen 14 (1992) 37-96; K. R. Firth, The Apocalyptic Tradition in Reformation Britain, 1530-1645 (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1979); P. W. Flint, "The Daniel Tradition at Qumran," in The Book of Daniel: Composition and Reception, ed. J. J. Collins and P. W. Flint (2 vols.; VTSup 83; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2002) 2:329-67; J. Gammie, "A Journey through Danielic Spaces: The Book of Daniel in the Theology and the Piety of the Christian Community," Int 39 (1985) 144-56; Jerome, Commentary on Daniel (trans. G. Archer; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1958); B. Lindars, Son of Man: A Fresh Examination of the Son of Man Sayings in the Gospels (London: SPCK, 1983); I. H. Marshall, "Son of Man," DJG 775-81; S. Mowinckel, He That Cometh: The Mes- siah Concept in the Old Testament and Later Judaism (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2005); S. Paul, "The Mesopotamian Babylonian Background of Daniel 1-6," in The Book of Daniel: Composition and Reception, ed. J. J. Collins and P. W. Flint (2 vols.; VTSup 83; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2002) 1:55-68; B. E. Reynolds, The Apocalyptic Son of Man in the Gospel of John (WUNT 2/249; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2008); C. Rowland, The Open Heaven: A Study of Apocalyptic in Judaism and Early Christianity (New York: Crossroad, 1982); W. B. Shelton, Martyrdom from Exegesis in Hippolytus: An Early Church Presbyterian's Commentary on Daniel (Eugene, OR: Wipf & Stock, 2008); Theodoret of Cyrus, Commentary on Daniel (trans. R. Hill; SBLWGW 7; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2006); E. Ulrich, "The Text of Daniel in the Qumran Scrolls," in The Book of Daniel: Composition and Reception, ed. J. Collins and P. W. Flint (2 vols.; VTSup 83; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2002) 2:573-85; J. C. Vanderkam, "Righteous One, Messiah, Chosen One, and Son of Man in 1 Enoch 37-71," in The Messiah: Developments in Earliest Judaism and Christianity, ed. J. H. Charlesworth (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992) 169-91; J. Walton, "The Anzu Myth as Relevant Background for Daniel 7?" in The Book of Daniel: Composition and Reception, ed. J. J. Collins and P. W. Flint (2 vols.; VTSup 83; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2002) 1:69-89; N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996).

W. D. Tucker Jr.

DARIUS THE MEDE. See DANIEL: BOOK OF.

DAUGHTER ZION. See ZION.

DAVIDIC COVENANT/KINGSHIP. See COVENANT; MESSIAH.

DAY OF THE LORD

The Day of the Lord is a significant recurring theme in the prophetic literature of the OT. At its essence, it refers to a time of Yahweh's unmistakable and powerful intervention. It appears in a variety of contexts in prophetic literature and draws together a wide array of images. The prophets employ the specter of the Day of the Lord to offer both warning and hope, announcing both disaster and *salvation. The Day of the Lord continues to engender a significant amount of scholarly discussion concerning its origins, development and essential meaning. This article explores the usage of the Day of the Lord in prophetic literature, focusing on the vocabulary that invokes this day, its origins and temporal orientation. It then explores the varied uses of the Day of the Lord across the OT Prophetic Books.

1. Foundations
2. The Day of the Lord in the Major Prophets
3. The Day of the Lord in the Minor Prophets (Book of the Twelve)
4. Reception of the Concept
5. Conclusion

1. Foundations.

1.1. Terminology. One of the most significant issues encountered when considering the Day of the Lord in prophetic literature is the determination of which passages contain this theme. To begin, there are fifteen verses in the OT that contain the exact phrase yôm yhw̄h (“Day of the LORD”): Isaiah 13:6, 9; Ezekiel 13:5; Joel 1:15; 2:1, 11, 31 (3:4 MT); 3:14 (4:14 MT); Amos 5:18, 20; Obadiah 15; Zephaniah 1:7, 14 (2x); Malachi 3:23 (4:5 MT). Some scholars, most notably Y. Hoffman, insist that a discussion of the Day of the Lord must begin with these passages alone (Hoffman, 44). He would argue that only after taking account of these explicit references is it viable to broaden the scope of the study. This perspective is appealing because it provides an easily manageable collection of texts from which to derive an understanding of the Day of the Lord.

This restrictive approach, however, faces numerous challenges. One of the most significant concerns the viability of identifying the phrase yôm yhw̄h as a discrete term that always conveys a certain idea or meaning. D. Ishai-Rosenboim points to the variety of contexts that employ “day of the Lord” language and argues that the literal meaning of the phrase is so broad that it defies easy categorization (Ishai-Rosenboim, 400). Furthermore, the number of variant phrases that invoke the context of a day characterized by a powerful intervention of Yahweh suggests that the Day of the Lord resonates more broadly than just in those fifteen passages (Nogalski, 193).

This understanding permits the consideration of a significant number of different prophetic passages that seem to invoke the Day of the Lord but employ variations on the phrase

yôm yhw̄h. These variations include the insertion of a preposition into the middle of the phrase yôm yhw̄h, referring to a day of Yahweh’s anger or *wrath, and the addition of other descriptors to the day (Weiss, 64-65). These variations on yôm yhw̄h widen the pool of available texts to include Isaiah 2:12; 34:8; 61:2; Jeremiah 46:10; Ezekiel 7:19; 30:3; Zephaniah 1:18; 2:2, 3; Zechariah 14:1.

It is also possible to further broaden the potential range of the Day of the Lord. Other stock phrases such as bayyôm hahû (“on that day”) and bayyāmîm hāhēm̄mā (“in those days”) seem to function within the prophetic literature as references to Yahweh’s actions or days where Yahweh’s activity is imminent, suggesting that they may form part of the Day of the Lord motif complex (Nogalski, 194). The frequency of these phrases within the prophetic corpus would greatly expand the range of texts under consideration and would suggest that the Day of the Lord is a more prevalent motif in prophetic literature than generally has been admitted.

The range of terminology under discussion has significant ramifications for understanding this theme in prophetic literature. This methodological question permits no easy answer, since we should neither dilute the power of the motif by permitting overly broad criteria nor dismiss passages that evoke similar imagery on the ground of minimal lexical variance. The current trend appears to favor the consideration of a broader range of texts, acknowledging that the concept of the Day of the Lord invokes a certain sense of Yahweh’s intervention into human affairs for a variety of purposes. This places the focus upon the rhetorical effect of invoking the Day of the Lord with all of its attendant imagery. Consequently, it is useful to consider variations on the phrase yôm yhw̄h that invoke similar images in order to explain the purposes and effects of Yahweh’s actions on the Day of the Lord. The prophets employ an array of terms and phrases to discuss the features and results of this intervention. Thus, limiting the Day of the Lord to the specific verses that contain the phrase yôm yhw̄h is overly restrictive and diminishes the significance of this concept throughout prophetic literature.

1.2. Origins. The question of the origins of the Day of the Lord in Israelite religious expression consumes much of the energy devoted to this topic. Various references to the Day of the Lord in prophetic literature play significant roles in this discussion. S. Mowinckel is a key figure in the discussion of the origins of the Day of the Lord, which he locates in harvest celebrations and an annual festival of enthronement in which Yahweh took his place as the rightful ruler over Israel. This festival would occur at the end of the agricultural cycle, when the earth hovered on the brink of returning to chaos and only the renewed presence of Yahweh could restore prosperity and fertility (Mowinckel, 140). Consequently, this festival in which Yahweh was again symbolically enthroned as king of Israel reflected the desire for Yahweh to act restoratively to guarantee another year of prosperity and security. The Day of the Lord, in this understanding, reestablishes Yahweh's governance over Israel and pointed to his great acts as a means of cementing his position. This perspective is rooted in comparisons with practices from Babylonian and Canaanite practices that celebrate a ritual enthronement of deities (Gray, 24-25).

The evidence that Mowinckel adduces for the existence of this festival and the enthronement of Yahweh derives from the discussion of the Day of the Lord in Amos 5:18-20, which claims that the Day of the Lord will be a day of darkness rather than a day of light. Amos 5:21-24 then denounces Israel's cultic festivals for their apparently empty piety, which probably included this enthronement festival (Mowinckel, 132). Amos 5:18-20 is thus a shocking reinterpretation of the motif because its roots in the enthronement festival gave it an initial sense of the day when Yahweh would remember his *covenant and act to restore prosperity. Instead, the prophetic use of the motif in Amos introduces the idea of judgment and *destruction in Yahweh's actions.

This theory of the origins of the Day of the Lord receives significant challenges from those who question the existence of the enthronement festival and argue that it relies too much on Babylonian cultic practices (Černý, 44-45). Instead, L. Černý proposes that Day of the Lord has its origins as a day decreed by Yahweh in which Yahweh will act to shape the future of Israel. Prophetic figures took the concept and suggested that Yahweh's shaping could include negative consequences. This occurs in Amos 5:18-20, where the combination of perceived religious apostasy, political instability and foreign threat combined to render inappropriate any positive portrayals of Yahweh's intervention (Černý, 103). As the period of prophetic proclamation proceeded, the fall of Jerusalem made it appear that the Day of the Lord had already taken place, but later prophets were able to reappropriate the concept to serve the needs of the exilic and postexilic communities, where it pointed forward to describe a situation that was "international, global and universal," which ultimately marked the end of ages and announced final judgment (Černý, 79-80).

Following Mowinckel and Černý, G. von Rad advanced another influential proposal for discussing the origin of the Day of the Lord. His hypothesis probably has garnered the most support in the discussion of the origins of the Day of the Lord and is the theory that provides the background for most of the subsequent discussion of the motif. Notably, von Rad's work offers one of the narrowest examinations of the motif, as he claims that he intends to focus on the passages that contain the phrase yôm yhw (von Rad 1959, 97). Uniquely, he asserts that Amos 5:18-20, almost uniformly considered the "earliest" Day of the Lord passage, is not an appropriate place from which to begin the investigation because of the lack of surrounding context that would reveal the content of the motif. Von Rad also leaves aside Isaiah 2:12, usually considered the next earliest use of the motif because it deals generally with the results and effects of Yahweh's arrival on his day, rather than with the day itself.

For his study, von Rad focuses on four passages (Is 13; 34, Ezek 7; Joel 2) that, in his estimation, discuss the Day of the Lord in sufficiently significant detail. From a close reading of these passages, he locates the origins of the Day of the Lord in the concept of holy war with Yahweh as the divine warrior who descends to achieve victory over his enemies (see Warfare and Divine Warfare). Von Rad thus claims that the Day of the Lord reflects a "pure event of war," and he specifically rejects Mowinckel's enthronement hypothesis (von Rad 1959, 108). Locating the origins of the Day of the Lord in the realm of holy war permits von Rad to explain the motifs that it employs including the appearance of Yahweh, the mustering of his army, the terror that afflicts his enemies, cosmological cataclysms and the sacral element of devoting the plunder to Yahweh. These martial motifs certainly suggest that the Day of the Lord resonates with the idea of Yahweh establishing supremacy over opposing nations through military conquest (Stuart, 161).

Ultimately, von Rad concludes that the use of the Day of the Lord in prophetic literature reflects "a bold actualization of ancient Yahwistic ideas" (von Rad 1959, 105). Essentially, the prophets appropriate the idea of Yahweh coming as divine warrior and use it to warn that Yahweh could target Israel and Judah themselves, as well as offer hope that Yahweh eventually would defeat foreign oppressors.

The identification of holy war as the origin of the Day of the Lord motif is the principal point of departure for further studies, which both build from and critique this position. F. Cross tries to combine Mowinckel and von Rad's hypotheses by claiming that the Day of the Lord reflects a combination of kingship and conquest traditions: a day both of Yahweh's holy warfare and of Yahweh's enthronement (Cross, 21). Others advance competing proposals to determine the origins of the Day of the Lord, with F. Fensham agreeing with von Rad and Mowinckel that the motif originated within the prehistory of Israel but asserting instead that it ought to be linked to treaty curses for the community's own misdemeanors (Fensham, 94). Fensham specifically raises issues with von Rad's hypothesis, including questioning why the Day of the Lord can be directed against Israel and why the idea of war does not appear to be present in every mention of the concept, highlighting especially the context surrounding Amos 5:18-20, which focuses upon Israel's transgressions and empty religious festivals. This critique is especially relevant in the context of Amos because one would expect an early mention of the motif to reflect its theological underpinnings. Notably, Fensham does not dispute that militaristic motifs occur in the discussion of the Day of the Lord, but he seeks to subordinate them under the broader category of punishment for the breaking of covenant. He argues that "the Day of the Lord is a day of punishment which may not be a day of war, but a day in which certain curses took effect. . . . The Day of the Lord is a day of judgment and punishment" (Fensham, 94-95).

The emphasis on punitive aspects of the Day of the Lord makes it difficult to account for its salvific potential, which various Day of the Lord passages explore in some detail. When prophets invoke the Day of the Lord against foreign *nations, they use motifs of military defeat and responses from the natural world to characterize the totality of their destruction, since covenant curses are not applicable. When the Day of the Lord is directed against Yahweh's people, it may be possible to see elements of curses from Yahweh's covenant treaty with Israel. These include, but are not limited to, curses of military destruction. This resonance, however, is not sufficient evidence to establish that covenant curses provide the basis for the Day of the Lord as it is employed in prophetic literature (see Blessings and Curses).

M. Weiss directly challenges von Rad's identification of holy war as the origin of the Day of the Lord, citing the existence of numerous prophetic texts that employ the vocabulary of holy war that are not part of the corpus of passages that invoke the Day of the Lord. Essentially, this indicates that the Day of the Lord is sufficiently complex that it cannot be perfectly conflated with the idea of holy war. Significantly, this list includes Amos 5:18-20 and Isaiah 2, which are possibly the earliest mentions of the Day of the Lord, but which von Rad relegated to positions of secondary importance in his own analysis because of what he considered the insufficient depth with which they approached the subject. Instead, Weiss argues that the Day of the Lord is a more generic concept, adapting itself according to use that the different prophetic figures wished to employ. The unifying feature throughout passages that invoke the Day of the Lord is Yahweh's appearance and action; essentially, to raise the specter of the Day of the Lord is to anticipate "an actual theophany in all of its concrete incisiveness" (Weiss, 47). Weiss's work helps to demonstrate the limitations of assigning the origin of the Day of the Lord to one particular image complex; instead, he appears to allow for greater creativity on behalf of the prophets who used the Day of the Lord to evoke images of Yahweh acting in varied fashions. Interestingly, Weiss breaks with other interpreters in that he grounds his approach to the Day of the Lord in the prophetic literature, arguing that the Day of the Lord is primarily a prophetic concept that Amos helped to establish through his use of the phrase yôm yhw (Weiss, 60). He maintains, however, that the phrase would have been comprehensible to Amos's audience as referring to a time of Yahweh's appearance and action. This broad approach to the concept has the advantage of being able to handle the available material in a reasonably clear and coherent manner.

Finally, Y. Hoffman argues instead that the root of Day of the Lord material is theophany, "a special and exceptional intervention in the current stream of events" that Yahweh accomplishes (Hoffman, 44). Hoffman's analysis is tightly restricted to those passages that contain the exact phrase yôm yhw. He questions those studies that accord the same level of significance to passages containing the variant phrases, claiming that the proper way to proceed is to engage in a detailed philological examination of the phrase itself before moving toward an evaluation of related phrases. Hoffman takes issue with Weiss's assertion that the Day of the Lord was not a familiar concept by the time of Amos, arguing that Amos's assertion that the Day of the Lord will be a day of darkness and not light packs rhetorical punch only if there is already an assumption of what the Day of the Lord ought to entail (Hoffman, 38).

Curiously, Hoffman argues that while in Amos the concept of the Day of the Lord must have been known, the exact phrase yôm yhw may not have been fixed. This actually argues against his own injunction to consider only those passages that use the exact phrase, since one could argue that other synonymous phrases are invoking the same context. What unites the Day of the Lord passages for Hoffman is this sense of it being a day when Yahweh will appear and act in a powerful or miraculous fashion. Consequently, the surrounding motifs of cosmic upheaval, war and judgment on the wicked should be expected companions to the appearance of the Day of the Lord in prophetic literature.

In summary, the preceding discussion illustrates the continuing lack of consensus concerning the origins of the Day of the Lord. Instead, there is a broad spectrum of hypotheses that strive to peer back into the murky past and describe the origins of the motif, in spite of the paucity of evidence and disagreements over which prophetic texts ought to have priority. Suggestions for the origins of the Day of the Lord include a range of sources, such as holy war traditions, theophany, enthronement festivals, enactment of covenant treaty curses, or some combinations of these. This lack of scholarly consensus is not surprising given the difficulty of trying to trace the development of this motif through Israel's existence while only having direct evidence of its existence in a limited number of prophetic texts. This research, however, does help to elucidate various elements of the image complex evoked when the prophetic literature invokes the Day of the Lord. These include most obviously the appearance of Yahweh, which often is accompanied by descriptions of war, cosmic upheaval, judgment and destruction, the targets of the day, and its temporal proximity.

1.3. Temporal Orientation. The flexibility of the Day of the Lord motif in prophetic literature is also on display when in regard to its temporal orientation. One of the enduring questions surrounding the Day of the Lord concerns the timing of when the prophets expected it to occur. On many occasions it is evident that the future is in view, where the Day of the Lord is a prophesied day that brings either judgment or restoration. There is some room for variation in whether this future appearance of the Day of the Lord also indicates an eschatological end to history (see Eschatology). Imminence is a clear feature of the Day of the Lord, with numerous references emphasizing that the day is "near" or "coming" (Is 13:6; Ezek 30:3; Joel 1:15; 2:1; 3:14; Zeph 1:7, 14). The nearness of the day rhetorically heightens the power of the motif because its power looms over those against whom Yahweh directs it. The progression of the prophetic literature appears to adopt a more eschatological orientation culminating with establishment of Yahweh's reign and the cleansing of Israel and the nations in Zechariah 14, and with the promise of the return of Elijah as a harbinger of the Day of the Lord in Malachi 4.

The temporal orientation of the Day of the Lord appears to stretch beyond its future appearance. Specifically, several passages (Is 22:1-14; Jer 46:2-20; Lam 1:12; 2:22; Ezek 13:1-9) seem to refer to the Day of the Lord as a past historical event in which Yahweh exercises divine authority over the outcome. J. Everson links Isaiah 22:1-14 with Sennacherib's invasion, Jeremiah 46:2-20 with the battle of Carchemish, and Ezekiel 13:1-9 and Lamentations 1-2 with the *Babylonian capture of Jerusalem (Everson, 331). This challenges the dominant streams of interpretation that focus on the Day of the Lord as a final and decisive intervention of Yahweh into history. Interestingly, these passages describe Yahweh acting to both defeat a foreign enemy (Is 22; Jer 46) and to bring judgment upon Jerusalem and Judah (Lam 1—2; Ezek 13). This range of usage again confirms the flexibility of the Day of the Lord for prophetic proclamation. Everson correctly states that “the Day of YHWH was a powerful concept available to the prophets for their use in interpreting various momentous events—past, future or imminent” (Everson, 335). These past occurrences of the Day of the Lord emphasize its martial nature, which builds on the tradition that von Rad established, but the evidence of the temporal flexibility of the Day of the Lord is a valuable contribution to the discussion.

2. The Day of the Lord in the Major Prophets.

We now consider examples of the Day of the Lord in prophetic texts. In keeping with the foregoing discussion concerning terminology, texts that employ different phrases to invoke the Day of the Lord will be referenced here. The following discussion cannot be exhaustive, but it does provide an orientation to the flexibility and power of the Day of the Lord motif in prophetic proclamation.

2.1. Isaiah. Isaiah contains several attested references to the Day of the Lord both through the phrase yôm yhw and its variants. Isaiah 2:12 refers to a yôm layhw šēbā’ôt (“day for the LORD Almighty”), in which Yahweh establishes his supremacy over the nations and their idols. The preceding context accuses Yahweh’s people of idolatry, which he will rectify by appearing in power. The verses that follow delineate the range of those who suffer the effects of the Day of the Lord, focusing upon those who are prideful and arrogant (Is 2:12) and eventually revealing their insignificant stature in comparison to Yahweh (Is 2:22).

These verses further describe the range of those against whom Yahweh directs his day, using images drawn from nature, such as the cedars of Lebanon and the oaks of Bashan (Is 2:13-14), as well as human artisanship in the description of towers, walls and ships (Is 2:15-16). This picture of the Day of Lord emphasizes its terror and judgment against those who do not acknowledge Yahweh, making explicit reference to how they will abandon their idols when Yahweh makes his divine presence inescapably evident (Is 2:20-21). Martial images relating to Yahweh’s army or divine victory in battle are absent; rather, the appearance of Yahweh is sufficient to cause terror and panic.

Another key passage that uses the Day of the Lord occurs in Isaiah 13, which explicitly invokes the coming of the yôm yhw (Is 13:6, 9). The context is an oracle against Babylon that claims that Yahweh is mustering an army to unleash destruction, bringing martial imagery to bear (Is 13:5). The Day of the Lord in this passage reflects the outpouring of Yahweh’s wrath on Babylon. It combines the images of Yahweh’s army with the theophanic nature of the day by pointing to the trembling and darkening of the heavenly bodies that respond to the arrival of Yahweh (Is 13:10). This resonates with core images of the Day of the Lord, where the whole cosmos responds to Yahweh’s intervention with darkness and trembling (cf. Joel 2:21-32; Amos 5:18-20; Zeph 1:14-16). The responses of those against whom Yahweh directs the Day of the Lord mirror the trembling of nature, with images relating to convulsion, pain and torment.

Isaiah 22:5 also invokes the Day of the Lord by using a phrase stating that there is a day of devastation that belongs to the “Lord God of hosts” (’ādōnay yhw šēbā’ôt). The martial images in the surrounding context resonate with other instances of the Day of the Lord. This passage creates the context of a people experiencing defeat because Yahweh acts against them (Is 22:6-11). It paints Judah’s attempts at self-reliance as futile in the wake of Yahweh acting against the city. It also shows the flexibility of the Day of the Lord motif within a prophetic book, as some believe that it references an Assyrian invasion of Judah, adding divine sanction to a historical event.

Isaiah 34:8 follows the other references to the Day of the Lord in announcing judgment against foreign nations. It announces a “day of vengeance for Yahweh” (yôm nāqām layhw), which contains numerous references to martial imagery, most notably the image of Yahweh wielding a bloodied sword (Is 34:6). The surrounding context of this chapter establishes Yahweh’s supremacy over all armies and describes the responses of nature of his conquests (Is 34:1-4). Interestingly, Edom now personifies the enemy against whom Yahweh moves, rather than Babylon as in Isaiah 13. The text makes evident the destruction entailed by the Day of the Lord by describing a return to nature, where Yahweh's judgment erases all evidence of human activity (Is 34:13-15).

2.2. Jeremiah. The exact phrase yôm yhw does not occur in Jeremiah, but there is at least one passage that seems invoke motifs related to the Day of the Lord. Jeremiah 46:10 refers to a day that belongs to the "Lord God of hosts" ('ādōnay yhw šebā'ōt), while the parallel clause describes it as a yôm nēqāmā ("day of vengeance"). The context of this day again highlights its martial attributes, referring to Yahweh's sword (Jer 46:10b) and the destruction of the warriors who oppose Yahweh (Jer 46:12). The target of the Day of the Lord in this instance is Egypt, and the prophetic oracle is set against the backdrop of the Egyptian defeat at Carchemish (Jer 46:2). The reference to Yahweh's weaponry and the description of the day as a day of vengeance indicate that this passage resonates with Isaiah 34:6, where Yahweh again breaks the power of a foreign enemy and establishes supremacy. The temporal orientation of the Day of the Lord in this passage looks backward to this historical event and interprets it through the lens of Yahweh's control over nations and their armies. Associating this passage with the Day of the Lord may offer the clearest indication of the ability of this prophetic motif to address past situations as well as warn of future appearances of Yahweh.

2.3. Ezekiel. Ezekiel also employs the Day of the Lord in several different contexts to indicate the nature of Yahweh's intervention into human affairs. Ezekiel 7:19 occurs in the context of a prophetic announcement of judgment against those who profane the temple in Jerusalem, and the prophet claims that this will occur "on the day of the LORD's wrath" (bēyôm 'ebrat yhw). The prophet sets up this judgment with the announcement "Behold, the day," which introduces a lengthy list of the elements that this day contains. Martial imagery again plays an important role, as Yahweh's sword menaces the community, while Yahweh continues to reveal the depths of the divine power through the promise of plague and famine. The response of the audience, as it convulses and laments, reflects its inability to stand in the face of Yahweh's power. Ezekiel thus uses the Day of the Lord on this occasion to emphasize Yahweh's incipient judgment on the covenant community that failed to remain faithful.

Ezekiel 13:5 is set in the context of an address against false prophets who claim to have a word from Yahweh. Yahweh declares through Ezekiel that these prophets have not stood in the breaches of the wall or assembled for battle bēyôm yhw ("on the day of the LORD"). The vision of the Day of the Lord that Ezekiel constructs here sets Yahweh as an invader against a besieged city whose prophets refused to play their allotted role. Yahweh then announces judgment against the false prophets in Jerusalem through exercising divine authority over nature and bringing a destroying wind (Ezek 13:13). Here, again, the Day of the Lord targets Yahweh's own people and uses images of Yahweh's control over nature to describe the coming destruction.

Ezekiel 30 again demonstrates the flexibility of the Day of the Lord within an individual prophetic book by using this motif to announce destruction against Egypt. This chapter activates the Day of the Lord with a double reference to the nearness of the day, and then states that it is a "day for the LORD" (yôm layhw) (Ezek 30:3a). The proximity of the day is a regular feature of the Day of the Lord, increasing the sense of imminence behind Yahweh's intervention. Ezekiel 30 also draws from the image world of cosmic darkness (Ezek 30:3b) and martial imagery to describe the effects of this day (Ezek 30:4). Interestingly, in this chapter Yahweh uses the Babylonians as agents of the Day of the Lord (Ezek 30:10), perhaps substituting for the heavenly army (cf. Is 13:3-6; Joel 2:10-11), but the chapter ultimately emphasizes Yahweh's authority over the activities of all the nations through a series of first-person verbs that describe Egypt's destruction (Ezek 30:13-19). The Day of the Lord that Ezekiel announces against Egypt ultimately indicates Yahweh's claim over all the nations, which learn that Yahweh is God through his inescapable intervention into their affairs.

3. The Day of the Lord in the Minor Prophets (Book of the Twelve).

A significant number of the references to the Day of the Lord derive from the Book of the *Twelve, such that the Day of the Lord can be seen as an underlying theme that helps to organize a reading of this collection (Rendtorff, 89). R. Rendtorff specially identifies a common refrain in the use of the Day of the Lord in Joel, Amos and Zephaniah, emphasizing the need to seek and return to Yahweh. Furthermore, twelve of the fifteen uses of the collocation yôm yhwh occur within this corpus, while there are also numerous examples of variant expressions that appear to invoke the Day of the Lord. This may substantially increase the number of texts that could be considered under the rubric of the Day of the Lord.

J. Nogalski aptly summarizes the broad sweep of the Day of the Lord in Book of the Twelve with the idea that the texts that evoke the Day of the Lord reflect an indication of Yahweh's intervention into human affairs. This intervention can be foretold or remembered (Nogalski, 196). It can also have both positive and negative effects on Israel and Judah, depending on the prophet's particular message. Yahweh's appearance and action comprise an important element of prophetic persuasion, and the Day of the Lord provides the prophets with an opportunity to emphasize Yahweh's authority and the necessity of responding appropriately.

3.1. Joel. Joel contains five references to the Day of the Lord that use the exact collocation yôm yhwh, spanning the length of the book (Joel 1:15; 2:1, 11, 31 [3:4 MT]; 3:14 [4:14 MT]). Joel demonstrates the range of Day of the Lord imagery by employing this concept in contexts of both woe and weal. In the first half of the book Joel 1:15 introduces the Day of the Lord into a discussion of an overwhelming locust plague and drought, suggesting that the situation faced by the audience has a divine source. Joel 2:1 and Joel 2:11 then form an inclusio around the description of Yahweh's army as it marches against Jerusalem, bringing destruction in its wake. This passage expands on the Day of the Lord by attaching descriptions of the darkness (Joel 2:2) and trembling of the heavenly bodies (Joel 2:10). These references highlight the capacity of the Day of the Lord to unleash devastation against Yahweh's own covenant people, using both natural and supernatural agents to threaten destruction.

Joel 2:12-32 reverses this picture and uses the concept of the Day of the Lord to announce the possibility of rescue thanks to Yahweh's powerful intervention. A call to return to Yahweh lays the foundations for the reversal of the Day of the Lord, where it now signifies restoration rather than destruction. This is a significant development because it indicates that Yahweh's covenant community may have the ability to avert the Day of the Lord by responding according to the prophet's prescriptions. Joel 2:31 (3:4 MT) echoes the use of the Day of the Lord earlier in the chapter when it describes the darkening of heavenly bodies, but in this instance Yahweh offers escape from the Day of Lord for those who call upon his name.

The final occurrence of the phrase yôm yhwh is in Joel 3:14 (4:14 MT), and it emphasizes the way in which this prophetic book enacts a complete reversal of the sense of the Day of the Lord. This is evident in a comparison the use of the Day of the Lord in Joel 2:1-2, 10-11 and Joel 3:14-16 (4:14-16 MT). In the former passage the call goes up to sound an alarm in Zion because the day of Yahweh is near. Joel 2:10-11 then reveals that this Day of the Lord entails Yahweh leading an unstoppable army against *Zion. Meanwhile, Joel 3:14 also announces that the Day of the Lord is near, using almost the same vocabulary. In Joel 3:14-16, however, Zion is the location of Yahweh's divine activity. Following the announcement in Joel 3:14 that the Day of the Lord is near, Joel 3:16 declares that Yahweh roars from Zion, essentially rendering it impregnable by his very presence. In both instances the Day of the Lord results in a call going out from Zion, but the call in Joel 2 sounds the alarm, whereas the call in Joel 3 reinforces the complete security of Zion because the text establishes that Yahweh is Zion's guardian.

Joel also appears to invoke the Day of the Lord through variant phrases, including bayyôm hahû ("on that day") in Joel 3:18 (4:18 MT) and bayyāmûm hāhēmā ("in those days") in Joel 2:29; 3:1 (3:2; 4:1 MT). All three passages employ these phrases in a forward-looking context where Yahweh will break into history to either judge or offer salvation to Judah and/or foreign nations. The intervention of the deity in these passages resonates with the picture of the Day of the Lord found in the explicit mentions of that day in Joel 1:15; 2:1, 11, 31; 3:14, which suggests that the Day of the Lord is also in view in these particular examples.

3.2. Amos. Amos uses the Day of Lord in the context of a prophetic threat against Israel. Amos 5:18 calls down woe on those who long for the Day of the Lord, which Amos then describes as a day of darkness, not of light (cf. Joel 2:1-2; Zeph 1:15-16). The phrase yôm yhwh then recurs in Amos 5:20, alongside imagery that emphasizes the gloomy nature of the day.

Two elements of use of the Day of the Lord in Amos merit special attention. First, Amos 5:18, 20 are commonly thought to be the earliest uses of the collocation yôm yhw in prophetic literature, which has given them a significant role to play in discussions of the origins and development of the concept. Second, these references admirably reveal the ambiguity associated with the Day of the Lord. Amos castigates those who long for the Day of the Lord, prophesying that it will bring darkness and destruction. This may implicitly suggest that there was a stream in Israelite religious expression that expected the Day of the Lord to be a positive experience, perhaps providing rescue from enemies and oppression. Amos thus potentially introduces a new trajectory by suggesting that Yahweh's actions on the Day of the Lord could target Israel (Hoffman, 41). This widens the usefulness of the Day of the Lord motif and permits the prophets to use its rhetorical force to speak of both woe and weal for their audiences.

3.3. Obadiah. Obadiah 15 refers to the yôm yhw in the context of the announcement of judgment against Edom. It locates the Day of the Lord as a day of judgment against all nations, focusing in particular on the fate of Edom. Obadiah looks to a coming Day of the Lord, referring to it as "near" (cf. Is 13:6; Ezek 30:3; Joel 1:15; 2:1; 3:14; Zeph 1:7, 14). It also shares with Joel 3:4 the idea of escape from the Day of the Lord rooted in Zion (Obad 17). Obadiah adds one unique feature to the imagery surrounding the Day of the Lord in that it portrays Judah as an agent in executing the verdict (Snyman, 85). It is clearly Yahweh's power that overthrows the offending nation, but Obadiah does provide a greater role for the people of Yahweh beyond that of passive recipients of rescue. The Day of the Lord remains a time when Yahweh intervenes into human affairs, but there is room for a creative presentation of how his involvement will occur.

3.4. Zephaniah. Zephaniah is heavily indebted to the concept of the Day of Lord. Zephaniah 1:7, 14 (2x) explicitly refer to the yôm yhw in order to announce judgment against Judah. Both verses refer to the imminence of the Day of the Lord, while Zephaniah 1:14 overtly adopts a martial tone when it portrays Yahweh as a mighty warrior shouting a battle cry. Zephaniah 1:15-16 then combines theophanic and martial image worlds by describing the Day of the Lord as a day of darkness and cloud, but also a day of horn blasts against cities and their defenses.

Parallel phrases continue to provide the pictures of the Day of the Lord as a day of Yahweh's judgment against Judah and Jerusalem. Zephaniah 1:18 points to the yôm 'ebrat yhw ("day of the LORD's wrath"), while Zephaniah 2:2-3 refers to the yôm 'ap-yhw ("day of the LORD's anger"). Zephaniah 2:2-3 is also notable in that it explicitly calls its audience to repent and return to Yahweh in order to escape the Day of the Lord. This echoes the development of the Day of the Lord in Joel by providing an element of overt conditionality into announcements of the Day of the Lord against Israel and Judah, suggesting that a proper response can turn it aside.

Zephaniah 3 shifts perspective and points to the positive elements of the Day of the Lord. Zephaniah 3:11, 16 use bayyôm hahû' ("on that day") to point to a time when Yahweh restores Judah and Jerusalem. This chapter continues the theme of Zephaniah in using martial imagery to describe Yahweh (Zeph 3:17), but in this instance Yahweh as mighty warrior is a symbol of protection rather than condemnation. These examples denote a progression in Zephaniah's use of the Day of the Lord. It begins as a day of disaster and judgment for Judah, but perhaps through the call to repentance in Zephaniah 2:1-3 Yahweh's activities by the end of the book effectively restore and protect Judah, signifying a renewed relationship with Yahweh.

3.5. Zechariah. The final three chapters of Zechariah are replete with images that reflect the Day of the Lord. Zechariah 12:1—13:6 employs the phrase bayyôm hahû' ("on that day") ten times to describe the effects of Yahweh's intervention in human affairs (Zech 12:3, 4, 6, 8 [2x], 9, 11; 13:1, 2, 4). This intervention follows several different lines. Zechariah 12:1-9 uses this concept to indicate how Yahweh will protect Jerusalem from hostile nations, keeping it secure while he brings its enemies to destruction. Zechariah 12:10-14 shifts the focus to the house of David and Jerusalem and describes the magnitude of its weeping in the wake of the fate of the enigmatic figure whom they pierced (Zech 12:10). This probably reflecting an internal purification element to the Day of the Lord that goes along with the external protection previously described. Zechariah 13:1-6 continues the internal focus as it describes the cleansing of house of David and Jerusalem through the removal of idolatry (Zech 13:1-2). This will happen in conjunction with Yahweh's removal of false prophecy from the community, suggesting a divinely inspired cleansing of the community's religious expression (Zech 13:3-6).

Zechariah 14:1 refers to a yôm-bā' layhwh ("day coming for Yahweh") to introduce its detailed discussion of Yahweh's appearance and Jerusalem's final fate. In the verses that follow, multiple uses of bayyôm hahû' ("on that day") reinforce the idea that this chapter focuses upon the Day of the Lord (Zech 14:4, 6, 8, 9, 13, 20, 21). The use of the Day of the Lord in Zechariah 14 proceeds along interesting trajectories. It casts the day in a martial tone, referring to a day in which Yahweh fights (Zech 14:3), but it differs even from the previous presentation of the Day of the Lord in Zechariah. As in Joel 3:14; Obadiah 15; Zechariah 12:1-8, Jerusalem is the location from which Yahweh fights on this day, but unlike those passages, Yahweh's presence in Zechariah 14 does not guarantee the inviolability of Jerusalem. Instead, Zechariah 14 announces the capture of the city and the mistreatment of half of its inhabitants before Yahweh acts to rectify the situation (Zech 14:2-3). The closest resonances to this description of the Day of the Lord derive from Joel 3:4 and Obadiah 17, which indicate the potential for there to be survivors who escape the Day of the Lord by calling on the name of Yahweh. The capture of the city seems to be a more intensive purification process than is found in Joel or Obadiah, but after this process finishes, Yahweh is able to establish Jerusalem as the seat of divine kingship.

The Day of the Lord undergoes a significant progression as it unfolds throughout this chapter. Zechariah brings out other recurrent images including the trembling of nature (Zech 14:4) and darkness (Zech 14:6). After the description of purification, the Day of the Lord in Zechariah 14 highlights the restorative elements for Jerusalem while emphasizing the destructive fate of those nations who oppose Yahweh (Zech 14:12-13) and his sovereignty over the entire world (Zech 14:9). Interestingly, Zechariah 14:14 may resonate with Obadiah 15 in that it also appears to portray the newly purified Judah as an active agent fighting alongside Yahweh on the Day of the Lord. This would reflect the sincerity of Judah's commitment to Yahweh after his actions on its behalf. The Day of the Lord concludes in this chapter with the defeat of the nations, their pilgrimage to acknowledge Yahweh's sovereignty, and the establishment of Jerusalem as a holy city devoted to Yahweh. In this way, it summarizes both the trajectories of external protection and internal purification that Zechariah evokes.

3.6. Malachi. The final verses of Malachi invoke the Day of the Lord in the context of Yahweh judging between the righteous and the wicked. The temporal outlook of these verses concerns a future judgment. Malachi uses the Day of the Lord to set up distinctions within the Judahite community, where the coming of the day promises salvation for those who obey Yahweh and devastation for those who do not. The crux of what it means to follow Yahweh is to remember the law of Moses (Mal 4:4).

The idea of the Day of the Lord is also present in Malachi 3:17; 4:1 through references to a day of Yahweh's action. Malachi 3:17 refers to the day when Yahweh acts to preserve the faithful *remnant. He refers to them as a treasured possession, which invokes echoes of the Sinai covenant (cf. Ex 19:5). Malachi 4:1 (3:19 MT) again invokes the Day of the Lord by referring to hayyôm bā' ("the day is coming"), where Yahweh's judgment takes on images of an all-consuming fire. Again, restoration is also possible for those who faithfully serve Yahweh.

Malachi 4:5 (3:23 MT) also uniquely describes the return of the prophet Elijah as a harbinger of the Day of the Lord (cf. Rev 11). This suggests an intermediate stage where the audience has the opportunity to listen to Elijah in order to experience the restorative elements of the Day of the Lord. Failure to heed Yahweh's prophet will lead to the Day of the Lord bringing judgment and devastation. Malachi echoes Joel 2:10-11 by referring to the "great and terrible" Day of the Lord. The presence of Elijah may serve a similar function to Joel's prophetic call to return to Yahweh in Joel 2:12-17. The prophetic announcement of the Day of the Lord as judgment against Judah and Jerusalem seems to function as a rhetorical appeal for the audience to heed the prophetic word and return to proper worship of Yahweh.

4. Reception of the Concept.

Here we briefly consider the Day of the Lord and its continuing impact beyond the borders of the OT. The impact of this concept spills into the NT and even into contemporary theological pursuits.

4.1. New Testament Reception. The Day of the Lord resonates across the canon and is picked up in the NT in the context of the work of Jesus Christ and the inauguration of the church. It continues to employ powerful and evocative images of cosmic upheaval and divine judgment to emphasize the overwhelming importance of this day. One of the most striking examples is found in Peter's sermon in Acts 2, which explicitly links the events of Pentecost with the prophecy of the Day of the Lord in Joel 2:28-32 (see Acts 2:14-24). This connects the beginning of the church to the prophetic concept of the Day of the Lord. Other mentions of the Day of the Lord have eschatological overtones, signifying the judgment that Jesus can bring as the resurrected Messiah (Vander Hart, 16-17). The Day of the Lord thus is inextricably linked with the work of Jesus Christ and the inauguration of his kingdom. The full weight of the Day of Lord is still anticipated, but through Jesus the NT writers see its fulfillment coming to pass (see Rom 2:5, 16; 1 Cor 1:8; Phil 1:6; 1 Thess 5:2-8; 2 Thess 1:10; 2:2; 2 Pet 3:10, 12) (see Prophets in the New Testament).

4.2. Recent Developments. In recent years different methodological approaches have been brought to bear on the Day of the Lord that may offer new interpretive opportunities. Two of them may be briefly considered. First, D. Kille considers Amos's use of the Day of the Lord from the perspective of Jungian *psychology, suggesting that its apparent reversal of expectations reflects strategies of communicating with an audience that is employing repression and projection to avoid dealing with the harsh realities of the Day of the Lord. The function of the reversal is to disturb the audience and to cut through any attempts to deflect the power of the prophetic proclamation (Kille, 272-76).

Second, from the perspective of global scholarship, M. Udoekpo considers the Day of the Lord in Zephaniah from a theological perspective. He challenges the lack of theological consideration in studies of source and development of the Day of the Lord and traces some links from Zephaniah's use of the Day of the Lord into the NT (see Lk 1:26-38; Rom 9:27-29; 1 Thess 4:13-18). His work is also notable for considering how the Day of the Lord speaks into the African cultural context, suggesting that it addresses the continued necessity of full commitment to Yahweh amidst a "pluri-religious and multi-cultural society" (Udoekpo, 290). Further methodological diversity may continue to add new dimensions to continued study of the Day of the Lord.

5. Conclusion.

The Day of the Lord continues to be a fruitful theme to consider in OT prophetic literature. Disputes over its terminology and origins are likely to continue, but the essence of the concept as a time in which Yahweh intervenes powerfully and effectively into the affairs of this world is well established. The Day of the Lord also admirably highlights the creativity and rhetorical power of the OT prophets as they invoke images relating to warfare, creation and chaos, and theophany in the attempt to capture the power inherent in this day. The flexibility of the Day of the Lord is also in view when the prophets can use it to castigate Israel and Judah as well as to offer salvation and rescue from the hands of their oppressors. The invocation of the Day of the Lord is a significant tool in prophetic imagery, and it helps to powerfully demonstrate Yahweh's responsive relationship with Israel and Judah. For the prophets, human affairs do not proceed unnoticed by Yahweh; indeed, the Day of the Lord provides a powerful reminder of Yahweh's presence and ability to shape events according to the divine purpose. This purpose does not cease at the conclusion of the OT, but continues to speak into the NT and contemporary contexts.

See also DESTRUCTION; ESCHATOLOGY; RETRIBUTION; SALVATION, DELIVERANCE; WARFARE AND DIVINE WARFARE; WRATH.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Barton, "The Day of Yahweh in the Minor Prophets," in Biblical and Near Eastern Essays: Studies in Honour of Kevin J. Cathcart, ed. C. McCarthy and J. F. Healey (JSOT-Sup 375; London: T & T Clark, 2004) 68-79; K. J. Cathcart, "Day of Yahweh," ABD 2:84-85; L. Černý, The Day of Yahweh and Some Relevant Problems (Prague: Nákl. Filosofické fakulty Univ. Karlovy, 1948); F. M. Cross Jr., "The Divine Warrior in Israel's Early Cult," in Biblical Motifs: Origins and Transformations, ed. A. Alt-mann (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1966) 11-30; F. E. Deist, "Parallels and Reinterpretation in the Book of Joel: A Theology of Yom Yahweh?" in Text and Context: Old Testament and Semitic Studies for F. C. Fensham, ed. W. Claassen (JSOTSup 48; Sheffield: JSOT, 1988) 63-80; J. A. Everson, "The Days of Yahweh," JBL 93 (1974) 329-37; F. C. Fensham, "A Possible Origin of the Concept of the Day of the Lord," in Biblical Essays: Proceedings of the Ninth Meeting of "Die Ou-Testamentiese Werk-gemeenskap in Suid-Afrika," Held at the University of Stellenbosch, 26th-29th July 1966 (Stellenbosch: Potchefstroom Herald, 1966) 90-97; J. Gray, "The Day of Yahweh in Cultic Experience and Eschatological Prospect," SEÅ 39 (1974) 5-37; R. H. Hiers, "Day of the Lord," ABD 2:82-83; Y. Hoffman, "The Day of the Lord as a Concept and a Term in Prophetic Literature," ZAW 93 (1981) 37-50; D. Ishai-Rosenboim, "Is 'יְהוָה' (the Day of the Lord) a Term in Biblical Language?" Bib 87 (2006) 395-401; D. A. Kille, "The Day of the Lord from Jungian Perspective," in Psychology and the Bible: A New Way to Read the Scriptures, 2: From Genesis to Apocalyptic Vision, ed. J. H. Ellens and W. G. Rollins (Westport, CT: Praeger, 2004) 267-76; G. A. King, "The Day of the Lord in Zephaniah," BSac 152 (1995) 16-32; R. W. Klein, "The Day of the Lord," CTM 39 (1968) 517-25; P. D. Miller Jr., "The Divine Council and the Prophetic Call to War," VT 18 (1968) 100-107; idem, The Divine Warrior in Early Israel (HSM 5; Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1973); S. Mowinkel, He That Cometh, trans. G. W. Anderson (Oxford: Blackwell, 1956); J. D. Nogalski, "The Day(s) of YHWH in the Book of the Twelve," in Thematic Threads in the Book of the Twelve, ed. P. L. Redditt and A. Scharf (BZAW 325; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2003) 192-213; R. Rendtorff, "How to Read the Book of the Twelve as a Theological Unity," in Reading and Hearing the Book of the Twelve, ed. J. D. Nogalski and M. A. Sweeney (SBLSymS 15; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2000) 75-90; P.-G. Schwesig, Die Rolle des Tag-JHWHs-Dichtungen im Dodekapropheton (BZAW 366; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2006); S. D. Snyman, "Yom (YHWH) in the Book of Obadiah," in Goldene Äpfel in silbernen Schalen: Collected Communications from the XIIIth Congress of the International Organization for the Study of the Old Testament, Leuven, 1989, ed. K. D. Schunck and M. Augustin (BEATAJ 20; Frankfurt: Peter Lang, 1992) 81-91; D. K. Stuart, "The Sovereign's Day of Conquest," BASOR 221 (1976) 159-64; M. U. Udoekpo, Re-thinking the Day of YHWH and the Restoration of Fortunes in the Prophet Zephaniah: An Exegetical and Theological Study of 1:14-18; 3:14-20 (OOTD 2; Frankfurt: Peter Lang, 2010); M. J. Vander Hart, "The Transition of the Old Testament Day of the Lord into the New Testament Day of the Lord Jesus Christ," Mid-America Journal of Theology 9 (1993) 3-25; G. von Rad, "The Origin of the Concept of the Day of the Lord," JSS 4 (1959) 97-108; idem, Holy War in Ancient Israel, trans. B. C. Ollenburger (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1991); M. Weiss, "The Origin of the 'Day of the Lord,'" HUCA 37 (1966) 29-60. J. D. Barker

DAY OF YAHWEH. See DAY OF THE LORD.

DEAD SEA SCROLLS

Among the finds at the Dead Sea are approximately 225 scrolls of Scripture (235 if the deuterocanonical books, also known as the books of the Apocrypha, are included). Every book of what in time would become the OT is represented at Qumran, at least in fragmentary form, with the exception of Esther. Three books of the OT Apocrypha are also represented (Tobit, Sirach, Letter of Jeremiah). The books of Jubilees and Enoch may have been thought of as Scripture at Qumran, given the number of copies (fifteen and twenty respectively), as well as the fact that they are quoted a few times. The Prophets play a very important role in Qumran's eschatology and community self-understanding.

1. Canonical Books of the Prophets
2. Extracanonical Books of the Prophets
3. Interpretation of the Prophets

1. Canonical Books of the Prophets.

Most of the books of the prophets are well represented at Qumran and elsewhere in the region of the Dead Sea. The Latter Prophets, especially Isaiah, are better represented than the Former Prophets. But Qumran's Former Prophets scrolls are very important as witnesses to the Hebrew text and as inspiration for some very interesting legendary and interpretive traditions.

1.1. Joshua. Fragments of two scrolls of Joshua were recovered from Cave 4 (4Q47; 4Q48). These scrolls preserve portions of Joshua 2—8; 10; 17. The text of Joshua at Qum-ran agrees with Josephus by saying that Joshua built an altar immediately after crossing the Jordan (see Josephus, Ant. 5.16-20). The Joshua text in places agrees with the LXX (in that it is shorter than the Hebrew text and sometimes shorter than the Greek) and in places agrees with the MT. It is an important witness to the text of Joshua in the period shortly before Jesus and Christian beginnings.

1.2. Judges. Fragments of three scrolls of Judges were recovered from Qumran, two from Cave 4 (4Q49; 4Q50) and one from Cave 1 (1Q6). These scrolls preserve portions of Judges 6; 8—9; 19; 21. There are indications that the Hebrew text of the Joshua scrolls is a bit shorter than that of the MT.

1.3. Samuel. Fragments of four scrolls of Samuel (in antiquity 1–2 Samuel were regarded as a single book, even if preserved as two scrolls), one in Cave 1 (1Q7) and three in Cave 4 (4Q51; 4Q52; 4Q53). Most of the text of Samuel is preserved, and in many places the Samuel scrolls of Qumran agree with the LXX. Significantly, 4Q51 preserves the equivalent of about three verses missing at the beginning of 1 Samuel 11, the account of the tyrant Nahash, who oppressed the Gadites and Reubenites. The recovered material coheres with the account of the story told by Josephus and explains why Nahash made the demands that he made. The same Samuel scroll, moreover, tells us that Goliath was only four cubits and a span in height (about 6 feet 6 inches), instead of six cubits and a span in height (about 9 feet 6 inches) as read in the MT.

1.4. Kings. Fragments of three scrolls of Kings have been recovered: a leather scroll in Cave 4 (4Q54), a leather scroll in Cave 5 (5Q2) and a papyrus scroll in Cave 6 (6Q4). These scrolls preserve portions of 1 Kings 1; 3; 7—8; 12; 22; 2 Kings 5—9. 4Q54 preserves an otherwise lost part of 1 Kings 8:16, a part of the verse not preserved in the MT or the LXX.

1.5. Isaiah. There are twenty-one Isaiah scrolls. Best known are the two well-preserved scrolls from Cave 1: 1QIsa^a (also known as the Great Isaiah Scroll) and 1QIsa^b. The former, which dates to the second century BC, preserves almost the entire text of Isaiah and matches the text of the MT closely. Ironically, photographs of the Great Isaiah Scroll taken by John Trever in 1948 (in color and in black and white) preserve the text more fully and more clearly than does the actually scroll itself today. Other fairly well-preserved scrolls include 4Q56 and 4Q57. There are also five commentaries, or pesharim, on portions of Isaiah (4Q161; 4Q162; 4Q163; 4Q164; 4Q165). These commentaries preserve some of the text of Isaiah.

In addition to the many quotations in these commentaries, the book of Isaiah, not surprisingly, is quoted frequently in the nonbiblical scrolls, some twenty-eight times in all. More than half of these quotations appear in the Damascus Document (CD), an important foundational document of the Qumran community. Of these quotations, perhaps the most important is Isaiah 40:3: “A voice cries out, ‘In the wilderness prepare the way of the Lord.’” The scribe understands “in the wilderness” as referring not to the location of the voice that cries out but rather to the place where the way of the Lord is prepared. This important verse is cited in 1QS VIII, 13-14 and is understood as in reference to the Qumran community, whose task in the *wilderness is to study Scripture and come to a better understanding of God’s law. Indeed, the community refers to itself as “the Way,” much as the early Christian movement did (see Acts 9:2; 19:9, 23; 24:22). For Christians, Isaiah’s “way of the Lord” took on special meaning thanks to the preaching and baptizing of John the Baptist (see Mt 3:1-3; Mk 1:2-3; Lk 3:1-6; Jn 1:19-23), a wilderness prophet whose message and lifestyle parallel in important ways those of the men of Qumran.

1.6. Jeremiah. There are six Jeremiah scrolls, one in Cave 2 (2Q13) and five in Cave 4 (4Q70; 4Q71; 4Q72; 4Q72a; 4Q72b). Some of these scrolls (esp. 4Q71; 4Q72a) exhibit affiliation with the LXX, whose Greek text is noticeably shorter than the Hebrew text. One of the oldest biblical scrolls found at Qumran is the heavily corrected 4Q70, which dates at least as far back as 200 BC. The book of Jeremiah is cited in three nonbiblical scrolls. There are also four scrolls of (Jeremiah’s) Lamentations and one small fragment of the apocryphal Letter of Jeremiah (7Q2), which in the Apocrypha serves as the sixth chapter of Baruch.

1.7. Ezekiel. There are fragments of six Ezekiel scrolls, which preserve portions of Ezekiel 1; 4—5; 7; 10—11; 16; 23—24; 35—38; 41 (1Q9; 3Q1; 4Q73; 4Q74; 4Q75; 11Q4). Ezekiel is cited five times in nonbiblical scrolls.

1.8. Minor Prophets. Eight scrolls of the Minor Prophets were found at Qumran, seven in Cave 4 (4Q76; 4Q77; 4Q78; 4Q79; 4Q80; 4Q81; 4Q82) and one in Cave 5 (5Q4). Two more were found at Naḥal Hever (8Hev 1) and Wadi Murabbaʿat (Mur 88). There are commentaries (pesharim) on Hosea (4Q166; 4Q167), Habakkuk (1QpHab), Micah (1Q14; 4Q168), Nahum (4Q169) and Zephaniah (4Q170). In addition to the many quotations of the text in these commentaries several of the Minor Prophets are cited in nonbiblical scrolls.

1.9. Daniel. Daniel apparently was viewed as a prophet at Qumran (in the MT the book of Daniel is listed among the Writings). There are eight scrolls, ranging in date from 125 BC to AD 50: two in Cave 1 (1Q71; 1Q72), five in Cave 4 (4Q112; 4Q113; 4Q114; 4Q115; 4Q116) and one in Cave 6 (6Q7). Much of the Hebrew and Aramaic text of Daniel is preserved in these scrolls. The last chapter, Daniel 12, is missing. However, Daniel 12:10 is quoted in 4Q174 IV, 3-4, where it is introduced as taken from the “book of Daniel the prophet.” Also to be noted is 11Q13 II, 18, where Daniel 9:25-26 is quoted in a prophetic context.

1.10. 1 Enoch. 1 Enoch is part of the canon of Scripture in the Ethiopic Church. At Qumran some twenty scrolls of 1 Enoch, all of them fragmentary and all of them in Aramaic (with the exception of a few small Greek fragments from Cave 7), have been recovered (1Q23; 1Q24; 2Q26; 4Q201; 4Q202; 4Q203; 4Q204; 4Q205; 4Q206; 4Q207; 4Q208; 4Q209; 4Q210; 4Q211; 4Q530; 4Q531; 4Q532; 6Q8; 7Q4). The only extensive portion of this book not attested at Qumran is the so-called Similitudes of Enoch (1 En 37–71), in which a messianic “son of man” figure is prominent. The quasi-scriptural status of 1 Enoch is attested by its quotation in the NT letter of Jude (see Jude 14-15). Jesus himself may have alluded to 1 Enoch 10:4 in Matthew 22:13.

2. Extracanonical Books of the Prophets.

Scattered in OT literature are references to various writings on which presumably the authors of the books of Samuel, Kings and Chronicles drew. In 2 Samuel 1:18 we hear of a “Book of Jashar” (cf. Josh 10:13). In 1 Kings 11:41 we hear of the “Book of the Acts of Solomon.” In 1 Kings 14:19 we hear of the “Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Israel” (cf. 1 Kings 15:31; 16:5, 14, 20, 27, 33; 22:39; 2 Kings 1:18; 10:34; 13:8; passim). And in 1 Kings 14:29 we hear of the “Chronicles of the Kings of Judah” (cf. 1 Kings 15:7, 23, 31; 22:45; 2 Kings 8:23; 12:19; passim). Some of these lost writings were related to known prophets, others to unknown prophets. A number of these interesting writings are referenced in Chronicles, a work produced over a period of time, probably ranging from 500 BC to 350 BC.

The Chronicler mentions the “Chronicles of Samuel the seer,” the “Chronicles of Nathan the prophet” and the “Chronicles of Gad the seer” (1 Chron 29:29). Elsewhere we hear of the “History of Nathan the prophet,” the “Prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite” and the “Visions of Iddo the seer concerning Jeroboam the son of Nebat” (2 Chron 9:29). We hear of the “Chronicles of Shemaiah the prophet and of Iddo the seer” (2 Chron 12:15). We hear of “the story of the prophet Iddo” (2 Chron 13:22). The reference to “the vision of Isaiah the prophet the son of Amoz, in the Book of the Kings of Judah and Israel” (2 Chron 32:32 [cf. Is 1:1]) may not be to the canonical book of Isaiah. Finally, we hear of “the Chronicles of the Seers” (2 Chron 33:19).

The many references to otherwise unknown writings attest the existence of a great deal of literature loosely related to what in time became canonical Scripture. These references may also have encouraged the belief that additional books of prophecy and visions could be “found,” and this belief, accordingly, may well have encouraged the production of more books.

Just as there are several apocryphal works that expand on themes related to the books of Moses (to update the law, to credit various prophetic visions to Moses), so there are many apocryphal works that expand on themes related to the prophets. Again, in general the purpose of these writings, as is the case with many of the apocalypses and testaments in the Pseudepigrapha, is to have a well-known prophet of the classical period speak to current events or events sensed soon to take place. These utterances may be eschatological, but sometimes they are legal and/or cultic. Many such “prophetic” writings have been found among the DSS.

2.1. Joshua Apocrypha. A number of apocryphal texts about or attributed to Joshua have been found at Qumran. These include 4QParaphrase of Joshua (4Q123), 4QApocryphon of Joshua (4Q378; 4Q379) and 4QProphecy of Joshua (4Q522).

2.2. Samuel Apocrypha. There are at least two apocryphal works related to Samuel the prophet: 4QVision of Samuel (4Q160) and 6QApocryphon on Samuel-Kings (6Q9). Perhaps we should also include 2Q22, which could be an apocryphon of David, and 4Q523, which could be an apocryphon concerning Jonathan.

2.3. Kings Apocrypha. There are a number of apocryphal texts related to the book of Kings and some of its principal players. Among these is 4QParaphrase of Kings (4Q382), which may have focused on Elijah. Elisha is the focus of 4QApocryphon of Elisha (4Q481a). Mention also should be made of 11QApocryphal Psalms (11Q11), which seems to be focused on Solomon and his exorcistic and prophetic powers.

2.4. Jeremiah and Ezekiel Apocrypha. Several apocryphal texts feature the prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel. These include 4Q383; 4Q384; 4Q385; 4Q385a; 4Q385b; 4Q385c; 4Q386; 4Q387a; 4Q387b; 4Q388; 4Q388a; 4Q389; 4Q389a; 4Q390; 4Q391. Of special interest are 4QApocryphon of Jeremiah^a (4Q383) and 4QApocryphon of Jeremiah^c (4Q385b). The latter draws on Jeremiah 40–44 and seems to portray the prophet Jeremiah as a Moses-like figure.

2.5. Daniel Apocrypha. There are several texts that appear to be part of the “Daniel series.” Besides the well-known additions to Daniel (Susanna, Bel and the Dragon, Prayer of Azariah, Song of the Three Youths), preserved in the LXX, Qumran offers an Aramaic Prayer of Nabonidus (4Q242), an Aramaic Vision of Daniel (4Q243; 4Q244; 4Q245), an Aramaic Vision of the Son of God (4Q246), an Aramaic Vision of the Four Kingdoms (4Q552; 4Q553) and, possibly, an Aramaic Vision (4Q489). The Aramaic Prayer of Nabonidus is of interest because of its linkage of illness, sin, forgiveness and exorcism, which are elements found together in the teaching and activities of Jesus of Nazareth. The Aramaic Vision of the Son of God is quite intriguing in light of four remarkable parallels with the annunciation of the conception of Jesus (see Lk 1:32–36). It is said of Jesus and the eschatological personage envisioned in the Aramaic scroll from Qumran that each will be called “Great,” “Son of God” and “Son of the Most High,” and each will rule forever.

2.6. Malachi Apocryphon. 5Q10 and 5Q11 seem to be fragments of an apocryphon based on Malachi. The text is addressed to the “King of Glory.” It praises God and gives thanks for his protective power against the demonic forces.

3. Interpretation of the Prophets.

Just as important as the text types attested by the Prophets scrolls of Qumran and the region of the Dead Sea are the interpretive traditions. These interpretive traditions appear in the Prophets scrolls as variants and glosses, and they appear, especially, in the formal commentaries (pesharim) and quotations in other writings.

3.1. Variants. Most variants are scribal errors, often accidental omissions (see Is 2:3, where in the Great Isaiah Scroll the scribe omits the phrase “the mountain of the Lord”) or errors from habit (see Is 49:6, where in the Great Isaiah Scroll the scribe reads “tribes of Israel” instead of the correct “tribes of Jacob”). Some variants actually correct the text (and often agree with the LXX). As an example of the latter, the Great Isaiah Scroll correctly reads at Isaiah 53:9, “with rich men, his tomb,” instead of the way it reads in the MT, “with a rich man in his deaths.”

Some variants are “enrichments” of the text through the addition of words and phrases found elsewhere in the biblical text. We see a number of these examples in the Great Isaiah Scroll. At Isaiah 1:15b we read, “Your hands are full of blood, your fingers with iniquity.” The second clause comes from Isaiah 59:3. At Isaiah 51:6 we read, “Lift up your eyes to the heavens, and look at the earth beneath, and see who created these.” The third clause was borrowed from Isaiah 40:26. At Isaiah 52:12b we read, “For the Lord will go before you, and the God of Israel will be your rear guard; the God of all the earth he will be called.” The third clause is derived from Isaiah 54:5 and very appropriately prepares for the Servant Song (Is 52:13–53:12) that follows. At Isaiah 7:14 the Great Isaiah Scroll reads, “His name shall be called Immanuel,” instead of “She shall call his name Immanuel.” The Great Isaiah Scroll reading reflects Isaiah 9:6, “His name shall be called Wonderful Counselor. . . .”

Some variants appear to be deliberate changes of the text to bring out a new meaning. A series of changes at Isaiah 6:9–10 in the Great Isaiah Scroll offers an interesting example. Replacing the negative particles in Isaiah 6:9 with similar-sounding conjunctions leads to this reading: “Keep on listening, because you may understand; keep on looking, because you may perceive.” A slight alteration of spelling creates a new imperative in the next line of this verse and the beginning of the next: “Make the heart of this people appalled. Stop its ears and turn away its eyes.” The Great Isaiah Scroll copyist drew upon Isaiah 33:15, which describes the righteous person as one “who stops his ears from hearing of murder, and shuts his eyes from looking upon evil.” The idea of being appalled at evil and returning to the Lord is found elsewhere in the Prophets (see Hos 5:15–6:1) and at Qumran (see IQH^a XV, 5-6). Accordingly, the alterations in Isaiah 6:9 transform Isaiah’s word of judgment into an exhortation to guard against evil. This would then explain one more variant near the end of Isaiah 6:10, where we read “Let it [the people] understand in its heart” instead of “Lest it understand in its heart.” The purpose of Isaiah 6:9-10 is not to pronounce a word of judgment on Israel but rather to exhort the faithful (probably the men of Qumran) to turn away from evil and to understand and so return to the Lord for healing and restoration. The variants here in the Great Isaiah Scroll are not misspellings; they are deliberate interpretive changes.

There are also some interesting variants in the Great Isaiah Scroll Servant Songs (see Servant of Yahweh). The Suffering Servant Song seems to read, “Just as many were astonished at you—so I anointed his appearance beyond anyone (else), and his form beyond that of (other) sons of men—so shall he sprinkle many nations because of himself” (with italics indicating departures from the MT). Instead of “marred,” the servant is “anointed,” thus suggesting that the servant is the awaited *Messiah. This interpretation is consistent with the Targum, which also identifies the servant as the Messiah (cf. the Targum of Is 52:13: “my servant, the Messiah”; Is 53:10: “they shall see the kingdom of their Messiah”). The meaning of “sprinkle” may be clarified by a passage in the Rule of the Community scroll: “At that time God will purify by his truth all the deeds of a man; and he will refine him more than the (other) sons of men. . . . He shall sprinkle each with a spirit of truth” (IQS IV, 20-21). The “man” whom God has refined “more than the (other) sons of men” may well be the Messiah, through whom God will “sprinkle” humanity “with a spirit of truth.”

3.2. Paragraphing and Marginal Sigla. The Great Isaiah Scroll also exhibits some paragraphing and marginal sigla that seem to have interpretive significance. In column 43 one can observe a prominent hat-shaped siglum in the right-hand margin, right where Isaiah 52:7 begins: “How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him who brings good tidings . . . who says to Zion, ‘Your God reigns.’” The siglum may be a combination of the Greek paragraphos, which is a long horizontal line (—), and a large sāmek (the Hebrew letter s), which indicates the beginning of a section (sefer). The circle-shaped sāmek resting on the horizontal line gives the siglum the appearance of a derby hat. A simpler siglum (this time the horizontal line by itself) appears in the right-hand margin of column 44 separating Isaiah 52:15 and Isaiah 53:1. Paragraphing for the whole passage is Isaiah 52:7-12; 52:13-15; 53:1-8; 53:9-12.

The sigla in the MT are similar, though less pronounced. Accordingly, both the Great Isaiah Scroll of Qumran and the MT appear to view Isaiah 52:7-12 and the well-known Song of the Suffering Servant, Isaiah 52:13—53:12, as two related units, perhaps with Isaiah 52:7-12 introducing the song. Interestingly enough, this is how several modern commentators understand the sense of Isaiah 52—53, even though no reference is made to the Great Isaiah Scroll.

Even the Targum, the later Aramaic translation and paraphrase, links Isaiah 52:7 with the Song of the Suffering Servant. We see this in a change of wording in Isaiah 53:1. The Hebrew’s “Who has believed our report?” becomes in the Targum “Who has believed this our good tidings?” This means that the good tidings (or gospel) announced by the prophet in Isaiah 52:7 have to do with Lord’s Suffering Servant in Isaiah 53:1. And, as noted above, the Targum goes on to identify the servant as none other than the Messiah.

The linkage between Isaiah 52:7 and Isaiah 53:1 is attested in Paul and Peter, two major figures in the early church. Paul quotes the two passages side by side in Romans 10:15-16. They are linked allusively in Peter’s speech to Cornelius (esp. Acts 10:36, 43). In Christian circles the linkage of these two Isaiah passages may have originated with Jesus himself, who proclaimed, “The kingdom of God is at hand . . . believe in the gospel” (Mk 1:15). Not only does he proclaim the good tidings (or gospel) in language that derives from Isaiah 40:9 and Isaiah 52:7, but also his language reflects the way Isaiah was being paraphrased and interpreted in *Aramaic in the synagogue. In the Targum the good tidings of these passages are summed up in the words "The kingdom of your God is revealed!" Yet Jesus will later tell his disciples, in language that echoes the Song of the Suffering Servant, "The Son of Man also came not to be served but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many" (Mk 10:45 [cf. Is 53:8, 10, 12]). Indeed, in the Gospel of John Jesus declares that the Son of Man must be "lifted up" (Jn 12:31, 34). In saying this, he alludes to Isaiah 52:13: "Behold, my servant . . . shall be lifted up, and shall be very high." A few verses later the Johannine evangelist quotes Isaiah 53:1: "Who was believed our report?" (Jn 12:38), thus strengthening the link between Jesus the Son of Man and the Suffering Servant of Isaiah 52:13—53:12.

3.3. Peshet Interpretation. The formal commentaries, or pesharim, on the Prophets and Psalms are eschatological and semiallegorical. The writers of these commentaries believed that they lived in or very close to the "last days." They interpreted Scripture from this perspective, even claiming to possess insights denied the OT prophets themselves. This perspective is clearly expressed in the commentary on Habakkuk: "Then God told Habakkuk to write down what is going to happen to the generation to come; but when that period would be complete He did not make known to him. When it says, 'so that with ease someone can read it,' this refers to the Teacher of Righteousness to whom God made known all the mysterious revelations of his servants the prophets" (1QP Hab VII, 1-5). The prophet Habakkuk did not know when his prophecy would be fulfilled, but God made this known to the Teacher of Righteousness, the authoritative teacher of the Qumran community. This teacher is the one who has fulfilled the prophetic anticipation that the day will come when "with ease someone can read" Habakkuk's prophecy and interpret it. All of the pesharim reflect this perspective.

3.3.1. Isaiah. Fragments of five commentaries on Isaiah were recovered from Cave 4. 4QIsaiah Pesher^a (4Q161) comments on portions of Isaiah 10—11. Following the quotation of Isaiah 10:28-32, the commentary states that "this refers to the last days," in which a great battle will take place. After the quotation of Isaiah 10:33-34, which refers to the felling of the trees of Lebanon, the commentary predicts the coming of the Kittim (the Romans), who will fall at the hand of Israel. Isaiah 11:1-5, which foretells the sprout from the stock of Jesse, is applied, not surprisingly, to the "Branch of David," who will arise in the last days. He will rule over Israel and will be guided by the Zadokite priests. This Branch of David, of course, is none other than the Messiah. 4QIsaiah Pesher^b (4Q162) comments on portions of Isaiah 5 and foretells coming famine and the presence in Jerusalem of "men of mockery," probably critics of the men of Qumran. 4QIsaiah Pesher^c (4Q163) comments on portions of Isaiah 10; 14; 30. The text is quite fragmentary; very little of the commentary proper has survived. The phrases "last days" and "flattery seekers who are in Jerusalem" are read. 4QIsaiah^d (4Q164) comments on portions of Isaiah 54. The "rubies of all your battlements" (Is 54:12a) are, we are told, in reference to the twelve priests. Only tiny fragments of 4QIsaiah^e (4Q165) have survived. One part comments on Isaiah 40:11, "Like a shepherd he will graze his flock," which is applied to the Teacher of Righteousness.

We may have a sixth commentary on Isaiah from Cave 3, 3QIsaiah Pesher (3Q4). All that has survived are quotations and brief comments on Isaiah 1:1 and Isaiah 1:2. The eschatological orientation is clear enough ("The interpretation concerns all the things to come"). There is also reference to the "day of judgment." There is also another fragment from Cave 4 (4Q500) that interprets Isaiah 5:1-7 (Isaiah's Song of the Vineyard) in terms of the temple establishment. But this scroll is not a commentary.

3.3.2. Hosea. Two fragmentary commentaries on Hosea were recovered from Cave 4. 4QHosea Pesher^a (4Q166) comments on Hosea 2:6-12. Only small portions of the commentary have survived. The focus is on the punishment inflicted upon Israel during the time of the nation's exile. 4QHosea Pesher^b (4Q167) comments on Hosea 5:13-15 and Hosea 6:7. The commentator foresees the appearance of the Lion of Wrath and the last priest.

3.3.3. Micah. Two fragmentary commentaries on Micah have been recovered: one from Cave 1, 1QMicah Pesher (1Q14), and one from Cave 4, 4QMicah Pesher (?) (4Q168). The fragments of 1QMicah Pesher contain quotations of Micah 1:2-6, 9; 6:15-16. In Micah 1:5 the commentator finds reference to the Teacher of Righteousness and the “council of the Community [yhd].” Only two fragments of 4QMicah Pesher (?) have been identified with confidence (frgs. 1, 3 [frgs. 2, 4 belong to 4QHosea Pesher^b]). 4QHosea Pesher^b fragment 36 might belong to 4QMicah Pesher (?), but only part of one word can be seen. All that can be made out is the text of Micah 4:8-12. No commentary survives.

3.3.4. Nahum. A substantial portion of a commentary found in Cave 4, 4QNahum Pesher (4Q169), has survived. This commentary, on Nahum 1:3—3:14, is remarkable because in addition to the usual eschatological predictions and semiallegorical identifications it actually refers to recent past events that are easily recognized. The commentary interprets the theological significance of Demetrius III’s attempt, with help from a number of Pharisees, to overthrow the Hasmonean ruler Alexander Jannaeus and the violent reprisals against the Pharisees. Besides Jannaeus (r. 103-76 BC), the commentary alludes to Alexander’s widow, Salome Alexandra (r. 76-67 BC), and their sons Hyrcanus II and Aristobolus II (r. 67-63 BC). These events are also recounted by Josephus (see Josephus, J.W. 1.85-131; Ant. 13.320-432; 14.1-79). The Romans are identified as the “Kittim” (and they are identified by this sobriquet in other commentaries). The Seleucid ruler Demetrius III Eukerus (r. 95-88 BC) is identified by his name “Demetrius, king of Greece,” probably because there was no recognized sobriquet for this figure among the men of Qumran. “Antiochus” is mentioned, whereby Antiochus IV Epiphanes probably is in view. The Pharisees are called the “Seekers-after-Smooth-Things” and “Ephraim,” after the rebellious Israelite tribe. The Sadducees are called “Manasseh,” after the apostate king of Judah. Alexander Jannaeus is identified as the “Lion of Wrath.” The Qumran community refers to itself as “Judah.” An unknown group is dubbed the “House of Peleg.” We are told that they are allies of Manasseh (i.e., the Sadducees).

One of the most gripping elements of this commentary is its interpretation of Nahum 2:12b: “he [the lion] has filled his caves with prey and his dens with torn flesh.” The passage is interpreted in reference to Jannaeus, the Lion of Wrath, who “hanged men up alive,” a reference to the crucifixion of eight hundred Pharisees, a gruesome event described by Josephus (“While he feasted with his concubines in a conspicuous place, he ordered eight hundred of the Jews to be crucified, and slaughtered their children and wives before the eyes of the still-living wretches” [Josephus, Ant. 13.380]).

3.3.5. Habakkuk. The best preserved of the pesharim is the commentary on Habakkuk, 1QHabakkuk Pesher (1QpHab). Its thirteen columns of text provide commentary on Habakkuk 1:2—2:20. Apparently, this is where the commentary originally came to an end (there are only four lines of text at the top of col. 13). Of course, one cannot be sure. Two scribes produced this scroll. The first scribe penned 1QpHab 1:1—12:13a; the second penned 1QpHab 12:13b—13:4. Perhaps there was more commentary to be penned. The first two columns are fragmentary. Most of what is lost is at the bottom of the scroll, where the scroll, rolled up and placed in a jar right-side up, is most vulnerable to moisture and rot. The last two or three lines of every column are lost.

This commentary tells us much about the community that produced it. Key players are the “Teacher of Righteousness,” the “Man of the Lie,” the “House of Absalom,” the “Wicked Priest” and the “One Who Spouts the Lie.” The commentary is eschatological, anticipating the coming of the Kittim (i.e., the Romans), judgment and the downfall of the priest of Jerusalem. The prophecy of Habakkuk is consistently understood to refer to recent events in the history of the Qumran community and to an eschatological judgment soon to take place. The “traitors” of Habakkuk 1:5 are understood to refer to the allies of the Man of the Lie, who refused to listen to the Teacher of Righteousness. The “Chaldeans” of Habakkuk 1:6 refer to the Kittim. The “wicked one” who “swallows up one more righteous than himself” of Habakkuk 1:13 refers to the House of Absalom and their partisans, who refused to support the Teacher of Righteousness when he was slandered by the Man of the Lie. The woe pronounced against the “one who multiplies what is not his own” in Habakkuk 2:6 refers to the Wicked Priest. And so it goes.

3.3.6. Zephaniah. A few small fragments of two commentaries on Zephaniah were recovered from Cave 1 (1QZephaniah Pesher [1Q15]) and Cave 4 (4QZephaniah Pesher [4Q170]). The first quotes Zephaniah 1:18b—2:2; the second quotes Zephaniah 1:12-13. Very little commentary has survived.

3.3.7. Malachi. Tiny fragments of a commentary on Malachi were found in Cave 5 (5*QMala-chi Pesher* [5Q10]). All that can be made out are quotations of Malachi 1:14a and Malachi 1:14b. There is reference to the “scoffers,” which supports the identification of the text as a pesher. Fragments of a text in Cave 4 (4*QCommentary on Malachi* [4Q253a]) may be another commentary on Malachi. All that is extant is a fragmentary quotation of Malachi 3:16-18 and a few words of commentary.

3.3.8. Other Interpretation. Many other scrolls quote and interpret passages from the Prophets. Only a few can be discussed here.

3.3.8.1. 4*QFlorilegium* (4Q174) and 4*QCatechism A* (4Q177). The theme of this text is the last days. In 4Q174 Nathan’s prophecy is quoted in part (2 Sam 7:10-11a). The word “place” is understood to refer to the temple that Solomon eventually would build (4Q174 II, 18—III, 3). The commentary goes on to quote 2 Samuel 7:11b (“I will give you rest from your enemies”), understanding it to refer to the time of the Qumran community, when the wicked, the “children of Belial,” try to make the “Sons of Light” stumble (4Q174 III, 7-9). The promise to David to raise up a son (2 Sam 7:12-14) is taken in a messianic sense (4Q174 III, 10-13). Other passages from the prophets are cited, such as Isaiah 8:11; Ezekiel 37:23; Daniel 12:10. All of these passages are understood in an eschatological sense, as referring to the time of the men of Qumran. The fragmentary 4Q177 continues this eschatological theme, quoting along the way Isaiah 37:30; 32:7; Micah 2:10-11; Zechariah 3:9; Ezekiel 25:8; Hosea 5:8, as well as a number of passages from Psalms, which the men of Qumran also regarded as prophetic and eschatological.

3.3.8.2. 4Q285 and 11Q14. These overlapping texts have been called the “Rule of War” and the “War of the Messiah.” They quote Isaiah 10:34—11:1 (the falling of the trees of Lebanon and the rise of the sprout from the stump of Jesse) and then offer this commentary: “[This is the] Branch of David. Then [all forces of Belial] shall be judged, [and the king of the Kittim shall stand for judgment] and the Leader of the congregation—the Branch of David—will have him put to death. [Then all Israel shall come out with timbrel]s and dancers, and the [high] priest shall order [them to cleanse their bodies from the guilty blood of the c] orpse[s of] the Kittim” (4Q285 7, 3-6; 11Q14 I, 11-15). The “Branch of David” is the eschatological Messiah. The Kittim are the Romans. This remarkable passage envisions the Roman emperor (the “king of the Kittim”) slain by the Messiah. After the battle the high priest organizes the cleanup, lest the land of Israel be polluted by the “guilty blood” of the slain Romans.

3.3.8.3. 1Q28b. Appendix B of the Rule of the Community scroll, known as 1*QRule of Benedictions*, provides a series of blessings. Column 5 articulates the blessings for the “prince of the community.” Throughout these blessings words and phrases from Isaiah 11 appear. The messianic prince “with righteousness” will “judge the poor, and decide with equity for the meek of the earth” (1QSb V, 21-22, quoting Is 11:4). He will judge the earth and “with the breath” of his “lips” he will “kill the wicked” (1QSb V, 24-25). Isaiah 11:4 is again quoted, though with some modification. Additional texts are cited, including Isaiah 11:5; Micah 4:13; Numbers 24:17. The last passage was widely interpreted in Jewish late antiquity in reference to the eschatological Messiah.

3.3.8.4. 4Q254. Several fragments of 4Q254 (4*QCommentary on Genesis C*) contain commentary on Jacob’s deathbed blessings of his sons (Gen 49). Fragment 4 is of special interest, for it quotes part of Zechariah 4:14 (“two sons of oil”) in what appears to be commentary on either the blessing of Judah (Gen 49:8-12) or the blessing of Simeon and Levi (Gen 49:5-7). This curious description, “two sons of oil,” is distinctive of Zechariah and may reflect Zechariah’s eschatological perspective. In later rabbinic interpretation the “two sons of oil” are understood to be the anointed high priest and anointed king, the Messiah (see Sipre §97 [on Lev 7:35-38]; Abot R. Nat. A 34:4; Num. Rab. 14:13 [on Num 7:84]). The “two sons of oil,” wherever fragment 4 should be positioned in 4Q254, probably refers to the eschatological descendants of Levi, the patriarch from whom the anointed high priest will descend, and of Judah, the patriarch from whom the anointed king, the Messiah, will descend. Accordingly, 4Q254 may well be the earliest documentation of a form of diarchic messianism, in which an anointed priest and an anointed king were expected figures who would faithfully serve God and Israel side by side. This diarchic messianism reflects Israel's kingly history and the expectations of the prophets Zechariah and Haggai. It may also have relevance for interpreting Jesus' confrontation of the temple establishment shortly after his entry into Jerusalem.

See also APOCALYPTICISM, APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE; CANON, CANONIZATION; FORMATION OF THE PROPHETIC BOOKS; MESSIAH; PROPHETS IN THE NEW TESTAMENT; TEXT AND TEXTUAL CRITICISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. G. Abegg, P. W. Flint and E. Ulrich, The Dead Sea Scrolls Bible: The Oldest Known Bible Translated for the First Time into English (San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1999); R. Achenbach, "The Pentateuch, the Prophets, and the Torah in the Fifth and Fourth Centuries B.C.E.," in Judah and the Judeans in the Fourth Century B.C.E., ed. O. Lipschits, G. N. Knoppers and R. Albertz (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2007) 253-85; G. Brin, "The Laws of the Prophets in the Sect of the Judean Desert: Studies in 4Q375," JSP 10 (1992) 19-51, reprinted in Qumran Questions, ed. J. H. Charlesworth (BibSem 36; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1995) 28-60; G. J. Brooke, "Prophecy," EDSS 2:694-700; idem, "4Q254 Fragments 1 and 4, and 4Q254a: Some Preliminary Comments," in Proceedings of the Eleventh World Congress of Jewish Studies: Jerusalem, June 22-29, 1993 (Jerusalem: World Union of Jewish Studies, 1994) 185-92; idem, "Parabiblical Prophetic Narratives," in The Dead Sea Scrolls after Fifty Years: A Comprehensive Assessment, ed. P. W. Flint and J. C. VanderKam (2 vols.; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1998) 1:271-301; idem, "The Rewritten Law, Prophets and Psalms: Issues for Understanding the Text of the Bible," in The Bible as Book: The Hebrew Bible and the Judaean Desert Discoveries, ed. E. D. Herbert and E. Tov (New Castle, DE: Oak Knoll, 2002) 31-40; idem, "The Twelve Minor Prophets and the Dead Sea Scrolls," in Congress Volume: Leiden 2004, ed. A. Lemaire (VTSup 109; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2006) 19-43; M. Broshi, "On netinim and False Prophets," in Solving Riddles and Untying Knots: Biblical, Epigraphic, and Semitic Studies in Honor of Jonas C. Greenfield, ed. Z. Zevit et al. (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1995) 29-37; M. Burrows, "Prophecy and Prophets at Qumran," in Israel's Prophetic Heritage: Essays in Honor of James Muilenburg, ed. B. W. Anderson and W. Harrelson (New York: Harper, 1962) 223-32; C. A. Evans, "1QIsaiah^a and the Absence of Prophetic Critique at Qumran," RevQ 11 (1984) 537-42; idem, "'The Two Sons of Oil': Early Evidence of Messianic Interpretation of Zechariah 4:14 in 4Q254 4 2," in The Provo International Conference on the Dead Sea Scrolls: Technological Innovations, New Texts, and Reformulated Issues, ed. D. W. Parry and E. Ulrich (STDJ 30; Leiden: Brill, 1999) 566-75; idem, "Diarchic Messianism in the Dead Sea Scrolls and the Messianism of Jesus of Nazareth," in The Dead Sea Scrolls: Fifty Years after Their Discovery; Proceedings of the Jerusalem Congress, July 20-25, 1997, ed. L. H. Schiffman, E. Tov and J. C. VanderKam (Jerusalem: Israel Exploration Society and the Israel Antiquities Authority, 2000) 558-67; A. Finkel, "The Oracular Interpretation of the Torah and Prophets as Reflected in the Temple Scroll and Pesharim of Qumran," in Proceedings of the Eleventh World Congress of Jewish Studies, Division A: The Bible and Its World, ed. D. Assaf (Jerusalem: World Union of Jewish Studies, 1994) 179-84; R. E. Fuller, "Textual Traditions in the Book of Hosea and the Minor Prophets," in The Madrid Qumran Congress: Proceedings of the International Congress on the Dead Sea Scrolls, Madrid, 18-21 March, 1991, ed. J. Trebolle Barrera and L. Vegas Montaner (2 vols.; STDJ 11; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1992) 1:247-56; idem, "4QMicah: A Small Fragment of a Manuscript of the Minor Prophets from Qumran, Cave IV," RevQ 16 (1993) 193-202; F. García Martínez, "The Text of the XII Prophets at Qumran," OTE 17 (2004) 103-19; R. P. Gordon, "The Targum to the Minor Prophets and the Dead Sea Texts: Textual and Exegetical Notes," RevQ 8 (1974) 425-29; L. L. Grabbe, "The Law, the Prophets, and the Rest: The State of the Bible in pre-Maccabean Times," DSD 13 (2006) 319-38; R. Gray, Prophetic Figures in Late Second Temple Jewish Palestine: The Evidence from Josephus (New York: Oxford University Press, 1993); G. Howard, "Lucianic Readings in a Greek Twelve Prophets Scroll from the Judaean Desert," JQR 62 (1971) 51-60; A. P. Jassen, "The Presentation of the Ancient Prophets as Lawgivers at Qumran," JBL 127 (2008) 307-37; R. G. Kratz, "Mose und die Propheten: Zur Interpretation von 4QMMT C," in From 4QMMT to Resurrection: Mélanges qumraniens en hommage à Émile Puech, ed. F. García Martínez, A. Steudel and E. Tigchelaar (STDJ 61; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2006) 151-76; A. Shemesh, "A Note on 4Q339 'List of False Prophets,'" RevQ 20 (2002) 319-20; L. A. Sinclair, "Hebrew Text of the Qumran Micah Pesher and Textual Traditions of the Minor Prophets," RevQ 11 (1983) 253-63; E. Tov, "The Literary History of the Book of Jeremiah in the Light of Its Textual History," in Empirical Models for Biblical Criticism, ed. J. Tigay (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1985) 211-27; idem, "The Jeremiah Scrolls from Cave 4," RevQ 14 (1989) 189-206; E. Tov, R. A. Kraft and P. J. Parsons, The Greek Minor Prophets Scroll from Nahal Hever (8HevXIIgr) (The Seiyal Collection 1) (DJD 8; Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1990); E. Ulrich et al., eds., Qumran Cave 4. X: The Prophets (DJD 15; Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1997).

C. A. Evans

DEATH

As rhetoricians, the OT prophets were adept at persuasion; in their times, as today, death was the ultimate threat, and thus it was one of the most powerful images that they could invoke. At times, they offer a choice between life and death; more often still, they present a miserable death as the fate of those who reject the word of God or oppress God's people. Furthermore, the prophets preserve a number of references to beliefs and practices surrounding death that shed light on Israelite religion and culture.

1. Burial and Mourning
2. The Dead
3. The Underworld and Its Deities
4. The Rhetoric of Death

1. Burial and Mourning.

In the prophetic texts there are no descriptions of typical burials such as one finds throughout Genesis through 2 Kings (on the archaeology of burials in ancient Israel, see Bloch-Smith). Instead, one finds in prophetic warnings and threats a kind of photographic negative of proper burial, describing its opposite. It is quite clear in the prophets, as elsewhere, that the lack of proper sepulture and mourning is viewed as a terrible fate, thus the threat of having one's corpse exposed is a particularly persistent theme in Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel (e.g., Jer 19:7: "I will make them fall by the sword before their enemies. . . . I will give their dead bodies for food to the birds of the air and to the wild animals of the earth" [see section 4]). This phenomenon is known as "antiburial" and reflects actual historical practices of invading armies. It is also manifest in the burning of kings (or their remains), usually as punishment for political "rebellion" (Is 30:33; Amos 2:1). This reflects historical practices known in Egypt and Assyria and is not to be confused with cremation, which was not widely practiced in the ancient Near East.

Israelite customs of mourning and lamentation appear to have been very similar to those of Israel's neighbors, and these practices are well-attested in the prophets. A great number of Hebrew roots refer to mourning ('bl, spd, nhh, šhh, qdr, yll, 'nh), but a coherent picture nevertheless emerges. At the death of a prominent person, a whole family (Zech 12:12) or tribe (Num 20:29) might gather. Indeed, allowing for hyperbole and the semimythical character of certain texts, a whole nation might be said to gather (Gen 50:10; Deut 34:8; 1 Sam 25:1; 1 Kings 14:18); more likely, a maximum turnout would have included representatives from the whole nation, as the Neo-Babylonian king Nabonidus described in the case of his mother's burial. Large numbers of mourners helped to mark a successful life since lack of mourning was seen as a curse (Jer 16:4; 25:33).

Physical manifestations of mourning included a bowed posture (Ps 35:13); shaving the head or disheveling the hair (Ezek 27:31; Amos 8:9); tearing garments (Joel 2:12); donning sackcloth or other specific "mourning garments" (Jer 4:8; 6:26; Joel 1:8); and smearing ashes on the body (Jer 6:26; Job 2:8). The practices may have been intended to establish a link with the dead person by approximating the same physical appearance (i.e., low, dusty, etc.). There were certain limitations on outward expressions of mourning, however; for example, gashing flesh is portrayed as a foreign practice (Jer 49:3) and is specifically prohibited (Lev 19:28; Deut 14:1).

Vocal weeping and wailing (e.g., Jer 4:8) were central to mourning. Professional mourners seem to have been employed in some cases: "Call for the mourning women to come; send for the skilled women to come; let them quickly raise a dirge over us, so that our eyes may run down with tears" (Jer 9:16-17 [cf. Amos 5:16]). There also are other signs that lament may have been formalized, such as the reference to the qinah form in Ezekiel 19:14: "This is a lamentation [qînâ], and it shall be used as a lamentation [qînâ]" (see also Ezek 27:2, 32; 28:12; 32:2, 16; Amos 5:1). The cry hōy (which occurs some fifty times in the prophets, including twenty-one in Isaiah) also seems to have been typical of funerary laments (see Jer 22:18; 34:5; Amos 5:16), although that original social context was forgotten in later periods. The interjection often is translated as “Ah!” “Alas!” or “Woe!”

On the one hand, there do not seem to have been great changes in the Israelites’ personal mourning practices over time. On the other hand, specific public mourning festivals are reported to have arisen in specific periods to honor certain people, such as Josiah (2 Chron 35:24-25) and Jephthah’s daughter (Judg 11:39-40). Zechariah 7:3-5 refers to a custom of mourning in the fifth and seventh months, almost certainly related to the destruction of Jerusalem in the fifth month.

Although the data are less than conclusive, it appears that there were some dedicated spaces for mourning and the cultic functions associated with burials. Ecclesiastes 7:2, 4 mentions a “house of mourning” (bêt-’ēbel), and Judah seems to have had a specific type of venue in which funerary feasting could take place. Called a marzēah, it is attested twice in the Bible, both in the prophets (Jer 16:5; Amos 6:7). The Jeremiah 16 passage clearly places the marzēah in a mourning context and likely alludes to actual funerary feasts. Amos 6:7 draws on the same events but appears to be a deliberate mischaracterization of the banquets of the wealthy as funerary banquets; that is, the prophet was mocking the way in which the participants were feasting as death was approaching.

Other apparent biblical references to a marzēah include Amos 4:1; Hosea 4:16-19; Isaiah 28:7-8. Since the marzēah is implicitly condemned in both its biblical attestations, it may well have been viewed by Yahwistic prophets as inappropriate and as a threat to Yahweh’s worship, probably because the living might seek the blessing and aid of the spirits of the dead at such an event. A similar phenomenon by a cognate name (marziḥu) is known from Ugarit, where it was connected to the invocation of the dead.

2. The Dead.

Corpses were thought to cultically defile anyone who touched them, according to priestly law (e.g., Num 5:2, 19:13). Among the prophets, Ezekiel and Haggai also show awareness of defilement by dead bodies (Ezek 6:5; 44:25; Hag 2:13-14). Not surprisingly, then, the concern about corpse defilement is most likely to occur in works influenced by priestly ideas.

The OT distinguishes itself from the literature of surrounding cultures by its polemic against belief in the supernatural power of the dead. The dead, it is said, do not praise (e.g., Ps 30:10; 88:10); instead, they “go down into silence” (Ps 115:17). They know nothing (Eccles 9:5, 10) and sit in darkness (Lam 3:6). Although this polemic is not particularly widespread in the prophets, Isaiah 14:10 provides a significant example (see also Is 47:5; Jer 48:2). This sort of polemic does not necessarily mean that belief in the power of the dead was not held by many in ancient Israel; indeed, the opposite may be true (see Afterlife).

3. The Underworld and Its Deities.

The underworld in Israelite thought is known primarily by the name “Sheol,” which appears to be a uniquely Hebraic term, the etymology of which is contested. Although it occurs sixty-five times in the Bible, its use in the prophets is surprisingly limited: it occurs only six times outside of Isaiah and Ezekiel 31—32 (Hos 13:14 [2x]; Amos 9:2; Jon 2:3 [which really is an embedded psalm]; Hab 2:5).

Death is personified quite clearly at times in the Bible. Some of these clearly allude to the West Semitic tradition of a swallowing god of death, Mot, attested most famously in the Ugaritic Baal Cycle. One of the most prominent instances is found in Isaiah 5:14 (“Sheol has enlarged its appetite and opened its mouth beyond measure”), but there are also others. Habakkuk 2:5 describes an arrogant Babylonian ruler who “makes his gullet wide like Sheol, and is as insatiable as Mot.” One might also mention Hosea 13:14 (“Death, where are your plagues?”). The lament of Jeremiah 9:20, “Death has come up into our windows, it has entered our palaces, to cut off the children from the streets and the young men from the squares,” is also highly reminiscent of other ancient Near Eastern cultures’ fears of demonic assaults.

Despite these occurrences, it is not likely that Mot had a cult in Judah or Israel or was commonly regarded as an active divine presence. Isaiah 28:15, 18 refer to a “covenant with Death,” but this is almost universally regarded as a reference to some other deity or perhaps to a foreign nation personified. The author has argued that the Hebrew word for “death” (mwrt) puns on the name of the Egyptian national goddess Mut, whose name probably sounded almost identical, and who was indeed seen as a guarantor of Egypt’s political agreements (Hays 2010).

The underworld god Molek certainly was known to the Israelites (Lev 18:21; 20:2-5; 2 Kings 23:10; Jer 32:35; Is 57:9 [emended from melek, “king”]), although later copyists sometimes confused him with the Ammonite deity Milcom. Molek is repeatedly portrayed as a god who received child sacrifices (see, in addition to the above texts, Ezek 16:21; 23:37-39), but space limitations preclude a full discussion of the topic (see Heider).

Mot and Molek were not the only supernatural chthonic powers named in the prophets. Although Jewish interest in demonology would peak much later, demons appear sporadically in the OT. The Semitic plague deity Rešeph becomes a henchman in Yahweh’s wrathful retinue in Habakkuk 3:5: “Before him went Pestilence, and Plague [ršp] followed close behind.” Demons are also often portrayed seminaturalistically as wild *animals, sometimes haunting wastelands as in other ancient Near Eastern cultures (see Demons and Deities). Perhaps the most obvious reference is in Isaiah 34:14, to Lilith, a well-known Mesopotamian demon. The divine adversary haśśātān (Zech 3:1-2) bears mentioning, although his name was not applied to the king of the underworld until much later.

4. The Rhetoric of Death.

Many biblical texts employ imagery of life and death for rhetorical ends. Most of these fall into certain distinct categories. (1) There are psalmic laments, in which supplicants frequently describe their suffering in terms of encroaching death to impel God’s action on one’s behalf or to thank God for salvation already experienced (e.g., Ps 9:14; 13:3; 28:1; 30:3; 56:14; 49:15; 68:21; 86:13; 103:4; 143:7). (2) There are legal punishment clauses, where death is threatened (e.g., Lev 20:10-12). (3) There are wisdom dichotomies (or alternatives), which present a choice between death and life. This motif is likely rooted in wisdom discourse—for example, Proverbs 12:28: “In the path of righteousness there is life, in walking its path there is no death” (cf. Prov 8:36; 13:14; 14:27). It explodes again in the prophets (and in Deuteronomistic literature) during the Neo-Assyrian period. The close of Moses’ monologue in Deuteronomy 30:15-20 may be the most prominent manifestation (“I set before you life and death. . . . Choose life!”). Precisely the same sort of rhetoric manifests itself more concisely in the exhortations of the prophets, particularly by the time of the exile—for example, Jeremiah 21:8: “See, I am setting before you the way of life and the way of death” (cf. Ezek 33:11; 18:23; 18:32). One might conclude, then, that the “wisdom alternative” was taken up by the prophets, particularly after the eighth century bc. (4) There are prophetic judgment speeches. This final major type of rhetoric employing imagery of death might be characterized as “aversion therapy”—the association of certain beliefs and actions with death imagery so graphic and horrifying as to make them unappealing. This most commonly takes the form of images of corpse exposure. Leaving the corpse to the elements and to desecration was an awful fate because it denied a restful afterlife to those so exposed; it was also, of course, repulsive at a purely natural level. The repeated threats of corpse exposure may suggest a particularly strong aversion to the dead body in Judean culture; issues of cultic purity and prohibitions of contact with the dead probably were among the forces at work. “Aversion therapy” was used already by Isaiah of Jerusalem (e.g., Is 14:19: “you are cast out from your grave”), and Jeremiah and Ezekiel seize on it with special enthusiasm, becoming the exemplars of the technique (e.g., Jer 7:33; 8:1-2; 9:22; 14:16; 16:4; 19:7; 22:18; 26:23; 36:30; Ezek 6:5-7; 29:5).

It is likely that this imagery also reflects Judeans’ intimate, historical familiarity with the horrors of warfare, suffered especially at the hands of the Mesopotamians. In some cases, such as Nahum 3:1-3, this is particularly clear: “Horsemen charging, flashing sword and glittering spear, piles of dead, heaps of corpses, dead bodies without end—they stumble over the bodies!” The vast destruction and carnage of the Neo-Assyrians’ military campaigns first reached Israel and Judah during Isaiah’s career, which suggests his work as a natural jumping-off point for that literary motif (e.g., Is 14:19-20, which probably reflects on the death of Sargon II on campaign in 705 BC).

All of these traditions draw on death's negative connotations in Israel, holding up death as an unwelcome destination and as a punishment. One could identify a fifth, "pessimistic" tradition in which death is welcomed, which stands in some tension with the aforementioned types of rhetoric. This may be seen most obviously in Job (e.g., "Why did I not perish at birth, and die as I came from the womb?" [Job 3:11]), but also in cases where prophets were suffering persecution (e.g., Moses [Num 11:15], Elijah [1 Kings 19:4], Jeremiah [Jer 20:7-18]). However, examples of that view are so uncommon as to call into question its status as a "tradition"; it is better to identify it as a reaction against tradition for the sake of shock value.

See also AFTERLIFE; DESTRUCTION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. E. Bloch-Smith, "The Cult of the Dead in Judah: Interpreting the Material Remains," JBL 111 (1992a) 213-24; idem, Juda-hite Burial Practices and Beliefs about the Dead (JSOTSup 123; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1992b); H. C. Brichto, "Kin, Cult, Land and Afterlife—A Biblical Complex," HUCA 44 (1973) 1-54; B. S. Childs, "Death and Dying in Old Testament Theology," in Love and Death in the Ancient Near East: Essays in Honor of Marvin H. Pope, ed. J. Marks and R. Good (Guilford, CT: Four Quarters Publishing, 1987) 89-91; R. E. Friedman and S. D. Overton, "Death and Afterlife: The Biblical Silence," in Death, Life-after-Death, Resurrection and the World-to-Come in the Judaisms of Antiquity, part 4 of Judaism in Late Antiquity, ed. A. Avery-Peck and J. Neusner (HO 55; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2000) 35-60; R. S. Hallote, Death, Burial, and Afterlife in the Biblical World: How the Israelites and Their Neighbors Treated the Dead (Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 2001); C. B. Hays, "The Covenant with Mut: A New Interpretation of Isaiah 28:1-22," VT 60 (2010) 212-40; idem, Death in the Iron Age II and in First Isaiah (Forschungen zum Alten Testament; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2011); G. C. Heider, The Cult of Molek: A Reassessment (JSOTSup 43; Sheffield: JSOT, 1985); W. Janzen, Mourning Cry and Woe Oracle (BZAW 125; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1972); P. S. Johnston, Shades of Wicked: Death and Afterlife in the Old Testament (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2002); P. J. King and L. E. Stager, Life in Biblical Israel (LAI; Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 2001); T. J. Lewis, Cults of the Dead in Ancient Israel and Ugarit (HSM 39; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1989); J. Lust, "On Wizards and Prophets," in Studies on Prophecy: A Collection of Twelve Papers (VTSup 26; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1974) 133-42; J. L. McLaughlin, The Marzēah in the Prophetic Literature: References and Allusions in Light of the Extra-Biblical Evidence (VTSup 86; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2001); G. E. Mendenhall, "From Witchcraft to Justice: Death and Afterlife in the Old Testament," in Death and Afterlife: Perspectives on World Religions, ed. H. Obayashi (Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1992) 67-81; H. Nutkowitz, L'homme face à la mort au royaume de Juda: Rites, pratiques et représentations (Paris: Cerf, 2006); S. M. Olyan, Biblical Mourning: Ritual and Social Dimensions (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004); idem, "Some Neglected Aspects of Israelite Interment Ideology," JBL 124 (2005) 601-16; L. Y. Rahmani, "Ancient Jerusalem's Funerary Customs and Tombs, Part Two," BA 44 (1981) 229-35; J. W. Ribar, "Death-Cult Practices in Ancient Palestine" (Ph.D. diss.; University of Michigan, 1973); B. B. Schmidt, Israel's Beneficent Dead: Ancestor Cult and Necromancy in Ancient Israelite Religion and Tradition (FAT 111; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1994); M. S. Smith and E. Bloch-Smith, "Death and Afterlife in Ugarit and Israel," JAOS 108 (1988) 277-84; K. Spronk, Beatific Afterlife in Ancient Israel and in the Ancient Near East (AOAT 219; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1986).

C. B. Hays

DECALOGUE. See COVENANT; LAW.

DELIVERANCE. See SALVATION, DELIVERANCE.

DELIVERER, GOD AS. See GOD.

DEPORTATION. See EXILE.

DESERT. See WILDERNESS, DESERT.

DESTRUCTION

The concept of destruction and its vivid portrayal occur frequently in the OT. At the macrolevel, the OT speaks of destruction as a divine, physical judgment, the inevitable result of wicked or unrighteous behavior on the part of both individuals and national entities. The former is the predominant focus of OT Wisdom literature (e.g., Ps 1:6; 37:38; 49:5-9; 73:18-19; 92:7; 145:20; Prov 6:12-15; 14:11) (Mabie). In the prophetic literature, language of destruction is informed by Israel's covenant relationship with Yahweh as a nation in the promised land. The Torah and the OT Historical Books describe the birth of the nation and the struggle against the hostile forces occupying the promised land, a struggle finally won in the days of David and Solomon. The ministries of the Major Prophets and the Minor Prophets took place in the years following the fracturing of Israel's monarchy, a situation that fostered religious apostasy and ill-fated alliances with enemy Gentile (non-Israelite) *nations. The prophets focused on the importance of Israel's loyalty to Yahweh as their god and separation from the pagan Gentiles. They repeatedly preached that such spiritual devotion would ensure the destruction of Israel's enemies and warned that Yahweh's election of Israel would not avert destruction for Israel if they pursued other gods. Israel's spiritual defections consequently prompted harsh language of destruction. Despite his *wrath, Yahweh also swore through the prophets to honor his *covenant with Israel by preserving a believing remnant out of the ashes. This vow was expressed in two ways: the promise of imminent destruction of the nations hostile to Israel, and a more remote future time when all the forces aligned against Yahweh and his people would be ultimately defeated, ushering in his global kingdom.

1. Vocabulary of "Destruction"
2. Preprophetic Background
3. Destruction of Yahweh's Unfaithful People
4. Destruction of Israel's National Enemies

1. Vocabulary of "Destruction."

Biblical writers use a wide range of vocabulary to speak of destruction, though some verb lemmas are most prominent: šmd, 'bd, šht. Each of these lemmas appears frequently in the prophetic material. The verb šmd occurs ninety times (the majority in the Hiphil stem) and basically refers to physical destruction, most often of people. God is the subject of this verb roughly 80 percent of the time (NIDOTTE 4:151). The lemma 'bd occurs even more frequently (roughly two hundred occurrences). Most of these instances are in the Qal, where the meaning is "to be destroyed" or "to be lost." Nearly seventy of these occurrences are in the Piel (41x) and Hiphil (26x), with the meaning "to exterminate" or "to destroy" (NIDOTTE 1:223-24). In over two-thirds of the occurrences in Qal and Hiphil stems, and in one-third of those in the Piel stem, Yahweh is the direct or implied agent of destruction (TLOT 14). The verb šht occurs about 140 times in the OT, most often in the Hiphil (96x) and Piel (39x) stems, with a semantic range including "to wipe out," "to spoil," "to ruin" and "to destroy" (NIDOTTE 4:92). This lemma is "anchored particularly firmly in the conceptual realm of war" because its participial form evolved into "a technical military term [that] indicates a particular division in ancient Near Eastern armies" (TLOT 1318).

2. Preprophetic Background.

Prior to the prophetic period, language for "destruction" in the Torah and the OT Historical Books described a holy war directed at nations hostile to his people (see Warfare and Divine Warfare). Yahweh assumed the role of a divine destroyer, "a supernatural envoy from God assigned the task of annihilating large numbers of people" (Meier, 240). In literary-theological terms, the strategy used to convey this idea is the supernatural personification of "destruction" language. The most obvious example is the "destroyer" (Heb mašhīt, a Hiphil participle of the root šht) of the firstborn in the final plague against Egypt (Ex 12:23). This passage both differentiates and identifies Yahweh and the destroyer: "For the LORD will pass through to strike the Egyptians, and when he sees the blood . . . the LORD will pass over the door and will not allow the destroyer [mašhīt] to enter your houses to strike you." Elsewhere in the OT the destruction is attributed to Yahweh himself (Ex 4:23: "I will kill your firstborn"; cf. Ex 11:4-5; 12:12—13:23a, 27, 29; Ps 78:51; 105:36). The imagery of Yahweh destroying the enemy of his people continued with the exodus from Egypt. Exodus 15, the song sung by Moses and the Israelites after the miraculous deliverance at the Red/Reed Sea, informs us that Yahweh is "a man of war" (Ex 15:3) who drowned the armies of Egypt, "overthrowing" (hrs) and "devouring" ('kl) them (Ex 15:7).

The theme of Yahweh as the warrior who destroys the enemies of his people is also prominent in Deuteronomy and the Deuteronomistic History (Joshua through 2 Kings). These portions of the Hebrew Bible describe the outworking of Yahweh's covenant with the patriarchs to grant their descendants (Israel) the land of Canaan. God had instructed Israel through Moses to "devote to destruction" (hrm) certain cities and populations in the land of Canaan (Num 21:2-3; Deut 7:2; 13:15; 20:17). Joshua was charged with carrying out these instructions as well and did so (Josh 6:18-21; 8:26; 10:28-40; 11:11-21) under the command of Yahweh, who appeared in a theophany to him as "the captain of the armies of Yahweh" (Josh 5:13-15; cf. Ex 3:1-6).

In this early period, then, Yahweh was the mighty destroyer, fighting for his beloved Israel. During the prophetic period, after Israel had become unfaithful by pursuing other gods, the language and motifs of destruction would be repurposed to describe the fate of Israel.

3. Destruction of Yahweh's Unfaithful People.

As Israel embarked on the task of possessing the promised land, they were warned not to violate their covenantal relationship with God: "Yahweh will send on you curses, confusion, and frustration in all that you undertake to do, until you are destroyed [šmd] and perish ['bd] quickly on account of the evil of your deeds, because you have forsaken me" (Deut 28:20). But both the northern kingdom of Israel (= Israel, Ephraim, Samaria) and the southern kingdom (Judah) abandoned exclusive loyalty to Yahweh. Prophets to both kingdoms denounced the spiritual infidelity, prophesying the destruction of Israel (destroyed in 722 BC by Assyria; cf. Hos 8:8) and Judah (exiled into Babylon in three waves, c. 605-586 BC; cf. Is 39:1-7; Jer 20:4-6).

3.1. Oracles against Israel. Several of the Prophetic Books devote considerable space to long rhetorical denunciations ("oracles") of Israel (Jer 1—25; Ezek 6—7; 12—24; Amos 3—6), and virtually every one of the Prophetic Books contains some indictment of God's people. "Thus says the LORD: Even so will I spoil [šht] the pride of Judah and the great pride of Jerusalem. This evil people, who refuse to hear my words, who stubbornly follow their own heart and have gone after other gods. . . ." (Jer 13:9-10). Ezekiel and Hosea (Ezek 6:3; 30:13; Hos 10:8) announced impending disaster for Israel's apostate high places (bāmôt), altars (mizbēhôt), idols (gillūlim) and images ('ēlīlim), all of which would be demolished ('bd). Micah prophesied (Mic 5:14) that Israelite cities in which carved images (pēsīlim) and Asherah poles ('āšerīm) were found would be destroyed (šmd). In the days leading to the Babylonian captivity, Jeremiah warned that the false prophets who were telling the populace that Yahweh would protect them were liars: "For it is a lie that they are prophesying to you, with the result that you will be removed far from your land, and I will drive you out, and you will perish ['bd]. . . . They are prophesying falsely in my name, with the result that I will drive you out and you will perish ['bd], you and the prophets who are prophesying to you" (Jer 27:10, 15). The errant house of Jeroboam was "destroyed [šmd] . . . according to the word of the LORD" (1 Kings 15:29). The line of Ahab was "wiped out [šmd] according to the word of the LORD that he spoke to Elijah" (2 Kings 10:17). Elsewhere, Yahweh told his people through Jeremiah in no uncertain terms that "I have destroyed ['bd] my people; they did not turn from their ways" (Jer 15:7), and that "I will not pity or spare or have compassion, that I should not destroy [šht]" the kings, priests, prophets and inhabitants of Jerusalem (Jer 13:13-14).

3.2. Israel and "the Day of the Lord." The personal offense taken by Yahweh at Israel's apostasy is expressed in two ways. First and most frequently, the destructive judgment of Israel is described as "the day of the LORD" (see Day of the Lord). The descriptive phrase left no doubt as to what had prompted judgment and who was inflicting it. This same phrase was also used by the prophets for the apocalyptic destruction of Israel's enemies (Geyer; see 4.2 below).

The "day of the LORD" with respect to God's judgment of his people was described in several ways. Some prophets connected it to natural disasters and celestial omens. Amos warned Israel that the Day of the Lord would be "darkness, and not light" and "gloom with no brightness" (Amos 5:18, 20). The connection to natural disasters included pestilence and crop failure (Joel 2:1-11; Hag 1:5-6; 2:14-19; Mal 3:9-12). Still others described it in terms of the horror of battle, where people are forced to flee for their lives, imagery that would be literalized for many who heard the words (Is 3:18—4:1; 22:5; Hos 1:4-5; Amos 2:13-16; 8:3, 9). Still more alternative language makes the destruction's association with the evil of the people clear (Ezek 7:7-12, 19; Mal 4:1, 5). The familiar description of foreign nations as instruments of punishment is also included in "day of the LORD" passages (Is 5:26-30; Hos 11:5; Amos 3:9-11) (Geyer). Some texts indicate that certain prophets believed that the Day of the Lord was very near (Ezek 7:7, 10, 12; 22:4; Joel 3:14; Zeph 1:7; Mal 3:1-2).

3.3. Supernatural Destroyers. The second expression of personal affront in regard to Israel's apostasy and impending destruction involves the personification of "destruction" language, a strategy employed previously in the defeat of Israel's enemies in Egypt and at the Red/Reed Sea. Now, however, the prophets wield it to convey a terrible message: Yahweh is personally sending supernatural agents of destruction against his people (Kapelrud). In Ezekiel 9:1-6 a group of angelic beings are commanded by Yahweh to pass through Jerusalem and slaughter everyone who was guilty of committing idolatry. None of these figures are called "destroyer," though the word is part of their commissioning (lēmāšhīt [Ezek 9:6]). At the exodus event, the destroyer's judgment on the firstborn had been described as a plague (negep [Ex 12:13]). Two other words for plagues are personified as supernatural destroyers in the Hebrew Bible: qeteb and deber (Deut 32:24; Ps 91:6; Hos 13:14) (del Olmo Lete; Wyatt). Isaiah 28:2 employs the imagery of a supernatural destroyer against Israel by warning of "a destroying tempest" (lit., "a tempest of qeteb [destruction]") sent by Yahweh against "the drunkards of Ephraim [i.e., Israel]."

4. Destruction of Israel's National Enemies.

Despite the horror of Yahweh's destruction of Israel and *exile of Judah, the prophets were quite clear that God's use of foreign *nations as instruments of his wrath should not be construed as an endorsement of those foreign nations. They would get what was coming to them as well. The "destruction" language is cast in both eschatologically imminent terms and a more remote apocalyptic judgment of the nations.

4.1. Oracles against the Nations. Destruction rhetoric aimed at Israel's historic enemies frequently comes in the form of "oracles," poetic diatribes labeled by scholars as "oracles against the nations." Several of the Prophetic Books devote considerable space to this rhetorical genre (Is 13—23; Jer 46—51; Ezek 25—32). For example, Isaiah prophesies the destruction of strongholds in Canaan, specifically Tyre (šmd [Is 23:11-12]). Ezekiel warns that destruction awaits the Ammonites, Moabite, Edomites and Philistines (šmd, ʿbd, hrbh [Ezek 25]). Likewise targeted for destruction are the city of Tyre (šht, ʿbd [Ezek 26:4, 17; 28:16]) and the Egyptians (šmd [Ezek 30:13; 32:12]). Zephaniah declares that Assyria will be demolished by the hand of Yahweh (šmd, ʿbd [Zeph 2:13]). The book of Obadiah announces the destruction of Edom (ʿbd [Obad 8]). Jeremiah portends the destruction of Moab (šmd [Jer 48:8]). Amos forecasts the doom of Philistine cities (ʿbd [Amos 1:8]), Tyre, and Edom (ʿkl [Amos 1:9-12]). Jeremiah, using a wide range of vocabulary, also prophesies the destruction of Babylon. Babylon will be "destroyed" (šht [Jer 51:11]), "devastated" (šdd [Jer 51:55]), "broken" (šbr [Jer 28:2]) and "killed" (mwt [Jer 41:2]).

4.2. The Future Day of the Lord. All the prophets target the nations with declarations of destruction and judgment, but several go much further in prophesying a "day of the LORD" involving many or even all nations hostile to Yahweh and Israel (Jer 25:33; Ezek 30:2-5; 38:17-39:8; Joel 3:14). According to Zechariah 12:3-9; 14:12-13, "on that day" Yahweh will destroy all the nations opposed to Jerusalem. Even more audacious is the language used by Zephaniah, who proclaimed that Yahweh would destroy "all the inhabitants of the earth" (Zeph 1:7-18), a viewpoint shared by Isaiah 13:6-8.

The apex of the language of apocalyptic destruction transcends even the defeat of all the nations of the earth. Passages in Isaiah and Jeremiah insist that the Day of the Lord will involve the punishment of the cosmic powers, the host of heaven (Is 24:21), a conflict that will threaten the very fabric and order of creation itself.

The two most noteworthy passages regarding this total cosmic upheaval are Isaiah 27:1 and Jeremiah 4:23-28. Isaiah 27:1 equates "that day" with Yahweh's climactic victory over the forces of primeval chaos, personified by Leviathan, "the dragon that is in the sea." Jeremiah 4:23-28 also resorts to the description of primeval chaos. Situating the oracle in "that day" (Jer

4:9), the prophet writes, "I looked on the earth, and behold, it was without form and void [tôhû wāböhû]; and to the heavens, and they had no light." The phrase tôhû wāböhû is an explicit reference to the unformed heavens and earth in Genesis 1:2. Scholars debate when these verses in Jeremiah were penned in relation to other passages securely assigned to the apocalyptic genre, but they agree that the language is consistent with an apocalyptic outlook (Eppstein; Hayes). There could hardly be a more dramatic way to cast divine visitation.

See also CHAOS; DAY OF THE LORD; DEATH; WARFARE AND DIVINE WARFARE; WRATH.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. V. Eppstein, "The Day of Yahweh in Jeremiah 4:23-28," JBL 87 (1986) 93-97; J. Geyer, "Mythology and Culture in the Oracles against the Nations," VT 36 (1986) 129-45; K. Hayes, "Jeremiah IV 23: tôhû without böhû," VT 47 (1997) 247-49; A. Kapelrud, "God as Destroyer in the Preaching of Amos and in the Ancient Near East," JBL 71 (1952) 33-38; F. J. Mabie, "Chaos and Death," DOTWPW 41-54; S. Meier, "Destroyer," *DDD*² 240-44; G. del Olmo Lete, "Deber," *DDD*² 231-32; N. Wyatt, "Qeteb," *DDD*² 674.

M. S. Heiser

DIRGES. See JEREMIAH: BOOK OF; LAMENTATIONS, BOOK OF.

DIVINATION, MAGIC

The terms divination and magic are difficult to define, and the two have some overlap. The prophets refer to divination and magic in terms of disapproval and condemnation. From the perspective of the prophetic writings, divination therefore can be said to involve the use of illicit means to seek information or direction normally hidden from humans. Magic can be understood as the attempt to influence for good or avert evil by the unlawful use of supernatural forces.

1. Divination
2. Magic
3. The Prophetic Response
4. Theological Implications

1. Divination.

The Hebrew root qsm denotes divination and its practitioners in general (the root nhš, which also refers to divination, is not found in the prophets). The use of the Aramaic root gwr in Dan 2:27; 4:7 (MT 4:4); 5:7, 11 likely refers to diviners in a general sense.

The cultural and religious world in which the prophets labored was saturated with divination, but Yahweh's prophets put it in a negative light. They condemned it (Is 44:25; Zech 10:2; cf. Deut 18:10), associated it with false prophecy inside Israel (Jer 27:9; 29:8; Ezek 13:6-9, 17, 23; 22:28; Mic 3:5-7, 11), essentially equated it with lies and falsehood (šeqer [Jer 14:14]), and contrasted its futility with the power of Yahweh's *Spirit enabling the prophet to discern justly and declare Israel's sin (Mic 3:8). However, so deeply established was the evil of divination within God's people (2 Kings 17:17; 21:6; Is 2:6), that when the prophets pictured the collapse of society, it was specifically mentioned as part of the passing scene (Is 3:1-3; Mic 3:6). Diviners were even found in postexilic Israel (Zech 10:2).

1.1. Specific Divinatory Methods.

1.1.1. Rhabdomancy. Rhabdomancy is divination by the use of wooden sticks or rods. Hosea may be referring to this practice when he articulates Yahweh's accusation: "My people consult their sticks [ʿēšô], and their staffs [maqlô] inform them" (Hos 4:12) (Macintosh, 151-52). There is, however, no consensus on the meaning of this passage. The king of Babylon's shaking of arrows (Ezek 21:21) may be belomancy, a form of rhabdomancy, but the king's actions have also been interpreted as divination by lot.

1.1.2. Hepatoscopy. Hepatoscopy, a specialized form of extispicy, is the examination of the liver of a sacrificial animal for omens. Babylon was famous for this type of divination, and its king is pictured as practicing it (Ezek 21:21). Some have thought that King Ahaz read omens from sacrificial animals (2 Kings 16:2, 15; cf. Lev 3:3-5; Deut 18:10). The prophets make no direct reference to this form of divination within Israel.

1.1.3. Oneiromancy. Oneiromancy is divination by means of dreams. Jeremiah referred to the false prophets using dreams to convey their lies (Jer 23:25; 29:8-9; cf. Deut 13:2-5). Oneiromancy was a well-established practice in Babylon (Butler). Not surprisingly, its royal court was equipped with those who claimed to be able to interpret dreams (Dan 2:4; 4:6).

1.1.4. Teraphim. Teraphim (Heb tērāpîm) can be identified as images (HALOT 1795) used for divinatory purposes, but no scholarly consensus exists on their precise identity and use. Zechariah 10:2 identifies them as oracular devices that are condemned: “The teraphim utter deceit, and the diviners see deception.” The king of Babylon “consulted the teraphim” (Ezek 21:26). Hosea 3:4 predicts that “the Israelites will live many days . . . without ephod and teraphim.” Since the northern kingdom did not have the officially sanctioned ephod with the Urim and Thummim, this reference (and the LXX translation) may indicate that teraphim functioned as a substitute for the Urim and Thummim (cf. Judg 17:5) (Van Dam, 149-51; cf. Rofé). On the other hand, teraphim have been connected with necromancy because of their association with mediums and spiritists in Josiah’s reformation (2 Kings 23:24) (Van der Toorn).

1.1.5. Astrology. Astrology as a divinatory means sought signs or omens foretelling the future in celestial phenomena. Astrology had a long history in Mesopotamia. Babylonian astrologers were characterized as those “who divide the heavens [Qere: hōbērê šamayim], who look at the stars [haḥōzīm bakkōkābīm], who make known at the new moons what is coming upon you” (Is 47:13). The courts of Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar had at their beck and call Chaldeans (kašdīm [Dan 2:2]), best known for their proficiency in astrology (Rochberg-Halton, 505). Israel was impressed by “the signs of the heavens” (Jer 10:2) and worshiped the heavenly bodies (Jer 8:2).

1.1.6. Necromancy. Necromancy is communication with the dead to understand better the past or to know the future. When Judah was threatened in the eighth century BC by Assyria, God’s people inquired of the mediums (’ōbôt) and spiritists (yiddē’ōnīm) who consulted “the dead” (hammētīm) (Is 8:19; cf. Is 29:4). Necromancy may also be referred to elsewhere. The people “sit among the graves and spend the night in secret places” (Is 65:4). The suggestion that necromancy is alluded to in Isaiah 28:7-22 seems unlikely (Johnston, 158-60). Necromancy was known in Mesopotamia (Cryer, 181-83) and may also have been practiced in Syria-Palestine (Jeffers, 173-81; cf. Schmidt, 100-122, 201-20) and Egypt (see Is 19:3) (Ritner).

1.1.7. Soothsaying. Soothsaying as a divinatory practice involved predicting the future, but it is unclear exactly how or on what basis the predictions were made. Isaiah characterized Israel as rejected by God because the nation was full of soothsayers (’ōnēnīm) like the Philistines were (Is 2:6). Jeremiah warned the people directly: “Do not to listen to your [false] prophets, diviners (qōšēmēkem), your interpreters of dreams, your soothsayers (’ōnēnēkem) and sorcerers (kaššāpēkem)” (Jer 27:9). Elsewhere the soothsayers were also associated with sorcery or witchcraft, kešep (Mic 5:12 [MT 5:11]), and ’ōnēnâ sometimes is translated as “sorcerer” (Is 57:3).

2. Magic.

Most often magic is referred to with the root kšp (“to practice sorcery”). Although, like divination, magic and sorcery were strictly forbidden (Deut 18:10-11), these practices made deep inroads into the life of God’s people and were considered an acceptable part of society. When Isaiah listed the prominent and respected people of his day, he included the “skillful magician” (ḥākam ḥārāsīm) (Is 3:3 [see HALOT 358]) and the “expert enchanter” (nēbôn lāḥaš) (Is 3:3; cf. Jer 27:9). The use of the positive attributes “skillful” and “expert” perhaps are ironic, given that Yahweh is the source of wisdom, and that Isaiah’s prophecy scorns the wisdom of diviners (cf. Is 11:2; 44:25; 47:10). On the other hand, this usage may simply indicate that according to human standards, they were considered expert at their craft.

Magic and sorcery (kēšāpīm) were associated with Nineveh (Nah 3:4) and especially with Babylon, the city of sorceries (ḥābārīm) and magic spells (kēšāpīm) (Is 47:9, 12). It is interesting to note that when Nebuchadnezzar wanted his dream recounted and explained, he called in the wise men (cf. Dan 2:12), who were identified as “magicians [ḥartummīm], conjurers [aššāpīm], sorcerers [mēkaššēpīm] and Chaldeans [kašdīm]” (Dan 2:2). Apparently, dream interpretation included dispelling or removing any evil consequences of such a dream by the use of magic (Oppenheim 2008, 218-19).

3. The Prophetic Response.

To appreciate the prophets’ disapproval of divination and magic, one needs to be aware of some of the presuppositions informing these practices (Van Dam, 114-24). Divination and magic would be inconceivable without the notion that the natural world was conceived personally. The gods were in and behind the phenomena and forces of nature. There was no qualitative difference between the gods and humans. Through divination the diviner attempted to find out the intent and desires of the gods on the assumption that they spoke through the arrangement of the sticks or rods, through the features of a liver, or by the arrangement of the stars in the heavens. The gods were also thought to communicate through dreams. One could seek an incubation dream for getting the necessary information by spending a night in a holy place such as a temple (COS 1.60:157, 159; 2.155:422-24, 428; Butler, 217-39). By collecting omens and the anomalous results (whether positive or negative) that were observed, diviners developed enormous bodies of scientific literature to be used for future reference (Oppenheim 1977, 210-12).

Because the gods were conceived as part of nature, there was always the temptation to control and manipulate the gods and the messages that were divined. However, in this worldview larger independent forces were above the gods. To counter these, both humans and gods would resort to magical incantations and spells (Kaufmann, 40-42; Van Dam, 122).

The prophetic outlook was completely different. Israel's *God is the only God. He is not part of the natural world; rather, he created it and is above it (Is 42:5; 45:18). He cannot be manipulated, for he is sovereign and in complete control. He determines the future (Is 14:24-27). There is no point in seeking omens by divination (cf. Is 47:12-15; Mic 3:6-7). Indeed, God frustrates the omens of diviners (Is 44:25). He is the one who directs the history of Israel and the nations (Is 45:1-7; Jer 32:17-23). There is no power or force above him. Therefore, to pay respects to Fortune (gad) or Destiny (mēnī) is to forsake Yahweh (Is 65:11). Not surprisingly, the prophets condemned all forms of divination and magic (cf. Deut 18:10-11).

Besides the general prohibitions, the prophets also condemned specific methods of divination. Jeremiah strongly denounced dreams conjured up by false prophets to spread lies (seger [Jer 23:25-28; 27:9-10; 29:8-9]). Such abuse, however, did not prevent Yahweh as sovereign God from using dreams that he sent to give his revelation to Nebuchadnezzar. But, Babylon's wise men, enchanters, magicians and diviners were powerless and unable to provide the interpretation. God had to reveal that to his prophet Daniel (Dan 2; 4).

With regard to astrology, there was no need for Israel "to be dismayed by the signs of the heavens" (Jer 10:2; cf. Jer 10:6-7, 11-13), since God created the heavenly bodies (Is 40:26; Jer 31:35; Amos 5:8). Being enamored with astrology included worshiping the heavenly bodies as astral deities, a practice that God strictly forbade (Deut 4:19). Thus, the reforming king Josiah had ordered the removal from the temple of all the vessels made for "all the host of heaven" (kōl šēbā' haššāmāyīm) and deposed the priests who had burnt incense to "the sun, the moon and the constellations and all the host of the heaven" (2 Kings 23:4-5; cf. Deut 4:19; 17:2-7; Jer 8:1-2; Ezek 8:16). Both the northern and southern kingdoms were severely punished because of such worship (2 Kings 17:16-18; Jer 8:2; 19:13). The futility of depending on astrology is evident in Isaiah's taunting Babylon to let their astrologers come forward to save them (Is 47:13).

In opposing necromancy (cf. Deut 18:11), Isaiah tellingly asked, "When men tell you to consult mediums and spiritists, who whisper and mutter, should not a people inquire of their God? Why consult the dead on behalf of the living?" (Is 8:19). Because God is the living God, they should go to him.

When it came to the practice of magic, God served notice that he would judge his people because of it and remove sorceries from them (Mic 5:12; Mal 3:5). Also, Nineveh stood condemned in part because of its sorceries (Nah 3:1-4). To be sure, magic was ineffective (Is 47:9, 12), for God is sovereign and can overcome magic (cf. Jer 8:17). It is noteworthy that Nebuchadnezzar found God-fearing Daniel and his three friends ten times wiser and more understanding than the magicians and conjurers of his kingdom (Dan 1:20).

4. Theological Implications.

God's revelation of himself as the only God, who is above and sovereign over all creation, undergirded his prophets' prohibition of divination and magic. These were mere human attempts to get hidden information from gods of their own making and to influence the course of events. In biblical religion, the living God came to humans and revealed himself and his will. Although God forbade the seeking of divine knowledge by way of divination as practiced in the nations, God did accommodate himself to the human desire to inquire of God and permitted the use of the lot (Prov 16:33), the Urim and Thummim (Ex 28:30; Num 27:21) and the inquiry of God through the prophets (2 Kings 3:10-20; Jer 21:2; Ezek 20:1-3) in order to determine the divine will or knowledge.

The Prophetic Books clearly distinguish prophecy from divination. It is, therefore, not helpful to characterize canonical prophecy as a type of divination, as is becoming more common today (see Kitz). False prophecy, on the other hand, is associated with divination (Heb root qsm) and is characterized as a human endeavor (Is 44:25; Jer 14:14; 27:9; 29:8 Ezek 13:6-9; 22:28; Mic 3:5-7, 11). The root qsm is never used of true prophets.

By forbidding divination, Yahweh wanted to encourage his people to rely on his word. Significantly, Isaiah told Israel to go to the living God rather than to mediums and spiritists, and he enjoined, "To the law and to the testimony! If they do not speak according to this word, it is because they have no dawn" (Is 8:20; cf. Is 45:19). The people were to turn to the word and to the prophets, who had been promised to bring that word (cf. Deut 18:15 in context). The divine word was to show the way for God's people. God esteemed the one "who is humble and contrite in spirit, and trembles at my word" (Is 66:2).

See also ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN PROPHECY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. S. A. L. Butler, Mesopotamian Conceptions of Dreams and Dream Rituals (AOAT 258; Münster: Ugarit-Verlag, 1998); F. H. Cryer, Divination in Ancient Israel and Its Near Eastern Environment: A Socio-Historical Investigation (JSOTSup 142; Sheffield: JSOT, 1994); A. Jeffers, Magic and Divination in Ancient Palestine and Syria (SHCANE 8; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1996); P. S. Johnston, Shades of Sheol: Death and Afterlife in the Old Testament (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2003); Y. Kaufmann, The Religion of Israel from Its Beginnings to the Babylonian Exile (trans. M. Greenberg; New York: Schocken, 1972); A. M. Kitz, "Prophecy as Divination," CBQ 65 (2003) 22-42; A. A. Macintosh, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Hosea (ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1997); A. L. Oppenheim, Ancient Mesopotamia: Portrait of a Dead Civilization (rev. ed., completed by E. Reiner; Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1977); idem, The Interpretation of Dreams in the Ancient Near East (repr., Piscataway, NJ: Gorgias, 2008 [1956]); R. K. Ritner, "Necromancy in Ancient Egypt," in Magic and Divination in the Ancient World, ed.

L. Ciruolo and J. Seidel (AMD 2; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2002) 89-96; F. Rochberg-Halton, "Astrology in the Ancient Near East," ABD 1.504-7; A. Rofé, "'No Ephod or Teraphim'—oude hieratie oude delōn: Hosea 3:4 in the LXX and in the Paraphrases of the Chronicles and the Damascus Document," in Sefer Moshe: The Moshe Weinfeld Jubilee Volume, ed. C. Cohen, A. Hurvitz and S. M. Paul (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2004) 135-49; B. B. Schmidt, Israel's Beneficent Dead: Ancestor Cult and Necromancy in Ancient Israelite Religion and Tradition (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1996); C. Van Dam, The Urim and Thummim: A Means of Revelation in Ancient Israel (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1997); K. Van der Toorn, "The Nature of the Biblical Teraphim in the Light of the Cuneiform Evidence," CBQ 52 (1990) 203-22.

C. Van Dam

DIVINE ASSEMBLY. See DIVINE COUNCIL.

DIVINE COUNCIL

The term divine council is used broadly by Hebrew Bible scholars to refer to the "heavenly host," the pantheon of divine beings who administer the affairs of the cosmos (Handy; Mullen 1980; ABD 2:214-17). All ancient Mediterranean cultures had some conception of a divine council. The Hebrew Bible describes a divine council under the authority of Yahweh, the God of Israel. While the divine council of Israel and its neighbors share significant features, the divine council of Israelite religion was distinct in important ways. This article briefly summarizes the more important aspects of the divine council in the Hebrew Bible and its relationship to the prophetic office (see further Heiser, DOTWPW 112-16; 2008).

1. Foundational Passages and Vocabulary
2. Prophets and the Divine Council
3. The Divine Council as Divine Warriors in the Prophets

1. Foundational Passages and Vocabulary.

1.1. Vocabulary for the Council. Understanding the relationship of the heavenly council and the prophets requires an acquaintance with certain key passages and vocabulary. Psalm 82 is an essential text for understanding the Israelite divine council. The psalm contains an explicit reference to a divine assembly under the authority of God ('elōhīm) along with a subsequent plural use of the word ʾelōhīm (“God, gods”): “God [ʾelōhīm] stands in the divine council [baʿadat-ʾēl]; among the gods [ʾelōhīm] he passes judgment” (Ps 82:1). The second occurrence of ʾelōhīm certainly is plural, as the preposition “in the midst of” (bēqereb) precedes the term. The Trinity cannot explain this plurality, since the psalm goes on to describe how God charges the other ʾelōhīm with corruption and sentences them to die “like humankind.” Psalm 89:5-7 also places the God of Israel “in the assembly of the holy ones” (biḥal qēdōšīm) and then asks, “For who in the clouds can be compared to Yahweh? Who is like Yahweh among the sons of God [bēnē ʾēlīm], a god greatly feared in the council [sōd] of the holy ones?” These passages clearly depict a heavenly council (“in the clouds”) and not, as some scholars suggest, a council of earthly human judges. The concept of a council does not conflict with the notion that its head, Yahweh, is a triune being, nor does it impinge on monotheism, since the Israelite understanding of the council saw Yahweh as a unique, incomparable deity who was the creator of the heavenly host and its unquestioned sovereign (Heiser 2008).

1.2. Vocabulary for the Divine Abode/Throne Room. The vocabulary describing the divine abode and the council meeting place found in the Hebrew Bible corresponds very closely to vocabulary in ancient Near Eastern literature cognate to the Hebrew Bible (Clifford; Heiser, DOTWPW 112-16). For example, in the literature of the city-state of Ugarit, the divine council and its gods met on a cosmic mountain. The high god El dwelt on this mountain, which also was described as a well-watered garden. With his council, El issued divine decrees from his “tent” and “tent shrine” (CTA 1.III.26ff.). The Ugaritic god Baal, the deity who oversaw the council for El, held meetings in the “heights” of Mount Šapānu, governing from his palace of lapis lazuli, whose courtyard was fashioned with “paved bricks.”

These descriptions are present in the Hebrew Bible with respect to Israel’s God and his council. Yahweh dwells on mountains (Sinai or Zion [e.g., Ex 34:26; 1 Kings 8:10; Ps 48:1-2]). The Jerusalem *temple and *Zion are said to be located in the “heights” of the šāpōn (“the north” [Ps 48:1-2; Is 14:13]). Additionally, Mount Zion is described as a watery habitation (Is 33:20-22; Ezek 47:1-12; Joel 3:18; Zech 14:8), much in the fashion of the garden of Eden (Gen 2:6-15), called the “garden of God,” and the “holy mountain of God” in Ezekiel 28:13-16. At Sinai Moses and others saw Yahweh and feasted with him at a banquet. The account in Exodus 24 notes that under God’s feet was a paved construction of “sapphire stone” (Ex 24:10). Other striking parallels include Yahweh’s frequent presence in the tabernacle tent and the description of Zion as Yahweh’s tent (Ps 26:8; 74:7; 1 Chron 9:23; Is 33:20). That the members of Yahweh’s host are present in his abode or throne room is indicated by the presence of the heavenly host at Sinai (Deut 33:1-2; cf. Acts 7:53; Gal 3:19), the presence of “thrones” (plural) and a “court” before the enthroned Ancient of Days in Daniel 7:1-10, and divine council sessions found elsewhere (1 Kings 22:19; cf. 2 Chron 18:18). Yahweh’s “location” and the presence of the council were therefore inseparable in terms of Israel’s “cosmic geography,” similar to our familiar conception of God and his *angels living in the same place. The throne room of God was where God held court with his servant council.

2. Prophets and the Divine Council.

2.1. The Divine Council as Witness to God’s Decrees and Acts. The divine throne room is the place from which Yahweh governs the world with his heavenly council, the place where “Yahweh’s decrees directing the human community and the divine world are set forth and through whom they are communicated or enacted” (Miller 2000, 426).

The most transparent example of this interaction is 1 Kings 22:13-23. The prophet Micaiah ben Imlah, summoned to prophesy about an alliance between Jehoshaphat and Ahab and the fate of their planned assault on Ramoth-gilead, tells Ahab, “I saw the LORD sitting on his throne, and all the host of heaven standing beside him on his right hand and on his left; and the LORD said, ‘Who will entice Ahab, that he may go up and fall at Ramoth-gilead?’” (1 Kings 22:19-20). The narrative continues with Micaiah describing the spirits of the heavenly host deliberating with one another about how to accomplish Yahweh’s decree.

The council therefore has the important role of bearing witness to God’s decrees and acts. Not surprisingly, this notion is common outside the Hebrew Bible in cognate divine council descriptions (Bokovy). Amos 3 describes the Lord's intention to punish Israel. In Amos 3:7 we read that "the Lord God does nothing without revealing his council/counsel [sôd] to the prophets." This declaration is followed by two plural imperatives in Amos 3:10 ("Proclaim to the strongholds . . . and say . . .") and Amos 3:13 ("Hear and testify against the house of Jacob, declares the Lord God, the God of hosts"). Again Israel and Judah are not the recipient of the commands, creating the distinct possibility that the divine council is called upon to witness the judgment meted out by the Lord (Bokovy).

2.2. Prophetic Commissioning and the Divine Council: Precursors to the Classical Prophets. Broadening the conception of a prophet to someone who serves as the righteous spokesperson for God allows one to appreciate the motif of a direct divine encounter-commission in the lives of many biblical figures singled out for service to God prior to the period of the classical prophets.

The motif of a divine encounter is applied to the first man, Adam, whom God appointed as ruling steward over Eden, the well-watered garden and mountain of God (Gen 2:6-15; Ezek 28:13-16), the abode of God and his council. Proceeding from Adam, Enoch and Noah "walked with God" (Gen 5:22, 24; 6:9). The former "prophesied," according to Jude 14-15, while the latter is referred to as a "herald of righteousness" (2 Pet 2:5) who told his contemporaries of the coming flood, warning them of God's judgment (1 Pet. 3:20).

The theophanic encounters of the patriarchs are well known. Genesis 12:1-7 and Genesis 15:1-6 record God's appearance to Abraham, calling him out of paganism to father a people for God, a people who would serve as mediators between the Gentile nations and the true God. That this account was visible is suggested by the language of manifestation in Genesis 15:1 and in Acts 7:2-4, where Stephen notes that the glory of Lord "appeared" to Abraham before he journeyed to Haran. Yahweh likewise appeared to Isaac (Gen 26:1-5) and Jacob (Gen 28:10-22; 31:11-13; 32:22-32; cf. Hos 12:3-4). Later in the story of Israel, Moses was commissioned at the burning bush (Ex 3:1-15) and encountered God subsequently many times (e.g., Ex 19:16—20:21; 24:9-18; 33:7-11). The elders of Israel under Moses were commissioned directly by Yahweh (Num 11:24-25), as was Joshua (Deut 31:14-23; Josh 5:13-15). Various judges of Israel, leading up to the time of the classical prophets, also met Yahweh when they were called to ministry. The book of Judges records a dramatic appearance to Gideon (Judg 6), an event that the writer notes took place "under the terebinth at Ophrah" (Judg 6:11, 19). The reference to the terebinth is of interest, as trees often marked places where Yahweh had appeared to people such as Abraham (Gen 12:6; 13:18; 14:13; 18:1) (Nielsen, DDD 637, 851). The prophetess Deborah (Judg 4:4) also apparently received messages from the Lord under "the Palm of Deborah" (Judg 4:4-5). The "word" of the Lord "appeared" to Samuel, the last of Israel's judges, as a boy, "standing" before him to inform him of Eli's fate (1 Sam 3). This theophanic manifestation apparently occurred with some regularity to Samuel (1 Sam 3:20-21).

2.3. Prophetic Commissioning and the Divine Council: The Classical Prophets. The popular conception of a prophet is of someone empowered by God to foretell the future. But in fact, the forecasting of future events was an infrequent part of a prophet's ministry. To speak prophetically in the biblical sense meant simply to be a spokesperson for God, to serve as God's mouthpiece to his covenant people, Israel, and to their enemies. In biblical literature, God chose prophets and commissioned them for such ministry (see Call/Commission Narratives). This commissioning took the form of a direct encounter with God in connection with the divine council (Kingsbury; Nissinen).

The call of Isaiah, described in the book that bears his name, is no doubt the most familiar instance of prophetic commissioning in God's throne room (Is 6:1-9). The scene is quite reminiscent of 1 Kings 22:19-23, where Yahweh met with his council concerning the wicked King Ahab. Having decreed Ahab's death, Yahweh allows council members to suggest the means for the execution of the decree. In the case of Isaiah, after the prophet is purified for God's presence (Is 6:6-7), Yahweh asks the council, "Whom shall I send, and who will go for us?" (Is 6:8). Isaiah immediately volunteers. The reader then learns that Yahweh has already decreed that his people will be judged, but he tells the prophet to preach "until the cities lie waste . . . and the land is a desolate waste." The council appears again in Isaiah 40, though its presence is hard to detect in English translations. The council's presence is indicated primarily by the presence of plural imperatives whereby God commands an unidentified group in a context that rules out a human audience (Cross). For example, in Isaiah 40:1-2 we read, "Comfort, comfort my people, says your God." The two imperatives "comfort" are grammatically plural in Hebrew, as are the ensuing commands "Speak tenderly to Jerusalem and cry to her." To whom are these commands intended for response? The answer cannot be Jerusalem or Israel, for they are the objects of the commands. For this and other contextual reasons, many scholars argue that the divine council is the audience (Cross; Seitz). Whereas in Isaiah 6 punishment was decreed, this time Yahweh and his council pronounce deliverance from *exile.

Ezekiel likewise receives his mission directive before the throne of God. Unlike Isaiah, who was brought to the throne, this time the throne of the Lord comes to the prophet in a vision by the river Chebar (Ezek 1:1-14, 26-28; 10:1). The description utilizes vocabulary familiar to Yahweh's appearances at Sinai (Ex 19:16-18; 20:18; 24:9-11, 17; Deut 4:36) (Miller 1965) and the throne room description of the divine council meeting in Daniel (Dan 7:9-10). The enthroned Yahweh commands Ezekiel to stand and receive his commission (Ezek 2:1-3) to a defeated but still rebellious people (Ezek 2:4-7).

Like Isaiah and Ezekiel, the prophet Jeremiah was commissioned in a direct encounter with God. In Jeremiah 1 we read that at the beginning of the prophet's ministry the "word of the LORD" came to him (Jer 1:4) to appoint him a prophet. The theophany becomes even more dramatic as the passage continues, where the "word" is identified as Yahweh (Jer 1:6-7), who has come in human corporeal form, reaching out his hand to touch Jeremiah's mouth (Jer 1:9). This dramatic call legitimized Jeremiah's status as a prophet. Jeremiah 23 reveals that God judges a prophet false who has never "stood in the council of the LORD" (Jer 23:16, 18). The Lord declares of false prophets, "If they had stood in my council, then they would have proclaimed my words to my people, and they would have turned them from their evil way, and from the evil of their deeds" (Jer 23:22). The implication is clear: true prophets have appeared before the divine council, whereas false prophets have not.

3. The Divine Council as Divine Warriors in the Prophets.

Prophetic declarations of eschatological holy *war also involve the divine council (Miller 1968). The divine council (along with human warriors) forms a cosmic army on the Day of the Lord in the writings of the prophets (Is 13:1-8; Joel 3:11-12; Zech 14:1-5). This language is in turn drawing upon other material in the Hebrew Bible that casts the divine council as an army (Deut 33:1-5; 2 Kings 6:15-17; Ps 68:16-17). This context also adds nuance to the common title for Israel's God, "Lord of hosts," for "host" (šābā') is a word used frequently in the Hebrew Bible for a military force (e.g., 2 Sam 3:23; Ps 108:12).

See also ANGELS, MESSENGERS, HEAVENLY BEINGS; CALL/COMMISSION NARRATIVES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. E. Bokov, "Invoking the Council as Witnesses in Amos 3:13," JBL 127 (2008) 37-51; R. Clifford, The Cosmic Mountain in Canaan and the Old Testament (HSM 4; Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1972); F. M. Cross, "The Council of Yahweh in Second Isaiah," JNES 12 (1953) 274-77; L. Handy, Among the Host of Heaven: The Syro-Palestinian Pantheon as Bureaucracy (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1994); M. S. Heiser, "Divine Council," DOTWPW 112-16; idem, "Monotheism, Polytheism, Monolatry, or Henotheism? Toward an Assessment of Divine Plurality in the Hebrew Bible" BBR 18 (2008) 1-30; E. Kingsbury, "The Prophets and the Council of Yahweh," JBL 83 (1964) 279-86; P. D. Miller, "Fire in the Mythology of Canaan and Israel," CBQ 27 (1965) 256-61; idem, "The Divine Council and the Prophetic Call to War," VT 18 (1968) 100-107; idem, "Cosmology and World Order in the Old Testament: The Divine Council as Cosmic-Political Symbol," in Israelite Religion and Biblical Theology: Collected Essays (JSOT-Sup 267; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 2000), 422-44; E. T. Mullen Jr., The Divine Council in Canaanite and Early Hebrew Literature (HSM 24; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1980); idem, "Divine Assembly," ABD 2:214-17; K. Nielsen, "Oak," DDD 637; idem, "Terebinth," DDD 851; M. Nissinen, "Prophets and the Divine Council," in Kein Land für sich allein: Studien zum Kulturkontakt in Kanaan, Israel/Palästina und Ebir-nari für Manfred Weippert zum 65. Geburtstag, ed. U. Hübner and E. Knauf (OBO 186; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2002) 4-19; C. R. Seitz,

"The Divine Council: Temporal Transition and New Prophecy in the Book of Isaiah," JBL 109 (1990) 229-47.

M. S. Heiser

DIVINE PRESENCE

Each section of the Hebrew Bible alludes to the divine presence, that aspect of deity that R. Otto calls the mysterium tremendum et fascinans (Otto, 12-41). Whether defined as the object causing the numinous experience (Tracy, 174-76) or the numinous experience itself (Otto, 12-35), the divine presence in the Pentateuch engages a number of characters (Terrien, 63-160), while the Writings abstractly reflect on it in the lyrical (Ps 10:1; 18:1-3), lament (Lam 1:2, 21), apocalyptic (Dan 9:20) and wisdom traditions (Job 28; Prov 8). Whereas an earlier generation claims that no deity but Yahweh deliberately "hides himself" (mistattēr [Is 45:15]) (Miskotte, 267), contemporary readers counter that a growing mass of literary evidence, combined with a growing appreciation for the peculiarities distinguishing the methods used by historians versus theologians, nullifies such a claim (Podella, 33-70; Kutsko, 157-69; Burnett, 2). Aware of these developments, the following survey lists some of the more prominent ways in which the presence-absence polarity operates within the Prophets.

1. Imag(in)ing the Divine Presence
2. Prophetic Encounters with the Divine Presence
3. Summary

1. Imag(in)ing the Divine Presence.

Most references to "the presence" in English Bibles derive from translations of the Hebrew noun pānīm (plurale tantum), both in its nominal as well as its prepositional formulations (Simian-Yofre, 608-14). Cognate usage occurs in Ugaritic (pnm [CAT 1.2 iii 4]), Moabite (lpny kmš, "Chemosh's presence" [KAI 181:13, 18]), Akkadian (panū [pl.], the moon-god Sin's "presence," [Erra Epic 2C:15]), Aramaic (pnh [DNWSI 918]), Phoenician (lpnm [KAI 26A ii 4]), Punic (pn b'l, "countenance of Baal," referring to the goddess Tannit [KAI 78:2]) and Qumranian Hebrew texts (lpnwhy [1QS 6:26]), so the fact that similar parameters envelop the semantic possibilities of Hebrew pānīm comes as no surprise (HAL 887-90).

Overlapping the semantic field of Hebrew pānīm stands the semantic field of Hebrew kābōd

("to honor, glorify") and its nominal derivative kābōd ("glory, honor") (Weinfeld, 27-37). Akkadian cognates appear in the Creation Epic to describe Marduk as greatly "honored" among the gods (kabātu [Enuma Elish 4:3, 5]), and ancient Near Eastern scribes often depict their deities (and the monarchs representing them) with crowned heads radiating fiery "auras" (Akk melammū). The moon-god Sin, for example, wears such an aura (KAR 69:22), as does the war-god Assur (CAD "M/2:10") and the scorpion monsters confronting Gilgamesh (Epic of Gilgamesh 9:44). It also appears in the Canaanite glosses from Amarna animating mayor Biridiya's complaint that Pharaoh "honors" (kabādu) those of his neighbors who maliciously treat him, Pharaoh's loyal servant, with contempt (EA 245:39). Similarly, Hebrew kābōd describes the terrifying glory and awesome majesty of Yahweh's divine presence (Weinfeld, 29).

2. Prophetic Encounters with the Divine Presence.

2.1. Moses. Following the spectacular theophanic events on Mount Sinai (Ex 20-33), Moses' face radiates a supernatural aura of its own as he descends the mountain to begin leading the Hebrews on a prolonged trek through the wilderness, an idyllic time (Ps 105; Jer 2:1-3; Hos 2:14-15) in which "prophetic revelations" (Knohl, 74) occur to him in a "tent of meeting" ('ohel mō'ēd) through "face to face" (pānīm 'el-pānīm) encounters (Ex 33:11). Portrayed as the "ideal mediatorial figure" (Orlov, 184) (see Deut 18:15), Moses participates in the first of these encounters, in Exodus 33:13-20, as follows (see Seebass, 328-30):

Moses: "If I have found favor in your sight, let me know your ways, so that I may (continue to) know you."

God: "My presence [pānāy] will walk [pl., yēlēkū; LXX adds 'before you']. . ."

Moses: "If your presence [pānēkā] does not walk [pl., hōlēkīm], . . . how will it be known whether I have found favor? . . ."

God: "All right, I will do this thing you ask. . ."

Moses: "Please, let me see your glory [kēbōdekā]."

God: "My goodness [tūbī] will pass before you. . . But you cannot see my presence [pānāy]."

Several things occur in this paradigmatic encounter, not least the prophet's demand that the wilderness trek be aborted until or unless the divine presence promises to provide it with hands-on leadership, not through angelic (or any other) mediation, but directly through “his presence” (pānāyw [Deut 4:37]) (Knapp, 108). All future prophetic encounters tend to refer, in varying degrees, to this paradigmatic encounter of Moses with the divine presence in the wilderness.

2.2. Samuel. Entering Canaan, the Hebrews continue following the divine presence hovering over the tabernacle (cloud by day, pillar of fire by night), but not to the indigenously Canaanite “high places” (bāmôt). Extending the space provided within the original “tent of meeting,” the divine presence soon comes to inhabit another “place” (māqôm), one specially designed to house the Name (Deut 12:5-18), the “tabernacle” (miškān [Ex 25:9]) (Langer, 21-23; Weinfeld, 36-37), followed by the *temple (1 Kings 8:1-13) (Moore 2003, 233-37). Because of the ubiquitous temptation to *idolatry, all Hebrew cultic activity—feasting, fasting, tithing, Levitical benevolence—is carefully delimited to this firmly boundaried “place” (Deut 14:23; 15:20; 16:11; 18:7), cemented in Deuteronomy via name-dwelling formulae like those inscribed on Mesopotamian monuments (Richter, 204-6).

Unlike Moses, Samuel does not engage the divine presence visually. According to 1 Samuel 3:1, visions have become “rare” (yāqār [i.e., they no longer “break through,” niprās]). Instead, the primary channel for prophetic communication becomes the divine voice (1 Sam 3:1-10), thereby confirming and conforming to the polarity generally presumed throughout the prophetic corpus: northern prophets tend to receive auditions, while southern prophets tend to experience *visions (Wilson, 135-296). Later, when Samuel calls “all Israel” to a cultic ceremony at Mizpah involving communal fasting and the pouring out of water, the text explicitly locates this activity “in the presence” (1 Sam 7:6). Ascertaining by lottery the identity of the first Hebrew king, Samuel then writes down the “kingship laws” (mišpaṭ hammēlukā) and deposits them in a safe place “in Yahweh’s presence” (lipnē yhw [the ark of the covenant?]) before anointing Saul king (1 Sam 10:25; 11:15). Fleeing for their lives, David and his men eat the “bread of the Presence” (leḥem happānīm) at a Yahweh shrine in a small village while fleeing the wrath of this Hebrew king (1 Sam 21:6).

2.3. Elijah. Like the Mosaic “tent of meeting” and tabernacle, Solomon’s temple provides another holy “place” for the divine presence to encounter the Hebrews on a regular basis. On the day of the temple’s inauguration, in fact, another wilderness-like cloud appears, a nimbus so opaque that the priests in the temple cannot see well enough to perform their duties (1 Kings 8:11). When Elijah takes on the Baal priests, the divine presence descends on Mount Carmel to support him via another wilderness symbol, a column of heavenly fire (Ps 50:3). Later, a number of meteorological disturbances occur before Elijah on Mount Horeb (1 Kings 18–19) before a heavenly chariot descends to carry him off into the heavens (2 Kings 2:11) (Moore 2003, 97-102; 279-84; Tabor, 92).

2.4. Isaiah. After Israel splits into “two nations under God,” Judah’s predilection to divorce laissez-faire worship from *covenant ethics soon causes Yahweh to ask, “When you come to see my Presence [lērā’ôt pānāy], who seeks this from your hand?” (Is 1:12). The demonstrative pronoun in this question refers to the plethora of butchered animals, exotic incense and pagan rituals to which so many Judahites have addicted themselves in lieu of covenant justice (Is 1:10-17). Such behavior makes the Presence so “weary” that he soon finds himself “averting my eyes” and “closing my ears,” even when his children cry and plead and scream for help (Is 1:14-15).

The call narrative in Isaiah preserves one of the clearest depictions of the Presence in the entire Bible (Is 6:1-5). Unlike the Ephraimite Samuel’s prophetic encounter with the divine voice, the southern prophet Isaiah sees something (Wilson, 135-296). Unlike Moses’ vision of the divine “back,” the vision that Isaiah sees is of a Being so huge that just the hem of his robe “fills” (mēle’im) the temple (Is 6:1), though, as with the Mosaic theophany, the specific contours are carefully and strategically “occluded” (yēkasseh pānāyw) (Is 6:2 [Lxx pl., katekalypton]) by strange winged creatures (šērāpīm) whose function may be modeled after creatures and characterizations preserved in much older Canaanite texts (Day, 149-51). Isaiah’s inaugural vision intertextually parallels Ezekiel’s vision at the river Chebar (Ezek 1:1–2:10), but attempts to make it parallel Elijah’s heavenly ascent are considerably less certain (pace Tabor, 92).

More convincing are the intratextual paral-els generated by the oracles of comfort and renewal in Isaiah 40—55, especially those alluding to the “wilderness sojourn” in Isaiah 40—44 (Westermann, 29-41; Evans, 49). Identifying Israel as a “light to the nations” (Is 42:7), Yahweh assures his servant (Is 42:1) that the glory responsible for radiating this light is of divine origin and is available to no nation other than Israel (Is 42:8, repeated verbatim in Is 48:11). To a postexilic audience struggling to understand its newly reinforced, overtly missional identity, this evidently needs stating and restating (see, e.g., Is 58:8). Even when “thick darkness” covers the earth, Israel’s light shines so brightly that it cannot be dimmed. The divine glory is simply too powerful to allow this to happen (Is 60:1-2). Having spent decades in Gentile captivity, newly freed Israel’s challenge is to reflect this glory in ways that can heal the broken, enable the poor, and liberate the imprisoned (Is 61:3).

Reprising the wilderness experience, Isaiah foretells a time when Jerusalem will be cleansed by fire, after which the divine glory will become manifest through yet another cloud, this one over Mount Zion (Is 24:23). This cloud is to be protected by a “covering” described in Isaiah 4:5-6 by four synonymous terms: huppâ (“canopy”), sukkâ (“pavilion”), šēl (“shade”) and maḥseh (“refuge”) (see Evans, 48-50). Each of these nouns has roots in the bedrock of the Hebrew wilderness tradition (Frankel, 31-37; Moore 2009, 189-92), yet beyond its appearance to Judah (Is 2:19-21), the “Presence of Yahweh’s terror” (pēnē paḥad yhw̄h [Is 2:10]) will appear to Tyre (Is 23:18) as well as Egypt (Is 19:16-17). With these promises Isaiah broadens and redefines the character of the Presence, not only in terms of comfort and protection, but also in categories involving the use of terror and “trembling” (rāgaz [Is 64:2; cf. Jer 5:22]) (Muntingh, 157-58).

2.5. Jeremiah. Like Kings, the book of Jeremiah focuses attention on the divine assembly as a holy place to which only true prophets have access (see Divine Council). Whereas Micaiah ben Imlah narrates the inner workings of this assembly from the perspective of an eyewitness (1 Kings 22:15-28) (Moore 2003, 126-31), Jeremiah categorically asserts that false prophets, by definition, are charlatans without access to the divine assembly (Jer 23:16-18). The Book of Consolation (Jer 30—33) elaborates this by listing a number of divine promises, one formulated in the binary language of legal analogy: (1) as surely as the sun, moon and stars are “fixed orders” (huqqot, a term used to describe “legal statutes” in Ex 12:14, 17; Ezek 44:5 [see HAL 333]) in the cosmos, so (2) Israel stands as a “nation in my Presence” (gôy lēpānay, Jer 31:35-36). The conclusion to the Book of Consolation reinforces this analogy through repetition: (1) just as surely as “my covenant” establishes “day and night” as “fixed orders” (huqqot), so (2) it is impossible for the Presence to reject his people or fail to restore their fortunes (Jer 33:10-25). How this will occur, exactly, is postponed until Ezekiel lays out the schematic blueprints of the new temple (Ezek 40—48), but to refugees weary of foreign laws and foreign customs, assurances like this go a long way toward aiding the process of identity reformation, not to mention the reclamation of political, socioeconomic and religious confidence. Thus, Jeremiah not only “addresses survivors for whom disaster has become a permanent reality,” he also “offers grounds for reconstituting the character of the (returning Jewish) community” (O’Connor, 88).

2.6. Ezekiel and Habakkuk. Whereas Moses comes closer than most other prophets to experiencing the fullness of the divine presence, Ezekiel comes closest to feeling the full force of the divine absence. Jeremiah partially feels this absence in his laments, especially those preserved in Jeremiah 17—20 (Diamond, 140-44), but Ezekiel experiences the shock of seeing the divine glory rise up and leave the temple (Ezek 10:18-22) (Weinfeld, 27-33). Whereas Jonah flees the divine presence for a little while (Jon 1:3, 10), Ezekiel not only watches it spectacularly arrive (Ezek 1:1-28), he also watches it spectacularly leave. Why does it leave? Because the divine presence cannot cohabit a “place” completely filled with “idols” (Ezek 6:4-6; 14:3-7 [“idols” are always gillūlim in Ezekiel, never ’ēlōhīm]). Thus, since the divine presence cannot dwell in the midst of other “presences,” absence, by default, becomes the only option (Kutsko, 25-76). Nevertheless, in spite of all this, Ezekiel dares to dream of a day when the divine glory will return and bring Israel back to life like fresh water in dry desert (Ezek 43:4; 47:1-12), a day when all discourse about the returning glory will resonate with “God himself dwelling in the Temple, expressed in such a way that his transcendence is safeguarded" (Cody, 220).

That the prophets would so readily agree with Habakkuk's catchphrase ("Yahweh is in his holy temple; let all the earth keep silence before him" [Hab 2:20]) might at first glance seem more than a little incongruous. After all, many cultures view prophecy as something peripheral to the concerns of central institutions such as temple cults (Wilson, 32-42). Yet peripheral intermediaries sometimes gravitate toward the center, and this tends to cause varying degrees of ambivalence between prophets and priests. Ezekiel is a classic example of this ambivalence (Wilson, 282-86).

2.7. Haggai and Zechariah. The book of Haggai opens with pointed descriptions of the contemptuous attitudes adopted by many returned exiles with regard to the prospect of rebuilding the Jerusalem temple. Evidently, many of these refugees have come to believe that the divine glory has forever abandoned them, never to return. This would explain why so many begin to think that the temple should not be rebuilt, and that what might be rebuilt will doubtless be embarrassingly insignificant. Haggai forthrightly challenges these objections by repeatedly voicing the determination of the divine presence in their midst: "I am with you" (Hag 1:13; 2:4), and "My spirit abides among you" (Hag 2:5). The effect of these reassurances translates into an immediate increase in motivation among many of these refugees, albeit without eliminating all of their detractors (Neh 4:1-23) (Assis, 582-96).

To those who doubt the whereabouts of the divine presence, the prophet Zechariah observes in his first night vision a decision on Yahweh's behalf to "return to Jerusalem" and "build a house" (Zech 1:16). Each of the following night visions corroborates this intention. Four blacksmiths rise up to pulverize the four horns responsible for expelling Judah from the land (Zech 1:18-21). A man with a measuring line discovers so much life in the new Jerusalem that the only "wall" large enough to protect it is the glory of Yahweh himself (Zech 2:5). Should the high priest Joshua behave appropriately, Yahweh promises to grant "rights of passage" (mahlēkim [the same term as in Ezek 42:4]) inside the precincts of the new temple (Zech 3:7). Two olive trees representing the political and religious arms of Israel's new government will faithfully communicate Yahweh's intentions. The terrifying side of the divine presence also makes itself known, first as a flying scroll whose mission is to "abide" in the houses of liars and thieves until they are consumed, then as a woman in a basket (named "Wickedness") who is taken to Babylon and deposited there in her own "house." Finally, four chariots pulled by four horses will continue to patrol the earth in order to "set my spirit at rest" (Zech 6:8).

3. Summary.

Powerful as it may be, the Hebrew concept of divine absence does not identically overlap the Christian concept of deus absconditus, especially as the latter is articulated in the writings of the medieval reformer Martin Luther. Whereas the OT concept presupposes the Deity's unwillingness to be present in the midst of other "presences" (Kutsko, 151), the NT concept presupposes the power of the presence at the cross, the only point on the Christian spatiotemporal continuum where the deus absconditus and the deus revelatus mysteriously intersect (Kattenbusch, 204). Whereas the latter grounds itself in the mystery of vicarious messianic atonement, the former grounds itself in the bond of eternal covenant (bērit 'ōlām) (Polaski, 143-45), a theological idea in which eternal abandonment is not just impossible, but inconceivable.

See also GOD; IDOLS, IDOLATRY, GODS; SPIRIT OF YAHWEH; TEMPLE; WORSHIP.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. E. Assis, "A Disputed Temple (Haggai 2,1-9)," ZAW 120 (2008) 582-96; J. S. Burnett, Where Is God? Divine Absence in the Hebrew Bible (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2010); A. Cody, Ezekiel: With an Excursus on Old Testament Priesthood (OTMes 11; Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier, 1984); J. Day, "Echoes of Baal's Seven Thunders and Lightnings in Psalm 29 and Habakkuk 3:9 and the Identity of the Seraphim in Isaiah 6," VT 29 (1979) 143-51; A. R. Diamond, The Confessions of Jeremiah in Context: Scenes of Prophetic Drama (JSOTSup 45; Sheffield: JSOT, 1987); C. A. Evans, "Jesus, John, and the Dead Sea Scrolls: Assessing Typologies of Restoration," in Christian Beginnings and the Dead Sea Scrolls, ed. J. J. Collins and C. A. Evans (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2006) 45-62; D. Frankel, "Two Priestly Conceptions of Guidance in the Wilderness," JSOT 81 (1998) 31-37; F. Kattenbusch, "Deus Absconditus bei Luther," in Festgabe für D. Dr. Julius Kaftan zu seinem 70. Geburtstag (Tübingen: Mohr, 1920) 170-214; D. Knapp, Deuteronomium 4: Literarische Analyse und theologische Interpretation (GTA 35; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1987); I. Knohl, "Two Aspects of the 'Tent of Meeting,'" in Tehilla le-Mosheh: Biblical and Judaic Studies in Honor of Moshe Greenberg, ed. M. Cogan (Winona Lake, IL: Eisenbrauns, 1997) 73-79; J. F. Kutsko, Between Heaven and Earth: Divine Presence and Absence in the Book of Ezekiel (BibJudS 7; Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2000); G. Langer, Von Gott erwählt—Jerusalem: Die Rezeption von Dtn 12 im frühen Judentum (OBSt 8; Klosterneuberg: Verlag Österreichisches Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1989); K. H. Miskotte, When the Gods are Silent, trans. J. W. Doberstein (New York: Harper & Row, 1967); M. S. Moore, Faith under Pressure: A Study of Biblical Leaders in Conflict (Siloam Springs, AR: Leafwood, 2003); idem, "Numbers," in The Transforming Word: One-Volume Commentary on the Bible, ed. M. A. Hamilton (Abilene, TX: Abilene Christian University Press, 2009) 185-202; L. M. Muntingh, "Fear of Yahweh and Fear of the Gods according to Isaiah and Qohelet," in Studies in Isaiah, ed. W. C. van Wyk (Pretoria West: NHW, 1980) 143-58; K. M. O'Connor, "The Book of Jeremiah: Reconstructing Community after Disaster," in Character Ethics and the Old Testament: Moral Dimensions of Scripture, ed. M. D. Carroll R. and J. E. Lapsley (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 2007) 81-92; A. Orlov, "In the Mirror of the Divine Face: The Enochic Features of the Exagoge of Ezekiel the Tragedian," in The Significance of Sinai: Traditions about Sinai and Divine Revelation in Judaism and Christianity, ed. G. J. Brooke, H. Najman and L. Stuckenbruck (TBN 12; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2008) 183-200; R. Otto, The Idea of the Holy: An Inquiry into the Non-Rational Factor in the Idea of the Divine and Its Relation to the Rational, trans. J. W. Harvey (London: Oxford University Press, 1923); T. Podella, Söm-Fasten: Kollektive Trauer um den verborgenen Gott im Alten Testament (AOAT 224; Kevelaer: Butzon & Bercker; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1989); D. C. Polaski, Authorizing an End: The Isaiah Apocalypse and Intertextuality (BIS 50; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2000); S. L. Richter, The Deuteronomistic History and the Name Theology: l'šakkēn š'mô šām in the Bible and the Ancient Near East (BZAW 318; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2002); H. Seebass, "Mose in einem seiner Ausnahmegespräche mit Gott: Zu Exod 33,12-23," in Gott und Mensch im Dialog: Festschrift für Otto Kaiser zum 80. Geburtstag, ed. M. Witte (2 vols.; BZAW 345; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2004) 1:301-31; H. Simian-Yofre, "עֲלֵינוּ," TDOT 11:589-615; J. D. Tabor, "Heaven, Ascent to," ABD 3:91-94; S. Terrien, The Elusive Presence: Toward a New Biblical Theology (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1978); D. C. Tracy, The Analogical Imagination: Christian Theology and the Culture of Pluralism (New York: Crossroad, 1981); M. Weinfeld, "עֲלֵינוּ," TDOT 7:22-38; C. Westermann, Das Buch Jesaja: Kapitel 40-66 (ATD 19; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1981); P. J. Williams, "Lying Spirits Sent by God? The Case of Micaiah's Prophecy," in The Trustworthiness of God: Perspectives on the Nature of Scripture, ed. P. Helm and C. R. Trueman (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2002) 58-66; R. R. Wilson, Prophecy and Society in Ancient Israel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980). M. S. Moore

DIVINE WARFARE. See WARFARE AND DIVINE WARFARE.

DIVINE WARRIOR. See COSMOLOGY; WARFARE AND DIVINE WARFARE.

DIVORCE. See MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.

DRAMA, PROPHETIC. See SIGN ACTS.

E

ECONOMIC JUSTICE. See SOCIAL JUSTICE;
WEALTH AND POVERTY.

EDITORIAL/REDACTION CRITICISM

Editorial or redaction criticism is a tool of biblical study that investigates the manner in which biblical authors/editors employ and shape their sources in developing their own message. It focuses on the placement of the traditions as well as differences in perspective between redactors and their sources. First used in NT studies, it has become widely used in OT studies as well. The following discussion first describes the rise and use of redaction criticism out of previously existing methods, and then it illustrates the use of the method by scholars investigating the Major Prophets and the Minor Prophets of the Bible.

1. The Rise and Use of Redaction Criticism
2. Formulae Used by Redactors
3. Quotations, Citations, Allusions and Catchwords Used by Redactors
4. Themes, Structures and Indications of Time Used by Redactors
5. The Redaction of the Prophetic Books as Wholes
6. Conclusion

1. The Rise and Use of Redaction Criticism.

1.1. The Rise of the Method. Strictly speaking, an emphasis on oral tradition, such as that of the so-called Scandinavian school of scholars (e.g., I. Engnell, E. Nielsen, G. Widengren), is not part of redaction criticism, though the Scandinavians were important in moving OT scholarship beyond source criticism and its concentration on underlying written documents. An advance toward redaction criticism occurred when M. Noth argued that the Pentateuch was comprised of five previously independent collections of traditions dealing with the patriarchs, the exodus, the wandering in the wilderness, the conquest and the giving of the law. Another step was the work of G. von Rad, who argued that the themes of the Pentateuch were arranged following the confession found in Deuteronomy 26:5-9. It begins with Abraham, continues with the oppression in Egypt, the exodus, and ends with the entry into Canaan (conveniently summarized in von Rad, 1:121-28). Interest in the editors or redactors of OT books had been born, and a number of scholars took up the task of studying them under the method called “tradition history” (see Rast). Those scholars also studied the reuse of earlier traditions in later passages. The term “redaction history,” however, appeared in connection with the work of three NT scholars after WWII: G. Bornkamm on the Gospel of Matthew, H. Conzelmann on the Gospel of Luke, and W. Marxsen on the Gospel of Mark (Perrin, 25-39). Their work proved so insightful that OT scholars began using both their method and its name.

1.2. The Use of the Method. Redaction criticism focuses on the work of editors in texts. Although writing is quite old in the Middle East, reaching back to the ancient Phoenicians, early efforts dealt mainly with records, wills and official documents. It is probably not accidental that the “writing prophets” appeared beginning in the eighth century BC, the time when public *writing blossomed in ancient Israel (Schmid, 44). Short versions of what earlier prophets said might have been transmitted orally alongside accounts of their deeds (esp. Elijah and Elisha), but nothing like Amos or Hosea, let alone the sixty-six-chapter book of Isaiah, arose before the eighth century BC. These collections, moreover, seem to have grown over time, as source critics demonstrated long ago. The growth of the prophetic books also left a trail that can be traced by redaction critics.

How, then, do such scholars work? Simply put, they look for signs of editing/redaction, including superscriptions (e.g., "The Book of the Vision of Nahum"), incipits or introductory sentences (e.g., "In the eighth month, in the second, year of Darius, the word of the LORD came to the prophet Zechariah" [Zech 1:1]), introductory formulae (e.g., "Thus says the LORD"), concluding formulae (e.g., "says the LORD"), quotations of earlier texts (e.g. Ex 34:6-7/Num 14:18/Deut 7:10 in whole or in part in Joel 2:13; Jon 4:2; Mic 7:18; Nah 1:2-3) and allusions to earlier texts (e.g., Zech 3:10, on which the postexilic Mic 4:4 depends) (Redditt 2008b, 72). In addition, they note the arrangement of materials.

Redaction critics, thus, may well employ the results of the use of other methods (including source and *form criticism), but with the intention of determining what redactors started with and how they modified it. Redaction critics also reckon with the possibility of a series of redactors at work in a book. The books of *Isaiah and *Daniel and the Book of the *Twelve in particular seem to have undergone stages of growth over several centuries (for a summary of redactional techniques observable in the Book of the Twelve, see Redditt 2003, 12-15). The remainder of this article, then, illustrates the types of redactional indicators discerned within the Major and the Minor Prophets of the Old Testament canon and how redaction critics use those indicators.

2. Formulae Used by Redactors.

2.1. Superscripts. Many of the Prophetic Books open with a superscription—that is, a heading that divulges something about what follows, commonly the names of the putative prophet whose message is being conveyed (modern scholars do not necessarily agree that everything that follows such a superscription necessarily derived from the prophet named). They are Isaiah 1:1; Jeremiah 1:1-3; Ezekiel 1:2-3; Hosea 1:1; Joel 1:1; Amos 1:1; Obadiah 1:1a; Micah 1:1; Nahum 1:1 (which actually contains two different superscripts); Habakkuk 1:1, Zephaniah 1:1; Malachi 1:1 (again two superscripts). Superscripts for Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Hosea and Amos contain material that tell the reader something about the prophet to whom the messages are being ascribed, but the others list only the name and perhaps other pertinent information. Zephaniah, for example, begins as several others do: "The word of the LORD that came to Zephaniah son of Cushi" (Zeph 1:1). The name "Cushi," however, means "Ethiopian." A reader might wonder if such a person were indeed an authentic spokesperson for Judah's God, and so, one might presume, a redactor added the Yahwistic pedigree that follows, tracing the prophet back three more generations of men whose names ended in "iah" to someone named "Hezekiah" (the eighth-century BC king of Judah?). Thus, the superscription seeks to stamp the imprimatur of Yahweh on the collection of sayings of the prophet. Sometimes the superscript contains additional information, such as an indication of the time when the prophet flourished (Is 1:1; Jer 1:1-3; Ezek 1:2-3; Hos 1:1; Amos 1:1; Mic 1:1).

E. Conrad thinks that superscripts are heavily nuanced. He calls attention to the phrase "a vision of Isaiah" (Is 1:1; cf. Obad 1, Nah 1:1), arguing that the word for "vision" in these texts designates genuine *visions of God received in the temple. The phrase "the words of [the prophet]" regarding what the prophet saw in Jeremiah 1:1; Amos 1:1, as well as the designation "things seen" in Ezekiel 1:1, mark all three as "unconventional" prophets, clueing the informed reader of distinctions that are lost in English translation (see Conrad).

The books of Isaiah, Habakkuk and Zechariah contain internal superscriptions. Isaiah 2:1 at a minimum introduces a major section of the book, and at some point in the history of the growth of the book it may have stood at the beginning. Isaiah 13:1 introduces a prediction against Babylon, and it may well serve secondarily as the beginning of a collection of sayings against foreign nations. Isaiah 15:1; 17:1; 19:1; 21:1; 22:1; 23:1 also introduce short prophecies of destruction by identifying the persons/nations condemned in the following verses, with the last chapter closing that section of the book. Habakkuk 3:1 is clearly a superscription at home in the Psalter, suggesting that the song that follows was a later addition to Habakkuk. (One should note that the word selâ in Hab 3:3, 9 and 13 appears nowhere else in the Hebrew Bible outside of Psalms. Likewise, the subscript in Hab 3:19 is similar to the ending of a number of Psalms.) J. Roberts, however, insists that redactionally the song follows a pattern seen elsewhere in Habakkuk of a lament followed by a song of praise, and that it reports a visionary experience (Roberts, 148-51).

2.2. Incipits. Some of the Prophetic Books, however, begin with or contain elsewhere sentences that introduce the prophet to whom the words are ascribed. Examples include Ezekiel 1:1; Haggai 1:1; 2:1, 20; Zechariah 1:1, 7; 7:1. Like superscripts, they function to begin the recorded revelation, but they are part of the narrative. A comparison of Ezekiel 1:1 with Ezekiel 1:2-3 illuminates the difference.

2.3. Introductory Formulae. Prophetic messages within a given book often open with introductory formulae, some or many of which appear to be from a redactor. Form critics long ago called attention to the phrase “thus says Yahweh,” which often introduces short prophetic utterances, often but not always predictions of doom. Perhaps the most famous redactional use of this formula is in Amos 1:3, 6, 9, 11, 13; 2:1, 4, 6. Critics have long noted that the seven states condemned in Amos 1—2 follow no particular order. The text jumps back and forth geographically, and some texts are more fully developed than others. J. Jeremias suggests the following history of the traditions. The initial arrangement included the threats against Damascus (Amos 1:3-5) and Ammon (Amos 1:13-15), both traditional enemies of the northern kingdom, plus the one against Israel (Amos 2:6-16). The sayings of Amos were collected in or brought to the south, to Judah, as is shown by the mention of southern kings in the superscript (Amos 1:1). When the collection came south, a later saying against Judah (Amos 2:4-5) was included to “update” Amos for southern readers. The final version of the book appeared in the exilic or Persian period. It added oracles against Gaza (Amos 1:5-8), Tyre (Amos 1:9-10), Edom (Amos 1:11-12) and Moab (Amos 2:1-3) (Jeremias, 25). The bitter enmity expressed against Edom arose as a consequence of Edom’s conduct during the final siege of Jerusalem in 586 BC (see Obad 8-14, 19-21).

2.4. Concluding Formulae. At times, given prophetic passages may conclude with a formula. Often one finds nē’um-yhwh, “declaration of Yahweh” (e.g., Jer 2:3). This formula may stand alone or be further elaborated: “declaration of the LORD of hosts” (Is 17:3), “declaration of the Lord God” (Jer 2:22), “declaration the LORD God of Israel” (Is 17:6). Although the formula typically marks the end of a passage, it can appear in the middle (Jer 8:12), apparently to emphasize that what the prophet is saying is uttered under the impulse of God.

The book of Isaiah offers an example of a longer concluding phrase. The sentence “For all this his anger has not turned away, and his hand is stretched out still” appears in Isaiah 5:25; 9:12, 21; 10:4 (NRSV). Despite the present separation of the first from the last three of these texts, the repeated phrase suggests that at one time all of them stood together. The rhetorical effect of the phrase was powerful, and a redactor critic might offer something like the following explanation. The sayings explained catastrophes that had befallen both northern Israel and southern Judah by charging the people with sin. The sayings also warned that more divine punishment was in the offing if the sins continued. As the text stands now, however, the original connection among the four texts has been broken by the insertion of a much older collection (Is 6:1—8:21, if not Is 9:7) and the addition of a prediction of the defeat of Israel and Judah by Assyria because of their sins (Is 10:5-19). The earlier meaning and function of four passages inadequately anticipates the coming punishment by God at the hands of Assyria.

3. Quotations, Citations, Allusions and Catchwords Used by Redactors.

3.1. Definitions. Much recent redaction criticism has focused on the use of quotations, citations, allusions and catchwords, so it will be useful to define these. Quotations are direct quotes of enough words of a source in a new document to imply use. Well-known phrases (e.g., “thus says the LORD”), therefore, do not constitute quotations, though even relatively short, but striking or characteristic turns of phrasing might well. Citations are cases where a biblical author refers to another work but does not actually quote it. Allusions are implied or indirect references by one work to another. Finally, catchwords are devices whereby an author picks up a word from one line and repeats it in a later line. In cases of alleged *intertexttual borrowing, R. Schultz argues, one “should look for indications of contextual awareness, including interpretive re-use, which indicates verbal dependence which is conscious and purposeful” (Schultz, 32).

3.2. Quotations. One of the most important examples of quotations in the prophets is the use of Exodus 34:6-7/Numbers 14:18/Deuteronomy 7:10 in whole or in part in Joel 2:13; Jonah 4:2; Micah 7:18; Nahum 1:2-3. Each text gives the quotation the text’s own particular emphasis, but the use of the confession of faith at least forms a theme within the Book of the Twelve. N. Lane, moreover, in a paper delivered at the 2008 Annual Meeting of the Society of Biblical Literature, pointed out that in the sequence of the collections in the LXX the four citations appear much closer together than they do in the MT, where they are spread out over twenty-three chapters. The LXX sequence for the first seven of the twelve is Hosea, Amos, Micah, Joel, Obadiah, Jonah and Nahum. In the LXX all four quotations appear within only ten chapters. Moreover, Joel ends (Joel 3:19-21 [MT 4:19-21]) by contrasting the futures of Edom and Judah, which is the subject matter of Obadiah, surely sufficient reason for a redactor to place Joel directly ahead of Obadiah. J. Nogalski has argued persuasively that the sequence in the MT is original (Nogalski 1993b, 48-57, 274-78), so a redaction critic might wonder if the new order for the twelve in the LXX might have been guided at least in part by a desire to highlight the quotation from Exodus.

3.3. Citations. Hosea 6:5 employs a citation. The verse speaks of the prophets (not named) whom God used to hew Israel. The reader must supply the identity of the prophets in question and the content of their message. Amos 6:5 employs another citation. There the prophet criticizes wealthy people who recline on beds of ivory, lounge on their couches, and “sing idle songs to the sound of the harp, and like David improvise on instruments of music” (NRSV). The verse draws upon David’s reputation as a musician (cf. 1 Sam 18:10-11; 19:9-10).

3.4. Allusions. Two example of the use of allusions must suffice. One clear example is the prediction of a “new covenant” in Jeremiah 31:31-34. Nowhere do the verses quote anything in Exodus through Deuteronomy (the “old covenant”), but the verses draw a clear contrast between the Sinai covenant and the covenant that God was about to make with Judah. Also, Isaiah 43:1-2 reuses both the creation and the exodus motif in promising the captives in Babylon that God would recreate them.

3.5. Catchwords. Catchwords often appear within a given saying (e.g., Is 24:4, 18-20), and Nogalski has argued that a whole series of catchwords ties together the collections that form the Book of the Twelve (Nogalski 1993a, 20-57). A word or several words used late in a given collection will be picked up and reused early in the next. One case is the odd mention of strangers “casting lots” for Jerusalem in Obadiah 11, followed a few verses later in Jonah 1:7 by the more logical mention of sailors casting lots to discern who on board was responsible for the savage storm threatening to wreck the ship carrying the prophet (Nogalski 1993a, 33). Another case involves catchwords between the end of Micah and the opening of Nahum. Three examples must suffice. First is the use of the question “who is a god like you?” in Micah 7:18, followed by the confession four verses later in Nahum 1:2, which says: “A God jealous and avenging is Yahweh.” In that same context, both Micah 7:18 and Nahum 1:8 speak of God’s “passing over.” Finally, Micah 7:14 speaks of “Carmel” and “Bashan,” as does Nahum 1:4 as well (Nogalski 1993a, 37-39). Proof is perhaps not possible here, but certainly it appears as if the end of Micah and the beginning of Nahum were edited to fit together.

4. Themes, Structures and Indications of Time Used by Redactors.

4.1. Themes. The Book of the Twelve again offers a wealth of examples of the use of common themes. Nogalski lists four that occur repeatedly in the Book of the Twelve: (1) the day of Yahweh (e.g., Joel 2:1-11; Zech 1:2-6); (2) fertility of the land or lack thereof as the punishment of God (e.g., Joel 1:2-2:17; Hag 1:6, 10-11); (3) the fate of God’s people (positively, e.g., Mal 3:10; Joel 2:14; negatively, repeatedly in Hosea through Zephaniah, e.g., Hos 4:1-3; Zeph 1:4-6); (4) theodicy (extensively through the use of the confession in Exod 34:6-7) (Nogalski 2007).

4.2. Structures. In addition to recognizing themes in shaping a work, redaction critics may also recognize structures. One favorite structure in the prophets is that of chiasmus, a pattern whereby a passage returns to its starting place. A brief schema showing how the two collections Nahum and Habakkuk fit together as a chiasmus will illustrate (Christensen):

- A. Hymn of theophany (Nahum 1)
- B. Taunt song against Nineveh (Nahum 2—3)
- X. The problem of theodicy (Habakkuk 1:1—2:5)
- B'. Taunt song against the "wicked one" (Habakkuk 2:6-20)
- A'. Hymn of theophany (Habakkuk 3)

Another device used frequently by biblical redactors in arranging prophetic texts is the sequence of doom followed by hope. K. Cuffey finds four basic sections in Micah as it stands. Each section is developed in terms of doom and hope; each doom section specifies punishment, and each hope passage contains a promise. The following outline demonstrates that structure (based on Cuffey, but with themes reflecting the reading of Micah in Redditt 2008a, 269):

- Theme: Micah 1:2—2:13. Honesty and justice among the people
- Doom: Micah 1:2—2:11. Punishment for social sins committed by the wealthy
- Hope: Micah 2:12-13. Promise in 2:12-13: God will gather a remnant
- Theme: Micah 3:1—4:8. Honesty and justice among the leaders
- Doom: Micah 3:1-12. Punishment against rulers, prophets and priests
- Hope: Micah 4:1-8. Promise in 4:6-7: God will gather a remnant
- Theme: Micah 4:9—5:15. Punishment and redemption of Jerusalem
- Doom: Micah 4:9—5:1. Punishment against Jerusalem
- Hope: Micah 5:2-15. Promise in 5:7-8: God will reign over Zion
- Theme: Micah 6:1-7:20. Sin and righteousness before God
- Doom: Micah 6:1—7:6. Punishment for injustice and idolatry
- Hope: Micah 7:7-20. Promise in 7:18: God will pardon a remnant

4.3. Dates. Haggai and Zechariah 1—8 comprise a case of redaction by date. Date formulae appear in Haggai 1:1; 1:15—2:1; 2:10, 20; Zechariah 1:1, 7; 7:1. All of these verses date the sayings of the two prophets between the second and fourth years of King Darius (Darius I, ruler of Babylon from 522/1 to 486 bc). Redactionally, therefore, the two prophets are made contemporaries, though neither prophet actually refers to the other. Thus, redaction critics often have concluded that one redactor produced the combined work, drawing perhaps on older reports of the prophets' preaching.

4.4. Other Indications of Time. S. De Vries studied the use of several temporal transition words or phrases: "then," "now," "(and it shall be) on that day," "in those days," "at that time," "behold days are coming," "afterwards" and "at the end of the ages." He distinguished between those that occurred as part of a passage (either originally or redactionally) and introductory transitions (as formulas for attaching material redactionally). He discovered that "then" and "now" appear exclusively as integral transitions, the phrase "behold the days are coming" belongs almost exclusively to Deuteronomistic and Jeremianic redactions, and the remaining indicators are always redactional (De Vries, 20). Thus the phrase "on that day" in texts such as Zechariah 12:3, 6, 8, serves as a redactional device to link previously separate verses.

5. The Redaction of the Prophetic Books as Wholes.

Isaiah 65:2 God spreads out his hands to a rebellious house.	Isaiah 1:2 God reared children, but they rebelled against God.
Isaiah 65:3 They are a people who provoke God.	Isaiah 1:4 The whole head is sick, utterly estranged.
Isaiah 65:3 They corrupted sacrifice in gardens.	Isaiah 1:29 Israel would blush because of the gardens that they chose.
Isaiah 65:6 God will repay into their bosom.	Isaiah 1:5 Why do the people continue to be smitten?
Isaiah 65:8 God will not destroy them all.	Isaiah 1:9 If Yahweh had not left a remnant, they would have become like Sodom.
Isaiah 65:15 God's servants will be called by a different name.	Isaiah 1:26 Jerusalem will be called the "city of righteousness."
Isaiah 66:18-20 All nations will come to God's holy mountain.	Isaiah 2:1-4 Let us go up to the mountain of Yahweh.

Table 1. Redactional Bracket of Isaiah

5.1. The Redaction of Isaiah. In the case of *Isaiah, the persona of one prophet, the eighth-century BC Isaiah, extends over the entire work, so that scholars speak of “Deutero-Isaiah” in Isaiah 40—55 and of “Trito-Isaiah” in Isaiah 56—66. Although numerous tradition bearers may have contributed to the book, their names were not preserved, so their identities are lost. Instead, the sayings of Isaiah seem to have undergone extensive redactional work, framed by a “bracket” around the whole book (see table 1) (Childs, 543-44).

5.2. The Redaction of Jeremiah. For the book of *Jeremiah, J. Rosenberg discerns a redactional pattern behind the whole work (material below based on Rosenberg, 190-91; see Redditt 2008a, 269; note that this frame applies only to Jeremiah in the MT, not in the LXX).

- A. Historical head note (Jer 1:1-3)
- B. Commission (Jer 1:10)
- C. “Prophet to the nations” theme introduced (Jer 1:5-10)
- D. Doom for Israel; poetic oracles mostly (Jer 1—10)
- E. Prophet cut off from Anathoth; prose mostly (Jer 11—28)
- F. Optimistic prophecies; renewal of Israel; prose brackets a poetic center (Jer 29—31)
- E'. Prophet returns to Anathoth; prose mostly (Jer 32—45)
- D'. Doom for the nations; mostly poetic oracles (Jer 46—51)
- C'. “Prophet to the nation” theme culminates (Jer 50—51)
- B'. Prophet’s concluding message (Jer 51:59-64)
- A'. Historical appendix (chap. 52)

Like most such patterns, this one may be accused of being arbitrary, but there is much to commend it. In particular, it highlights the optimistic chapters in the middle of Jeremiah and handles such pairings as doom for Israel and for the nations.

5.3. The Redaction of Ezekiel. Two devices discussed above figure prominently in the redaction of *Ezekiel. The first is a series of dates found in Ezekiel 1:1-3; 3:16; 8:1; 20:1; 24:1; 26:1;

29:1, 17; 30:20; 31:1; 32:1, 17; 33:21; 40:1. These dates lend to the book the impression of being a chronological record, except that Ezekiel 29:1 and Ezekiel 29:17 are out of sequence. Ezekiel 26:1 dated the prophet’s speech to the first day of a month not stated and the eleventh year of the exile of King Jehoiachin of Judah (i.e., late July 593 BC). The next date—the twelfth day, tenth month, tenth year (Ezek 29:1)—is at least ten months earlier. The third date—the first day, the first month, and the twenty-seventh year (Ezek 29:17)—is by far the latest date in the book. In Ezekiel 30:20-26, however, the date is the seventh day, the first month, the eleventh year, resuming the sequence that had obtained before the two in Ezekiel 29.

It seems clear, therefore, that a later redactor modified the chronological sequence in favor of the schema of doom against Jerusalem and Judah (Ezek 4—24), doom against foreign nations (Ezek 25—32) and hope for the future (Ezek 34—48). This schema was prefaced by Ezekiel 1—3, a report of Ezekiel’s call vision, and interrupted by Ezekiel 33, a report the fall of Jerusalem predicted in Ezekiel 1—24.

5.4. The Redaction of Daniel. The first piece of evidence that a redaction critic faces in connection with *Daniel is that the book employs two different languages, *Hebrew and *Aramaic. It begins (Dan 1:1—2:4a) and ends (Dan 8:1—12:13) in Hebrew, but the middle chapters (Dan 2:4b—7:28) are in Aramaic. Critics posit two redactors of the Aramaic section, one who arranged Daniel 4—6 (Collins, 37), and a second who added Daniel 2:4b-49 plus Daniel 3 and Daniel 7. The resulting Aramaic section of Daniel exhibits a chiastic structure that most likely was deliberate.

- A. A dream about four world kingdoms replaced by a fifth (Dan 2:4b-49)
- B. Three friends in a fiery furnace (Dan 3:1-30)
- C. Daniel interprets a dream for Nebuchadnezzar (Dan 4:1-37)
- C'. Daniel interprets the handwriting on the wall for Belshazzar (Dan 5:1-31)
- B'. Daniel in the lions’ den (Dan 6:1-28)
- A'. A vision about four world kingdoms replaced by a fifth (Dan 7:1-28)

This version probably would have had an introduction to Daniel, his friends and their circumstances, which is now lost. Possibly, however, much of what is now Daniel 1 appeared in that introduction, was translated into Hebrew and perhaps was expanded in the process (Redditt 1999, 26-27). Traces from the hand of the redactor may be found in Daniel 1:3-7; 2:6, 49; 4:8, 19; Daniel 5:12 (see Redditt 1999, 27-29).

The Hebrew chapters seem to have been added one vision at a time, but within a couple of years. The Aramaic section knows and "predicts" the coming of Antiochus IV Epiphanes, the Seleucid ruler of Palestine in the years 175-164 BC, identified as a "little horn" (cf. Dan 7:8; 8:9). Daniel 8 added his committing "the transgression that makes desolate" (Dan 8:13). That event was Antiochus's defilement of the temple in Jerusalem in late 167 BC, an event involving erecting a "desolating sacrilege" in the temple (1 Macc 1:54) and dedicating it to the Greek god Olympian Zeus (2 Macc 6:2). The final vision (Dan 10-12) becomes increasingly detailed about the events leading up to the death of Antiochus, which it actually predicts (Dan 11:44), though it has him die in Palestine, when in fact he died in Persia. The final prediction in Daniel 12:11-12 possibly was intended to assure the reader that everything had happened that needed to happen before God unveiled his own kingdom.

5.5. The Redaction of the Book of the Twelve.

The example of Haggai and Zechariah 1-8 reveals that redaction critics also focus on the structure of the Book of the Twelve as one edited work. They point to the date formulae and other shared characteristics of Hosea, Joel, Amos and Zephaniah and postulate a so-called Book of the Four, comprised of two northern (Hosea, Amos) and two southern (Micah, Nahum) prophets, whose works were collected in Judah to explain the fall of Israel and warn of the impending fall of Judah. Haggai-Zechariah 1-8 seem to have been redacted together, and Nahum-Habakkuk as well (see 4.2 above). It is a predictable step, then, to attempt to write the history of the redaction of the Book of the Twelve (see esp. Nogalski 1993a; 1993b; Schart). It seems likely that Malachi was attached to Haggai-Zechariah 1-8 and joined to the Book of the Four and Nahum/Habakkuk. Joel and Obadiah, plus Jonah, were added to bring the total to twelve, always a favored number in the OT. One of the principles for merging would have been chronology, preserved by the dates.

6. Conclusion.

Editorial/redaction criticism has come of age as a widely used method in the study of prophets since its introduction in the twentieth century. It is not always possible to distinguish it from other newer methods such as *canonical, reader and *rhetorical criticism, but it focuses on the work of the editors/redactors and their intentions, so far as those intentions may be convincingly derived from their work.

See also CANONICAL CRITICISM; FORM CRITICISM; FORMATION OF THE PROPHETIC BOOKS; INTERTEXTUALITY AND INNERBIBLICAL INTERPRETATION; RHETORICAL CRITICISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. B. Childs, Isaiah (OTL; Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 2001); D. A. Christensen, "The Book of Nahum: A History of Interpretation," in Forming Prophetic Literature: Essays on Isaiah and the Twelve in Honor of John D. W. Watts, ed. J. Watts and P. House (JSOTSup 235; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1996) 187-94; J. J. Collins, Daniel (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); E. G. Conrad, "Forming the Twelve and Forming Canon," in Thematic Threads in the Book of the Twelve, ed. P. Redditt and A. Schart (BZAW 325; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2003) 96-101; K. H. Cuffey, "Remnant, Redactor, and Biblical Theologian," in Reading and Hearing the Book of the Twelve, ed. J. Nogalski and M. Sweeney (SBLSymS 15; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2000) 185-208; S. J. De Vries, "Futurism in the Preexilic Minor Prophets Compared with That of the Postexilic Minor Prophets," SBLSP 41 (2001) 19-38; J. Jeremias, The Book of Amos: A Commentary (OTL; Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1998); N. Lane, "YHWH and the Nations: Parallels to Exodus 34:6-7 in the Twelve," paper presented at the Annual Meeting of the Society of Biblical Literature, Boston, November 21-25, 2008; J. Nogalski, Literary Precursors to the Book of the Twelve (BZAW 217; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1993a); idem, Redactional Processes in the Book of the Twelve (BZAW 218; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1993b); idem, "Recurring Themes in the Book of the Twelve: Creating Points of Contact for a Theological Reading," Int 61 (2007) 125-36; M. Noth, A History of Pentateuchal Traditions, trans. B. Anderson (Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1972 [1948]); N. Perrin, What Is Redaction Criticism? (GBS; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1969); W. E. Rast, Tradition History and the Old Testament (GBS; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1972); P. L. Redditt, Daniel (NCBC; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1999); idem, "The Formation of the Book of the Twelve: A Review of Research," in Thematic Threads in the Book of the Twelve, ed. P. Redditt and A. Scharf (BZAW 325; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2003) 1-26; idem, Introduction to the Prophets (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2008a); idem, "The King in Haggai—Zechariah 1-8 and the Book of the Twelve," in Tradition in Transition: Haggai and Zechariah 1-8 in the Trajectory of Hebrew Theology, ed. M. Boda and M. Floyd (London: T & T Clark, 2008b) 56-82; J. J. M. Roberts, Nahum, Habakkuk, and Zephaniah: A Commentary (OTL; Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1991); J. Rosenberg, "Jeremiah and Ezekiel," in The Literary Guide to the Bible, ed. R. Alter and F. Kermode (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1987) 184-206; A. Scharf, Die Entstehung des Zwölfprophetenbuchs: Neubearbeitungen von Amos im Rahmen schriftensübergreifender Redaktionsprozesse (BZAW 260; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1998); K. Schmid, Literaturgeschichte des Alten Testaments: Eine Einführung (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 2008); R. L. Schultz, "The Ties That Bind: Intertextuality, the Identification of Verbal Parallels, and Reading Strategies in the Book of the Twelve," in Thematic Threads in the Book of the Twelve, ed. P. Redditt and A. Scharf (BZAW 325; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2003) 27-45; O. H. Steck, Der Abschluss der Prophetie im Alten Testament: Ein Versuch zur Frage des Vorgeschichte des Kanons (BTSt 17; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1991); G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, trans. D. M. G. Stalker (2 vols.; New York: Harper, 1962-1965).

P. L. Redditt

ENACTED PROPHECY. See PROPHECY AND SOCIETY; SIGN ACTS.

ESCHATOLOGY

Eschatology, defined as the "last things" or a distinct age beyond the present age, entails discussions about the end of history, matters of death, resurrection, judgment and the eternal state. Eschatology, from the Greek words eschatos ("final, last") and logos ("study of") has to do with the future, but chiefly the kind of future that is significantly discontinuous from the present, a future that represents the culmination of Yahweh's purposes.

This article deals primarily with expectations yet to be fulfilled, whether within history or beyond history. The OT ends on an eschatological note: "Lo, I will send you the prophet Elijah before the great and terrible day of the LORD comes. He will turn the hearts of parents to their children and the hearts of children to their parents, so that I will not come and strike the land with a curse" (Mal 4:5-6 NRSV). In this single announcement are bundled issues of time, named events, details involving certain subjects (e.g., land) and questions of interpretation (e.g., literal versus figurative, the identity of Elijah, the time of fulfillment).

The distinction between prophetic eschatology, which deals mainly with processes within history, and apocalyptic eschatology, with its crises-oriented heightened use of imagery and the final state, is only minimally helpful when considering the OT prophets (see Apocalypticism, Apocalyptic Literature). The eschatological topics to which prophets speak have to do with the future of *Israel, *nations, humankind and the *cosmos. For each, there are major questions of interpretation, answers to which often are determined by the larger streams/systems of interpretation. Three of these are dispensationalism (a subset of premillennialism), Reformed/covenant theology and mediating approaches.

1. Terminology and Announcement Genres
2. The Future of Israel
3. The Future of Nations
4. The Future of Humankind
5. The Future of the Cosmos
6. Conclusion: A Synoptic Theological Interpretation

1. Terminology and Announcement Genres.

Certain vocabulary is common to futuristic announcements. Two prominent phrases are "the days are coming" (yāmim bā'im [e.g., Jer 23:5; 49:2]) and "in that day" (bayyôm hahû). The latter expression occurs over one hundred times in the Prophetic Books (e.g., Is 19:16, 18, 19, 23, 24; Hos 2:16); fifteen of these are in Zechariah 12—14. The Hebrew phrase bē' aḥărît hayyāmim (lit., "in after days" [Is 2:2]) has been translated

“in days to come” (NRSV), “it shall come to pass in latter days (ESV) and “in the last days” (NIV) (see Ezek 38:16; Dan 2:28; 10:14). “The day of the LORD” (yôm yhw̄h) is a significant, somewhat technical expression for future judgment as well as salvation (see Amos 5:18; Joel 1:15; 2:30-31) (see Day of the Lord).

Two kinds of oracles, straightforward messages from Yahweh, specifically deal with the future. One is the judgment speech, with its standardized form of accusation and announcement (e.g., Ezek 25:15-17). The second, its counterpart the *salvation oracle, can include various components: (1) an allusion to lament is part of the announcement of salvation (Is 41:17; Jer 31:2-6); (2) motivations become part of the assurance of salvation (Is 43:5; Jer 30:10-11); (3) descriptions of a state of well-being are characteristic of other forms (Jer 31:23-25) (Westermann).

Future events were envisioned through symbolic actions or sign acts. Judah’s doom is announced in the breaking of a potter’s jar (Jer 19:1-13; cf. Ezek 4:1-8). Israel’s future reunification is foretold with the use of two sticks (Ezek 37:15-23). *Zion is a symbol of the city of God wherein are captured the prophets’ hopes and ideals, so much so that D. Gowan gives to Zion a central place in OT eschatology (Gowan, 4-20).

2. The Future of Israel.

In Jeremiah alone there are more than 220 verses on the subject of the doom of *Israel and Judah (e.g., Jer 4:4-8; 6:1-8) (see Payne, 324). Starkly put, sin on the part of the people, but also and especially by the leaders, is the immediate cause for coming disaster (Is 1:2-6; Jer 2:9-13; Ezek 22:1-12). Agents responsible for destruction include armies, famine, pestilence and wild animals (Ezek 14:21). Assyria’s conquest of Israel (722 BC) and Babylon’s conquest of Jerusalem (586 BC) and the consequent exile represent the historical fulfillment of these threats.

But beyond the judgment is salvation, now described in glowing terms as a golden age and only partially fulfilled in the sixth century BC. The prophets tell of the dispersed exiles returning to live in the *land (Is 43:5-7; Jer 24:4-7; Ezek 11:16-21) and of a rebuilt *temple in Jerusalem to which God’s glory returns (Ezek 40—48). Israel will be restored as a garden (Is 51:3; 61:11; Jer 31:12). *Worship places and practices will be restored (Jer 31:6, 10-14). A new *covenant will be established, including the gift of a new heart (Jer 31:31-34), in part because of God’s determination “never to draw back from doing good to them” (Jer 32:40 NRSV) and also to insure that there will be no more defection from Yahweh (Ezek 36:26-29a). Fear will be removed because Israel’s enemies will be destroyed (Jer 30:10; 46:27; Ezek 39:26; Mic 4:4). Allowing for some hyperbole, one can argue for a fulfillment within subsequent history. The exiles returned in 539 BC. Jerusalem’s walls were rebuilt (Neh 6:15), and a temple was completed in 516 BC. Yet this question is asked: Have all these promises been fulfilled?

There are those who answer no. For example, there is not a Davidide on the throne (Jer 23:5-6; Ezek 34:23), nor has there been the revitalization that Ezekiel pictures (Ezek 34—48). Nations bringing tribute to Israel awaits fulfillment (Is 45:14; 61:4-11). Moreover, dispensationalists claim, Yahweh’s land grant was part of an unconditional promise (Gen 17:8). Drawing on the NT mention of a millennium (Rev 20), classical dispensationalists and others posit a future time when a regathered nation of Israel will be the recipients of the glories promised (Is 60:1-22) (see Walvoord, 115-31). “Promises made here [about ‘your people and your holy city’ in Dan 9:24-27] are not yet realized in our time. Since God keeps His commitments, something more in terms of fulfillment can be anticipated” (Blaising and Bock, 93).

Scholars in the Reformed/covenant tradition demur. They regard the promises made to Israel in a more figurative or spiritual sense and see them fulfilled in the NT church. They object to the sharp distinction made between Israel and the church as two peoples of God. Besides, the kingdom of God is transnational. Thus, they do not hold to a national Israel as a part of God’s ongoing plan. The true descendants of Abraham are not the physical offspring but rather the spiritual (Rom 9:5-8). In their view, the millennium is not a specified time period but rather is symbolic (Bavinck, 99-127; Bloesch, 87-113; Bauckham and Hart, 132-39).

A third, mediating position, akin to historical premillennialism, while affirming a single people of God, allows for a millennial era in which national Israel may play a role. While admitting the use of symbolism and wary about an overly literal interpretation of the texts, and less given to filling out details, those who hold this view nevertheless affirm that the prophet's depiction of a golden age has this-world implications for Israel (e.g., Ladd, 19-28).

The salvific scenario for Israel is not the only one portrayed. Ezekiel points to a time when the world's nations, led by Gog of Magog, will descend on Israel to destroy it. Such an event, with its strong overtones of the "last days," raises fulfillment questions. J. F. Walvoord concludes that the upheaval described by Ezekiel falls during the tribulation period prior to the millennium (Walvoord, 103-20). Noting that Revelation 19—20 draws heavily on Ezekiel, D. Block, in mediating mode, observes that for John, the revelator, Ezekiel's prophesy becomes "identified as the penultimate event in human history" (Block, 492).

2.1. Issues of Interpretation.

2.1.1. The Identity of God's People. At one level, the people of God are the people of Israel, the physical descendants of Abraham to whom God in covenant made the promises of blessing, descendants and land. However, even though an ethnic group serves as nucleus, the covenant is not confined to certain ethnicities. Egypt and Assyria become part of God's people (Is 19:24-25; cf. Is 56:6-7). Non-Israelites enter God's ministry (Is 66:18-21). In a narrow historical sense, the covenant people are Israelites; theologically speaking, the covenant people are followers of Yahweh, regardless of ethnic origin.

Does ethnic Israel figure into God's plan for the future? Jeremiah avers, "If this fixed order [sun, moon, stars and the natural environment] were ever to cease . . . , then also the offspring of Israel would cease to be a nation before me forever" (Jer 31:36). Paul, while regarding the Christ event as pivotal, continues to speak of an ethnic Israel (Rom 9—11; esp. Rom 11:15-16). Thus, to dismiss the future role of an ethnic Israel runs the risk of ignoring statements in both the OT and the NT. One needs to leave open the possibility that in God's program there is yet a future place for Israel.

2.1.2. Literal or Figurative. The view that Israel has a future role in God's program leans heavily on the language of the prophets, which pictures the prosperity and the glories that accompany the people of Israel settled in their land. This land may be figurative. Even the description in Ezekiel of a future temple and a city may be better understood as carrying the interpretation given by the prophet, "The LORD is There" (Ezek 48:35). While not taking away from the force of futuristic announcements, one must make allowance, following the Reformed/covenant viewpoint, for the prophet's use of figurative language. "Eschatological thought is an imaginative picturing of the unimaginable" (Bauckham and Hart, 138). The combination of literal and figurative language renders a defined mosaic but leaves unanswered issues of temporal sequence (Sandy).

2.1.3. God's Covenant with Israel. Those who envision an ongoing national people at the end time rely on texts about *covenant that they regard as unconditional. Among the challenges to the notion of an unconditional covenant are not only notions of what a covenant is, but also Scriptures that associate ethical behavior with the maintenance of covenant (e.g., Ezek 33:23-29; cf. Jer 7:3, 5-7). While it is true that in Jeremiah and Ezekiel the land of Israel is identified as the land promised to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, that promise is not, for these prophets, a reason for Israel's return to the land. Rather, it is about Yahweh's compassion and reputation. It is about the nations' acknowledgment of Yahweh and his ways, and it is about the free worship of Yahweh (Martens, 339-43). Yet, since the covenant promises are large and secured by Yahweh's faithfulness, one must not discount the possibility of a future time when Israel will dwell in its own land.

3. The Future of Nations.

Prophets tell of the future of certain nations. Some prophets devote major space to the subject (Is 13—23; Jer 46—51; Ezek 25—32). Two books focus entirely on a single nation: Nahum on Assyria, and Obadiah on Edom. The devastation, destruction and demise of these nations and/or their capitals often are profiled in arresting ways (e.g., "Wild animals shall live with hyenas in Babylon . . . ; she shall never again be peopled, or inhabited for all generations" [Jer 50:39 NRSV]). Less emphasized are the reasons for such destruction, but generally, as with Babylon, judgment falls because "she has sinned against the Lord" (Jer 50:14 NRSV). Specifically, these sins are those of pride, arrogance and violence (Is 13:11; cf. Jer 48:29). Amos cites slavery, the harsh and unconscionable treatment of neighbor, treaty breaking and rudeness as reasons for Yahweh's destruction of specified nations (Amos 1:3-2:3). Moab is destroyed because of its misplaced trust in its strongholds (Jer 48:7). At least one nation is censured because of its bad treatment of God's people Israel (Ezek 25:1-7). The future for these nations is dark. Again, as illustrated by *Babylon, prophecies of apparent end-time scenarios (Is 13:6-16) merge with now historically fulfilled words (Is 13:17-22).

A principle at work is enunciated in Jeremiah when he visited the potter's house. Just as the malleability of the clay is a factor in the final product, so the response of a people plays into the nature of their future (Jer 18:1-11), as is illustrated in the book of Jonah. Destruction was decreed on Nineveh, but, given its inhabitants' repentance, God spared the city. The larger theology is that God in his grace extends pity to a nation, even to its *animals (Jon 4:11). Another key element in Yahweh's judgment on nations is a display of his glory with the intent that nations will acknowledge him (Ezek 38:23; 39:21-22).

There is good news for certain nations. The day is coming when it will be said, "Blessed be Egypt my people and Assyria the work of my hands" (Is 19:25 NRSV [cf. Jer 46:25-26]). God "will restore the fortunes of Moab in the latter days, says the LORD" (Jer 48:47 NRSV). The phrase "restoring fortunes" (šûb šēbût) also ends oracles against Ammon (Jer 49:6) and Elam (Jer 49:39). Earlier translations (e.g., KJV) concluded that the word šēbût derived from šbh ("to take captive") and so translated "bring again the captivity." Recent scholarly consensus is that the word šēbût is a form of the word šûb ("to return"), and the phrase is literally "turn the turning," with the meaning "to bring about the restoration of" (Westermann, 258-61). Although some of these salvation-type promises have been fulfilled in history, others await a more end-time fulfillment, it seems.

Both punitive judgment and blessed salvation for the nations and for Israel are contained in "day of the LORD"* announcements. That day is depicted as the decisive intervention of Yahweh. Figures of speech employed are those from the cosmos (sun and moon darkened), from history (victory in war) and from society (a great convocation). One scenario is of multitudes gathered before Yahweh in the valley of decision (judgment) (Joel 3:14); the outcome is one of punishment for the nations (cf. Is 34:1-17) and for those who are proud and idolatrous (Is 2:12-22). The outcome is also salvation for some, a paradisiacal prosperity for Judah/Israel (Joel 3:18-20; cf. Is 35:1-10). The outcomes, described with an aura of finality, warrant the view that the "day of the LORD" is an especially end-time event. Yahweh will be exalted on that day, and his rulership will be recognized (Is 2:11b).

Ezekiel paints a scene in which nations will fare badly. He envisions an apparent end-time destruction of nations. A massive coalition of nations, including Magog (see Gen 10:2) and other anciently known peoples, attack a restored Israel (Ezek 38—39). There is great loss of life and a staggering pile-up of captured ammunition. Yahweh, who has incited these nations to move against Israel, intervenes in the battle. Gog, prince of Magog, and the allies are vanquished, and Israel is spared (Ezek 38:21-22). One might conclude that the nations will be annihilated, although Zechariah, if describing the same event, speaks of survivors who will become Yahweh worshipers (Zech 14:16).

A similar vision of the elimination of nations is given by Daniel in his dream of a great anthropomorphic image. As interpreted within the biblical text, this image's head of gold is Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon (Dan 2:36-38). Successive empires are represented by the arms and the chest of silver, the thighs of bronze, the legs of iron, and the feet of both iron and clay (Dan 2:32-33). The entire image is crushed and pulverized by a stone that is cut, but not by human hands, from the mountain. That stone, representing a divine agent, demolishes earth's kingdoms. An eternal kingdom, the kingdom of God, is established.

3.1. Issues of Interpretation.

3.1.1. Temporal References. Certain terminology is conventionally understood as referring to the "last days" when, alternatively, the meaning may better be rendered "in the future." A case in point is the message about nations beating their swords into plowshares (Is 2:2-4; Mic 4:1-5). Some see fulfillment in an indeterminate future or in the millennial age (see commentaries). The phrase bē'ahārīt hayyāmīm (lit., "after days") may mean not the "last days" but rather "whenever," which yields the sense that whenever peoples seek for a divine message and follow God's directives, warfare is no longer an option (Wolff). Perhaps one should entertain both interpretations: obedience to the will of God eliminates resorting to war and violence; in the far-off, future age nations will no longer be at war, since they have embraced God's ways.

3.1.2. Identification of Empires in Daniel's Visions. *Daniel's vision of the statue (Dan 2), the beasts (Dan 7) and the ram/goat (Dan 8) suggests a succession of empires. The Medo-Persian Empire is represented by the ram with two horns (Dan 8:20). Those who combine the meanings of two or more of these visions conclude that the dominant empires will be Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece and Rome. Even though each has had its day in history, the theory of a revived Roman Empire in some form brings dispensationalists to suggest that a yet distant future fulfillment is to occur (Walvoord, 88-102). Those, Reformed/covenant scholars among them, who regard Greece as the final empire in the series see an already completed fulfillment of the little horn (Dan 7:8; 8:9-11) in Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175-164 bc). The mediating position is largely noncommittal about the future of nations but, like others, seizes firmly on the overriding message that nations, though powerful and even vicious, are under divine control.

As to identifications, it is prudent to follow the advice of Irenaeus of Lyons, a great theologian of the second century AD. What he said about the number of the beast (666) in Revelation 13:18 is applicable here: "It is . . . more certain, and less hazardous to await the fulfillment of the prophecy, than to be making surmises, and casting about for any names that may present themselves, inasmuch as many names can be found possessing the number mentioned; and the same question will, after all, remain unsolved" (quoted in Armerding and Gasque, 115).

Greater agreement can be expected on the significance of the stone uncut by human hands that demolishes the earthly kingdom. That stone is the Messiah, Jesus Christ, who becomes foundational for the coming kingdom. In Jesus that kingdom was inaugurated, but the world still awaits the full establishment of the kingdom of God.

4. The Future of Humankind.

Prophetic announcements that apply to humans more generically are about death, resurrection judgment, and life hereafter.

Little is said in the OT about what transpires for the individual after death. It seems that life, if it can be called such, is extremely minimized for the person who enters Sheol. Two snapshots of the shadowy existence there are given: the arrival of an Egyptian Pharaoh (Ezek 32:20-31) and a Babylonian ruler who comes to rest on a bed of maggots (Is 14:4-11). The language used is that of "sleep" (Is 14:8). Death marks a transition to a different realm. To conclude that the state of the dead is one of unconsciousness is not warranted, however, and certainly not when the evidence of the NT is adduced (Lk 16:28; Phil 1:23).

Isaiah is forthright in declaring a resurrection. "Your dead shall live, their corpses shall rise. O dwellers in the dust, awake and sing for joy! . . . The earth will give birth to those long dead" (Is 26:19 NRSV). The Suffering Servant is depicted, following a reading from Qumran, as one who will see light, a possible oblique reference to the resurrection (Is 53:11). The vision of Ezekiel about dead bones coming to life is about the communal and corporate restoration of Israel (Ezek 37:1-14), but indirectly it relates to the resurrection of the dead, in the sense of prefiguring it (Wright, 46-47). The fuller story is hinted at in Isaiah 25:8, where the Lord of hosts "will swallow up death forever" (cf. 1 Cor 15:54).

Daniel's statement is the most explicit in the OT about the resurrection: "Many of those who sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life and some to shame and everlasting contempt" (Dan 12:2 NRSV [cf. Jesus' reiteration in Jn 5:25-29]). Two destinies are envisioned, one positive and one negative. A positive description of that future is found in the pictorial of the new Jerusalem (Is 65:17-25), apparently the backdrop for John's vision (Rev 21). Negatively, it is said of those who rebelled against God that "their worm shall not die, their fire shall not be quenched" (Is 66:24 [cf. Jesus' description of Gehenna in Mk 9:48]).

The prophets assume a future judgment, for retribution is part of present and end-time reality (Is 63:1-6; Jer 25:29-33; Ezek 38-39; Hab 2:6-8; Zech 14). A major feature of the Day of the Lord is Yahweh's judging of the peoples. The upshot is safety and protection for some (Joel 3:16b-17) and dire disaster for others (Joel 3:19). The day is one of Yahweh's *wrath and *destruction (Zeph 1:14-16). That which was spoken in Ecclesiastes, "God will bring every deed into judgment, including every secret thing whether good or evil" (Eccles 12:14 NRSV) gains specificity in Daniel with the description "The court sat in judgment, and the books were opened" (Dan 7:10c NRSV). The setting for judgment is the Ancient One seated on a fiery throne (Dan 7:9).

4.1. Issues of Interpretation.

4.1.1. Body and Soul. Since details about the resurrection in the OT are sparse, large questions remain. One of these is whether the OT affirms a body-soul dichotomy, a concept of the soul separate from the body that derives from Greek philosophy and seems sometimes to be supported by the OT (e.g., Eccles 12:7). Engaging with the whole of Scripture, however, biblical scholars argue that a view of body-soul dualism is not biblically tenable (Wright, 28, 147-63; Bavinck, 31). Christian theologians affirm duality, thereby recognizing both a body and a soul-spirit dimension, but not dualism. The OT speaks of persons holistically, with body, soul and spirit, even in death.

4.1.2. How Many Resurrections? So sparse is the information from the OT that the question of the number of resurrections is moot. Drawing on NT statements about the first resurrection (Rev 20:4-5), dispensationalists traditionally posit a resurrection of the righteous at the onset of the millennium and a resurrection of the wicked at its close, as well as a final or third resurrection (Blaising and Bock, 270-83). Some in the Reformed/covenant camp distinguish two types of resurrection, spiritual and physical (see discussion in Erickson, 73-89).

5. The Future of the Cosmos.

Announcements about the future of the cosmos, the world of nature, are both negative (chaos will return) and positive (a new earth will be created) (see Cosmology). The undoing of the present order of creation is graphically depicted by Jeremiah: "I looked on the earth, and lo, it was waste and void; and to the heavens, and they had not light. I looked on the mountains, and lo, they were quaking, and all the hills moved to and fro" (Jer 4:23-24 NRSV). In this heavy pulsing poetry, all that exists apparently is annihilated before the Lord's fierce anger (Jer 4:26). Similarly, Zephaniah describes a creation that has become undone through a cosmic cataclysm in which all life, with allusions to the Genesis creation account, has been swept away (Zeph 1:2-3; cf. the seismic changes in Zech 14:3-10 and the opening lines of Is 24—27). Joel talks about signs in the heavens, blood and fire, the sun turned to darkness, and the moon to blood (Joel 2:3-31). The event, labeled a "day of the LORD," is universal in scope: "In the fire of his passion the whole earth shall be consumed; for a full, a terrible end he will make of all the inhabitants of the earth" (Zeph 1:18b NRSV). Such cosmic changes are end-time changes, though allowance must be made that "the cosmic imagery provides hyperbolic language to underline the significance of a specific historical and geographical situation" (Collins, 140).

The reasons for such drastic action are, unsurprisingly, human-related. Prior to Jeremiah's depiction of the world's dismal return to chaos, he complained that his people "are skilled in doing evil, but do not know how to do good" (Jer 4:22 NRSV [cf. Jer 4:17b, 18]). Similarly, the prophet Hosea connects the disarray in the environment to the immoral ways of a people (Hos 4:1-3). Given that gross sinful behavior brings severe detrimental effects upon the environment within history, at the eschaton extreme ubiquitous evil will bring about the total destruction of creation itself (see Creation Theology).

And yet all has not ended. Ezekiel tells of God's salvific action in an unspecified future. In barren regions trees will abound, and deserts will flourish (Ezek 36:30; cf. Is 41:18-20; 51:3; 55:12-13). Forests will be a safe place (Ezek 34:25; cf. Is 29:17). As a symbol of divine blessing, fish will teem in a river described as flowing eastward from the temple to the Dead Sea in a new topography (Ezek 47:9).

Isaiah's statement about the far-off future is forceful. "I [Yahweh] am about to do a new thing" (Is 43:19 NRSV). Isaiah describes a scene of re-creation, presumably after the undoing of the first creation. "For I am about to create new heavens and new earth; the former things shall not be remembered or come to mind" (Is 65:17 NRSV). Those things that earlier brought sorrow will be forgotten. In this new world, people aged one hundred will be considered young (Is 65:20). The natural world will also be unlike the earlier, for “the wolf and the lamb shall feed together” (Is 65:25 [cf. Is 11:6-8]). It will be a peaceable kingdom where things are made new (see Peace, Rest). Worship of Yahweh will be universal in this new world (Is 66:22-23). These announcements are prefaced with a brief mention of God’s faithfulness (Is 65:16). It is, then, more than mere conjecture to say that God’s commitment to his people is such, and the realization of his plan for humankind and the earth is such, that in the end the creation of a new heaven and earth is not only welcomed, but necessary. The whole earth will be full of the knowledge of God (Is 11:9), “drenched in God” (Wright, 102). God will be all in all.

An issue of interpretation here involves the newness of the new creation. It is natural to think of the new creation of the cosmos to be on the order of the restoration of the former cosmos, and thus a re-creation. But scholars point out that the new creation is to be conceptualized not as a restoration, or makeover, but rather as a transmutation of one order of existence into another (Bloesch, 77). That transmutation still keeps a focus on the earth, even if it is a new earth. N. T. Wright holds that this new earth is the locale of the “heaven” for which people hope (Wright, esp. 104-8, 201-5). Although his arguments incorporate the NT, the basis for his claim that the “place” of heaven is the new earth is the larger salvation story, including the OT.

6. Conclusion: A Synoptic Theological Interpretation.

God has come, he is coming, he will come (Zech 14:5b; Is 35:4) (see Moltmann). The forward movement in the prophetic announcements is unmistakable; it may even be said that the hope of God’s coming defines Christianity. History is not cyclical, as in other worldviews, but instead has direction. God is engaged in that history. That history is moving toward the denouement, the Day of the Lord, the realization of the establishment of the kingdom of God. “The establishment of God’s rule, his Kingdom, is the central hope of the prophets” (Ladd, 43).

A consistent theology of history is discernible whether the subject is Israel, the nations, the cosmos or the individual. Yahweh directs the course of events according to a righteous standard. Sin, whether in the form of disobedience to the covenant (Israel), or the transgression of universal ethics (the nations), or the taint brought upon nature through human evil (the cosmos), or the insubordination to the Almighty by the individual, results in divine judgment. But the goal (telos) is not destruction but rather redemption.

In general, the prophets depict the future as a mosaic. The overall texture, often in the forms of overlays, can be identified; they contain large salvific elements. For the West, the chronology of events matter. For the East, and certainly in ancient times, the character of the event was the crucial element: the “what” was more significant than the “when.” Curiosity in regard to calendaring and sequencing is understandable, but it was not the centerpiece of the prophets’ speech about the future. Both Daniel (Dan 12:4, 9) and Jesus (Mk 13:32) cautioned against attempts at mapping the future.

Taken together, the large number of prophecies about Israel, the nations, humanity generally and the cosmos convey a message about a God who is sovereign, righteous and caring and whose span of concern is for the individual, for the faith community, for nations and for the world of nature. God is a God of majesty, with full detailed knowledge of the world. He knows the end from the beginning (Is 41:22). Yahweh is the universal sovereign over the natural world (Zech 10:1-2) as well as over all political structures (Dan 4:34-35; 6:25-28; 7:13-14, 23-27). The message of eschatology is a message of hope (see Bauckham and Hart; Chia; Moltmann; Polkinghorne; Sauter, 119-208; Wright).

Eschatology and *ethics are interlocked. Behaviors, whether godly or ungodly, determine the future, whether short term or ultimately (Ezek 7:9; cf. Ezek 7:27) (Miller).

In the final disposition of all things righteousness will prevail. In the last judgment God will deal fully and finally with evil, for judgment will fall on the wicked, and the world will be set right, and that on a cosmic scale. The enduring image is that because of the Messiah, “they will neither harm nor destroy on all my holy mountain; for the earth will be filled with the knowledge of the LORD as the waters cover the sea” (Is 11:9 NRSV).

See also AFTERLIFE; APOCALYPTICISM, APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE; COSMOLOGY; CREATION THEOLOGY; DAY OF THE LORD; ISRAEL; LAND; PROPHECY AND ESCHATOLOGY IN CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY; RETRIBUTION; SALVATION, DELIVERANCE; ZION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. E. Armerding and W. W. Gasque, eds., A Guide to Biblical Prophecy (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1989); R. Bauckham and T. Hart, Hope against Hope: Christian Eschatology at the Turn of the Millennium (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999); H. Bavinck, The Last Things: Hope for This World and the Next, ed. J. Bolt, trans. J. Vriend (Grand Rapids: Baker; Carlisle: Paternoster, 1996); C. A. Blaising and D. L. Bock, Progressive Dispensationalism (Grand Rapids: BridgePoint Books, 2000); D. I. Block, The Book of Ezekiel: Chapters 25-48. (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); D. G. Bloesch, The Last Things: Resurrection, Judgment, Glory (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2004); R. Chia, Hope of the World: A Christian Vision of the Last Things (Downers Grove, IL: IVP Academic, 2005); M. J. Erickson, A Basic Guide to Eschatology: Making Sense of the Millennium (rev. ed.; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1998); D. E. Gowan, Eschatology in the Old Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); D. J. Hayes, The Message of the Prophets: A Survey of the Prophetic and Apocalyptic Books of the Old Testament (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2010) 77-90; A. A. Hoekema, The Bible and the Future (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1979); G. E. Ladd, The Last Things: An Eschatology for Laymen (Grand Rapids, Eerdmans, 1978); E. A. Martens, "Motivations for the Promise of Israel's Restoration to the Land in Jeremiah and Ezekiel" (Ph.D. diss., Claremont Graduate School, 1972); P. D. Miller Jr., Sin and Judgment in the Prophets: A Stylistic and Theological Analysis (SBLMS 27; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1982); J. Moltmann, The Coming of God: Christian Eschatology, trans. M. Kohl (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996); J. B. Payne, Encyclopedia of Biblical Prophecy: The Complete Guide to Scriptural Predictions and Their Fulfillment (New York: Harper & Row, 1973); J. Polkinghorne, The God of Hope and the End of the World (New Haven: Yale University Press, 2002); D. B. Sandy, Plowshares and Pruning Hooks: Rethinking the Language of Biblical Prophecy and Apocalyptic (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2002); G. Sauter, What Dare We Hope? Reconsidering Eschatology (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1999); J. F. Walvoord, The Nations, Israel and the Church in Prophecy (Grand Rapids: Academic Books, 1988); C. Westermann, Prophetic Oracles of Salvation in the Old Testament, trans. K. Crim (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1991); H. W. Wolff, "Swords into Plowshares: Misuse of a Word of Prophecy?" in The Meaning of Peace: Biblical Studies, ed. P. B. Yoder and W. M. Swartley, trans. W. W. Sawatsky (Elkhart, IN: Institute of Mennonite Studies, 2001) 110-26; N. T. Wright, Surprised by Hope: Rethinking Heaven, the Resurrection, and the Mission of the Church (New York: HarperOne, 2008).

E. A. Martens

ESCHATOLOGY IN CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY. See PROPHECY AND ESCHATOLOGY IN CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY.

ETHICS

The prophets have long been understood as champions of social justice. Almost one hundred and fifty years ago, J. Wellhausen portrayed the eighth-century BC prophets—Isaiah, Micah, Amos, Hosea—as champions of what he called "ethical monotheism," which in his mind represented the high point of Israelite religion. From this perspective, the faith of these individuals had progressed beyond primitive tribal religion and was unencumbered with the deadening trappings of religious ritual into which belief in the God of Israel would degenerate. Relationship with God was defined by proper moral conduct. This understanding greatly influenced scholarship and, at a more popular level, advocates of the social gospel at the end of the nineteenth century and into the early decades of the twentieth. Few today set so starkly the moral demands of the prophets over against the cult, but the perception that the prophets were defenders of justice remains strong. The label "prophetic" is used across a wide spectrum of theological persuasions and in liberation theologies around the globe to refer to individuals or initiatives that act on behalf of the vulnerable. Even those who have been wary of some of the tenets of the social gospel and liberation theologies are increasingly becoming aware of the valuable contribution of this literature toward formulating ethical positions to contemporary problems.

This focus on ethics is appropriate, even if the reconstruction of prophetic faith by Wellhausen and others is overly simplistic. In both the Historical Books and the Prophetic Books prophets demonstrate broad social concern, which is grounded in the person of God, who is committed to humanity and is deeply moved by injustice and the suffering that it causes. Elijah and Elisha, for example, respond to the needs of widows (1 Kings 17:7-24; 2 Kings 4:1-7), and commitment to justice in every realm—socio-economic, judicial, political—characterizes the Prophetic Books. This emphasis marks a major difference between the biblical material and the prophetic oracles of other regions of ancient Mesopotamia. What has been recovered of those prophets has almost no mention of social concerns; instead, these oracles are concerned with military success, the maintenance of sanctuaries and their personnel, and proper attention to religious ceremonies.

The purpose of this article is to survey the variety of methodologies that have been utilized to study the ethics of the prophetic literature. Some are limited to the descriptive purpose of recovering the messages of these books. Others are committed to extracting moral teaching for those who seek to find guidance there for their moral life; descriptive results now serve prescriptive ends. Both kinds approaches are reviewed in this article.

1. Concerns of Past Research
2. Recent Studies of Prophetic Ethics
3. New Directions in Scholarship

1. Concerns of Past Research.

1.1. Theological Traditions Behind Prophetic Ethics. During the first three-quarters of the twentieth century scholarship concentrated on trying to specify the theological tradition(s) that undergirded the prophetic message. The four primary candidates were the covenant, the law, clan wisdom and creation.

The *covenant emphasis argued that the prophetic literature decried the violation of the expectations of the ancient tribal association with Yahweh. That is, according to this perspective, its ethical concerns do not reflect a new morality introduced by the prophets but rather hearken back to the historic obligations of the people before God and among themselves. Key terms, such as mīšpat ("justice"), šēdāqā ("righteousness") and hesed ("steadfast love, mercy"), and the many metaphors utilized in these books (especially the trope of *marriage) were defined in terms of the demands of that vertical relationship with God and their implications for community life. The prophetic exhortations and warnings were connected to the covenant blessings and curses of Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 28.

A second option was to claim that the prophets had in view the violation of specific *laws. Jeremiah 7:9 and Hosea 4:2 appear to allude to the Ten Commandments (Ex 20:1-17; Deut 5:6-21), and many passages seem to assume particular mandates, even if these are not cited explicitly. Examples include abuses in the legal system (Is 10:2; 29:21; Amos 5:12; Mic 3:11; Hab 1:3-4; cf. Ex 23:1-8; Deut 16:18-20), unjust acquisition of land (Is 5:8; Mic 2:1-2; cf. Lev 25), dishonesty in the market place (Amos 8:4-6; Mic 6:10-11; cf. Lev 19:35-36; Deut 25:13-16) and sexual impropriety (Amos 2:7; cf. Lev 18:8, 15, 17; 20:10-20). The Prophetic Books also repeatedly denounce both Israel's and Judah's worship of God (Is 1:10-20; 58; Jer 7:1-11; Amos 5:21-24; Zech 7; Mal 3:2-5) because it is divorced from the care of widows and orphans, the poor and aliens, all of whom are vulnerable individuals that the law demanded be cared for.

Other scholars turned to the Wisdom literature to explain prophetic ethics (see Prophecy and Wisdom). On the basis of form-critical studies, H. Wolff argued that in Amos the concepts of the "right" (Amos 3:10) and "justice and righteousness" (Amos 5:7, 15, 24; 6:12) find their source in clan wisdom (Prov 8:8-9; 24:26; 1:3; 2:9; 16:8). Similarly, the condemnation in Amos of false scales (Amos 8:5) and worship divorced from ethics (Amos 5:21-24) arose originally, he believed, within clan wisdom circles (Prov 11:1; 16:11; 20:23; 15:8; 21:23, 27). These insights Amos would have learned from the elders of his hometown of Tekoa and elsewhere, in contradistinction to the ways of the learned scribes and advisors of the royal court and the political acumen and protocols taught and practiced there.

A fourth approach located the moral order within *creation. This argument can go in one of two directions. The first is the conviction that the prophetic literature establishes a direct correlation between *sin and its judgment (Schmid; Fretheim): evil deeds trigger corresponding consequences in nature and history (Jer 6:19; 17:10; Ezek 7:27; 22:31; Hos 4:1-3). A second explanation appeals to a form of natural law—that is, the concept that all peoples share some common moral sensibilities perceptible within creation and human experience. This could explain, for instance, the denunciation of cruel acts of *warfare by the surrounding nations in passages often labeled by scholars as the "oracles against the nations" (Is 13—23; Jer 46—51; Ezek 25—32; Amos 1—2; Nahum; Obadiah). The assumption is that everyone, even those outside of faith in Yahweh and beyond the borders of Israel and Judah, would agree that certain behavior is reprehensible, and that those who perpetrate such atrocities should be held accountable (Barton).

Each of these four proposals has textual support, but each also has its detractors. The covenant option is a case in point. Scholars dispute the date of the emergence of this concept. Unlike those who argue for its foundational importance, some believe that covenant is a relatively late theological category, no earlier than the second half of the eighth century BC (cf. Hos 6:7; 8:1) or even later, and therefore it would have had little significance for a prophet such as Amos. This disagreement as to the date of the covenant theme has had no final resolution. The criticism of the approach that links prophetic teaching to specific laws is that the prophets primarily refer to moral principles instead of explicit legislation, hence the generalities in the language of their moral censure. On the other hand, connections to the Wisdom literature sometimes are tenuous and can match neither the quantity nor the clarity of possible links to the legal material. Finally, it is not difficult to perceive in the Prophetic Books a belief in an underlying moral framework grounded in the natural order of things, a notion that would have been shared across cultures. Although there may be disagreement concerning the connection between cause and effect, few would argue against the broader concept of a cosmic moral design.

It is more realistic to say that the ethical message of the prophets cannot be limited to any one theological tradition, and that these traditions were not as neatly distinct in content and bound to circumscribed groups of advocates as some might suppose. The prophets would have moved and spoken within a moral universe into which multiple theological emphases fed. They argued on the basis of the range of theological material available to them to communicate the divine word. These principles endure and are the framework for modern appeals to the prophetic text.

1.2. Approaches Defined by Textual Redactions. Some scholars perceive inconsistencies or diverse perspectives within the Prophetic Books instead of uniform ethical voices. These tensions, they contend, are proof that their canonical form derives from several authors at different times. Accordingly, their efforts are directed at reconstructing the ethics of the authors or redactors of the putative redactional layers delimited by various critical theories (see Redaction/Editorial Criticism). These diachronic approaches attempt to trace the hypothetical ethical trajectories within each book.

For example, there are studies of the book of Isaiah that limit their horizon to the ethics of “Isaiah of Jerusalem,” by which is meant material that may be traced back to the eighth-century BC prophet according to critical criteria. The working assumption is that this is to be found primarily within what is commonly called “First Isaiah” (Is 1—39), while the ethical message of the rest of the book and some sections of Isaiah 1—39 are attributed to other hands (Barton). R. Coote distinguishes three layers in the book of Amos, each of which, he contends, arose within dissimilar historical settings and social circumstances. The initial stage is rooted in the historical prophet and denounces socioeconomic oppression perpetrated by Samaria’s elite; the second originated in Judah in the seventh century BC and adds cultic concerns to the demand for justice; the final, postexilic layer offers a word of hope at the book’s end to those who had experienced the realities of divine judgment announced in the earlier collections. Similar work has been done on other Prophetic Books.

These studies seek to give an account for the complexities of these books with a historical-literary model. They continue a long-standing emphasis of biblical scholarship on trying to retrace the development of biblical books, even as they complement that focus with attempts to ascertain the ethical teaching embedded in each stratum. These presentations of the ethical message of strands of material are only as assured as the viability of the critical theories upon which they are built. *Canonical criticism and the increasing interest in final-form studies are an expression, at least to some degree, of dissatisfaction with the subjective decisions regarding issues such as the dating of texts and the nature of the ethical discourse possible in certain contexts.

In addition, the density of the message of a book may have another explanation. Complexity is not contrary to ethical coherence, but rather can testify to the moral nuancing, the difficulties of real-life situations, and the simultaneous multiple personal and social ethical debates common to all communities. Beyond the descriptive efforts of these approaches lies the question of whether these critical reconstructions are an exercise restricted to academic circles, far removed from the competence and needs of faith communities that utilize the Prophetic Books as Scripture to inform their moral life. The growing textual sophistication that these approaches require can render problematic the feasibility of appropriating the Prophetic Books as an ethical resource. The opposite danger, of course, is to remove the biblical text and its message from any kind of historical and sociocultural setting and thus reduce its ethical teaching to disembodied, transcendent moral principles.

2. Recent Studies of Prophetic Ethics.

2.1. Social-Science and Historical Approaches.

In the past, scholars described the settings of ancient Israel in a general way, claiming simply that the prophets decried the change in the moral atmosphere wrought by the rise of the monarchy, which was said to have been accompanied by the absorption of Canaanite values, or that the woes of Israel were to be pinned on some form of nascent capitalism. More recent *social-science and historical approaches have attempted to ascertain with greater theoretical precision and more detail the socioeconomic and political contexts that sparked prophetic anger.

Sociological approaches to prophetic ethics are not new. They arose in the early twentieth century. An important landmark study was M. Weber's Ancient Judaism (originally published as a series of essays in 1917-1921), which attributed the criticism of the prophets to the conflict between the rural village proletariat and urban patricians generated by the establishment of the monarchy, the tension-filled transformation of the ancient tribal covenant confederation to a bureaucratic state, and the concentration of wealth and power in the cities. This dichotomy between rural and urban shaped generations of scholarly views, even as Weber's investigation of the socioeconomic power arrangements suggested in the biblical text led to an interest in probing the possible concrete dynamics that may lie behind its message. Weber, of course, was a sociologist who ventured into the realm of the biblical scholarship of his day and incorporated its critical positions into his work.

The last three decades have witnessed a more informed application of social-science methodologies to the study of prophetic ethics. This research often goes hand in hand with positions elaborated by contemporary higher-critical scholarship about dating biblical texts (e.g., Pleins). The value of this work depends not only on the careful readings of the text, but also on how well versed biblical scholars are with the standards of the social sciences and with the specific sociological research to which they appeal. Each proposal may find a degree of resonance within the biblical material, which then gives it an aura of plausibility, so the comprehensiveness of its treatment of prophetic passages also must come into play in any evaluation of its explanatory value.

Interest has centered especially on models that might help interpreters comprehend the socioeconomic conditions and political structures condemned by the prophets (for a survey, see Houston, 18-51). These studies attempt to identify the mechanisms of oppression and the groups responsible for that state of affairs. Complicating matters for the researcher is that the world of ancient Israel and Judah, like any other, was not static. Systemic realities and their corresponding key actors would have changed as the monarchy and its policies morphed across the centuries in response to the shifting nature of the economic, political and military interactions with immediate neighbors and with the empires that cast their threatening shadows across the region.

One of the explanatory hypotheses that have been advanced is that of rent capitalism by O. Loretz and B. Lang. In rent capitalism peasants are dependent upon urban merchants and moneylenders. Diverse factors, such as inadequate rainfall, war and poor crop yields, press peasants into an inescapable cycle of debt to these city dwellers from whom they must go to acquire seed, tools and even food; circumstances at their worst result in these peasants succumbing to debt slavery and the loss of their land and facilitates the rise of latifundia (large estates) in the hands of the powerful. N. Gottwald and M. Chaney suggest that the model of the tributary state offers the best account of the prophetic message. Building on the Marxist notion of the “Asiatic mode of production,” Gottwald contends that in ancient Israel rural communities were forced to give their agricultural surpluses to the central authorities—that is, the bureaucracy of the monarchy—who in turn redistributed those gains to their supporters; in time, the peasant producers also were exploited by the state to provide goods for a growing export economy, which also solely benefited the ruling class. A third proposal, by R. Simkins and W. Houston, is that ancient Israel functioned as a patronage society, in which wealthy and powerful patrons had a reciprocal relationship with their poorer clients. The latter would have expected protection and gracious provision from the former, while the patron would have counted on the loyalty of those under his care. This pattern of personal relationship, they contend, was integral to the cultural fabric of the ancient world and would have shaped attitudes and behaviors from the familial (father and the extended family) and clan and village (local head and tribe) levels to that of the monarchy (king and subjects). They judge that the OT prophets criticize violations of these arrangements, the oppression of clients by their respective patrons.

Sociological method has been used not only to reconstruct the social and economic realities of ancient Israel. It also has informed the dynamics of moral life that may be reflected in prophetic texts. A. Mein’s work on Ezekiel tries to identify the various moral worlds—that is, the contexts, worldviews and religious ideologies—of the different social groups that experienced the *exile. He concentrates particularly on Jerusalem’s deported elite, who would have struggled with the loss of prestige, privilege and identity as a defeated minority in a foreign setting, to explain Ezekiel’s interconnection of ethical responsibilities with the stress on ritual, repentance and the vision of restoration. Another turn in the application of social science studies applies them to both biblical and modern settings. For example, G. Cuéllar utilizes diaspora research to probe Isaiah 40–55 in order to find parallels between the timely words directed at that ancient exilic community and the corridos songs of northern Mexico. The prophetic text offers a liberating voice to the Mexican American immigrant experiences in the United States and the crisis of identity and sociocultural marginalization common to minority displaced peoples.

In addition to these various kinds of sociological approaches, new research into the historical backgrounds is providing more precise interpretation of the prophetic message. Archaeological findings of epigraphic and monumental evidence, along with realia from daily life, illuminate the biblical text in fresh ways. Examples abound. Activities that are condemned, such as the excesses of the marzeah feast in Amos 6:4–7 and Jeremiah 16:5–9 (perhaps also Is 5:11–13; 28:7–8; Amos 2:7–8; 4:1), now are better understood (McLaughlin). The words of Isaiah (Bäckersten; Cohen and Westbrook) and Amos (Radine) are set against the backdrop of Assyrian foreign policy in the eighth century BC. Historical allusions within the rhetoric of the Prophetic Books surface that earlier scholarship had not noticed and provide a higher level of realism to the ethical material.

2.2. Feminist and Ideological Studies. *Feminist approaches consider the prophetic literature to be intrinsically culturally conditioned against women. This shortcoming, it is argued, is manifest in the negative portrayals of Israel as a wayward, unfaithful wife and in the descriptions of judgment as terrible abuse perpetrated on her (note Jer 3–4; Ezek 16; 23; Hos 1–3). At the same time, the God of the prophets is portrayed as a male, a jealous and violent husband. Feminists contend that the theology of these books legitimates and perpetuates false and destructive views of women at best and physical aggression against women at worst. They are the product of a patriarchal ideology, a fact that necessarily impacts assessment of their ethics.

Feminist approaches to prophetic ethics and views on its continuing ethical relevance can be placed along a spectrum. Feminist ethicists differ on the pervasiveness of negative elements inherent to the prophetic material and, therefore, on the moral authority to be granted to it today. Some criticize the prophets for a harmful view of women (and for other matters, such as what is viewed as the indiscriminate violence of divine judgment) but still appreciate these books for their championing of the poor, the ethical critique of worship, the condemnation of the powerful, and the vision of cosmic redemption where nature and human life will be restored. These fundamental moral commitments within this literature are deemed to point the way toward a contemporary commitment to living a life of justice and ecological sensitivity in spite of the other damaging dimensions that cannot be accepted (Dempsey).

Others are not so generous in their appreciation of the Prophetic Books. They contend that the problematic language and utterly foreign underlying beliefs cannot be overcome, so the ethical authority of the prophets is disallowed. The prophetic literature does not contain the ethical compass that is needed, but it can serve as an ethical interlocutor or as a negative foil with which one can wrestle in trying to process in one's moral life the person of God and the vicissitudes of a woman's existence (O'Brien).

These approaches raise important issues, such as the character of biblical metaphors, their purpose and limitations, and the role of competing and complementary tropes. Theological convictions are being reexamined, in particular the meaning of biblical authority and the nature of God. The comprehension of patriarchy and its presence within the biblical text, along with the history of how these texts have been appropriated, have become major topics of research. Decisions on these matters determine in large measure the interpretation of contested passages and the appraisal of the value of the prophets for moral life.

Feminist approaches are perhaps the earliest example and most weighty of those within the broader movement of ideological criticism. Ideological criticism treats the biblical books as any other literature; it examines and evaluates the accuracy and view of reality that is communicated through the rhetoric of texts and then considers the morality of what the language is trying to legitimate and to inculcate in its readers. This is a hermeneutics of suspicion that questions texts and encourages resisting the literary strategies of their encoded ideologies, which can be blatantly expressed or subtly disguised as subtexts. This subversive reading "against the grain" often is done self-consciously from a certain interested position (such as feminism). Primacy is given to the reader as over against any written text, even the Bible, which many take as sacred Scripture. Whereas what it teaches is commonly taken as truth about God and ethics, ideological criticism highlights what it considers to be knotty portrayals of God's speech, actions and attitudes and the unacceptable moral things that the Bible commends or commands of those that are his people. A. Davies is troubled by what is said about the scope and methods of divine judgment in the book of Isaiah; this discomfort arises not only from the fact that some of these ideas are historically conditioned, but also from the realization that the notion of divine judgment violates the ethical convictions of many Christians today. In the end, he believes that the book of Isaiah demands trust in an incomprehensible God, one who functions with a double standard and contradicts what he demands of humans and what he judges them for. M. Gray believes that the statement "the LORD is a God of justice" (Is 30:18; cf. Is 61:8) is undermined by the book's content. Once again skepticism reigns, as the reader exposes the hidden agendas of the text. Gray juxtaposes Isaiah 1 and Isaiah 58 and, on the basis of a detailed textual analysis, concludes that the inconsistencies in the justice of God and his failures in creating a more equitable people and world can serve as the motivation for human initiatives to effect change in spite of God (Is 58:6-10). In his mind, this interpretive stance is deeply missiological.

2.3. Literary Approaches and Character Ethics. Whereas higher critical studies investigate the literary prehistory of the Prophetic Books and the ethical material of their various redactions, literary approaches concentrate on the final, or canonical, form of these books. These approaches can reflect simply an aesthetic interest in the structure and language of individual books or of its collections (such as the Book of the Twelve as a whole or combinations of books within that group). When connected to ethics, however, this focus moves beyond artistic concerns to discussions about how this literature functions in moral life (the power of these texts) and how it can be best appropriated by those who consider it to be Scripture (the question of textual method). These commitments stand in sharp contrast to ideological critiques that question the viability of the prophets for ethics.

Literary approaches have been most extensively utilized for character ethics. There are several constituent elements of character ethics: a set of traditions that offer a vision of reality and the purpose of life, a concept of the "good" to which the moral life is directed that is defined by those traditions, and a community within which that good is modeled and encouraged. In this scheme, the Bible merits first place as the fund of traditions that shapes the view of life and the world of those who embrace it as Scripture; it presents the meaning of the “good” and exhorts its readers to conform their minds, hearts and every sphere of human experience to that ideal. The believing community should serve as the place where such matters find their incarnation in moral exemplars among its members and are nurtured by the proclamation of the divine word and the practices of worship.

The majority of this kind of study in the OT has attended to narratives and the Wisdom literature, but the landscape of this research is changing. Fruitful explorations, for instance, of Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Amos and Micah, are efforts in this direction (Carroll R., 2001; Carroll R. and Lapsley; Lapsley). These readings of prophetic texts have two focal points. First, they direct careful attention to the moral life of those within these texts; they look at dimensions of the character of the prophets and other persons (their ethical values, the struggles and emotions, fears and hopes) in the crucibles of existence described there and at what ethical behavior God expected of Israel and the nations then, and thus perhaps for today. W. Janzen includes the prophetic as one of his five models of life before God in his paradigmatic approach to OT ethics. The prophets are exemplary in their exhortations to justice and holiness and in their willingness to fulfill their calling in the face of rejection and suffering.

Second, these approaches also inquire into how texts impact their readers. These are not, then, simply thorough examinations of prophetic texts as literature useful for ethics (the substance of what is presented there as applicable for modern life); they probe the power of this literature as Scripture to mold the character of the reader. W. Brueggemann is an important figure in explaining the potential influence of the “prophetic imagination” on the reader’s sociopolitical understandings and commitments. Another area of interest is the kind of reader that might best be equipped to engage the text (Briggs). These approaches, therefore, appeal to philosophical hermeneutics and philosophical ethics—the mechanisms by which the text functions as a means of forming a people of virtue, and the unique skills of the virtuous reader as the most appropriate interpreter of these texts for ethics.

3. New Directions in Scholarship.

This survey demonstrates that the prophetic literature is a rich resource for ethics, whether the goal is to describe the ethical thinking and moral behavior of ancient Israel (or of the authors of these books), or the purpose is to probe the Prophetic Books for contemporary ethical guidance. There are many options among scholarly approaches. Although a bit simplistic, the following categorization that is commonly used to characterize basic emphases of biblical studies helps summarize this review of approaches to ethics in the prophets: some studies focus on what is “behind” prophetic texts (traditions and literary prehistory, social-science and historical backgrounds), others on what is “in” these texts (literary studies), and still others what is “in front of” them in terms of their impact (feminism and ideological criticism, character ethics).

Each of these trajectories of scholarship will continue, but at least three new approaches deserve mention. The first is related to the shift in scholarly interest from the prehistory of OT texts to the time frame of their production, which is increasingly being assigned to the Persian period. This change in focus of the social setting of the literature affects the appreciation of the socioeconomic and political critique of the Prophetic Books. No longer do those passages serve as a window into the world of oppressive practices of, for example, eighth-century BC Israel and Judah; rather, they may have served as an indirect means for the scribes of the postexilic community, who compiled or even penned these books, to disparage life under Persian rule in Yehud with the authoritative voice of the prophets of the past. By presenting their condemnation in the mouth of the ancient spokespersons of God, they would have deflected attention from themselves, even as they made their ethical argument against the empire. This shift affects both the descriptive task of comprehending the ethical message of the prophetic literature as well as the prescriptive implications that might be drawn for contemporary life.

A second development arises from the movement to develop a theological interpretation of the OT as Christian Scripture. There is no hard-and-fast definition of what this theological interpretation actually is, and perhaps this perspective will encompass several kinds of ways of reading and interpreting biblical texts, but there are several shared commitments that are significant for the use of the prophetic literature for ethics (Carroll R., forthcoming). First, the biblical text is taken to be the authoritative word for the church. In other words, the ecclesial setting is believed to be the most appropriate place within which to do ethical readings, and the church the most suitable group for which such work is done. Ethics cannot be an academic exercise removed from the life of the church, nor can it be simply descriptive of what may lie behind the text or in its pages. Second, the focus of looking at the Bible for ethics will be on its canonical form, not on hypothetical redactional layers or the settings of its production. Research will look at how the world of the text can shape Christian faith theologically and morally instead of concentrating on questions set by modern critical agendas. Third, the OT is recognized as part of Christian Scripture, so ethical reflection necessarily will consider how the prophetic message set within that broader framework might point to the life and teaching of Jesus and connect to the rest of the NT.

The third avenue of future research is to pursue new topics of ethical relevance for the Prophetic Books. One area in which the prophetic literature is being explored more rigorously for ethical insights in the twenty-first century concerns the environment. Scholars are interfacing ecological studies with readings of prophetic texts to establish the theological bases for Christian commitment to and involvement in environmental efforts. Some scholars, who are engaged in ecological hermeneutics, such as those of the Earth Bible Project, assume in concert with ecofeminism a suspicious stance vis-à-vis the prophetic text's view of nature, questioning to what degree it is anthropocentric and perhaps counterproductive to modern sensibilities (Habel; cf. Dempsey). Others take a positive perspective about the orientation that the biblical material can empower (Marlow; Wright). Themes that are garnering attention include the interdependence of humanity and the created order, the relationship between nature and the moral order, the connection between the creation and divine blessing and judgment, and the eschatological visions of a redeemed natural order. At the very least, scholars need to be aware of the largely agrarian mindset of the biblical authors, which is quite different from their own predominantly urban elite perspective (Davis).

See also HERMENEUTICS; JUSTICE, RIGHTEOUSNESS; SOCIAL JUSTICE; WEALTH AND POVERTY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. O. Bäckersten, Isaiah's Political Message: An Appraisal of His Alleged Social Critique (FAT 2/29; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2008); J. Barton, Understanding Old Testament Ethics (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 2003); R. S. Briggs, The Virtuous Reader: Old Testament Narrative and Interpretive Virtue (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2010); W. Brueggemann, The Prophetic Imagination (rev. ed.; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2001); M. D. Carroll R., "Seeking the Virtues among the Prophets: The Book of Amos as a Test Case," ExAud 17 (2001) 77-96; idem, "Failing the Vulnerable: The Prophets and Social Care," in Transforming the World? The Gospel and Social Theology, ed. D. Hughes and J. A. Grant (Nottingham: Apollos, 2009) 33-48; idem, "Ethics and the Old Testament," in Hearing the Old Testament, ed. C. Bartholomew and D. Beldman (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, forthcoming); M. D. Carroll R. and J. E. Lapsley, eds., Character Ethics and the Old Testament: Scripture and Moral Life (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 2007); M. L. Chaney, "Bitter Bounty: The Dynamics of Political Economy Critiqued by the Eighth-Century Prophets," in The Bible and Liberation: Political and Social Hermeneutics, ed. N. K. Gottwald and R. Horsley (rev. ed.; Maryknoll, NY: Orbis; London: SPCK, 1993) 250-63; R. Cohen and R. Westbrook, eds., Isaiah's Vision of Peace in Biblical and Modern International Relations: Swords into Plowshares (New York: Palgrave, 2008); R. B. Coote, Amos among the Prophets: Composition and Theology (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1981); G. L. Cuéllar, Voices of Marginality: Exile and Return in Second Isaiah 40-55 and the Mexican Immigrant Experience (AUSTR 271; New York: Peter Lang, 2008); A. Davies, Double Standards in Isaiah: Re-evaluating Prophetic Ethics and Divine Justice (BIS 46; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2000); E. W. Davies, Prophecy and Ethics: Isaiah and the Ethical Tradition of Israel (JSOTSup 16; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1981); E. F. Davis, Scripture, Culture, and Agriculture: An Agrarian Reading of the Bible (New York: Cambridge University Press, 2009);

C. Dempsey, Hope amid the Ruins: The Ethics of Israel's Prophets (St. Louis: Chalice, 2000); T. E. Fretheim, God and World in the Old Testament: A Relational Theology of Creation (Nashville: Abingdon, 2005); H. Gossai, Justice, Righteousness, and the Social Critique of the Eighth-Century Prophets (AUSTR 141; New York: Peter Lang, 1993); N. K. Gottwald, The Politics of Ancient Israel (Library of Ancient Israel; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2001); M. Gray, Rhetoric and Social Justice in Isaiah (LHBOTS 432; London: T & T Clark, 2006); N. Habel, ed., The Earth Story in the Psalms and Prophets (Earth Bible 4; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 2001); W. J. Houston, Contending for Justice: Ideologies and Theologies of Social Justice in the Old Testament (rev. ed.; London: T & T Clark, 2008); W. Janzen, Old Testament Ethics: A Paradigmatic Approach (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1994); J. Jensen, Ethical Dimensions of the Prophets (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical, 2006); K. Koch, "Is There a Doctrine of Retribution in the Old Testament?" in Theodicy in the Old Testament, ed. J. L. Crenshaw (OBT; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983) 57-87; B. Lang, "The Social Organization of Peasant Poverty in Biblical Israel" in idem, Monotheism and the Prophetic Minority: An Essay in Biblical History and Sociology (SWBA 1; Sheffield: Almond, 1983) 114-27; J. E. Lapsley, Can These Bones Live? The Problem of the Moral Self in the Book of Ezekiel (BZAW 301; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2001); O. Loretz, "Die prophetische Kritik des Rentenkapitalismus," UF 7 (1975) 271-78; H. Marlow, Biblical Prophets and Contemporary Environmental Ethics (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2009); J. L. McLaughlin, The Marzēah in the Prophetic Literature: References and Allusions in Light of the Extra-Biblical Evidence (VTSup 86; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2001); A. Mein, Ezekiel and the Ethics of Exile (OTM; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001); J. M. O'Brien, Challenging Prophetic Metaphor: Theology and Ideology in the Prophets (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 2008); J. D. Pleins, The Social Visions of the Hebrew Bible: A Theological Introduction (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 2001); J. Radine, The Book of Amos in Emergent Judah (FAT 2/45; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2010); H. H. Schmid, "Creation, Righteousness, and Salvation: 'Creation Theology' as the Broad Horizon of Biblical Theology," in Creation in the Old Testament, ed. B. W. Anderson (Issues in Religion and Theology; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985) 102-17; R. A. Simkins, "Patronage and the Political Economy of Monarchic Israel," Semeia 87 (1999) 123-44; M. Weber, Ancient Judaism, trans. and ed. H. H. Gerth and D. Martindale (Glencoe, IL: Free Press, 1952); H. W. Wolff, Amos the Prophet: The Man and His Background, trans. F. McCurley (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1973); C. J. H. Wright, Old Testament Ethics for the People of God (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2004). M. D. Carroll R.

EVIL

Evil is one of the themes uniting the Prophetic Books with their wider biblical context. Since the ethical components of evil run counter to God's will as expressed in *creation and *covenant, it precipitates a significant area of theological interest.

1. English and Hebrew Usage
2. Lexical Discussion
3. Prophetic Usage

1. English and Hebrew Usage.

In English, "evil" has a consistently negative connotation, coming at the opposite end of the spectrum from "good." Both have a range of reference, but "evil" is used most frequently in the moral or ethical sphere, in which sense there is often an element of perverse intentionality. This element is lacking in the case of natural evil, where inanimate things or natural occurrences are injurious or harmful, or at least are not beneficial. The concept has become personified as the "Evil One," Satan himself.

A related but distinct concept is *sin, which falls at the opposite end of the spectrum from "righteousness" (see Justice, Righteousness). The "evil/good" category is universal, finding a place within all worldviews, each of which has its own understanding of things that are either beneficial or harmful. On the other hand, "sin/righteousness" is context specific, unique to the particular expectations and prohibitions understood within any specific worldview. From a Judeo-Christian, biblical worldview, sin and righteousness are how one breaks or maintains the relationship with God, which is established by the covenants contained in the OT and the NT. There is, therefore, overlap but not absolute identification between the "evil/good" and "sin/righteousness" spectra.

The most frequent Hebrew root denoting "evil" is r'cc and its cognates. The semantic range of the r^{cc} family in Hebrew is broader than that of English “evil.” In Jeremiah 24:3, 8; 29:17 the description of figs as “bad” or “rotten” (NIV, NASB, Message) indicates that they are of such poor quality as to be unfit for human consumption. In Ezekiel 5:17; 14:15, 21 animals are designated “wild” (NIV, NRSV) or “dangerous” (HSCB) because they, like disease and war, are inimical to human flourishing, which their removal allows (Ezek 34:25). Neither use includes any moral judgment (hence the KJV’s literal rendition, “evil,” with its intrinsic moral connotation as noted above, is inappropriate) but rather points to aspects of their nature that do not aid human well-being. None of these examples are sin. However, uses of this Hebrew word family where aspects of human life involve moral censure or result from inappropriate human activity indicate both evil and sin. One might thus conceptualize the Hebrew understanding of evil as a larger concept within which is contained the concept of sin as a subcategory. Another Hebrew term rendered as “evil,” the noun ’āwen , has a narrower range of usage than does r^{cc} . It refers to human wrongdoing and its results, not to the inanimate realm, and so fits within the subcategory of sin.

2. Lexical Discussion.

The most common Hebrew root translated as “evil” among the English versions is r^{cc} , which within the Prophetic Books occurs as a verb twenty-four times; as the adjective ra^{c} , which is most commonly used substantively, fifty-nine times; and as three nouns: $rā^{\text{c}}ā$, which is formally indistinguishable from a feminine adjective used substantively, one hundred fifty-six times; $rōa^{\text{c}}$, thirteen times; and $mēra^{\text{c}}$, once. The NRSV in Daniel 12:4 idiosyncratically adopts the proposed emendation from the MT $dā^{\text{c}}at$ (“knowledge”) to $rā^{\text{c}}ōt$ (“evils”), a minor change on one Hebrew consonant and an alternate reading of a vowel, vowels not having been recorded in the original transcription. Even if the emendation is correct, it adds nothing to the understanding of the semantic field of “evil.”

English versions also use “evil” to translate ’āwen , which, occurring twenty-seven times in the prophetic literature, is significant enough to receive comment in this article. Some also translate $ma^{\text{c}}ālāl$ as “evil deeds” (Jer 11:18 NRSV). The term itself appears neutral, however, usually requiring the separate adjective “evil” to provide a negative connotation, so this term will not be studied here. Neither will the ESV’s redundant addition of “evil” to modify $dibbā$ (“slander”) in Ezekiel 36:3.

An analysis of what the prophets considered evil as determined through a study of these specific terms shows other instances where similar actions are recorded though without a specific identification of them as evil. Some of these cases will be mentioned as well.

3. Prophetic Usage.

3.1. Evil Actions. Evil is never systematically explained in the biblical text, but our understanding of it is aided by looking at things to which it is compared or contrasted. “Evil” (r^{cc}) is used several times as a contrasting polar opposite of “good” ($tōb$), the former to be avoided and the latter sought (Is 7:15-16; Jer 13:23; 25:5; Amos 5:14-15). Those who reverse this order through childish naiveté show a foolish lack of understanding (Jer 4:22), while those who purposefully switch them are condemned (Is 5:20; Mic 3:2; Mal 2:17).

Within the Prophetic Books, the first occurrence of a word from the semantic field of “evil” is in the context of sin, iniquity and corruption, all three being elements of a purposeful separation by the practitioner from God (Is 1:4). This separation through sin is a common theme in the prophets (e.g., Is 3:9; Jer 16:10; 36:3; Ezek 20:44; 36:31), reflecting a rebellion against Israel’s divine king (Jer 2:19; 18:10; 32:32-33; Is 65:2 [“not good”]), not listening to him (Jer 32:23) but turning instead to their own anarchic leadership (Is 47:10; Jer 7:24; 11:8; 13:10; 16:12; 18:12), to following *idols and other gods (Jer 7:30; 11:17; 35:15; 44:3, 5), or to taking part in other abominable activities (Jer 44:22; Ezek 6:9). In addition to a breach of relationship with God, “evil” can also indicate damage done to relations with other humans, through arrogance or insolence (Is 13:11), extortion and robbery (“not good” in Ezek 18:18), mistreatment of the poor and helpless (Is 32:7; Jer 5:28; Zech 7:10), perverting justice though bribery (Is 33:15; Mic 7:3), or destroying and killing (Is 33:15; 59:7; Jer 31:28; Jon 3:8). A clear example of the perversion is among Israel’s shepherd-leaders, whose evil consists of reversing their expected role vis-à-vis their charges, scattering those whom they should protect (Jer 23:2). This is highlighted by a wordplay, contrasting “evil” (r^{c}) with “shepherding” (r^{h}) (Jer 22:22; 23:2). Wanton, evil destruction is also attributed to the visionary beasts in Daniel 7, even though the designation of “evil” is not applied to them.

This litany of wrongs does not reflect an ad hoc list of elements, but rather many of the evils noted by the prophets are counter to the standards that God previously established at creation and more specifically upon entering into a covenant relationship with Israel at Mount Sinai. In other words, the standard of the prophets as to what was evil is based mainly on material presented in the Pentateuch. Human-kind, created in God’s image, was to be God’s co-regent in superintending and tending God’s creation (Gen 1:26-28; 2:15), assisting in maintaining and furthering the “good” that characterized creation when it left God’s hand (Gen 1:31). The evil condemned by the prophets runs counter to the human creation mandate, and it perverts the creational harmony between the divine, human and *animal spheres evidenced in Genesis 1—2 (e.g., Gen 2:1-4; cf. Is 56:2).

Specific expectations of God for human-kind are spelled out among the covenant ordinances, and a number of the evil acts condemned by the prophets directly challenge these. Exclusive covenant allegiance of Israel to their great king, Yahweh, which is a main element in the Decalogue (Ex 20:3-6; Deut 5:7-10), is replaced by idol worship (Jer 1:16; 2:13; 11:17; 35:15). People dishonor Yahweh’s special day, the Sabbath (Ex 20:8-11; Deut 5:12-15; Is 56:2). In the sphere of interpersonal relationships, people kill (Ex 20:13; Deut 5:17; Is 59:7), commit spiritual adultery (Ex 20:14; Deut 5:18; Jer 3:2; 23:10), steal (Ex 20:15; Deut 5:19; Hos 7:1) and lie (Ex 20:16; Deut 5:20; Is 59:15; Jer 9:3; Dan 11:27; Zech 8:17). They also subvert the clear commands requiring acceptable sacrifices to be unblemished (Lev 1:10; Mal 1:8).

One verse deserves particular comment in today’s climate, where business or profit often is vilified. Habakkuk 2:9 bemoans those who “get evil gain” (NRSV). Gain (besaʿ) itself is not intrinsically evil, as some would picture it. It seems originally to be a neutral construct (Kellermann, 207), with any negative connotations supplied by the context, such as in the Habakkuk passage (cf. Is 33:15; 57:17). It can also have a positive connotation (Mic 4:13). It does then seem to develop a more negative connotation in itself, mainly due to its inappropriate acquisition or use through means such as bribes (e.g., 1 Sam 8:3), so care needs to be used in interpreting it.

Evil actions are not limited to God’s covenant people. Aram (Syria), Israel’s neighbor to the east, joined with them in plotting evil by attacking Judah (Is 7:5-6). The actions taken by *Babylon against Judah were designated “evil” and were punished by God (Jer 51:24, 60). Assyria, and its capital, Nineveh, also engaged in evil activity noticed by God (Jon 1:2), as did the “nations” (Zech 1:15).

The noun ʾāwen shares part of its semantic range with r^{c} , at times paralleling it (Is 31:2; 59:7; Jer 4:14; Ezek 11:2; Mic 2:1). It designates iniquitous worship practices such as breaking Sabbath (Is 1:13) or consulting idols (Hos 12:11 [Heb v. 12]; Zech 10:2). It also designates actions detrimental to the poor and others who are defenseless (Is 10:1-2; 32:6), those mistreated in legal contexts (Is 29:20-21), and shedding blood (Hos 6:8). Its perpetrators are either foolish (Is 32:6) or purposefully wicked (Is 59:7). Also, ʾāwen is regularly associated with inappropriate speech (Is 58:9; Zech 10:2).

Prophets condemn many of these same evil actions even though not specifically designating them as “evil,” so one must be careful not to assume that a simple word study can exhaust the topic. A lengthy representative list of many of the deeds already enumerated is found in Ezekiel 22:6-12.

3.2. Evil Results. The range of meanings of the root r^{c} shows that it can denote a spectrum pointing to a process rather than a single event or action. A similar example of a process concept from English is “farming,” which involves a myriad of discrete activities under the overarching concept of crop production and animal husbandry. A Hebrew example is the word ḥattāʾt, which can be employed to indicate a range of related concepts, depending on its context, including sin itself (Jer 31:34), the resultant guilt (Jer 17:1), punishment for sin (Zech 14:19) and a *sacrifice atoning for sin (Ezek 44:27). In any specific case, one of these meanings from across the meaning spectrum of a single word would be in mind, so it is important to understand which nuance is intended.

In the case of the root under discussion, “evil” performed by Israel and Judah results in Yahweh speaking “evil” over them (Jer 11:17); thus, a bad action yields a bad result, with both action and result described by the same term (Is 31:2; 47:10-11; Jer 18:8-11; 26:3; Ezek 6:9-10; Jon 3:10), or the bad result following negative actions specified by other terms (Jer 4:18). This bad consequence of a bad act is what T. Fretheim refers to as “the created moral order” (Fretheim, 49). This usage describing the result of an evil act is well translated as “catastrophe, disaster,” reflecting the negative impact upon the recipient while avoiding any negative moral connotation of the word itself in these cases. This shows the importance of relativity or point of view, since, C. S. Lewis pointed out, a hell for humans could, at the same time, be heaven for mosquitoes (Lewis, 141). For humans, what appears harmful (bad or evil) to them could in fact be beneficial if it precipitates the cessation of unacceptable behavior. This understanding of the term is quite important theologically because on many occasions God is said to cause this “disaster” (Is 45:7; Jer 19:3, 15; 26:13; 35:17; 40:2; Ezek 14:22). A translation using “evil” in these instances, as in, for example, the KJV rendition of Amos 3:6 (“Shall there be evil in a city, and the LORD hath not done it?”), could be seen to attribute moral depravity to God. Therefore, one must use care in determining which semantic nuance of the terms best suits the situation.

Israel itself can acknowledge human culpability for “evil” consequences (Jer 26:19; Dan 9:14). There is a nexus of evil and disaster that is evident even to pagans, though not always recognized by God’s prophets (Jon 1:7-8). Those who deny this connection will perish (Amos 9:10).

The misfortune is not solely the result of breach of the covenant between Israel and its God, however. Unnamed plotters threaten Moab with disaster (Jer 48:2, 16), while God promises to bring it against both Elam (Jer 49:37) and Babylon (Jer 51:2, 64).

The word ’āwen also indicates deleterious results of evil actions, the disaster of *exile (Amos 5:5), or the incursions of an army from the north (Jer 4:14).

Preferable to the suffering resulting from practicing evil is the joy derived from avoiding disaster (Is 56:2), which positive outcome is God’s ultimate goal (Jer 18:8; 26:3; 29:11; 32:42; 42:10; Joel 2:13; Jon 4:2; cf. Is 55:7 [’āwen]).

See also JUSTICE, RIGHTEOUSNESS; REPENTANCE; SIN, SINNERS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. W. Baker, “רָעָה,” NIDOTTE 3:1154-58; W. Eichrodt, Theology of the Old Testament, trans. J. A. Baker (OTL; London: SCM, 1967) 2:483-95; T. E. Fretheim, Creation Untamed: The Bible, God, and Natural Disasters (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2010); A. J. Heschel, The Prophets (New York: Harper & Row, 1962); D. Kellermann, “רָעָה,” TDOT 2:205-8; C. S. Lewis, The Problem of Pain (New York: HarperCollins, 2001); J. C. McCann Jr., “רָעָה,” NIDOTTE 1:694-95. D. W. Baker

DOTTE 3:1154-58; W. Eichrodt, Theology of the Old Testament, trans. J. A. Baker (OTL; London: SCM, 1967) 2:483-95; T. E. Fretheim, Creation Untamed: The Bible, God, and Natural Disasters (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2010); A. J. Heschel, The Prophets (New York: Harper & Row, 1962); D. Kellermann, “רָעָה,” TDOT 2:205-8; C. S. Lewis, The Problem of Pain (New York: HarperCollins, 2001); J. C. McCann Jr., “רָעָה,” NIDOTTE 1:694-95. D. W. Baker

EXILE

The study of the period of the biblical exile, or forced migration, is complex. This seminal period is no longer viewed simply as a monolithic period of approximately seventy years of punishment (Jer 25:11-12; 29:10; Zech 1:12; 7:5; Dan 9:2), while the *land of Judah remained dormant and in purification until its restoration. Even though there had already been a displacement and resettlement of the northern kingdom of Israel to Assyria (721 bc), the exile has been understood historically as the southern kingdom of Judah’s experience of displacement and resettlement in *Babylon in the sixth century bc. The critical examination and re-evaluation of this period now involves a careful study of at least three or four generations in Babylon, a *remnant community or communities back in Judah (with Mizpah replacing Jerusalem after 587 bc) dealing with parallel or even sharply different issues of survival than their Judeo-Babylonian counterparts, as well as Judean refugees in Egypt, Pathros, Ethiopia, Elam, Hamath (Elephantine) and presumably the coastlands as well (Jer 31:10; Ezek 39:6; Dan 11:30; CD) (see Israelite History).

1. Preliminary Considerations
2. The Nomenclature of “Exile”
3. Displacement
4. Resettlement and Generational Consciousness

1. Preliminary Considerations.

1.1. The Three Waves of Displacement. Historically, with three distinct waves of displacement to Babylon in 597, 587 and 582 bc, the time frame of the exile is classically marked as beginning ca. 597 bc, from the initial wave of the first generation Judeans (or Judeo-Babylonians) displaced to Babylon, until 538 bc, the brink of the first wave of the third and fourth generation Judeo-Babylonians/Persians preparing for return migrations to Yehud. An alternative time frame has been suggested by R. Albertz, from 587 to 520 (or 515) BC, that is, from the destruction of the *temple in Jerusalem to the rebuilding of the (second) temple. However, such a demarcation eclipses the import of the displaced and resettled royal Davidic family, the military, the elites, and the merchants and skilled classes of peoples of 597 BC. It was these principal groups' work that established the first Judean ethnic enclave in Babylon (Ps 137; Ezek 1:1; 3:15), thereby making life less caustic for subsequent Judean forced migrants who arrived in 587 and 582 BC. Delineating the exile by temple-centered events rather than by people-centered events places undue emphasis on an edifice, as significant as it was. A more serious complication that rises with this attempt to re-date the exile is that by 520 or 515 BC the exilic period had made its way into the Achaemenid (Persian) or the return migrations period—well into the time of Darius. Outside a small circle of modern scholars focused on the temple, the scholarly consensus is that the study of the exile of Judah and the Judeans is best understood as a period under the hegemony of the Neo-Babylonians (626-539 BC: Nabopolassar [620-605 BC]; Nebuchadnezzar [605-562 BC]; Amel-Marduk [562-560 BC]; Neriglissar [560-556 BC]; Labasi-Marduk [556 BC]; Nabonidus [556-539 BC]).

1.2. Approaches to the Study of the Exilic Period. Traditionally there are three accepted and proven methods for the critical study of the exilic period: historical-archeological, literary and sociological (see Social-Scientific Approaches). The sociological approach, which includes historical and literary analyses, has been the catalyst for promising new thinking and insights (e.g., J. Wellhausen, D. Smith-Christopher, H. Barstad, J. Ahn). Just as history has a way of repeating itself, so also do social structures. How peoples, individually and collectively in ancient or modern times, respond to displacement and resettlement has not changed much. Examining the struggles and the rebuilding of lives in successive waves of various (im)migrants and their families reveals similar human experiences of struggle and joy. U. Segal points out that regardless of whether a migration is involuntary or voluntary, the lives of all first generation (im)migrants are laden with indescribable hardships, pains and sacrifices—with past traditions and ideals clashing under new domains. Yet the issues and concerns of each ensuing generation are noticeably different. Thus, accurately identifying those sets of social constructions and structures that confronted the Judeans will substantially aid us in better understanding the exile, or forced migrations, of the sixth century BC.

2. The Nomenclature of Exile.

2.1. Synonyms. Lexically, the most common expression for exile in Biblical Hebrew is głh. Yet there are at least eight additional comparable Hebrew or Aramaic terms (bdr [Aramaic], “scatter”; bzr, “scatter”; zrh “scatter”; nps, “spread out, scatter”; ps, “scatter, disperse”; dłh [Niphal], “be pushed”; ndh [Piel], “force out”; and šbh [Niphal], “be taken captive”) that express both the individual and collective experience of forced migration.

2.2. Exile. Much of previous critical scholarship on the exile, from Henrich Ewald (1878) to Adolphe Lods (1950), primarily advanced Julius Wellhausen's social observation of the various classes of peoples taken into exile. Unfortunately Wellhausen's brilliant insight was reduced into one grossly generalized and uniform view of Judeans all laboring in great depression, groaning under the wrath of Yahweh. In Wellhausen's Prolegomena to the History of Ancient Israel (1885), followed by W. Robertson Smith (1905), the first generation of critical scholars of exile spoke of this period as the “Babylonian Captivity,” the “Chaldean Vassalage” or simply the “exile,” in its most painfully hopeless and damaging aspects. Much of mid-to late-nineteenth-century biblical scholarship on the exilic period was not necessarily about the period itself but focused on issues in three areas of OT study: (1) whether the Pentateuch was produced before or during/after the exile; (2) Isaiah 40—55 (or 40—66) as belonging to a distinctive author in Babylon or elsewhere; (3) the period as a monochrome background for the study of Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Deutero-Isaiah.

2.3. Exile and Restoration. However, beginning with M. Noth (1953, ET 1967) a transitional generation of exilic scholars contributed significantly to advance the study. C. Whitley (1957) and P. Ackroyd (1968) observed that the sixth century BC had been a dynamic age of intellectual movements, with Taoism in China, the Upanishads of pre-Buddhism, Hinduism in India, Zoroastrianism in Iran, the Orphic-Pythagorean tradition in Greece and the Hebrew exilic prophets in Babylon. It was noted that Israel's literature in response to the exile took on a more meaningful nature when compared with the known literature of the sixth century BC. Thus the Babylonian exile was deemed especially significant, for like the rebirth of a phoenix, there resulted out of pain and hardship a powerful and sustainable literary culture. Indeed, the period of exile was positively linked with restoration.

By 1989 D. Smith's (Smith-Christopher) path-breaking Religion of the Landless, a sociological approach to the subject, had demonstrated how the Judeans lived and even flourished as minorities in Babylon in spite of their traumatic experiences. And with the publication of K. van Lerberghe and A. Schoors' edited volume, Immigration and Emigration within the Ancient Near East (1995), a new window opened for biblical scholars dealing with glh as migration. Now there were invaluable studies on nonindigenous peoples (sojourners, immigrants, foreigners in general, hostages, corvée labors).

2.4. Deportation. H. Barstad's The Myth of the Empty Land (1996) signaled a break from scholars studying simply "exile" or "exile and restoration," and was followed by a collection of essays on the exile from the European Seminar in Historical Methodology, published as Leading Captivity Captive (1998). These two works reshaped the landscape of contemporary exilic scholarship. This second generation of exilic scholarship (1996-2010) charted a fresh perspective by transcending the past and proposing and advocating the construct of the "myth of the empty land." In other words, the exile never happened but was a mythopoetic construct, a literary trope or invention at best (R. Carroll, P. Davies, T. Thompson). And yet for others (B. Oded, R. Albertz) the exile was a watershed historical period, the most seminal period in Israel's history. Indeed, as Albertz poignantly noted, without the exilic experience, ancient Israel would never have arrived at full-blown monotheism, and the missional component of being "a light to the nations" would not have developed. Yet others pressed on with salient questions like: What precisely is the "exile"? Is it to be dated at 597, 587 or 582 BC? Or should it be from 587/6 to 515 BC, or from 598/7 to 538 BC? Is establishing a time frame even necessary, since the exile endured into the Second Temple period? In short, Barstad's innovative thesis that the Judean landed gentry played an important role after the multiple "deportations" to Babylon has provided a much-needed social construct for understanding those that remained in the land after the displacements. But before expanding on Barstad's social construction, we must briefly remark on the term "deportation," which is associated with second-generation exilic scholarship.

In contemporary North American and generally Western sociological, political and jurisprudential settings, "deporting" or "deportation" is connected with "mass deportation," "undocumented peoples," or removing foreign nationals—in other words, the so-called immigration problem. When used to describe the events and the people of Judah in the sixth-century BC, this usage is alarming, even if the term is being used in a neutral sense. Biblical scholars who continue to advocate the use of "deportation" or "deported" when referring to the sixth-century Judeans are overlooking the critical contemporary issue in which "deportation" is closely tied to returning (or detaining) illegal immigrants. The proper term when referring to involuntary mass-movement of people is "displacement."

Barstad's social construction of the *remnant that remained in Judah underscores the importance of socioeconomics. Despite the fact that the king, his court, military, scribes, artisans and others were displaced and resettled in Babylon, the suggestion is that there was minimal disturbance to everyday Judean life since the Judean economy was primarily agrarian. A fully functional, undisrupted Judean society, with trade, commerce, worship and scribal activity continued. In Barstad's understanding the Chronicler's characterization that "the land was empty" is seen as a myth since the land was still populated. While there is much to be gained from Barstad's contribution, a sociological assessment of his construction raises questions beyond those pursued by B. Oded and others who have debated the notion of myth. A society experiencing a drain of its intellectuals, elites, politicians, military, traders, artisans, smiths and so forth would suffer immediate and long-term disruptions and discontinuities.

The removal or dismissal of the various functional roles represented by the displaced groups of 597 BC projects a gradually decaying, dysfunctional society after each additional displacement in 597, 587 and 582 BC. If, however, replacements or substitutes of peoples are factored in to fill the void left by the displaced groups of 597 BC (that is, from the populace of qualified or unqualified Judeans, or qualified non-Judeans from Edom, Ammon, Moab or other regions), at some point the important question of identity and ethnicity needs to enter into Barstad's social construction. Clearly by the period of the return migrations there was a rich heterogeneous society in Yehud. This was in contrast with the more ethnically monolithic and homogenous—but socioeconomically diverse communities—represented by the Judeo-Babylonians/Persians of the return.

Additionally, a series of pressing questions need to be addressed by Barstad: What does each succeeding Judahite (to distinguish them from the Judeans who involuntarily or voluntarily fled) generation look like? What were the issues and concerns of the first-, second- and third- (and possibly even the fourth-) generation Judahites who continued to populate and survive in the region, along with the Samaritans and others? Were there any similarities or differences between them and their Judeo-Babylonian generational counterparts? A social construction of the exilic period now requires a full working knowledge of each generation unit (a term coined and defined by the social philosopher K. Mannheim). Thus when it comes to biblical texts of the exilic period, the question is refined to, which exilic generational text is it? Is it a first-, transitional, second- or third-generation exilic Judeo-Babylonian text?

In fact, there were continuities and discontinuities in Judah after the displacements. But in support of Barstad's social construction, the central Judahite perspective on the exile during its seventy years was of a continuous period of judgment, punishing the children for the sins of the fathers down to the third and fourth generation (Ex 20:5; 34:7; Deut 5:9). However, from a Judeo-Babylonian point of view—clearly for the second and subsequent generations in Babylon—the outlook is quite different. That is, each generation is responsible for its own action (Jer 31:29; Ezek 18:2). In fact, for the likes of Daniel, Shadrach, Meshach, Abednego and others, there were opportunities for upward socioeconomic movement. Herein lies the fundamental difference between the two predominant views on the period of exile, or forced migrations.

2.5. Forced Migrations. The third generation of exilic scholarship speaks of “forced migration,” “displacement and resettlement” and “diaspora studies” to reframe and further advance our understanding of the exilic period. The introduction of forced-migration studies to exilic scholarship was undertaken by J. Ahn in his 2006 Yale dissertation (published in 2011 as Exile as Forced Migrations) and has subsequently fostered new critical reflection on the exilic, or forced-migrations, period. In parallel with “forced migration,” “return migration” is the suggested corollary for reexamining issues and concerns of the postexilic period. For biblical studies the term forced migrations (plural) plays a role in all three recorded displacements of 597, 587 and 582 BC.

The study of forced migration takes into account theories of migration, reasons for such force and analyses of displaced peoples. It seeks to identify extrinsic factors or forces that cause involuntary movements of peoples. Forced migration produces a host of problems: urban redevelopment, population structure, redistribution policies, regional redevelopment followed by challenges to identity and ethnicity and so forth. Biblical scholars and specialists on the exilic period can benefit by reflecting on these and other issues that likely played some role in the sixth century BC.

A problem in contemporary exilic scholarship is the conjoining of the 597 and 587 BC groups due to the inability of past scholarship to discern the separate concerns of the two groups. Past studies have neglected the fact that by 587 BC Judah was already conquered and annexed by the Neo-Babylonians (597 BC). Technically, it is correct to speak of the first wave of forced migrants as exiles. But to speak of the second displacement of the 587 BC group as exiles is a misnomer. The fact that the territory of Judah was already subjugated, incorporated and recognized as a part of the expanded Neo-Babylonian Empire suggests that the event that took place in 587 BC was in fact an internal displacement of peoples from the periphery of the Babylonian empire (Judah) to the center (Babylon), not another exile.

Judah ceased to exist autonomously after Je-hoiachin relinquished the throne in 597 BC. The state of Judah was reduced to a vassal status, and thus the 587 BC event was not so much a conquering or even a reconquering of Judah or Jerusalem, but a means of quelling an insurrection by destroying Judah's religious edifice as punishment and relocating its landed gentry to Babylon to serve as expendable laborers. The 582 BC event is also best understood in this way, for here we read of another group of people, including Jeremiah, crossing an international boundary and seeking asylum or refuge in Egypt (Jer 24:8; cf. Jer 26:21). Thus we rightfully turn to refugee studies to further understand the groups associated with 582 BC, which voluntarily took flight to Egypt or elsewhere.

In 2 Kings 24:4-16 we read that in the "eighth year" of Nebuchadnezzar, ten thousand people (2 Kings 24:14) were taken to Babylon. In 2 Kings 24:16, however, seven thousand able men for war and one thousand artisans and smiths were displaced. The discrepancy in these recorded numbers is further complicated by the figures presented in Jeremiah 52:28-30: In Nebuchadnezzar's "seventh year," 3,023 were displaced; in the eighteenth year, 832; in his twenty-third year, Nebuzaradan, the captain of the guard, took 745 men of Judah into forced migration.

S. Hermann says, "we must suppose that even after the fall of Jerusalem [587/6 BC], further groups of the population were sent into exile at intervals, even if we cannot see the reason for this measure or the system behind it" (Hermann, 291). Perhaps the system behind the multiple forced migrations of Judeans to Babylon was the result of careful socioeconomic planning for regional development. We can be reasonably certain, even without direct evidence, that the Neo-Babylonians must have carefully calculated the exact number of persons needed for each specific irrigation-canal project (or other building projects). The fact that Jeremiah 52:28-30 records exact figures in decreasing numbers is significant. These do not appear to be arbitrary figures since they decrease as the years progress. Although this suggests that there may have been less demand for Judean workers, it is more likely that the Babylonian irrigation infrastructure had reached its maximum capacity. The authors or redactors of Jeremiah were probably aware that in the Deuteronomistic history the figures were larger and rounded off, but the data preserved in this text clearly denotes a clarification with statistical precision.

In contrast to the single, punctuated mass displacement policy of the Neo-Assyrians (to punish rebellions), the Neo-Babylonians most likely implemented a gradual and repeated system of displacement to maintain and then expand their central economy. Again, in contrast to the Neo-Assyrians, who practiced an expansionist policy of integrating vassal populations into subparts of their acquired empire (a very costly and economically draining enterprise), the Neo-Babylonians practiced the opposite by forcing migration for regional economic development. They brought labor forces, skilled and unskilled, as well as raw and finished material, to Babylon. The Neo-Babylonians imposed forced migration on conquered persons to work on their extensive and numerous primary, secondary and tertiary canals. This repeated systematic and calculated move would have prevented any immediate overpopulation. Such an oversupply of laborers would have had the domino effect of shortages in housing, problems with food distribution, issues with water supply as well as the risk of serious health problems.

Current scholarship recognizes three types of forced migration.

2.5.1. Derivative Forced Migration (DFM). This is a "static migration" that results from geopolitical and cartographical rearrangement. Since the Neo-Babylonians expanded and included Judah into their remapped empire when Jehoiachin relinquished his throne in 597 BC, Derivative Forced Migration best describes the first displacement to Babylon in 597 BC. This term also takes into account the Judeans that encountered an "exile-less exile." In fact, even after the additional forced migrations in 587 and 582 BC, the characteristics of Derivative Forced Migration existed.

2.5.2. Purposive Forced Migration (PFM). The varied purposes of forced migration may be attributed to profit, culture, race, religion, security, punishment or revenge. The forced migration of Judeans in 587 and 582 BC is best described as Purposive Forced Migration related to international security issues, the punishment for Zedekiah's rebellion, as well as the profit motivation to sustain regional economic growth in Babylon.

2.5.3. Responsive Forced Migration (RFM). In contrast to the first two, which are involuntary forced migration, Responsive Forced Migration is a voluntary relocation from one country to another. In response to forces of political or natural oppressions of tyranny, warfare, domestic or climate-related change, people choose to migrate voluntarily. Thus in 582 BC a group of Judeans, including Jeremiah, voluntarily crossed over into Egypt in response to the fear of Babylonian reprisal. This also perhaps best describes the forced migrations to the coastlands.

2.5.4. Summary. All three types of forced migration are applicable to the events of the sixth century BC and are tabulated in table 1.

	597 BC	587 BC	582 BC
Judeo-Babylonians	DFM	PFM	PFM
Judeans (in the land)	DFM	DFM	DFM
Judeo-Egyptians (and possibly coastlands)			RFM

Table 1. Types of Forced Migration and Sixth-Century Judeans

3. Displacement.

For exilic and biblical studies, the study of displacement highlights the intrinsic or internal migration issues that impact the lives of displaced peoples. Issues and concerns that arise because of forced population transfer to a new nation are manifold: (1) tensions between local and central politics; (2) clashes between cultural/traditional values and new ones; (3) struggles of socioeconomic classes; (4) challenges of preserving one's first language (Hebrew) in the immediacy of one's family or community while dealing with the language or languages of the dominant culture (e.g., Aramaic for speaking and Akkadian/Sumerian for reading or writing); (5) restrictions of food or diet; (6) issues of gender and marriage (e.g., at what generational point does intermarriage become a realistic possibility); (7) problems of raising children and grandchildren in a bifurcated or dual culture; (8) questions of partial or full acculturation or assimilation; (9) struggles to maintain religious practices, including those for the sake of social identity; (10) defining the concept of home (is it Babylon or Judah/Yehud?). These and other factors become visible upon full resettlement. And indeed, in Babylon the Judeo-Babylonians experienced the range of concerns as forced migrants or immigrants over a period epitomized as "seventy years."

Complementing the three types of forced migration (see 2.5 above) a typology of displacement has been developed.

3.1. Development-Induced Displaced Persons.

In our contemporary world we see that thousands of people are displaced from their homelands or areas of habitual residence and resettled for purposes of economic development, industrialization (e.g., dam projects) or even preserving a rainforest. Nations or governmental entities carry this out in the name of eminent domain.

In the event of 597 BC, the king, his royal family, political advisers and court, as well as scribes, priests, military, and the artisans and smiths may be seen as Development-Induced Displaced Persons (DIDPs). The Neo-Babylonian government used its displaced and resettled persons for the development of its arable land and dilapidated infrastructure as well as for political control of Judah.

Moreover, from the Neo-Babylonian socioeconomic and theo-political point of view, the empire likely used this forced migration to achieve its goals of regional economic infrastructure redevelopment and urban stimulus. Ethnic enclaves were created beside the irrigation canals of Babylon, where they maintained the canals for agricultural production. Such efforts would be renewed with fresh workers arriving in 587 and 582 BC, possibly including other displacements not recorded in the OT. Sustaining ethnic enclaves requires two items for success: capital and maintaining the same ethnic group, if necessary through a program of chain migration.

From a Neo-Babylonian point of view, if the first wave of forced migrants in 597 BC had been completely ineffective, there would have been little or no need for additional displacement and resettlement of Judeans to Babylon. From a Judeo-Babylonian point of view, we must assume that the elites, including those who once ran a nation, fully recognized the purpose of their displacement and resettlement. Should they fail, there may have been severe consequences imposed on them and their children. Their local form of governance and outlook would not have been exclusive to the Judeo-Babylonian community but inclusive of those who remained in their homeland of Judah. And should a disaster strike Judah, as it did in 587 and 582 BC under the reigns of Zedekiah and Gedaliah, forced migration to Babylon would function as a means of saving lives.

3.2. Internally Displaced Persons. The category Internally Displaced Persons is internationally recognized today as referring to individuals or groups who, without crossing an internationally recognized state border, have been forced to flee their homes or regular domiciles in order to avoid violence, armed conflict, disaster or violations of human rights. The Judeans of 587 BC experienced armed conflict, violence, and human-made disaster (famine via the two- or three-year siege [cf. Deut 28:48-57]). The Babylonians forced the labor class, or the people of the land, to leave their homes and places of habitual residence. Against their will, and in violation of human rights, the Judeans were forcibly relocated within the expanded empire to Babylon. In the modern context internal displacement is recognized as occurring where large construction projects are used to forcibly relocate minority groups. This can be seen in the additional displacements of the Judeans to the irrigation canals of Babylon in 587 and 582 BC.

3.3. Refugees. In contrast to Internally Displaced Persons, refugees are people who flee against their will because of fear for their lives but cross an internationally recognized state border. So it was with those who fled after Gedaliah's murder in 582 BC: "All the soldiers, women, children and eunuchs whom Johanan brought back from Gibeon" (Jer 41:16) voluntarily fled and sought asylum in Egypt despite Jeremiah's warning not to go down to Egypt (Jer 42:19). This group crossed an international border into Egypt whereas the other 582 BC group was internally displaced to Babylon.

Profiling the group taken to Babylon in 582 BC has apparently not been attempted in exilic scholarship until now. The four fast days commemorating the catastrophe of Jerusalem in Zechariah 8:19 are: (1) the start of the siege (the tenth month: Jer 52:4), (2) the breaching of Jerusalem's wall (the fourth month: Jer 52:6-7), (3) the destruction of Jerusalem (the fifth month: Jer 52:12-13) and (4) the assassination of Gedaliah (the seventh month: Jer 41:1-2). Gedaliah likely represented all the displaced people from the 582 BC event. Clearly his murder was traumatic. He symbolized and meant a lot to the people he represented. The biblical text speaks of the "people of the land" that remained after the initial and secondary displacements: "None remained except the poorest people of the land," and "the captain of the guard Nebuzaradan left some of the poorest of the land to be vinedressers and plowmen" (2 Kings 25:12; Jer 52:16). This offers some insight into the economic context of post-587 BC. When Ishmael son of Nethaniah, the son of Elishama, and ten men assassinate Gedaliah, the purpose was to completely disrupt and economically cut off Judah's production of wine, balm and other goods that flowed into Babylon. It was successful. Johanan and the remaining leaders took the remaining Judahites to Egypt, and eventually this group would become the Elephantine Jews in Egypt.

Because Gedaliah was pro-Deuteronomic, we can suppose that the Deuteronomic code that advocates on behalf of the poor, and especially the "foreigners," was in full practice. So rightfully, although hard work was imposed on the foreigners and the poor Judahites of the land, we ought to surmise that they were well treated, with respect and dignity, and all enjoined in the faith of Yahweh. Gedaliah is remembered as this group's ideological representative. Yet, although the displacement of this 582 BC group to Babylon is recorded, the people that make up this particular event are not recorded. Yet their children, the second generation of the 582 BC group, resurface as the ones who claim, "Let not the foreigner who has joined himself to the LORD say, 'The LORD will surely separate me from his people'" (Isa 56:3). These words would best be assigned to the second and subsequent generation of descendants of the 582 BC group. In Babylon, ironically, they continued to experience and perpetuate the stereotype of being "children of foreigners."

3.4. Summary. In summary, the Judeans of 597 BC are best described as Development-Induced Displaced Persons who experienced Derivative Forced Migration. The 587 BC Judeans displaced to Babylon are Internally Displaced Persons who experienced Purposive Forced Migration. And those taken to Babylon in 582 BC are also considered Internally Displaced Persons, having experienced Purposive Forced Migration. But those who responded and took flight by crossing into Egypt or possibly elsewhere are best seen as refugees or asylum seekers who experienced Responsive Forced Migration.

4. Resettlement and Generational Consciousness.

4.1. Resettlement. With resettlement, factoring in a complicated process of moving thousands of peoples (for modern-day cases see Ahn 2011, 62-66), individuals and families soon after begin to unpack their experience by critically reflecting on their new life—comparing and contrasting the social construction of reality of the past and their present. The social construction of reality is reflected upon in Psalm 137:1: “There, by the irrigation canals of Babylon, there we lived and wept when we remembered Zion” (Ps 137:1). However, the reality check is that it is not the first generation of forced (im)migrants that can move out, but their children (the 1.5 and second generation) and their children’s children (third generation) that finally break free—moving and climbing upward on the socioeconomic ladder by “building, planting, and living” (Jer 29).

4.2. Generational Consciousness. An important new contribution to the study of the exilic or forced migrations period is “generational consciousness.” Interestingly, most sociological works that trace generational issues and concerns conclude with the third generation: M. Lee Hansen’s law of the third generation is that “What the son or daughter wishes to forget, the grandson or granddaughter wishes to remember.” Usually by the fourth generation there is complete and full assimilation and upward integration. This three-generational consciousness is interestingly visible in prophetic literature, especially in Isaianic scholarship’s designation of First-Second-Third Isaiah.

The unresolved impasse of the seventy years in exilic scholarship finds resolution when the seventy years is understood as a marker of social reflectivity—reflectivity of self-consciousness that is social in nature. It attests to a threefold Judeo-Babylonian generational consciousness. More specifically, it precisely marks three and a half generations, with each generational unit demarcated by twenty years, as the book of Numbers suggests. Thus, the generational makeup of the entire Judeo-Babylonian society in Babylon is the first (twenty years) generation, the transitional (1.5) generation (ten years), the second generation (twenty years), and the third generation (twenty years). The period of approximately seventy years is roughly broken down as follows:

597-577 BC: First Generation Judeo-Babylonians (twenty years): Psalm 137

Generational description: Adult Judeans displaced and resettled to Babylon

Social issues: hardships as found in all first-generation forced migrants

597 BC: Loss of social prestige, status, being reduced to corvée work on the irrigation canals of Babylon, experiencing insults, longing to return

587 BC: Loss of children and destruction of the temple

582 BC: Dismissed by the first and second waves of migrants, hybrid identity issues

Theological motif: Communal lament

597-587/582 BC: Transitional (1.5) generation of Judeo-Babylonians (ten years): Jeremiah 29

Generation description: Judean adolescents/teenagers brought to Babylon (Daniel and his three friends)

Social issues: build, live, plant, marry, have children—to prosper economically

Theological motif: Golah hope in the fabric of prayer

576-556 BC: Second generation of Judeo-Babylonians (twenty years): Isaiah 43

Generation description: Born to the first or 1.5 generation parents in Babylon

Social issues: Assimilation through education, in-group and out-group, economic issues within the second generation between the descendants of 597, 587, 582 BC

Theological motif: New creation

555-535 BC: Third generation of Judeo-Babylonians (twenty years): Numbers 32

Generation description: Born to second-generation parents (first generation Judeo-Persians)

Social Issues: Defining home and what constitutes home

Theological motif: Justifying home on the other side of the Jordan

This generational demarcation helps to identify the issues and concerns of each Judeo-Babylonian generational unit. In addition, it helps place particular exilic biblical texts in their proper generational Sitz im Leben. This Judeo-Babylonian generational consciousness is an integral aspect of contemporary exilic scholarship.

See also BABYLON; EXODUS IMAGERY; ISRAELITE HISTORY; LAND; REMNANT; TEMPLE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. Ackroyd, Exile and Restoration (OTL; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1968); J. Ahn, Exile as Forced Migrations: A Sociological, Literary, and Theological Approach on the Displacement and Resettlement of the Southern Kingdom of Judah (BZAW 417; Berlin/New York: de Gruyter, 2011); idem, ed., The Last of Kings on Exile: Forced Migrations in 2 Kings 24-25 (Leiden: forthcoming); J. Ahn and M. Leuchter, eds., The Prophets Speak on Forced Migrations: Exile in Major and Minor Cadence (BZAW; Berlin/New York: T & T Clark, 2012); J. Ahn and J. Middlemas, eds., By the Irrigation Canals of Babylon: Approaches to the Study of the Exile (LHBOTS 526; New York/London: T & T Clark, 2012); R. Albertz, Israel in Exile: The History and Literature of the Sixth Century B.C.E. (Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2003); H. Barstad, The Myth of the Empty Land: A Study in the History and Archeology of Judah during the "Exilic" Period (SO 28; Oslo: Scandinavian University Press, 1996); M. Coogan, "Into Exile: From Assyrian Conquest of Israel to the Fall of Babylon," in The Oxford History of the Biblical World, ed. M. D. Coogan (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998) 242-75; L. L. Grabbe, ed., Leading Captivity Captive: The 'Exile' as History and Ideology (JSOTSup 278/ESHM 2; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1998); M. Halvorson-Taylor, Enduring Exile: The Metaphorization of Exile in the Hebrew Bible (VTSup 141; Boston/Leiden: Brill, 2011); S. Hermann, A History of Israel in Old Testament Times (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1981); A. James, "Questioning the Terminology and Definitions of Forced Migrations," in The Politics of Forced Migration: A Conceptual, Operational and Legal Analysis, ed. N. Nachmias and R. Goldstein (Baltimore: Publish America, 2004) 39-61; E. Janssen, Juda in der Exilszeit: Ein Beitrag zur Frage der Entstehung des Judentums (FRLANT 69; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1956); J. Kiefer, Exil und Diaspora: Begrifflichkeit und Deutungen im antiken Judentum und in der Hebräischen Bibel (ABG 19; Leipzig: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 2005); R. Klein, Israel in Exile: A Theological Interpretation (OBT; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); K. van Lerberghe and A.

Schoors, eds., Immigration and Emigration within the Ancient Near East: Festschrift E. Lipiński (Leuven: Peeters, 1995); O. Lipschits, The Fall and Rise of Jerusalem: Judah under Babylonian Rule (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2005); O. Lipschits and J. Blenkinsopp, eds., Judah and the Judeans in the Neo-Babylonian Period (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2003); M. Noth, "The Jerusalem Catastrophe of 587 BC and Its Significance for Israel" in The Laws in the Pentateuch and Other Essays (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1967) 260-80; B. Oded, Mass Deportations and Deportees in the Neo-Assyrian Empire (Wiesbaden: Reichert, 1979); L. Pearce, "New Evidence for Judeans in Babylonia," in Judah and the Judeans in the Persian Period, ed. O. Lipschits and M. Oeming (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2006) 399-411; B. Porten, Archives from Elephantine: The Life of a Jewish Military Colony (Berkeley, Calif.: University of California Press, 1968); U. A. Segal, A Framework for Immigration (New York: Columbia University Press, 2002); D. L. Smith, The Religion of the Landless: The Social Context of the Babylonian Exile (Bloomington, IN: Meyer Stone, 1989); D. L. Smith-Christopher, A Biblical Theology of Exile (OBT; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2000); M.W. Stolper, Entrepreneurs and Empire: The Murašû Archives, the Murašû Firm, and Persian Rule in Babylonia (Leiden: Nederlands Historisch-Archeologisch Instituut te Istanbul, 1985); C. C. Torrey, The Composition and Historical Value of Ezra-Nehemiah (BZAW 2; Giessen: J. Ricker, 1896); E.A. Unger, Babylon: Die Heilige Stadt nach der Beschreibung der Babylonier (2 Auflage; ed. R. Borger; Berlin: deGruyter, 1970); D. S. Vanderhooft, The Neo-Babylonian Empire and Babylon in the Latter Prophets (HSM 59; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1999); K. van Lerberghe and A. Schoors, eds., Immigration and Emigration within the Ancient Near East: Festschrift E. Lipiński (OLA 65; Leuven: Uitgeverij Peeters en Departement Oriëntalistiek, 1995); C. F. Whitley, The Exilic Age (Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1957); R. R. Wilson, "Forced Migration and the Formation of the Prophetic Literature," in By the Irrigation Canals of Babylon: Approaches to the Study of the Exile, ed. J. Ahn and J. Middlemas (LHBOTS 526; New York/London: T & T Clark, 2012); R. Zadok, The Jews in Babylonia during the Chaldean and Achaemenian Periods according to the Babylonian Sources (Haifa: University of Haifa Press, 1979).

J. Ahn

EXODUS IMAGERY

There are a number of places in the prophets where the influence of particular moments in the exodus is clearly and commonly recognized (e.g., Is 11:15-16; Jer 7:22; 34:13; Ezek 20:5, 36; Hos 2:15; 11:1; Amos 3:1; Mic 6:4; 7:14-15). These texts primarily appeal to the fundamentals of Yahweh's previously revealed character and sovereign power as the basis for Israel's present judgment and future restoration. This suggests that the exodus was widely seen as Israel's foundational and identity-shaping moment. If so, as with all such events, one then would expect it to be the prophets' presupposition and hence something that could be evoked often by a simple allusion. Furthermore, the exodus is not so much a cluster of isolated events as an interrelated narrative tapestry. An appeal to one aspect may well imply interconnections with other related themes. But allusions of this kind depend on prior knowledge. It is here, when we move beyond explicit statements to inquire what else of the exodus the prophets knew, that matters quickly become more complex and therefore controversial. Our only substantial data for comparison is the extant pentateuchal exodus narratives. But this immediately raises the question of the relative dating and sources of those pentateuchal passages under consideration and, indeed, of the Prophetic Books themselves.

Given the constraints of this article, the following working assumptions have been made. First, based on various indications in Israel's Scriptures, the exodus is taken to include those events from Yahweh's initial response to Israel's cry in Egypt up to Moses' final words on the threshold of the conquest. Second, in keeping with vast majority of recent scholarly work on this subject, a final-form canonical approach is taken here. This is not to deny the benefits of redactional and source studies of the exodus and covenant traditions or of the Prophetic Books themselves. But such matters could not reasonably be resolved in an article of this limited scope. On the positive side, it does allow us, for example, to appreciate the intertextual links across the "three" Isaiahs and the role of Hosea in leading off the Book of the Twelve. Third, in order to help the reader identify possible allusions and to avoid undue repetition, we begin with a brief recital, in narrative form, of the exodus, highlighting its various themes and motifs. The level of detail herein is in large degree the result of attempting to correlate this overview with the kinds of detail considered in the close readings undertaken in a number of the articles listed in the bibliography.

The reader is cautioned, however, that this summary is necessarily a highly compressed and artificial construct. It should not be taken to suggest that every prophet had recourse to all these particular details in this particular form. The summary is simply a guide emerging from the particular circumstances of this article. On the other hand, reading the prophets even on this somewhat artificial basis can offer, if not certainty, at least some strong indications of the extent of a given prophet's understanding of the exodus and the influence that such understanding exerted on his writings.

Finally, the sections on the individual prophets combine my own close reading of the exodus narratives and the prophets in concert with the work of others. If a particular allusion was judged convincing in respect to one prophet, it was, in keeping with my attempt to read the entire corpus with a consistent level of sensitivity, applied across the board to others.

1. Exodus Themes
2. The Major Prophets
3. Daniel
4. The Book of the Twelve
5. Conclusion

1. Exodus Themes.

The exodus begins with Yahweh showing himself to be the *covenant-keeping God who hears Israel's cry (Ex 2:24; 3:7-14; Deut 9:5) and who, in begetting, creating and carrying them, establishes his father-son relationship with his people (Ex 4:22; Deut 1:31; 32:5-6, 15-18). In bringing them out of slavery (Ex 6:13; 7:4; 12:17; Lev 26:13; Deut 5:6) to *worship him on "this mountain" (e.g., Ex 3:12; 4:23; 8:1, 20), plundering their enemies (Ex 11:1-3; 12:35-36) and giving them a land flowing with milk and honey (Ex 3:8; Deut 6:3), he became their Redeemer, Savior, Deliverer and Rock (Ex 3:8; 6:6; 13; 14:30; 15:13; 18:10-11; Deut 7:8; 9:21; 13:5; 32:4, 15-18). At the same time, through his mighty arm and outstretched hand, particularly at the Reed Sea (Ex 14—15), he shows himself to be the mighty warrior Lord over creation and the nations and their gods (Ex 12:12; 15:11; 18:11; 34:10; Num 33:4; Deut 1:30; 3:24; 4:34; 10:12; 26:18; cf. Ex 19:16). This dual aspect of merciful redeemer and judicial warrior is intended to reveal his glory, making his name known not just to Israel (Ex 6:2-8; 10:2; Deut 5:24) and the Egyptians (Ex 7:5; 9:29; 14:17-18), but also throughout the earth (Ex 9:16; 32:12). Thus, on the one hand, Egypt is humbled and the nations tremble (Ex 15:14; Deut 2:25), but on the other hand, a mixed multitude also comes up out of Egypt with the possibility of joining Israel (Ex 12:38-49).

The central moment of the exodus occurs after Yahweh's fearful and earth-shattering descent on Sinai, intended to instill fear against sin (Ex 19:16-19; 20:18-21), when he makes covenant with Israel to be their God and they his kingdom-priest people (Ex 19:6; 24; Num 9:1-14; cf. Ex 6:7). Its terms will govern their relationship with him and the land and its continued fruitfulness (e.g., Ex 6:4; 20—23; 34; Lev 1—9; 11—27; Num 5—6; 15:1-26; 18—19; 28—30; Deuteronomy). Its wisdom, along with his presence, is to serve as a witness to the nations (Deut 4:6-8). Israel is to have no other gods (Ex 20:3, 23; 23:13-32; Deut 5:7; 12:12-13). If they do, Yahweh will judge them by giving them over to their enemies (Deut 7:4; 8:19; 11:28; 32), withdrawing his presence (Deut 31:18; 32:16-20), casting them out like the nations before them (Lev 18:24; Deut 8:20) and scattering them in foreign lands (Lev 26:33, 37-39; Deut 4:27; 28:64). On the contrary, as he is holy, they are also to be holy (Lev 11:44-46; Deut 26:19). As he is just and righteous, so also they are to be, remembering that they were once oppressed as slaves in Egypt (Ex 23:2-6; Deut 16:18-20; 24:17-18; 32:4). In this context and having made the appropriate preparation (Ex 25—31; 35—39; Num 7—8), the climax of the exodus is the transfer of Yahweh's presence to the tabernacle, now a moveable Mount Sinai, to dwell among his people (Ex 33:14-16; 40:34-38; Num 9:15-23; cf. Lev 26:12).

But Yahweh's deliverance and faithful provision are met with Israel's rebellion (Ex 16—17; Num 11—20). Expressed most clearly in the adulterous incident of the golden calf (Ex 32; cf. Num 5:11-31), it is here, however, that the true nature of Yahweh's character is revealed. He is the merciful and gracious Lord, who, although by no means leaving the guilty unpunished, abounds in steadfast love and faithfulness to the thousandth generation (Ex 33:19; 34:6-7; cf. Ex 15:3; 20:6). Moses subsequently lays before Israel the two ways, life or death, now on offer from the Lord (Deut 27—32; cf. Lev 26), who can either kill and make alive, wound or heal (Ex 15:26; Deut 32:39). Envisaging the prospect of a rebellious Israel's being cursed and scattered among the nations (Deut 28:64-68; 32:19-26; cf. Lev 26:33), Moses offers, based on Yahweh's compassion, the hope that after judgment will come repentance and final restoration (Deut 30:1-10; 32:36-43; cf. Lev 26:40-45).

2. The Major Prophets.

2.1. Isaiah. No other prophetic work reflects the paradigmatic influence of exodus motifs as does Isaiah. Well-recognized in Isaiah 40—55, it has been less so in the other main sections (Is 1—39; 56—66).

2.1.1. Isaiah 1—39. Isaiah begins with both negative and positive echoes of the exodus. Yahweh's opening complaint is addressed to his rebellious "sons" (Is 1:3-7; cf. Is 29:23; 30:1-2, 9; 63:8) and reflects Moses' Deuteronomic curses and warnings, which are taken up again in Isaiah 5; 28; 30 (see also Deut 21:18-21) (Bergey; Keiser). Yet this is answered by a vision of a future exodus-like theophany over Mount *Zion (Is 4:5) to which, echoing the exodus aim that God's glory and name be known throughout the earth, many *nations will come (Is 2:1-4). Likewise, Isaiah's characteristic designation of God as the "Holy One of Israel," occurring some thirty times throughout the entire work, recalls Yahweh's "I am holy" self-revelation and provides the basis for his actions first as judge and then redeemer (e.g., Is 1:4; 5:19; 12:6; 17:7; 29:19; 37:23; 40:25; 45:11; 54:5; 60:9). In this respect, the similarly repeated references to God's righteousness and *justice are at least partly grounded in the exodus revelation and hence his expectations of the same in Israel (e.g., Is 1:12-28; 5:7-24; 9:7; 11:4-7; 28:17; 32:16-17; 42:21; 45:8, 21; 56:1; 58:2). As judge, Yahweh in an antiexodus refuses to heal (Is 6:10; cf. Ex 15:26) or show compassion (Is 9:17; cf. Is 27:11) and stretches out his mighty hand against his people (Is 1:24-25; 5:25; 8:11; 9:12-21; 10:4), who now flee from his Sinai-like earth-shattering and glorious presence (Is 2:19-21). Because they have forgotten God their "Rock" (Is 17:10), their land, full of idols (Is 2:6-8; cf. 31:7) and injustice (Is 1:4, 15-17, 21-23), will be cursed (Is 17:11). Although the vine of his planting, they have produced wild fruit (Is 5; cf. Deut 32:32-35). Adding insult to injury, Yahweh's rebellious sons now seek salvation from Egypt (Is 30:1-2; 31:6); not surprisingly, their plans will fail disastrously (Is 30:5-7; 31:1-3).

But this is not the last word. As redeemer, the Lord of the exodus will "stretch out his hand" not only over the mighty waters of Assyria (cf. Is 8:7-8), just as he had the sea of Egypt (Is 10:24-26; 30:31), but also over all the nations (Is 14:26-27; 19:16; 23:11; 26:11). Showing himself still the "Everlasting Father" and "Mighty God" (Is 9:6), he will, in the context of a restored Davidic ruler (Is 11:1-9), extend his hand a second time to effect a new exodus, this time from Assyria (Is 11:11-16) but also Egypt, so that the *remnant of his people might worship again on his holy "mountain" (Is 27:12-13). Thus, the prophet reprises the strains of the exodus Song of the Sea (Is 12:2-5; cf. Ex 15:1-2, 21), for the Lord will again have compassion on his people and restore them (Is 14:1; cf. Is 30:18-19). Correspondingly, the nations will then experience the power of his theophanic coming and raised arm (Is 30:27-32; 31:3; 33:2-3) as Yahweh hears his people's cry (Is 30:19), heals them (Is 30:26), plunders their enemies (Is 33:4, 23b-24) and reveals his glory, waters springing up in the desert, as he leads the redeemed along a "Holy Way" back to their "Rock" in Jerusalem (Is 30:29; 35:1-10). Whereas the exodus spoke of a mixed multitude coming up with Israel, in this greater new exodus there would now be a highway both for Egypt, whose cry the Lord will also hear (Is 19:20), and for Assyria, who, along with Israel, will be God's blessed and worshiping peoples (Is 19:18-24).

2.1.2. Isaiah 40—55. Although questioned by some and the nature of the language and imagery debated (is it concrete or metaphorical? [Kiesow; Barstad; Lim]), the exodus is more influential here than in any other part of the prophetic corpus (Anderson). Its presence in the prologue (Is 40:1-11), the end of the first section (Is 48:20-21) and the epilogue (Is 55:12) suggests its paradigmatic significance. Beginning with the recollection of Israel's retribution from Yahweh's (outstretched) "hand" (Is 40:2; cf., e.g., Is 1:24-25; 5:25), the scene-setting proclamation of his coming "in might" and as a shepherd to deliver his people that all nations might see his glory clearly recalls Israel's first exodus (Is 40:3-11; cf. Is 42:13; Ps 77:21; 78:52). Consequently, Yahweh's promise of his presence (Is 40:9; 52:6), declaration "I am he!" ('ānī hū' [Is 41:4; 43:10, 13; 46:4; 48:12]), self-designation as "Redeemer," "Savior" and "Rock" (Is 41:14; 43:3, 11, 14; 44:6, 8, 24; 45:15, 21; 47:4; 48:17; 49:7, 26; 54:5, 8), concern for righteousness (Is 42:1-6, 42:21; 45:8, 21; 51:4), and declaration of compassion, everlasting love and mercy (ṛhm, hsd [Is 49:10, 13, 15; 54:7-8, 10; 55:7; cf. Is 47:6]) are best understood as deriving from and evoking his exodus self-revelation (cf. Ex 3:14; Deut 32:39).

In first responding to Israel's fear and then condemning their obtuse faithlessness (Watts), the prophet appeals to Yahweh's powerful creational acts in "the former things" of the first exodus to demonstrate and provoke trust in his ability to do even a greater thing in this "new" second exodus (Is 42:9; 43:16-19; 48:6). In this respect, his vast superiority over the nations' lifeless *idols is demonstrated in part by his control over *creation, first evident in his saving acts at the exodus (Is 40:17; 44:26-27; 45:21; 46:8-9).

Yahweh comes once again as a warrior, his mighty arm ruling for him (Is 40:10-11; 42:13; 49:24-26; 50:2; 51:5), but it is not Sinai being shaken but rather entire *mountains and hills laid waste (Is 42:15). Because he loves Israel (Is 43:4; 46:3-6), he will gather their "sons and daughters," whom he created for his glory, from east and west (Is 43:1-6; cf. Deut 32:6) and bring them in glorious procession (Is 40:11; 42:16; 49:10) to the place of his *presence, now restored Zion (Is 40:2, 9; 41:27; 44:26-28; 46:13; 51:3, 11, 16-17; 52:1-2; cf. Is 4:5). As the one who dries up the deep (Is 44:27), making a path through the sea and destroying chariot and rider (Is 43:16-17), he will lead them through the waters and the fire (Is 43:1-7). In this more leisurely new exodus—they will not go out in haste—he will again be their front and rear guard, turning darkness into light before them (Is 42:16; 52:15; cf. Ex. 13:21-20; 14:19-20) and providing rivers in the desert (Is 43:19-20; 41:18-19; 48:21; 49:10-12). This predication of the future hope on the exodus is explicit both in Yahweh's reminders that his hand is not too short to save, that he can dry up the sea and open rivers in the *wilderness (Is 50:2), and in the prophet's subsequent prayer that Yahweh awaken his mighty arm by reminding him of his dividing the sea for the redeemed (Is 51:9-11).

Of particular interest is the integration of the Isaianic servant and, as we saw in Isaiah 9—11, the Davidic king in this new exodus hope. If Isaiah 51:17—52:12 describes Zion's being prepared for deliverance from Babylon, and Isaiah 54 the city's glorious restoration, then Isaiah 52:13—53:12 describes the "way" in which this new exodus deliverance takes place (Watts). Yahweh's mighty delivering "arm" is ultimately revealed to Israel and the nations (Is 53:1; cf. Is 52:10, 15) in his righteous servant's bearing of Israel's Deuteronomic exilic curse (Is 53:4-5, 11; 1:5-6; cf. Deut 28:59-61; Ceresko; on the servant as a second Moses, see Hugenberger) (see Servant of Yahweh). In the subsequent restoration of Yahweh's servants, the everlasting covenant with David is fulfilled as the nations flock to their glory (Is 54:17; 55:5; cf. Is 45:22; 52:10).

2.1.3. Isaiah 56—66. The bleaker realities of these chapters see an increasing emphasis on the ability of Redeemer-Savior Yahweh (Is 59:20; 60:16; 63:8-10) to effect his promises through his "mighty arm" (Is 59:1, 16; 60:16; 62:8; 63:1, 12; 66:14). The prophet's first evocations of the exodus appear in Yahweh's promise of a new exodus gathering not just of Israel but also foreigners (Is 56:8) and the promise of his saving presence in response to his people's cry (Is 58:9). But they are most prominent in the two warrior songs (Is 59:15b-21; 63:1-6) and especially the final complaint (Is 63:11—64:12).

The former, in bracketing the vision of a restored Jerusalem (Is 60—62), reiterate that Redeemer Yahweh's "strong arm" will effect his people's *salvation, causing the nations, as in the exodus, to fear his glory (Is 59:16, 19-20; 63:1, 4-5; cf. Is 52:13—53:1; 62:10), and his people, now reaffirmed as "priests of the LORD" (cf. Ex 19:6) to enjoy their wealth (Is 60:11-12; 61:6). Thus, the summons goes out to build up the highway upon which the holy and redeemed people will return (Is 62:10-12; cf. Is 35:1-10).

The final complaint contains the most extended appeal to the exodus in the entire work. Reflecting back on the events that brought Israel to its present desperate situation, the prophet recalls, in classic fashion, how Savior Yahweh's great compassion (rh̄m) and steadfast love (hsd) in redeeming and carrying them (cf. Deut 1:31) were met by Israel's rebellion, causing him to become their enemy (Is 63:7-10). Urging Yahweh to remember the days of Moses, when his strong arm divided the waters, making an eternal name for himself (Is 63:11-14), the prophet, addressing Yahweh as "Father" and "Redeemer" (Is 63:16; 64:8), prays that Yahweh again rend the heavens, come down, shake the mountains, do fearful deeds on behalf of his people, and cause the nations to tremble (Is 63:1—64:4). The whole concludes with Yahweh's promise that his hand will be with his servants (Is 66:14), so that, in keeping his exodus project, all nations will see his glory (Is 66:18-19).

2.2. Jeremiah. In Jeremiah the influence of the exodus is similarly seen from the outset, informing both Yahweh's opening complaint against his people (Jer 2:1—3:10) and the prophet's famous Temple Sermon (Jer 7:1-15). In the complaint Israel's youthful devotion to the Lord, and his faithful guiding presence through the wilderness to a fruitful *land (Jer 2:2-7a), are set in sharp contrast to the nation's present infidelities. Not least of their infidelities is their devotion to other gods (Jer 2:7b—3:10; cf. Jer 5:19; 10:1-11), whereby, as in Isaiah 5, they have become a degenerate vine (Jer 2:21; cf. Deut 32:32-33). Although Yahweh's "firstborn son" (cf. Jer 31:20), they are now "faithless children" (e.g., Jer 3:14, 22). In the sermon, which details numerous covenant infractions, the exodus emphasis on covenantal obedience rather than *sacrifice (Jer 7:22-23) reveals the folly of Israel's trust in the temple's sanctity. Their present disobedience, including especially their idolatry, is traced back to the day their ancestors came out of Egypt (Jer 7:24-26), being couched primarily in terms of transgressing the Sinai covenant (e.g., Jer 2:9; 8:8; 9:13; 11:1-12; 16:10-13; 22:9; 26:4; 32:23; 44:10, 23). Instead of their own wisdom, might or wealth, they should trust in Yahweh's revealed steadfast love and justice (Jer 9:24).

Consequently, although God had mercifully kept covenant in giving them a land flowing with milk and honey (Jer 11:5), this time he will honor its curses (Jer 11:2-4; 16:13). In contrast to the incident of the golden calf, Yahweh will not have compassion on them (Jer 13:14; cf. Ex 34:6-7), even if Moses stood before him (Jer 15:1-2). In an antiexodus they will "go out" into exile and death (Jer 21:9). Because they failed to observe the Sabbath (Jer 17:19-27), the particular mark of their being his holy people (see Ex 31:12-16), their land will now lie desolate

(e.g., Jer 4:26; 6:8; 9:11, 15-16; 10:22; 22:5-6; 34:22; 44:2, 6, 22). In a reversal of the exodus, Yahweh's outstretched hand and mighty arm will again perform their wonderful deed, but now against them (Jer 21:2, 5; cf. Jer 6:12; 15:6; 21:5; 27:5-8). In resiling from their covenantal obligation, made when Yahweh had released them from slavery in Egypt, to release their slaves every seventh year, he will now "release" them to sword, pestilence and famine (Jer 34:8-22). And these will follow them even to Egypt, where, unthinkable, given Yahweh's earlier redemption (e.g. Jer 2:18, 36; cf. 2:6; 7:22, 25; 11:4, 7), they have disobeyed gone in vain hope of escape (Jer 41:17—46:28). In keeping with his character revealed at the exodus, he will by no means leave them unpunished (Jer 46:28b).

But even so, this same revealed character means that the Lord will not make an end of his people (Jer 46:28a; cf. Lam 3:22, 32). He promises that there will be a new exodus that will so outshine the old that Yahweh himself will now be known by it (Jer 16:14-15; 23:6-8). The ark will no longer be remembered or needed, since Jerusalem itself will be the Lord's throne (Jer 3:16). The positive presence of the exodus is most clearly felt in the Book of Consolation (Jer 30—33) (van der Wal), set in deliberate counterpoint in the middle of many chapters of "no exodus" hopes (Jer 26—45) (Yates). Mighty Yahweh, who with outstretched arm had performed signs and wonders in Egypt, will, in keeping with his character revealed therein, again show steadfast love to the thousandth generation (Jer 32:17-21; cf. Jer 30:18; 31:3, 20; 33:11, 26; see also Jer 42:12). He will bless "their tents" (Jer 30:18), have mercy on "his beloved son" (Jer 30:18; 31:3, 20), lead the redeemed back from exile (Jer 31:7-11) and again plant them in their land, where they will be his people and he their God (Jer 30:22; 31:26-34). Taking up the earlier emphasis on their breaking covenant, Yahweh will effect a new covenant, written not on stone but rather on their hearts (Jer 31:31-32; cf. Ex 32:19; Deut 30:6). And, as in Isaiah, this new exodus is linked with the restoration of the Davidic line (Jer 30:9; 33:15-26).

In a final word of encouragement, Jeremiah declares that even if enslaving Babylon refuses to let his people go (cf. Ex 7:14; 10:3-4), their kinsman Redeemer, mentioned only here in Jeremiah (Jer 50:34), mighty Yahweh, "the Holy

One," will turn his "hand" against it (Jer 51:25), intervening against its horses and chariots (Jer 50:29, 37a), plundering its houses (Jer 50:37b) and drying up its waters (Jer 50:33-38) (see Bellis). For even though Israel and Judah have filled their land with guilt before "the Holy One of Israel," he, unable to deny his exodus character, has not forsaken them (Jer 51:5).

2.3. Ezekiel. Compared to Isaiah and Jeremiah, in Ezekiel's message to the exiles the exodus plays a more limited and somewhat different role. Ezekiel shares the idea that their, and their ancestors', failure to keep the law (Ezek 5:6-7; 11:12; 16:59)—again notably their apostasy to other gods—is the covenantal cause of their desolation (Ezek 5:14-17; 7:2; 9:1-11; 14-16; cf. Ezek 33:23-29). As Yahweh had bared his arm at the exodus, so too Ezekiel will bare his arm in prophesying that God's hand was now against his people (Ezek 4:7; 6:14; 13:9; 14:9, 13; 16:27) (on Ezekiel as a new Moses, see Idestrom). Jeremiah's rebuke of Judah's whoredoms finds an extensive and intentionally shocking counterpart in Ezekiel's account of Jerusalem's lewdness (Ezek 16; cf. Hosea [see 4.1 below]). But there is also a message of hope to those dispersed among the nations (Ezek 11:16). Yahweh will, in language reminiscent of Jeremiah (Jer 30—31), regather them in a new exodus (Ezek 20:33-34; cf. Ezek 25:7, 13, 16), giving them a new heart and new spirit so that they will keep his commandments, and they will be his people and he their God (Ezek 11:16-20; 16:62), blessing their land (Ezek 36:6-12).

But there are new developments. Elements of the prophet's opening vision seem to echo the Sinai theophany (Ezek 1:4, 22; cf. Ex 19:16-18; 24:10, 15-17)—a kind of anti-Sinai presaging judgment?—and only in Ezekiel is there such an emphasis on the reversal of the high point of the exodus wherein Yahweh's presence departs from his temple (Ezek 10—12; cf. Ezek 25:3). While covenant obedience continues to lead to life and disobedience to death (Ezek 18; 33:10-20), the Exodus 34:7 tradition is modified so that the sins of the parents will be visited no longer on their children but rather upon the perpetrators themselves (Ezek 18:2-4, 20; cf. Ezek 33:10-20).

More remarkable is Ezekiel 20:5-38, the prophet's most extended engagement with the exodus. Beginning with the customary traditions of Yahweh's self-revelation and gift of a land flowing with milk and honey (Ezek 20:5-7, 15b, 19-20), Ezekiel's exodus is one of Israel's unrelenting rebellion (cf. Ezek 2:5). It begins, uniquely, with Israel's refusal to reject Egypt's gods even while in bondage (Ezek 20:7-8a; 23:8, 19-20, 27; cf. Josh 24:14)—this might partially explain the extended diatribe against Egypt (Ezek 29—32)—countered by Yahweh's commitment “for the sake of his name” to continue with their deliverance (Ezek 20:8b-10; cf. Ex 32:11-14). This initiates a threefold cycle, repeated throughout the wilderness journeying and into the land: (1) Yahweh's gift of his life-giving statutes and Sabbath as a testimony to his holiness (Ezek 20:11-12, 18-20), (2) Israel's refusal to obey, breach of Sabbath and persistent idolatry (Ezek 20:13a, 21a, 27-32), (3) Yahweh's withholding of his *wrath (Ezek 20:13b-14; 21b; cf. Ex 32:10-14; Num 14:11-20) while passing suspended sentence upon them (Ezek 20:15-16, 23-24; cf. Ex 32:34; Num 14:21-23), a sentence now meted out in the exile. The reference in Ezekiel 20:25 to God giving “bad statutes” in the exodus remains enigmatic, but it may be an ironic polemic against the people's perverse twisting of the law of the firstborn (see Ex 13:12-13) to justify their sacrificing children to Molech. If they insisted on this diametrically opposed reading, then Ezekiel would carry it through to its conclusion such that instead of intending life, Yahweh intended their devastation and death.

In another striking development and perhaps addressing the continued rebellious unbelief implied by Isaiah 40—55 (see 2.1.2 above) (Ezek 36:20, 23), Yahweh will enter into judgment even with the exiles (Ezek 20:36; cf. Ex 32:25-28, 35; Num 11:1-3, 33; 16). Bringing them back to the wilderness, he would cause them to “know” in a new “face-to-face” revelation that “I am the LORD” (cf. Ex 29:46), imposing the bond of covenant and pouring out his wrath not on the nations but instead on the rebels among them, who, he promises, will not return to the land (Ezek 20:33-38; cf. Ezek 11:21; Num 14:21-23; 20:9-12; Deut 5:4).

But for the rest, concerned, as in the exodus, for his holy name (Ezek 36:21-23, 32; cf. Ex 32:11-14), Yahweh will cleanse them (Ezek 36:21-25; cf. Ezek 16:9) and give them a new heart and spirit to follow his commands, blessing them and their land (Ezek 36:26-38; 37; cf. Ezek 34:25-31) (see Kohn). Through his “hand” he will again display his glory, causing both Israel and the nations to know that he is “the Holy One of Israel,” showing his people mercy (Ezek 39:25) and never again hiding his face from them (Ezek 39:21-29). And as in Isaiah and Jeremiah, Ezekiel's new exodus also envisages the restoration of the Davidic dynasty (Ezek 34:23-24; 37:24-25). Finally, picking up on his earlier vision of Yahweh's departing presence, this renewed relationship results not in a moveable tabernacle (Ex 25-31, 35-40) but rather in a new, fixed temple (Ezek 40—48) from which Yahweh's presence will never depart (Ezek 48:35) (Levenson).

3. Daniel.

The recollection of Yahweh's exodus self-revelation forms the basis of Daniel's prayer of confession (Dan 9). He acknowledges God's covenant faithfulness, steadfast love and merciful forgiveness (Dan 9:4, 9), confessing that Israel's transgression of Moses' law has justly led to their being cursed and driven into exile (Dan 9:5, 7, 11, 13-14). But appealing to the “Lord our God, who brought your people up out of Egypt with a mighty hand,” thereby making his name great (Dan 9:15), Daniel asks on the basis of God's great mercies that he forgive, hear and act to restore his people (Dan 9:18-19).

4. The Book of the Twelve.

4.1. Hosea. Yahweh's exodus self-revelation lies at the heart of both Hosea and, to the extent that this book introduces the corpus, the Book of the Twelve (Bosman): he will not leave unpunished Israel's idolatrous recapitulation of the “adultery” of the golden calf (Hos 3:1; 8:4-6; 10:5; 11:2; 13:2; 14:8). If they had turned to him, he would have “redeemed” them, but instead they sought help from, of all places, Egypt (Hos 7:13-16). Embodying Yahweh's experience of Israel's exodus infidelities beginning at Baal-Peor (Hos 9:10; cf. Num 25:1-5), Hosea marries an adulterous wife (Hos 2; 11), whose offspring's names, “I will not have compassion” and “Not my people” (Hos 1:6, 9), declare the consequences of Israel's repudiation of the Sinai covenant (e.g., Hos 4:6; 8:1) (McKenzie notes Hosea's link between the exodus and Deuteronomy).

This judgment is played out in Hosea's ironic, lex talionis reversal of various exodus motifs. Having been “I am” for them, in a play on Exodus 3:14 he will now be “not I am for you” (Hos 1:9b). Critiquing, as does Jeremiah, their misplaced trust in sacrifice (Hos 6:6), Hosea declares that because they did not reflect Yahweh’s steadfast love and righteousness in their dealings with others (Hos 4:1; 6:6; 10:12), he will no longer show either to them (Hos 6:6; 10:12), and none shall deliver them from his hand (Hos 2:10). Although they are his son whom he had called from Egypt (Hos 11:1-4), because they refused his repeated invitations to come to him, he will return them to Egypt, from whence he had brought them (Hos 11:5; cf. Hos 8:13; 9:3). As he had delivered them by a prophet (Hos 12:13), he will now destroy them and send them back by the word of his prophets (Hos 12:10). Similarly, just as Yahweh, their only God and Savior since Egypt (Hos 12:9; 13:4a), had provided for them (Hos 13:5-6a), now, having grown fat and abandoned him (Hos 13:6b), they will become his prey (i.e., provision), and there will be none to save or redeem (Hos 13:6b-11). He will, in a reversal of the exodus, divest them of their rich dwellings and reduce them to living in tents again (Hos 12:9). He will neither deliver nor redeem them from either Sheol or exodus-like deathly pestilence (Hos 13:14).

Nevertheless, Hosea, echoing the language of the Sinai self-revelation, declares that Yahweh will “in steadfast love and mercy” take them as his wife again (Hos 2:19). His compassion for his son will rise within him (Hos 11:8). Because he is “the Holy One,” he will not again destroy Ephraim (Hos 11:9) and will yet call them “my people” (Hos 2:1; 1:11). In a new exodus from both Egypt and Assyria (Hos 11:10-11), he will again lead them into the wilderness, where they will respond as in the days of their exodus youth (Hos 2:14). The very place where Israel first sinned through Achan (see Josh 7:1), now the Valley of Achor (‘ākôr means “sorrow” or “trouble”), would become the “gate of hope” (Hos 2:14-15; cf. Num 13:23-26), and they would again own David as their king (Hos 3:5).

4.2. Joel. Faced with the looming and dreadful “day of the LORD,” Joel likewise recalls Yahweh’s merciful relenting after the incident of the golden calf, calling the people to repentance (Joel 2:1-2, 13). His hopeful question, “Who knows?” (Joel 2:14), reminds them, however, that now, as then, Yahweh’s mercy is not a foregone conclusion, the Lord being free to show compassion to whom he chooses (see Ex 33:19). But as with Moses, Joel’s appeal to the importance of Yahweh’s reputation among the nations (Joel 2:17; cf. Ex 32:11-14) results in the Lord doing great things for his people, blessing them in the land and dwelling among them (Joel 2:18-27).

4.3. Amos. Amos too contrasts the Lord’s great kindness in bringing Israel up from Egypt, guiding them through the wilderness and giving them the land (Amos 2:10) with their faithless rejection of his law (Amos 2:4). As did Jeremiah and Hosea, he rebukes Israel’s misplaced trust in ritual, reminding them that God required no regular sacrificial program during the wilderness (Amos 5:25). This both relativizes sacrifice and reminds Israel that Yahweh’s priorities lie in the goodness and justice that characterize him (Amos 5:10-24). Since of all the families on the earth he had known them alone, now he will punish the entire family that he brought up from Egypt (Amos 3:1-2), visiting them, Hosea-like, with pestilence after the manner of Egypt (Amos 4:9-10) and sending them into exile (Amos 5:27; cf. Deut 30:28). Anticipating Jonah, Amos employs the archetypal exodus verb “to bring up” (‘ālā [see Ex 3:8, 17]) to challenge Israel’s smug belief that being Yahweh’s special people is sufficient to protect them (Amos 9:7). Nevertheless, in keeping with his character, he will “show favor” (hānan) to the remnant (Amos 5:15), raising again the fallen tent of David (Amos 9:11).

4.4. Jonah. The constancy and freedom of Yahweh’s character also stand at the heart of the book of Jonah, but now surprisingly extended to the nations. Echoing Joel 2:14’s hopeful question, “Who knows?” it is the Ninevites who repent and finding mercy (Jon 3:6-10). Yahweh’s final double interrogation of Jonah’s (and Israel’s) bitter and parochial nationalism (Jon 4:2-9) turns on Jonah’s sure knowledge of God’s exodus character (Jon 4:2). The concluding message is clear: just as Yahweh freely chose to show mercy to idolatrous Israel, he is free to show compassion to repentant Nineveh (Jon 3:10; 4:10-11).

4.5. Micah. In his complaint against Israel Micah invokes Yahweh’s “redemption” of Israel from the house of slavery, noting in particular his provision of leadership through Moses, Aaron and Miriam (Mic 6:4). Having announced judgment because Israel has failed to reflect God’s character (Mic 6:8), Micah, in last few verses of the book, returns to the question raised by Hosea's awful announcement of Yahweh's rejection of his people (Bosman). Because of Yahweh's exodus self-revelation, judgment cannot be the last word. The God who delights in clemency will again show mercy, compassion and covenant faithfulness to his remnant people (Mic 7:18-20; cf. Ex 34:6-7). Envisioning a new exodus in which Yahweh will redeem the remnant (Mic 7:12; 4:6-7, 10; 5:3), Micah prays for a repetition of God's mighty exodus deeds whereby the nations might again be terrified (Mic 7:15-17) and their wealth devoted to him (Mic 4:13).

4.6. Nahum. References to the exodus become less frequent in the second half of the Book of the Twelve. To introduce his message to Nineveh, Nahum too returns to Yahweh's Sinai self-revelation. Declaring that the Lord is slow to anger, Nahum, in his alteration of "great in love" (Ex 34:6b) to "great in power," underlines the certain albeit delayed consequences of Nineveh's actual failure to repent: "the LORD will by no means clear the guilty" (Nah 1:3). That power is then underlined via echoes of the shattering impact upon the earth of Creator Yahweh's exodus descent (Nah 1:4-6).

4.7. Habakkuk. With the Assyrians gone, Habakkuk is now faced with the mystery of how "the Holy One," "the Rock," can use the even more wicked Babylonians to judge his people (Hab 1:12). He too reflects on Yahweh's character (Hab 3:2) and power over creation when the "Holy One" came as demonstrated in his exodus plagues (Hab 3:3-5), his shattering descent on Sinai (Hab 3:6), his defeat of Egypt at the sea, and subsequent conquest (Hab 3:6-15), but this time to find comfort in the face of Judah's impending desolation.

4.8. Haggai. On the other hand, Haggai's postexilic declaration that Creator Yahweh's presence is with Zerubbabel, Joshua and the remnant people is in accordance with his promise when he brought them, similarly small and weak, out of Egypt (Hag 2:4-5). And therefore, as in the exodus, they can expect the imminent shaking of the heavens, the earth and all nations (Hag 2:6-7a), with the nations' treasure coming into his house (Hag 2:7b-9; cf. Mic 4:13). If they purify themselves and return to him, they will no longer experience his covenant curse upon their lands (Hag 2:17).

4.9. Zechariah. Zechariah contains no specific recollection of the exodus, though the demand for kindness (hesed) and mercy (rahūmim) (Zech 7:9) appears to originate in Yahweh's revealed character. A clearer echo perhaps is the Lord's promised compassionate redemption, on the basis of "I am their God" and in answer to their cry, of the exiles from Egypt and Assyria as they pass, recalling the Reed Sea, through the sea of distress (Zech 10:6-12; cf. Zech 1:16; 8:8). After judgment and in accordance with God's covenant promise, they will again be his people and he their God (Zech 13:9), which results, as in several other prophets, in the restoration of David's house (Zech 12:7-8; cf. Zech 13:1).

4.10. Malachi. Finally, at the conclusion of the Book of the Twelve, Malachi returns to two central concerns of the exodus: Yahweh's presence and his reputation among the nations (Mal 1:11). The promised "messenger of the covenant" in Malachi 3:1 reprises the role of the exodus "angel of the LORD" (Ex 23:20). He is to prepare for Yahweh's long-delayed returning presence by calling Israel back to covenantal obedience (Mal 3:2-4), the prerequisite of being blessed in the land (see Ex 23:21-33). Having reminded Israel of their long-standing rejection of Yahweh's Sinai statutes (Mal 3:7a), Malachi calls them to remember the Sinai ordinances of Moses (Mal 4:4), lest when the Lord comes, he strike the land with a curse (Mal 4:6).

5. Conclusion.

In beginning with the canonical pentateuchal accounts of the exodus, this article assumed both its interrelated complexity and foundational nature. The extensive, diverse, sometimes specific, but more commonly allusive nature of the prophets' appeals to the exodus strongly implies a significant body of knowledge shared between themselves and their audiences. The exodus, in all its breadth of interwoven ideas and motifs, apparently is not their invention but rather is an older complex of traditions upon which they freely drew without any hint of the need either to justify that appeal or to explain its presumed content. Here was something sufficiently well known that although the prophets sometimes were very specific in drawing parallels, in many places they felt that a simple allusion would suffice. So while on the surface it might appear that concepts such as justice, righteousness and compassion are common currency, the material here suggests that at least for a number of the prophets these norms were grounded in Yahweh's exodus self-revelation.

Even so, it is important to recognize that the prophets' individual engagement with the exodus very much reflects the needs of their particular situations. Although often sharing a range of fundamental ideas, different prophets reflect different aspects of those traditions in ways that most contribute to driving their message home. Nevertheless, even though it would still be mistaken to assume that this article's opening summary reflects what every prophet knew, there is sufficient commonality to suggest that they knew and assumed a great deal more about the exodus than perhaps was previously thought.

In terms of the exodus itself, the prophets' "theology" is essentially historical. Their fundamental assumption is that Yahweh's character and authority as creator and peerless Lord, as revealed at the exodus, remains constant. He who brought Pharaoh and the mountains low, who divided the waters and rescued his people, has lost none of his power, righteousness, compassion and faithfulness. As he had acted for the sake of his glorious name in the past, he will and can be relied upon to act again. If Israel becomes like the nations and rebels against him, his mighty hand will mete out the same justice against them as it did against the Egyptians. And the same applies to any nation that in arrogance exalts itself against him.

But it is here that the most remarkable contribution of the exodus to the prophets' message emerges: the deep and abiding conviction of a just Yahweh's overwhelming propensity to mercy and compassion—and not just to Israel, but also to the nations. As the creator of this good world, Yahweh's primary intention is to bring deliverance, life and blessing, both initially to Israel and through them to the nations. The exodus, it seems, was always intended to be cosmic in scope. Although lying outside the concerns of this essay, it seems that this is precisely the perspective taken by a later prophet, Paul of Tarsus (cf. Gal 1:15; Acts 14:27 with Jer 1:5; Is 49:1-6), in his magisterial achievement in Romans 9—11 (esp. Rom 11:25-36).

In this last respect, one must also note the frequently assumed link between the new exodus and the restoration of the Davidic kingdom. Apparently, as the solitary dating in 1 Kings 6:1 of the construction of Solomon's temple to the deliverance from Egypt suggests, a number of the prophets held the Davidic kingdom to be, finally, the ultimate realization of the exodus. It was in these early years of the Davidides that Yahweh's presence dwelled in a settled house among his blessed people and their land, and to whose glory evident in his wise and just king the nations were drawn.

See also COVENANT; EXILE; LAND; LAW; PROPHECY AND TRADITION; SALVATION, DELIVERANCE; WILDERNESS, DESERT.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. B. W. Anderson, "Exodus Typology in Second Isaiah," in Israel's Prophetic Heritage: Essays in Honor of James Muilenberg, ed. B. W. Anderson and W. Harrelson (New York: Harper, 1962) 177-95; H. M. Barstad, A Way in the Wilderness: The "Second Exodus" in the Message of Second Isaiah (Manchester, UK: University of Manchester Press, 1989); A. O. Bellis, "The New Exodus in Jeremiah 50:33-38," in Imagery and Imagination in Biblical Literature: Essays in Honor of Aloysius Fitzgerald, F.S.C., ed. L. Boadt and M. S. Smith (CBQMS 32; Washington, DC: Catholic Biblical Association, 2001) 157-68; R. Bergey, "The Song of Moses (Deuteronomy 32.1-43) and Isaianic Prophecies: A Case of Early Intertextuality?" JSOT 28 (2003) 33-54; J. P. Bosman, "The Paradoxical Presence of Exodus 34:6-7 in the Book of the Twelve," Scriptura 87 (2004) 233-43; A. R. Ceresko, "The Rhetorical Strategy of the Fourth Servant Song (Isaiah 52:13-53:12): Poetry and the Exodus-New Exodus," CBQ 56 (1994) 42-55; Y. Hoffman, "A North Israelite Typological Myth and a Judean Historical Tradition: The Exodus in Hosea and Amos," VT 39 (1989) 169-82; G. P. Hugenerberger, "The Servant of the Lord in the 'Servant Songs' of Isaiah," in The Lord's Anointed: Interpretation of Old Testament Messianic Texts, ed. P. E. Satterthwaite, R. S. Hess and G. J. Wenham (TynHS; Grand Rapids: Baker; Carlisle: Paternoster, 1995) 105-40; R. Idestrom, "Echoes of the Book of Exodus in Ezekiel," JSOT 28 (2003) 489-510; T. A. Keiser, "The Song of Moses: A Basis for Isaiah's Prophecy," VT 55 (2005) 486-500; K. Kiesow, Exodustexte im Jesajabuch: Literarkritische und motivegeschichtliche Analysen (OBO 24; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1979); R. L. Kohn, A New Heart and a New Soul: Ezekiel, the Exile and the Torah (JSOTSup 358; London: Sheffield Academic, 2002); J. D. Levenson, Theology of the Program of Restoration of Ezekiel 40-48

(HSM 10; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1976); B. H. Lim, The "Way of the Lord" in the Book of Isaiah (LHBOTS 522; New York: T & T Clark, 2010); J. Lust, "Exodus 6,2-8 and Ezekiel," in Studies in the Book of Exodus, ed. M. Vervenne (BETL 126; Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1996) 209-24; S. McKenzie, "Exodus Typology in Hosea," ResQ 22 (1979) 100-108; S. Paganini, C. Paganini and D. Markl, eds., Führe Mein Volk Heraus: Zur innerbiblischen Rezeption der Exodusthematik; Festschrift für Georg Fischer (Frankfurt: Peter Lang, 2004); A. Rayappan, "Out of Egypt: Bondage and Liberation in Jeremiah," in Führe Mein Volk Heraus: Zur innerbiblischen Rezeption der Exodusthematik; Festschrift für Georg Fischer, ed. S. Paganini, C. Paganini and D. Markl (Frankfurt: Peter Lang, 2004) 37-53; M. F. Rooker, "The Use of the Old Testament in the Book of Hosea," CTR 7 (1993) 51-66; A. van der Wal, "Themes from Exodus in Jeremiah 30-31," in Studies in the Book of Exodus, ed. M. Vervenne (BETL 126; Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1996) 559-66; R. E. Watts, "Consolation or Confrontation? Isaiah 40-55 and the Delay of the New Exodus," TynBul 41 (1990) 31-59; G. E. Yates, "New Exodus and No Exodus in Jeremiah 26-45: Promise and Warning to the Exiles in Babylon," TynBul 57 (2006) 1-22.

R. E. Watts

EXTRA-CANONICAL BOOKS OF PROPHETS. See DEAD SEA SCROLLS.

EZEKIEL: BOOK OF

The book of Ezekiel is set in the Jewish community in *Babylon during the sixth century BC. It is presented as the first-person account of the prophet Ezekiel, a man of priestly descent from among the first group of deportees from Judah in 593 BC (Ezek 1:1-3).

1. Historical Issues
2. Textual and Literary Issues
3. The Message of the Book of Ezekiel
4. The Book of Ezekiel in Texts from the Second Temple Period
5. Canonization of the Book of Ezekiel
6. Ideological Readings

1. Historical Issues.

1.1. Author and Prophet. It is important to distinguish between the literary persona of the prophet Ezekiel within the book of Ezekiel and the author(s) of the book itself. Although the two personae may coincide, this cannot be taken for granted. Personifications are common to all literature, although the form in which they occur differs. Sometimes entirely fictive characters are presented as historical persons, sometimes historical persons are hidden behind a screen of fiction, and sometimes personifications are made deliberately recognizable as literary fiction (de Moor, vii). This realization highlights the need to differentiate between the author of a prophetic text and the prophetic "I" within that same text. Scholarly views range from those who see a given prophetic book as based upon the sayings of a specific historical person to those who regard the prophetic literature as unhistorical presentations of prophets (Gitay). In the specific case of Ezekiel, from time to time scholars have voiced the idea of pseudepigraphy. This latter idea stems primarily from the perceived references to events during the Hellenistic era (Torrey, 83-99) and the protoapocalyptic features in Ezekiel (e.g., Feist). None of these theories has won any larger following, however. More recently, scholarship has focused on the presentation of Ezekiel as a literary character within the book bearing his name. For example, several scholars explore the ways in which the literary persona of Ezekiel is presented as a prophet and/or as a priest within the book.

1.2. Date and Compositional Growth. The book of Ezekiel in its present form is likely to be the result of several redactions, possibly reaching well into the Hellenistic era. For instance, the changes between first and third person may indicate that the book is composite in nature. Notably, Ezekiel 1:1 refers to the prophet in the first person, as does Ezekiel 1:4, while Ezekiel 1:2-3 speaks of him in the third person.

At the same time, the identification of the author of the greater part of the book of Ezekiel with a Jewish deportee in Babylon in the sixth century BC is supported by several factors. (1) The descriptions of the Babylonian exilic community in the book of Ezekiel fit the picture that can be gleaned from the meagre contemporary Neo-Babylonian sources (Mein, 59-66). (2) Based on the assumption that the chronology at least in part corresponds to topology, the language of the book of Ezekiel fits chronologically the sixth century BC, even if a later date cannot be excluded on linguistic grounds alone (Hurvitz; Rooker; Ehrens-värd).

(3) On the presupposition that the divine oracles in the book of Ezekiel at least to a certain extent reflect the experiences of the person uttering them, that person can easily be identified as one suffering posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) as the result of experiencing the violence of the Neo-Babylonian attacks on Jerusalem and the deprivation and humiliation of deportation (Smith-Christopher, 32-33). (4) Although parts of the book of Ezekiel contain eschatological and/or *apocalyptic imagery that is reminiscent of the imagery in texts from the Hellenistic period, it can be argued that this type of imagery was present already in texts from the Persian period. Notably, Ezekiel 38 shares features with Isaiah 24—27; 66:18-24; Haggai 2:6-7, 21-22; Joel 3:16; Zechariah 14:4, 5. It is highly unlikely that the material in Haggai is later than the Persian period, and it is debatable as to whether the other texts are as late as the Hellenistic period. (5) It is reasonable to assume that the author of the book of Ezekiel corresponds to a relatively large extent with the first-person narrator (Block 2004, 230), although that must remain a conjecture.

These factors have not prevented some scholars from detecting complex stratification in the book of Ezekiel, with dates ranging from the sixth to the third centuries BC. For instance, J. Garscha postulates three chief layers of the book of Ezekiel: (1) the original prophetic book (VEz), containing, but not identical to, the words of the prophet Ezekiel (500-485/460 BC); (2) the Deutero-Ezekielian reworking (DEz) (400-350 BC); (3) the cultic-law redaction (SEz) (300 BC). The key to Garscha's dating scheme is the laments over the king of Tyre (Ezek 26—28). Garscha, as well as other scholars, assumes that the content of Ezekiel 26—28 speaks about actual historical situations, and accordingly he attempts to identify these situations. Since we know that Alexander the Great destroyed Tyre in 332/331 BC, Garscha concludes that the material in Ezekiel 26—28 refers to this destruction. It follows that the recensions VEz and DEz must be older than 332 BC, and SEz must be younger (Garscha, 283-311; cf. Saur).

This methodology is based on the presupposition that events referred to in prophetic texts correspond directly to historical events contemporary with the author. This presupposition is, however, open for dispute. The very fact that a prophet envisions the destruction of Tyre (Ezek 26—28) need not reflect the prophet's contemporary reality. On the contrary, such a prediction may tell us instead that the prophet wished for its destruction. We might therefore conclude that at the time of the composition of Ezekiel 26—28 Tyre was a strong city, and that an Israelite prophet wished for its downfall.

1.3. Geographical Setting. Given the probability that the greater part of the book of Ezekiel was composed by a member of the Jewish community in Babylon in the sixth century BC, a careful reading of the book will provide insight into the exiles' lives. A strong case can also be made that the ministry and the message of the book of Ezekiel cannot be adequately understood unless we take its exilic background into account (see Exile).

Despite the likelihood that other biblical texts were composed by the Jewish community in Babylon, the book of Ezekiel is unique in the Hebrew Bible in that it presents the ministry of the prophet as taking place in Babylon. The first-person narrator describes his daily life in the Babylonian community. He mentions, for example, the Jewish settlement of Tel-abib (Ezek 3:15), and he refers to elders (Ezek 8:1; 14:1; 20:1), which implies that the exiles had some form of self-rule. In addition, the reference to prophets in Ezekiel 13 suggests that there were prophets other than Ezekiel in the Jewish community in Babylon, and that these prophets were free to deliver their oracles in some form of public space (Mein, 66-73).

This picture of the Jewish community is corroborated by the scant extrabiblical evidence. This evidence is primarily onomastic in character—that is, texts that mention persons with names containing a theophoric element related to Yahweh, or names that are accompanied by the ethnic designation "Judahite." There are three tablets from the early Persian period with Hebrew names, another ninety texts in a private collection (the TAYN corpus) containing references to Jews living in the Babylon-Borsippa region in the sixth century BC, and the Murashu archive from Nippur with tablets dating from 454 to 404 BC. All this evidence, taken together, seems to show that the Jews in Babylon were relatively well integrated into society, although it is unlikely that they assimilated into the population around them (Grabbe, 316-17).

Despite its exilic setting, much of the book of Ezekiel concerns Jerusalem. For example, the material in Ezekiel 8—11 depicts the removal of the *divine presence from Jerusalem, while the material in Ezekiel 40—48 envisions God's return and the subsequent rebuilding of the city. Likewise, several passages in the book appear to display knowledge of life in Jerusalem between 597 and 586 BC, a time during which the prophet Ezekiel must have already been living in Babylon (2 Kings 24:12; 2 Chron 36:10; cf. Ezek 1:1-2, which refers to the fifth year of exile [i.e., 593 BC]). The accounts in Ezekiel 8—11 portray the prophet as present, although in a vision, in Jerusalem. Ezekiel 8, for example, purportedly describes the kinds of worship that took place in the Jerusalem temple. Other passages, such as Ezekiel 12, concern the leaders of Jerusalem (Ezek 12:10). These factors have led some scholars to argue that the prophet was actually based in Judah rather than in Babylon, either during all (Herntrich) or part (Bertholet, xii-xvi) of his active prophetic ministry.

These interpretations are unconvincing for two reasons. First, it is possible that the descriptions of the rituals in the Jerusalem temple in Ezekiel 8 are influenced by the author's experiences prior to his deportation. It can be argued that the author, identified with Ezekiel the prophet and the priest, was familiar with the situation in the Jerusalem temple. Although he probably was not yet ordained as a priest (Ezek 1:1; cf. Num 4:3; 1 Chron 23:3, where thirty was the age of ordination) and therefore might not have taken an active role in the rituals, he would have known what was going on in the temple.

Second, there is no need to interpret the references to activities in Judah as evidence of actual journeys to Judah. Instead, it is preferable to accept the biblical explanation that the descriptions in Ezekiel 8—11 are based on a *visionary experience (Joyce, 6). As such, they could be a literal description of what was taking place in the temple, but also they could depict the author's opinion of the temple worship. In other words, nothing compels us to regard the descriptions in Ezekiel 8 as reflecting actual rites in the Jerusalem temple in the sixth century BC (see Liturgy and Cult). It is preferable to see them as polemical exaggerations through which the author sought to convince his audience that the destruction of the Jerusalem temple was God's justified act of punishment of the sinful people of Judah. A few scholars go further and interpret the descriptions in Ezekiel 8 as having risen from the prophet's own damaged fantasy than reflecting any reality (Halperin, 58-79).

1.4. Dependence on Earlier Biblical Texts. The book of Ezekiel is part of the longer tradition of ancient Israelite literature. It depends upon and also develops further motifs and ideas found in earlier material. In particular, there are similarities between the book of Ezekiel and the pentateuchal Priestly source (P), the texts of the Holiness School (HS) (Lev 17—26) and the book of Deuteronomy.

The book of Ezekiel shares a common literary language with the pentateuchal P source and contains material that relates to priestly concerns. The key sections are Ezekiel 3:17-21; 14:1-12; 18:1-20; 22:1-16 (Joyce, 10; Levitt Kohn, 31-75). This shared language and area of interest can be explained in different ways. If we identify the author of the book of Ezekiel with the character bearing the same name, and if we accept that this person was a priest, as indicated by Ezekiel 1:3, then it is natural to assume that such a person would not only concern himself with priestly matters but also use language associated with the priestly writing of the Pentateuch (Haran, 214). Alternatively, it is possible to distinguish between the material that does not reflect priestly concerns and the material with close ties to P. The latter material may then be explained as secondary material, added by a redactor who sought to bring the book of Ezekiel closer to its own priestly interests (see, e.g., Garscha). Of these two explanations, the former is more compelling because of its simplicity.

It is important to determine the direction of influence of the related material. In short, is the book of Ezekiel the earlier text, which P then reworks, or does P constitute a source upon which Ezekiel draws? Furthermore, to what extent did these two texts exist in their current form at the time when this influence took place? For example, the laws in Ezekiel 40—48 and some of the laws in P share a number of concerns, yet the individual laws often contradict each other. Notably, they disagree about the number of animals to be sacrificed on the same occasion, as well as the measures of the grain offering and the quantities of accompanying oil to be used.

Those scholars who advocate a preexilic origin of P naturally see P, although probably not in its current form, as the earlier source upon which the book of Ezekiel draws. M. Haran, for example, maintains that the two texts are independent manifestations of the same school, with P being the original source, while the material especially in Ezekiel 40–48 forms a freer version. Haran explains the discrepancies between the two texts by suggesting that instead of Ezekiel modifying P directly, he remembered P from his time serving in the temple before the exile. Other scholars see P as a later development of a tradition to which the book of Ezekiel belongs. W. Zimmerli, for example, argues that P drew from a general stream of priestly tradition of which the book of Ezekiel forms an earlier part (Zimmerli 1979, 52).

The mutual influence of the book of Ezekiel and P in terms of both vocabulary and concepts has theological implications for the reading of Ezekiel. For instance, the book of Ezekiel develops the priestly concept of Yahweh's glory. The P material in the Pentateuch employs the Hebrew term kābôd as a technical expression for God's presence. It emphasizes God's incorporeal nature (Ex 24:16-17), his potentially lethal presence (Ex 20:18; Num 16:19-21) and his association with the tabernacle (Ex 29:43; 40:34-35; Lev 9:6, 23). The theophanies in Ezekiel 1:28; 3:23; 44:4 use the same expression to denote God's graphic form. For example, Ezekiel 1:4 transforms the notion of God's manifestation in fire and cloud (cf. Ex 24:16-17) into an astonishingly anthropomorphic revelation of God's appearance. The vision accounts in Ezekiel develop the priestly notion of God's presence in the tabernacle into a picture of the mobility of God's presence, from his temple in Jerusalem (Ezek 1) to the exile (Ezek 11:22-23) and back to Jerusalem (Ezek 43:2-5) (Kutsko, 79-100).

The situation is similar when it comes to the relationship between the book of Ezekiel and HS. Is HS the later text, which depends on the book of Ezekiel, or does the book of Ezekiel depend on HS? Alternatively, do HS and the book of Ezekiel show signs of mutual literary dependence? These questions are complicated by the issue of the relationship between HS and P. Is HS an independent preexilic or postexilic source that at one point was incorporated into

P? Alternatively, are the authors of HS actually the redactors of P, with HS being composed to supplement and interact with P (Lyons, 5)?

Zimmerli's views on this matter are important. He maintains that the similarities and differences between the book of Ezekiel and HS are the result of reciprocal influence between the two growing corpora of texts. For example, while Ezekiel 17; 18; 20 depend on an early form of HS before it was incorporated into P, Leviticus 26 depends in part on the thoughts of Ezekiel 34:25-31 (Zimmerli 1979, 46-52).

More recent scholars, especially in the Anglo-American world, tend to regard the book of Ezekiel as the later text. R. Levitt Kohn, for example, maintains that the Ezekielian author(s) utilized not only P but also HS. In view of the recent trend of seeing the authors responsible for HS as the redactors of P, she argues that there is no evidence to suggest that the book of Ezekiel influenced the authors of HS. On the contrary, her word study suggests that the affinity between the book of Ezekiel and P is on the same level as that between the book of Ezekiel and HS. She therefore concludes that the Ezekielian author(s) utilized both sets of material without particular differentiation (Levitt Kohn, 85, 96-104). Likewise, M. Lyons argues that the book of Ezekiel made use of a preexisting body of material in the HS. It appeals to its authority yet also transforms it in order to develop its own argument. For example, it turns the positive and negative instructions in HS into accusations. Leviticus 18:4-5 mentions God's statutes and ordinances by which an Israelite should live. The later Ezekiel 22:7-12 contains a list of accusations, many of them alluding to laws in Leviticus 18–20, which then serve as the basis for the judgment promised in Ezekiel 22:2, 4-5, 14-15 (Lyons, 12-26).

The book of Ezekiel further contains expressions and concepts that are associated with Deuteronomy. Ezekiel 6, for example, presupposes the polemic against the high places of the Deuteronomic reform. Moreover, the material in Ezekiel 18 parallels that in Deuteronomy 12:1-4, and the verdict of stoning for a harlot in Ezekiel 16; 23 may reflect the legal material in Deuteronomy 13:10; 22:21. Some scholars therefore have suggested that the author(s) of the book of Ezekiel drew not only on P but also on D. Levitt Kohn, for example, has demonstrated that the Ezekielian author(s) appropriated the terminology of both sets of texts and created a synthesis, fitting for the new context of the community in exile (Levitt Kohn, 94-95). Along the same lines, T. Ganzel has shown that the Ezekielian author(s) had familiarity with Deuteronomy and created a new synthesis by combining the Deuteronomic language of *idolatry with the priestly concepts of impurity.

There are also links between the book of Ezekiel and the book of *Jeremiah, exemplified by the shared notion of “a new heart” (Ezek 11:19-20; 36:26-27; Jer 24:7; 31:31-34; 32:38-40). The affinity of the “new heart” in Jeremiah and Ezekiel with the idea of “circumcising the heart” in Deuteronomy 30:6 suggests that the prophetic writers depended on the Deuteronomic text. It is furthermore likely that the Ezekielian author(s) had access to the material in Jeremiah (Joyce, 39-40).

Finally, it is an open question as to what extent the book of Ezekiel and Isaiah 40—55 influence one another (see Isaiah: Book of). Some scholars argue that there is no awareness in Isaiah 40—55 of the teaching of the book of Ezekiel (e.g., Herrmann, 304), while other scholars maintain the opposite. Zimmerli, for example, argues that both texts share the idea of a return of the exiles to Judah accompanied by God’s own return, and that both texts contain the notion that God’s return to Judah is independent of Israel’s repentance (Is 52:7-10; Ezek 43) (Zimmerli 1982, 113). Likewise, D. Baltzer makes a case that Ezekiel and Isaiah 40—55 share seven key concepts, and he explains these similarities by their shared origin in the time of the exile. For example, he maintains that Zion-Jerusalem and the temple stand in the foreground in both texts (Is 40:1-11; 49-55; Ezek 11:16; 20:39-44) (Baltzer, 27-48).

Despite Zimmerli’s and Baltzer’s arguments, there seems to be little support for the notion of direct influence between Isaiah 40—55 and Ezekiel. Instead, the differences between the two texts are more significant than their similarities. The notion of repentance differs significantly in the two textual corpora. Likewise, the two sets of texts differ widely in their respective treatment of Zion-Jerusalem and the temple. While the material in Ezekiel 40—48 assigns great importance to the temple but refrains from mentioning *Zion, the material in Isaiah 49—55 places personified Zion in the foreground yet never refers to the temple. A close connection between the various materials in Isaiah 40—55 and Ezekiel is therefore unlikely.

2. Textual and Literary Issues.

2.1. Style. The style of the book of Ezekiel is unique among the prophetic writings. First, in contrast to most other books in the Prophets, which consist primarily of short oracles written in poetry, the book of Ezekiel contains long prose narratives and extended oracular passages. Second, the prophetic persona plays a more significant role in the book of Ezekiel than what is usual in the prophetic literature, with the exception of the book of Jeremiah. The prophet Ezekiel speaks and is spoken to by God, he acts and God causes him to act. For example, all the prose narratives are presented as spoken by the prophet in the first-person singular. The book of Ezekiel opens with prophetic, rather than divine, speech: “when I was among the exiles” (Ezek 1:1), and this style continues throughout the book. Along the same lines, the oracles often are framed by statements such as “the LORD said to me.” The prophet also describes his actions in the first-person singular. He describes how he eats the scroll that God gives him (Ezek 3:2), how God’s spirit takes him on visionary journeys (Ezek 3:14; 8:1-3; 40:1-2) and how he discusses with God (Ezek 4:12-15). The oracular material in the book of Ezekiel also contains descriptions of the prophet’s behavior. For instance, God commands Ezekiel to perform *sign acts such as acting out the siege of Jerusalem by placing a brick and an iron plate in front of him (Ezek 4:1-4) and by shaving his head (Ezek 5:1-4). This style reinforces the autobiographical mode of the book. At the same time, the prophet is dwarfed by God, for whom he speaks. The book of Ezekiel thus presents the prophet as doing and saying nothing apart from what God wants him to do.

2.2. Structure. There are different ways of viewing the structure of the book of Ezekiel. On the surface level, the chronological formulas found throughout the book, beginning with Ezekiel 1:1 and ending with Ezekiel 40:1, create thirteen literary units of varying lengths. The dating formulas are arranged roughly in chronological order, although some of the units appear out of linear order (Ezek 29:1 and Ezek 29:17). These literary units may contain more than one type of material and diversity of content (e.g. Ezek 32:17—33:20, where Ezek 32:17-32 contains an oracle against Egypt and Ezek 33:1-20 contains an oracle concerning a watchman) (Mayfield, 10-12, 182).

In regard more to content, the book of Ezekiel is commonly divided into three main sections. According to this structure, the book of Ezekiel begins with the prophet's call vision and ends with the vision of the new temple in Jerusalem.

The first section, Ezekiel 1—24, contains material that precedes the fall of Jerusalem in 587/586 BC. This section can be subdivided into three subsections, each introduced by a date. Ezekiel 1:1 opens with a date, followed by Ezekiel's first visionary journey and subsequent prophetic call (Ezek 1:1—3:15), prophetic signs and their interpretations (Ezek 3:16—5:17) and oracles of judgment (Ezek 6—7). Ezekiel 8:1 provides a new date, followed by Ezekiel's second visionary journey and accompanying oracles of judgment (Ezek 8—11), prophetic sign acts and their interpretation (Ezek 12:1-20) and oracles of judgment (Ezek 12:21—19:14). Ezekiel 20:1 contains yet another date, followed by various oracles of judgment.

The second section, Ezekiel 25—32, contains oracles against foreign nations in the same manner as, especially, Jeremiah (Jer 46—51) and Isaiah (Is 13—30). These oracles fall into two halves. The first half, in Ezekiel 25—28, contains oracles against Ammon, Moab, Edom, Philistia (Ezek 25), Tyre (Ezek 26:1—28:19) and Sidon (Ezek 28:20-23), and it ends with a brief oracle to Israel (Ezek 28:24-26). The second half, Ezekiel 29—32, consists of a collection of oracles and laments concerning Egypt.

The third section, Ezekiel 33—48, changes the tone from judgment to *salvation. This section falls into several subsections. Ezekiel 33 reports the fall of Jerusalem, and the subsequent Ezek 34—37 combines promises for the future restoration of Judah mixed in with references to the people's past *sins and judgment for its *leadership. Israel will be restored under God's leadership (Ezek 34) and cleansed from its sins and impurity (Ezek 36:16-37). Ezekiel is then taken on his third visionary journey, to the valley of the dry bones (Ezek 37:1-14), followed by an oracle of the future reunification of the northern and southern kingdoms (Ezek 37:15-28). The following material in Ezekiel 38—39 depicts the future invasion by Gog of Magog and his subsequent defeat. The final subsection, Ezekiel 40—48, features Ezekiel's fourth visionary journey. It contains detailed instructions of the future temple (Ezek 40:5—42:20), a vision within the vision of God's return to Jerusalem (Ezek 43:1-9) and his commission to the prophet to tell the people of Israel about the temple, its form and its laws, so that they can obey God (Ezek 43:10-12). The visionary tour continues in Ezekiel 43:13—46:24 with instructions concerning, among other things, the design of the altar, its dedication and prescriptions for the various offerings (Ezek 43:13-27; 45:18—46:15), rules for Levites and priests (Ezek 44:10-31), and the allotment of the land around the temple to the priestly personnel and the secular leadership (Ezek 45:1-8). The descriptions in the last two chapters change character. The prophet is led through the entrances of the temple to the land outside, which is gradually being filled with life-giving water coming from a source within the temple precincts (Ezek 47:1-12). The final material outlines the borders of Israel and the division of the *land (Ezek 47:13—48:35).

This division of the text is influenced by the perceived growth of the text. It is commonly assumed that the material in Ezekiel 1—24 was composed prior to the fall of Jerusalem in 586 BC, while the material in Ezekiel 33—48 was written afterward. Alternatively, the implied preexilic setting of the material in Ezekiel 1—24 indicates the way in which to read the text rather than its actual date of composition.

It further emphasizes the perceived distinct origin of the oracles against the *nations in Ezekiel 25—32. It is commonly held that these oracles originated independently from the rest of the book of Ezekiel (Zimmerli 1983, 4). However, given that the dating schema encompassing the entire book of Ezekiel incorporates these oracles, and given that the indirect audience of the oracles against the nations is Israel, a few scholars see them as integral to the book and largely primary in authorship (Joyce, 43).

The book of Ezekiel is punctuated at key points by three vision reports of theophanies, linked together by similar opening phrases (Ezek 1:1-3; 8:1-3; 40:1-2). These reports emphasize God's power and omnipresence and provide additional structure to the oracles in Ezekiel.

Finally, two interrelated literary motifs run alongside each other throughout the book of Ezekiel. The “watchman” motif is attested in Ezekiel 3:16b-21; 33:7-9. In both passages God appoints the prophet Ezekiel to be a watchman over the people of Israel. The first passage occurs in the beginning of the prophet’s ministry leading up to the fall of Jerusalem in 586 BC, while the second one happens shortly before the news reaches the prophet that Jerusalem has been destroyed (Ezek 33:21). The motif of the prophet’s muteness runs parallel to the watchman motif. It appears first in Ezekiel 3:22-27, directly following God’s calling Ezekiel to be a watchman. This creates a seemingly impossible situation where Ezekiel, as the watchman, is unable to call out. The same motif reappears in Ezekiel 24:27, which predicts the end of Ezekiel’s muteness, and reaches its climax in Ezekiel 33:21-22, immediately after the prophet has been informed about the fall of Jerusalem (Ezek 33:21), when his muteness is lifted (see 3 below).

2.3. Textual Criticism. The book of Ezekiel is preserved in two different textual editions: the Hebrew Masoretic Text (MT) and the Greek text of the Septuagint (LXX) (see Text and Textual Criticism). The latter text is a translation, probably carried out in Egypt around 150 BC (Olley, 15). The central question concerns the dating and form of the so-called Hebrew Vorlage of this translation, the Hebrew text upon which the Greek translation is based. In short, which of the two—the Hebrew Vorlage of the LXX or the Hebrew text of the MT—is the earlier text upon which the other text is based?

This discussion has significant repercussions for the dating of the final form of the book of Ezekiel. If the Hebrew Vorlage of the LXX is the earlier text, then the Hebrew text of the MT must be a product of the late Persian or even Hellenistic period. This conclusion is based on the following sequence of deduction. The LXX Greek translation stems from the Hellenistic period. This translation is based on an earlier Hebrew Vorlage of unknown date. At one point, the textual ancestor of the MT (i.e., the Hebrew text that later developed into the MT) modified this Vorlage. The question is when this modification took place. Although it is likely that the Hebrew Vorlage of the LXX is significantly older than the Hellenistic period, possibly going all the way back to the sixth century BC, there would have been little point in modifying it before it reached the official status in the Greek translation of the LXX.

Much scholarly ink has been spilled in investigating the chronological relationship between these two editions. The scholarly debate has primarily focused on key texts in which the differences between the MT and the LXX have considerable exegetical consequences. For example, several scholars consider the MT of Ezekiel 28:11-19 to be a later, Hellenistic emendation of the Hebrew Vorlage of the LXX (Stordalen, 334-48). Likewise, exegetes argue that the differences between Ezekiel 7 in the MT and the LXX are best explained as the result of intentional editorial additions to the ancestor of the MT during the Hellenistic era. These additions sought to make the extant text agree with the theological notions prevalent in the Judaism of the time (Lust, 7-20).

There are strong arguments on both sides of the debate. In view of some of the arguments, it is possible that some parts of the MT stem from the Hellenistic period. Nonetheless, until we have more conclusive data at our disposal, each case needs to be considered individually.

3. The Message of the Book of Ezekiel.

The message of the book of Ezekiel walks hand in hand with its structure. Its overarching feature is the proclamation of *God’s holiness, glory and power. No other book of the Bible explores God’s absolute awesomeness and otherness in such lavish language. It opens with a vision account of God’s overpowering presence (Ezek 1), and the reader is reminded at regular intervals of God’s majesty (e.g., Ezek 8:2-5).

This notion of God as utterly holy, glorious and powerful also provides the key for understanding the theology of the book of Ezekiel pertaining to the destruction of Jerusalem in 587/586 BC. The holy God of Israel cannot tolerate sin and demands the sole devotion of his people. Since the people failed to live up to God’s demands, God punished them by allowing the Neo-Babylonian armies to conquer their land and to destroy their capital city. In this sense, the book of Ezekiel is a theodicy; that is, it seeks to justify God’s behavior by declaring that God’s acts of punishment toward his people were the direct consequences of their sins (see Retribution). Moreover, the book declares that the fall of Judah was not a sign of God's inability to care for his people. On the contrary, it affirms his power over not only Judah but also the Neo-Babylonian Empire, over which he rules and uses as a tool for punishing Judah (Ezek 4–24). Nonetheless, for the sake of his own glory, God, as the supreme ruler of the world, is willing to bring Judah back from the ashes and to resurrect them as a people again (Ezek 34–48).

God's supremacy and executive power are further elucidated through the descriptions of the prophet Ezekiel. The prophet is portrayed as God's ultimate tool, on the verge of losing his own identity. Ezekiel is a man completely overpowered by God. He behaves, speaks, and even feels at the impulse of God's *Spirit, and he fulfills God's commands without pausing to question them or even to reflect about them. He internalizes God's word and, in a sense, becomes God's word through the symbolic eating of the scroll (Ezek 2:9–3:3). In this manner, the book of Ezekiel certifies that it contains only God's unadulterated speech.

In contrast to God's glory, there is nothing glorious or even good in the people of Judah. From the very beginning, Judah was deprived (Ezek 16:3b-5), and only God was in a position to save them from their natural squalor (Ezek 16:6-14). They are incorrigible, despite God's acts on their behalf (Ezek 16:15-34; cf. Ezek 20:5-26, 27-29), and thus fully deserving of punishment (Ezek 16:35-52; cf. Ezek 20:30-38). In fact, the people of Judah lack the inherent ability to do good. Left alone, they will always choose to disobey God because they have hearts of stone (Ezek 11:19; 36:26).

In this dismal situation, Judah's leaders carry most of the responsibility. The material in Ezekiel 8:10-12 portrays the elders of Judah as being involved in all kinds of "abominations" in the Jerusalem temple. Along similar lines, the critique in Ezekiel 13, directed toward members of the exilic community in Babylon, attacks male and female prophets and accuses them of neglect and of misleading the people by trapping them with false prophecies. In more general terms, the oracle in Ezekiel 22:23-31 rages about the failures of Judah's princes, priests, officials and prophets for their failure to lead Judah in correct worship of God.

At the same time, each individual in the generation leading up to the fall of Jerusalem is responsible for its destruction and the ensuing exile. The material in Ezekiel 18 repudiates the exiles' claims that their ancestors' sins would have caused their current suffering and maintains that the exiles brought their current suffering upon themselves. Ezekiel 18 thus preaches "collective responsibility" in the sense that all the individuals in Judah contributed to the fate of their nation (Joyce, 19-20, 23-26, 139).

Through the combined use of the watchman theme and the notion of Ezekiel's muteness (see 2.2 above), the book of Ezekiel creates an intricate theology of sin, repentance and punishment. God calls Ezekiel to be a watchman (Ezek 3:16-21) who is responsible for warning the people of God's pending punishment (and indirectly calling them to *repentance). If the prophet fails to convey the warning, he and the people will be punished. If, however, he fulfills his task, he will go free, regardless of whether or not the people repent. As to the people, the book of Ezekiel portrays a dichotomy between the righteous person, who repents in response to the watchman's warnings, and the persistent wicked person, who dies in any event (Tiemeyer 2005, 382-83).

Yet, there is a pervasive sense in the book of Ezekiel that the people will not repent, and, as a result, that God must punish them. Just after God has assigned Ezekiel to be a watchman for Jerusalem (Ezek 3:17-21), God makes Ezekiel mute (Ezek 3:22-27). This divine act removes Ezekiel's ability to mediate between God and the people ('is mōkīah [Ezek 3:26]). In this manner, God hampers Ezekiel's ability to intercede and thus guarantees that God can carry out his planned punishment. It appears as if Ezekiel was actually able to speak, but he could utter only God's words and only when God chose to open his mouth. When it is too late for the people to change—that is, when God has already meted out his punishment over Jerusalem—Ezekiel is called anew to be a watchman, and his muteness is removed (Ezek 33:21-22) (Tiemeyer 2006, 207-13).

Although the people who remained in Judah until the Babylonian destruction in 587/586 BC bear the brunt of the blame, the exilic community gets its fair share of critique (e.g., Ezek 14:1-11). It is, for example, unclear whether the critique against the shepherds in Ezekiel 34:1-10 is directed against the last leaders of the kingdom of Judah or against the leaders of the exilic community in Babylon (Block 1998, 277).

God, in his anger over the sins of his people and their misdirected *worship, decides to abandon his city and his temple (Ezek 11:22-23) before meting out his punishment over them. Deprived of God's presence, Jerusalem is left vulnerable to the onslaught by God's agents, the Neo-Babylonian armies (see Block 1997, 360).

God's presence will return, however, when the divine punishment has run its course (Ezek 43:1-9). The final vision report in the book of Ezekiel describes how a new temple will be built (Ezek 40:1—43:11). This new temple comes with new regulations (Ezek 43:12—46:24) relating to the altar, the status of the Zadokite priesthood, the role of the Levites and the celebration of festivals. Surrounding the temple, and with the temple as its origin, there will be a new land (Ezek 47:1-12) with new boundaries (Ezek 47:13-23; 48:1-7, 23-29), and in its midst will be a special allotment for God (Ezek 48:8-14). There will also be a new Jerusalem (Ezek 48:30-35), the name of which will be "God is here" (Ezek 48:35).

God, in consideration of his glory and despite his people's unworthiness, chooses to re-establish his *covenant with them (Ezek 16:53-63; 36:16-30, 33-38; cf. Ezek 20:39-42). The restoration is solely dependent on God's own desire and is unrelated to any change in the people's behavior (Ezek 36:22-23). God will fully restore, indeed resurrect, the people of Israel (Ezek 37). They will be purified from their defilement (Ezek 36:25-29), at which point they will feel endless remorse and shame for their past behavior (Ezek 16:62; 36:31-32; cf. Ezek 20:43-44). God will also bring his people back from the nations among which he has scattered them (e.g., Ezek 11:14-18; 34:11-16; 36:8, 24). Back in their own land, the people will have plenty to eat and leisure to rest, as God will care for them and restore their health and strength (Ezek 34:14-16). He will make a covenant of *peace with them and ensure that they will never again be the victims of other nations (Ezek 34:25-31), and he will make them abundant and prosperous (Ezek 36:8-11). God will also give the people new hearts that have a renewed capacity and desire to follow his will (Ezek 11:19-20; 36:25-27). At the same time, God will judge those from among his people who seek to do harm to the weaker ones (Ezek 34:17-22).

God further promises his people a new shepherd/leader, called "God's servant David," whom he himself will appoint (Ezek 34:23-24; 37:24-25). Another figure, the "prince" (nāṣī'), appears later in Ezekiel 44—46; 48. There is probably continuity between the two characters, as there is continuity between the *messianic hope in Ezekiel 1—39 (Ezek 17:1-24 [esp. vv. 22-24]; 21:30-32) and that in Ezekiel 40—48. The nāṣī' is portrayed as a mortal cultic figure of messianic character and with a political role in the eschatological future envisioned in Ezekiel 40—48 (Levenson, 57-107).

4. The Book of Ezekiel in Texts from the Second Temple Period.

The book of Ezekiel is referred to in the Apocrypha, the Pseudepigrapha, the Dead Sea Scrolls and the NT.

4.1. The Book of Ezekiel in the Apocrypha and the Pseudepigrapha. The Apocrypha and the Pseudepigrapha refer primarily to Ezekiel 1; 10; 34; 37. The material in 1 Enoch 14; 39; 71, for example, reuses the imagery of Ezekiel 1; 10. In addition, both the Animal Apocalypse of 1 Enoch 89—90 and Psalms of Solomon 17 use Ezekiel as the means of advancing messianic hope. Both texts notably allude to the description of David as the shepherd in Ezekiel 34. Finally, 4 Maccabees 18 quotes Ezekiel 37:3 as part of its defense of the resurrection (Manning, 78-99).

4.2. The Book of Ezekiel in the Dead Sea Scrolls. Many of the *Dead Sea Scrolls refer to the book of Ezekiel, which suggests that it was held in high esteem in the Qumran community (Zimmerli 1979, 74-75). The Damascus Document (CD) and Hodayot (1QH^a) contain most of the allusions. For example, CD-B XIX, 33-35 alludes to the references to prophets in Ezekiel 13:9, 1QH^a XIV; XVI reuse the imagery of water and plants of Ezekiel 17; 19; 31, and the Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice (MasIk; 4Q400; 4Q401; 4Q402; 4Q403; 4Q404; 4Q405; 4Q406; 4Q407) draw upon the images of the throne visions in Ezekiel 1; 10. In addition, the descriptions of the temple in the Temple Scroll (11Q19 XXIX, 8—XLVII, 15) are dependent on the material in Ezekiel 40—48.

Although these later texts apply the text of Ezekiel to the specific conditions in the Qumran community, they are sensitive to its meaning within the context of the book of Ezekiel. This combination of extensive and careful use of Ezekiel suggests that many of the Qumran authors had a strong affinity for the book of Ezekiel. The Qumran community shared its priestly interest in the temple, the Levitical law and the priesthood, and the concern for Jerusalem and its need to be punished. There are also similarities between the Qumran community and the book of Ezekiel in terms of eschatology. For example, the Qumran community constructed its eschatology as a replay of the exile and restoration as seen through Ezekiel's eyes, and it reused many of its key themes, such as the purification of the community in the wilderness, the giving of God's Spirit, and God's return to the restored temple (Manning, 22-77).

Another group of texts expands and interprets select parts of Ezekiel. For example, the extant fragments of 4QPseudo-Ezekiel (4Q385; 4Q385c; 4Q386; 4Q388; 4Q391), probably constituting four literary units, contain versions of passages from the book of Ezekiel. As far as scholars can tell, the author(s) of these fragments rewrote select passages from the book of Ezekiel and added to them other material. For instance, 4Q385 2-3; 4Q386 1 I; 4Q388 8, 7 attest to a reworked version of Ezekiel's vision of the valley of the dry bones (Ezek 37:1-14), and 4Q385 6 probably contains a rewritten version of Ezekiel's opening vision (Ezek 1) (see further Tromp, 70-75; Jassen, 231-34).

4.3. The Book of Ezekiel in the New Testament.

Although the name of the prophet Ezekiel is nowhere mentioned in the NT, the NT evokes several key passages in the book of Ezekiel (see Prophets in the New Testament). The NT Epistles contain some of the clearest cases of allusions. For instance, 2 Corinthians 5:17 and Ephesians 2:3 pick up the concept of a new heart from Ezekiel 11:19-20; 36:25-27 and transform it into a motif of grace. These later texts use it as a picture of God restoring Israel and, by extension, humankind to a condition that God intended for them all along (Duguid, 157-58). Likewise, Romans 2:24 alludes to the notion of God's name having been desecrated among the nations in Ezekiel 36:22, and Romans 10:5 and Galatians 3:10-11 reuse the idea in Ezekiel 20:11 that one should live by God's laws. It is also possible to detect an oblique reference to Ezekiel 12:22, 27 in 2 Peter 3:4.

Among the Gospels, the material in John 10:11-18 alludes to the shepherd imagery in Ezekiel 34; 37:15-28. The material in Ezekiel 34 is used primarily to make a connection between Jesus and God. This passage is useful to the Evangelist in that it contrasts the bad shepherds of Israel with two good ones, God and David. The Gospel of John portrays Jesus as fulfilling all the criteria that God fulfills in Ezekiel 34. For example, like God in Ezekiel, Jesus describes the people as "my flock" and "my sheep" (e.g., Ezek 34:3, 6, 30; John 10:14, 16, 26-27), and like God in Ezekiel, Jesus will rescue the sheep (Ezek 34:7-10; John 10:12-13). Furthermore, both John and Ezekiel emphasize the relationship between sheep and shepherd, expressed through the sheep's knowledge of their shepherd (Ezek 34:27, 30, 31; John 10:3, 14, 27). In this manner, the evangelist conveys the distinct impression that Jesus is God. The evangelist also refers to Ezekiel 34 in order to liken Jesus' opponents, symbolized by the "thief" and the "hireling," to bad shepherds (John 10:8, 10, 12-13; cf. Ezek 34:3-8). In contrast, the material in Ezekiel 37 is alluded to in John in order to establish a link between Jesus and David (John 10:16; cf. Ezek 37:19, 22-24). As David is God's faithful servant, appointed by him to care for the sheep, so Jesus is God's faithful representative who fully carries out God's work (Manning, 114-24).

The parable of the true vine in John 15:1-10 is influenced by the language and imagery of the vine metaphors in Ezekiel 15:1-8; 17:1-10, 19. As in the case of John 10, by alluding to the Ezekielian material, the NT authors transform it so that it can serve new purposes. First, the target audience is changed. The vine metaphors in their original context pronounce judgment upon Jerusalem and its leaders. In contrast, John uses them to encourage the disciples to trust only in Jesus and to explain the betrayal by Judas. In this respect, John's use of Ezekiel's vine metaphors probably should be understood in the light of the conflict with Jerusalem and its rulers that is present elsewhere in John's Gospel. Second, the identity of the vine is redefined. Whereas the vine denotes the whole people of Israel in the original context, in John the branches that Jesus will take care of and prune are only those who follow his teaching (Manning, 135-49).

The book of Revelation contains the majority of the allusions to the book of Ezekiel. There is some debate as to the extent of the influence, but most scholars agree on the following set of allusions: (1) the vision of the chariot in Ezekiel 1 underlies John's vision of the heavenly throne room with the four creatures surrounding Jesus in Revelation 4:1-8; (2) the notion that the prophet is forbidden to eat the scroll in Ezekiel 2:8-9 is echoed in Revelation 5:1, 10; (3) the notion of protection from the slaughter in Ezekiel 9:1-11 reappears in Revelation 7:1-8; (4) the condemnation of the prostitute in Ezekiel 16:23 is alluded to in Revelation 17:1-6, 15-18; (5) the oracles against Tyre in Ezekiel 26-28 serve as the model for the lament over the fall of Babylon (Rome) in Revelation 18; (6) the prophecies against Gog in Ezekiel 38-39 are picked up and transformed in Revelation 19-20; (7) both Ezekiel and Revelation end with a vision of the new temple (Ezek 40-48; Rev 21-22). In particular, Revelation 22:1-2 is modeled after Ezekiel 47:1-8.

The material in Revelation depends upon yet also transforms the texts in the book of Ezekiel. We see this phenomenon clearly in the reuse of Ezekiel 38-39 in Revelation 19-20. First, there is the significant correspondence between the descriptions of the birds' banquet and how they are being invited to gorge on the corpses of the defeated army in Revelation 19:17-21 and Ezekiel 39:4, 17-20. Second, Revelation 20:7-10 and Ezekiel 38-39 share four themes: (1) the notion that the nations will attack God's people; (2) a reference to the great size of Gog's army and the worldwide recruitment to it; (3) God's direct intervention from heaven; (4) reference to "fire and sulfur." At the same time, there is a marked difference between the two texts. For instance, in Ezekiel 38:2 God commands Ezekiel to prophesy against Gog, of the land of Magog, the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal. In contrast, Revelation 20:8 treats Gog and Magog as a pair of names and portrays them as coming from all over the world rather than from one specific country. Likewise, the material in Ezekiel 38:4-6 tells how God is ultimately responsible for Gog's attack on Israel: God will turn Gog around, put hooks in his jaws, and bring him and his army forth. Revelation 20:7 changes the theological meaning of this passage drastically by introducing the character of Satan and making him responsible for deceiving Gog and Magog (Boe, 274-345).

The identification of Gog and Magog has been endlessly debated, ranging from ancient powers to modern world leaders (see the overview in Boe, 88-99). Already the Aramaic Targum to Ezekiel (Ezek 39:16) identifies Gog with Rome.

There are also some similarities between the book of Ezekiel and the NT that probably are not the result of direct influence. For example, Jesus is described as the "son of man" throughout the NT. Notably, all four Gospels use this appellation as part of Jesus' self-representation, as do Acts 7:54-57; Hebrews 2:6-9; Revelation 1:12-18; 14:14. In the OT this appellation is attested primarily in the book of Ezekiel, where God calls the prophet "son of man" more than ninety times, and where it either emphasizes his humanity or is used instead of a personal pronoun. Nonetheless, it is questionable whether the NT writers are influenced by its use in the book of Ezekiel. Instead, they more likely are indebted to the specific use in Daniel 7:13, where the expression "son of man" refers to a divine being, and to its similar use in 1 Enoch 37-71.

It is also important to note that the NT writers never use the vision of the dry bones in Ezekiel 37 as a symbol for Jesus' resurrection or for the resurrection of believers in him, with the possible exception of John 5:25-28, which mentions the final resurrection of those who believe in Jesus (Manning, 160-65). Likewise, rabbinic Judaism never uses Ezekiel 37 as a proof-text to support the belief in a general eschatological resurrection.

5. Canonization of the Book of Ezekiel.

The book of Ezekiel was accepted into the *canon of the synagogue and church with difficulty. First, Ezekiel's claim to have seen God (Ezek 1:28) was not easily accepted. Notably, later patristic traditions sought to alleviate the situation by maintaining that Ezekiel had not seen God's essence but only his image. Second, certain regulations in the book of Ezekiel deviate from the cultic regulations as found in the Pentateuch (b. Menah. 45a; b. Šabb. 13b) (see Stevenson and Glerup, xix). This lack of agreement with the pentateuchal material caused the rabbinic discussion concerning the canonical status of the book of Ezekiel to last well into the fifth century AD. The rabbis sought to determine whether the book of Ezekiel, alongside books such as Ruth, Esther and Ecclesiastes, "defiled the hands"—that is, whether it should be considered as part of the literature deemed to be inspired of God and sacred to the Jews.

6. Ideological Readings.

6.1. Feminist Readings—Ezekiel 16 and 23. Much *feminist research on the OT has focused on the book of Ezekiel. In particular, the oracles in Ezekiel 16; 23, with their sexual and marital imagery, are key texts for those scholars who seek to highlight that many biblical texts are misogynist. These passages further stand out among those passages in the OT that contain sexual and marital metaphors because of their stark descriptions of sexual violence toward female Israel and Judah (see Women and Female Imagery).

The historical context of both Ezekiel 16 and Ezekiel 23 is the fall of Jerusalem to the Neo-Babylonian armies in 587/586 bc. The prophet Ezekiel is condemning the people of Judah for making politically alliances especially with Egypt (Ezek 16:26-29; 23:3) instead of trusting in God (implied by the imagery [cf. Ezek 29:16]).

The literary narratives in Ezekiel 16 and Ezekiel 23 consist of two related yet markedly different accounts. Looking more closely at Ezekiel 16, the chapter describes how God finds Jerusalem as a newborn baby, lying abandoned at the roadside, and rescues her. God “makes her flourish” (Ezek 16:7), and she matures. When God sees that she has reached sexual maturity, God takes her to him, washes her, clothes her and bedecks her with jewels (Ezek 16:8-14). Jerusalem then has sexual relations with other men and forgets her miserable youth (Ezek 16:15-34). God tries in vain to curtail her (sexual) activities (Ezek 16:27). Then, as a way of making Jerusalem pay for her sins and to vent his anger against her, God exposes her naked before her former lovers, who then stone her and hack her with their swords (Ezek 16:35-43). God promises that he will later remember his covenant with her and restore her (Ezek 16:60, 62). In response, he maintains, Jerusalem will feel shame and disgrace (Ezek 16:61, 63).

There are two ways of looking at Ezekiel 16 and Ezekiel 23. One can interpret the text in its historical setting and focus on the underlying tenor of the metaphor—that is, on Judah’s political alliances and God’s anger at Judah’s lack of trust in his ability to preserve them. In contrast to the marital imagery in Hosea 1—3 and Jeremiah 2, the ultimate aim of the imagery in Ezekiel 16 and Ezekiel 23 is not to bring Jerusalem to repentance. Instead, it provides a compelling tale of Judah’s depravity and God’s resulting righteous wrath, told in order to justify God’s destruction of Jerusalem. The people of Judah did not obey God’s commandments, and therefore God had to punish them (Baumann, 145, Tiemeyer 2010) (see 6.2 below). Alternatively, one can look at the text from a literary perspective and concentrate on the vehicle of the metaphor—that is, on the interplay between the man (God) and his wife (Judah). Most feminist scholarship on Ezekiel 16 and Ezekiel 23 approaches the text from this perspective (e.g., Moughtin-Mumby, 156-205).

In general, feminist critique of the sexual and marital imagery in the OT is aimed at the expressed patriarchal ideas that are understood to be both sexist and misogynistic. As in all the surrounding cultures, a woman’s sexuality was owned first by her father and then, after her marriage, by her husband. Whereas a man could have multiple sexual partners, as long as these partners were not the wives of other men, a woman was restricted to chastity while unmarried and, once married, to a sexual relationship with her husband. As to marriage, it was not a covenant between two equals, but rather one between a master and his subordinate woman. If the woman displeased her husband and/or was unfaithful to him, the husband had the legal and societal right to cast her off, to chastise her physically and to publically humiliate her. In contrast, a woman had no rights regarding a faithless husband. Feminist scholars argue that this gender inequality, inherent to the world of the OT, has rendered the sexual and marital imagery of the Bible difficult for readers today. It therefore is not the description of God and Israel as sharing a bond of intimacy and love in itself that causes problems. Problems arise, however, when one takes seriously the view of marriage presupposed by the ancient Israelite writers. Readers of the Bible need to realize that the prevalent modern view of marriage, it being a symbol of mutual love and reciprocal respect, and the ancient Israelite concept of marriage do not coincide. More specifically, readers must reject the notion that a husband had the right to physically abuse his wife in response to her unfaithfulness. In such a case, the woman's actual guilt is irrelevant, as no act of unfaithfulness justifies stripping a woman naked in public and having her stoned and hacked with swords (Ezek 16:37-40). Feminist scholars further maintain that an exegete who justifies this kind of divine behavior by appealing to God's immense love and rightfully felt jealousy is not taking the text seriously. Moreover, the notion that God, after brutally beating and publicly humiliating his wife, is graciously prepared to overlook her past faithlessness and take her back (Ezek 16:59-62) presents an image that is too close to situations of domestic violence to sit comfortably with today's readers. What woman should be urged to return to an abusive husband? Thus, the metaphor of God as Israel's husband has, for many contemporary readers, become a symbol of force and oppression.

Several nonfeminist scholars regard Ezekiel 16 as an expression of God's grace. He is prepared to love his wife unconditionally even though she, given the debt of her guilt, is totally undeserving of his affection. Moreover, many scholars see God's jealousy as a reflection of the intensity of his deep love for Israel. D. Block, for example, argues that God's jealousy is an expression of his love, a love that "is fueled not by an exploitative need to dominate but by ardor for the well-being of the object" (Block 1997, 13). In the particular context of Ezekiel 16, he maintains that it presents God as a gracious savior who lavishes his favors on the helpless infant/young woman (Block 1997, 469-70). From a feminist perspective, such a reading is unacceptable for several reasons. First, it is unwarranted to detach Ezekiel 16:1-14, 60-63 from its larger context and read it as an image of God's grace. As a whole, Ezekiel 16 is like a Cinderella story gone tragically awry. One cannot look at God's rescue of infant Jerusalem and his subsequent marriage to her without also looking at his horrific punishment of her because of her sins and her subsequent life of shame. Second, such a reading betrays a view of men and women in which the man is always the active partner while the woman is simply there to be adorned and to satisfy his (sexual) needs (Ezek 16:8, 13). Jerusalem is not really valued for the qualities of her soul or her intellectual capabilities. Third, the whole "fairy tale" of God's rescue and subsequent marriage to Judah is a Lolita story of broken trust and sexual abuse of power over a minor in his care (see Baumann, 161). It raises the question as to why God rescued the infant in the first place. His saving act of baby Judah is not depicted as part of his impartial desire to take care of her and raise her to adulthood and independence, as he becomes interested in washing off the blood that covered her as a newborn only after she has reached sexual maturity (Ezek 16:9).

The issue of intended versus unintended audience of texts containing sexual and marital metaphors complicates the reading of Ezekiel 16 and Ezekiel 23. The rhetoric of these two oracles, in their historical context, was meant for the prophet's male audience, and later for the male readership of the text, as the means of shaming them into repentance by likening them to women. Military defeat and exile had, in a sense, already emasculated them, and now they are further humiliated by being likened to women (see Kamionkowski, 58-91). From this perspective, the rhetoric of Ezekiel 16 and Ezekiel 23 must have been very powerful. For a contemporary female reader, however, it requires complicated mental gymnastics to get the message of Ezekiel 16 and Ezekiel 23 right. She needs first to imagine herself to be a man in order to then feel ashamed for being likened to a woman.

Finally, feminist scholarship points out that the use of imagery relating to prostitutes betrays the assumption that women actively choose to become prostitutes because they enjoy being sexually promiscuous (Ezek 16:23-32). The discrepancy between this fantasy and the reality is glaring. In the past as well as today, most women who become prostitutes do so because they are (1) sold, kidnapped or abandoned as children, (2) raped and thus declared unmarriageable, (3) enslaved or (4) unable to support themselves and their children in any other way. Prostitution itself is therefore yet another form of violence against woman.

6.2. Post-Holocaust Readings. Post-Holocaust theology shares certain aspects with feminist readings in that both approaches, although from different perspectives, question God's right to punish Judah. There is a strong sense among scholars who look at the biblical texts through the lens of post-Holocaust theology that the model for sin and punishment attested in the book of Ezekiel is inadequate in light of Jewish suffering. The theology of the book of Ezekiel that states that the people of Judah, rather than God, were responsible for their death and exile because of their sins cannot be upheld in view of the suffering of the Jews in the Holocaust. It cannot be maintained that the victims are to be blamed for their own suffering (Sweeney, 128-46). As K. Darr says, "In a world where holocausts happen, we dare not follow Ezekiel when he insists that suffering, alienation and exile are God's just punishment for sin" (Darr, 114). In order to "survive" the book of Ezekiel, some scholars have opted for counterreadings. Darr, for example, reads Job as a corrective of the book of Ezekiel (Darr, 113), and L.-S. Tiemeyer reads it together with Lamentations (Tiemeyer 2010).

6.3. Psychological Readings. The prophet Ezekiel often exhibits strange behaviors and states: muteness (Ezek 3:26), visionary traveling (Ezek 1; 8—11; 37; 40—48), emotional paralysis after his wife's death (Ezek 24:15-27), pornographic language (Ezek 16; 23) and sign acts (Ezek 4:1—5:4), such as acting out of the siege of Jerusalem with the help of a tile and an iron griddle (Ezek 4:1-3), and lying on one side for 390 days (Ezek 4:4-8), to name but a few. Given such behavior, scholars have from time to time argued that Ezekiel, as a literary figure and/or as the author of the book, was a psychotic who suffered from a paranoid condition (see Prophecy and Psychology).

Recently D. Halperin and D. Smith-Christopher have advanced this type of research. Halperin maintains that many of the violent images, particularly against women, in the book of Ezekiel, as well as the portrayal of God as a vengeful deity, stem from the prophet's sick mind, the result of sexual abuse as a child (Halperin, 133-34). The author (i.e., the prophet Ezekiel) was a profoundly disturbed man whose ways of thinking and expressing his thoughts are dominated by a pathological loathing of female sexuality. This becomes evident primarily in his pornographic descriptions of women in Ezekiel 16; 23 (Halperin, 142-51), his behavior following his wife's death (Halperin, 176-83), and his symbolic language pertaining to pollution that fuses the terminology of ritual pollution with female sexuality, as in, for example, Ezekiel 7:20-22 (Halperin, 151-54).

From a very different angle, Smith-Christopher argues that the divine oracles in the book of Ezekiel reflect, at least in part, the actual experiences of the prophet Ezekiel, who utters them. The descriptions and theology in these oracles are directly influenced by the prophet's experiences of the violence caused by the Neo-Babylonian attacks on Jerusalem and the deprivation and humiliation of deportation. As such, we should read the book of Ezekiel as the literary creation of a man who suffers posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) (Smith-Christopher, 75-104).

This field of research is not uncontested. First, it rests to a very large extent on the assumption that the prophet Ezekiel, as described within the book of Ezekiel, corresponds fully with the author of the book (see 1.1 above). Second, it challenges the claim of the book of Ezekiel, which describes the prophet's behavior as the immediate result of God's power upon him. Notably, both Halperin and Smith-Christopher maintain that the book of Ezekiel tells us more about the human being Ezekiel than about God. Ezekiel was an ill man whose illness influenced his writings. In contrast, the book of Ezekiel describes the prophet as a (healthy) person whose odd behavior is the result of the power of God's Spirit over him, and who uttered God's undiluted word.

6.4. Other Readings. The vision reports in the book of Ezekiel have fascinated people outside mainstream Christianity and rabbinic Judaism. In particular, the vision report in Ezekiel 1 (alongside Gen 6:1-4) has often been connected with the so-called ancient astronaut theories, which claim that intelligent extraterrestrial beings visited earth, and that this contact triggered the development of human cultures, technologies and/or religions. J. F. Blumrich, an aeronautical engineer, is the chief proponent of these theories. He maintains that a close reading of Ezekiel 1 reveals that Ezekiel saw a spacecraft consisting of three major systems: a main body, four helicopters that support the main body, and a capsule (Blumrich, 14, fig. 1; cf. Lieb, 42-73). However, none of these theories have received much attention in peer-reviewed studies in scientific journals.

6.5. The Book of Ezekiel in Art and Literature. Most depictions of the prophet Ezekiel in art are connected to his vision reports. For example, the paintings in the Dura-Europos synagogue (a third-century BC synagogue situated between Aleppo and Baghdad on the bank of the Euphrates) depict Ezekiel's visions (Ezek 1; 8—11; 37; 40—48) (Kraeling, 355-59). Likewise, in 1518 Raphael famously painted the scene depicted in Ezekiel 1, his only motif taken from the book of Ezekiel. Allusions to the book of Ezekiel in literature tend to be limited to Ezekiel's vision reports. For instance, John Milton, in Paradise Lost, speaks of the "chariot of paternal deity" (book 6, line 750), the vehicle on which the Son of God travels in order to fight the rebellious angels in the celestial battle (see Lieb, 21-31). Influenced by Milton, William Blake's poetry and artwork also draw on Ezekiel 1 (Rowland).

See also EXILE; EZEKIEL: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION; HERMENEUTICS; SIGN ACTS; TEMPLE; VISIONS, PROPHETIC.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Commentaries: A. Bertholet, Hesekiel (HAT 1/13; Tübingen: Mohr, 1936); D. I. Block, The Book of Ezekiel: Chapters 1-24 (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997); idem, The Book of Ezekiel: Chapters 25-48 (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); I. M. Duguid, Ezekiel (NIVAC; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1999); P. M. Joyce, Ezekiel: A Commentary (LHBOTS 482; London: T & T Clark, 2007); J. W. Olley, Ezekiel: A Commentary Based on the Codex Vaticanus (SCS; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2009); K. Stevenson and M. Glerup, eds., Ezekiel, Daniel (ACCS 13; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2008); W. Zimmerli, Ezekiel 1: A Commentary on the Book of the Prophet Ezekiel, Chapters 1-24, trans. R. E. Clements, ed. F. Cross and K. Baltzer (Hermeneia; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); idem, Ezekiel 2: A Commentary on the Book of the Prophet Ezekiel, Chapters 25-48, trans. R. E. Clements, ed. F. Cross and K. Baltzer (Hermeneia; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983). Studies: D. Baltzer, Ezechiel und Deuteriojesaja: Berührungen in der Heilserwartung der beiden grossen Exilspropheten (BZAW 121; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1971); G. Baumann, Love and Violence: Marriage as Metaphor for the Relationship between YHWH and Israel in the Prophetic Books, trans. L. M. Maloney (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical, 2003); D. I. Block, "In Search of Theological Meaning: Ezekiel Scholarship at the Turn of the Millennium," in Ezekiel's Hierarchical World: Wrestling with a Tiered Reality, ed. S. L. Cook and C. L. Patton (SBLSymS 31; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2004) 227-39; J. F. Blumrich, The Spaceships of Ezekiel (New York: Bantam, 1974); S. Boe, Gog and Magog: Ezekiel 38-39 as Pre-Text for Revelation 19,17-21 and 20,7-10 (WUNT 2/135; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2001); K. Darr, "Ezekiel's Justifications of God: Teaching Troubling Texts," JSOT 55 (1992) 97-117; J. de Moor, ed., The Elusive Prophet: The Prophet as a Historical Person, Literary Character, and Anonymous Artist (OTS 45; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2001); M. Ehrensverd, "Linguistic Dating of Biblical Texts," in Biblical Hebrew: Studies in Chronology and Typology, ed. I. Young (JSOTSup 369; London: T & T Clark, 2003) 164-88; U. Feist, Ezechiel: Das literarische Problem des Buches forschungsgeschichtlich betrachtet (BWANT 7/18; Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1995); T. Ganzel, "Transformation of Pentateuchal Descriptions of Idolatry," in Transforming Visions: Transformations of Text, Tradition, and Theology in Ezekiel, ed. W. A. Tooman and M. A. Lyons (PTMS 127; Eugene, OR: Pickwick, 2010) 33-49; J. Garscha, Studien zum Ezechielbuch: Eine redaktionskritische Untersuchung von 1-39 (EH 23/23; Frankfurt: Peter Lang, 1974); Y. Gitay, "The Projection of the Prophet: A Rhetorical Presentation of the Prophet Jeremiah," in Prophecy and Prophets: The Diversity of Contemporary Issues in Scholarship, ed. Y. Gitay (SBLSS; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1997) 41-55; L. L. Grabbe, A History of the Jews and Judaism in the Second Temple Period, 1: Yehud: A History of the Persian Province of Judah (LSST 47; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 2004); D. J. Halperin, Seeking Ezekiel: Text and Psychology (University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1993); M. Haran, "Ezekiel, P, and the Priestly School," VT 58 (2008) 211-18; V. Herntrich, Ezechielprobleme (BZAW 61; Giessen: Töpelmann, 1933); S. Herrmann, Die prophetischen Heilserwartungen im Alten Testament: Ursprung und Gestaltwandel (BWANT 5; Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1965); A. Hurvitz, A Linguistic Study of the Relationship between the Priestly Source and the Book of Ezekiel: A New Approach to an Old Problem (CahRB 20; Paris: Gabalda, 1982); A. P. Jassen, Mediating the Divine: Prophecy and Revelation in the Dead Sea Scrolls and Second Temple Judaism (STDJ 68; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2007); S. Kamionkowski, Gender Reversal and Cosmic Chaos: A Study on the Book of Ezekiel (JSOTSup 368; London: Sheffield Academic, 2003); R. Levitt Kohn, A New Heart and a New Soul: Ezekiel, the Exile and the Torah (JSOTSup 358; London: Sheffield Academic, 2002); C. H. Kraeling, The Synagogue (Excavations at Dura-Europos 8.1; New Haven: Yale University Press, 1956); J. F. Kutsko, Between Heaven and Earth: Divine Presence and Absence in the Book of Ezekiel (BibJudS 7; Winona Lake, IN; Eisenbrauns, 2000); J. D. Levenson, Theology of the Program of Restoration of Ezekiel 40-48 (HSM 10; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1976); M. Lieb, Children of Ezekiel: Aliens, UFOs, the Crisis of Race, and the Advent of End Time (Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1998); J. Lust, "The Use of Textual Witnesses for the Establishment of the Text," in Ezekiel and His Book: Textual and Literary Criticism and their Interrelation, ed. J. Lust (BETL 74; Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1986) 7-20; M. A. Lyons, "Transformation of Law: Ezekiel's Use of the Holiness Code (Leviticus 17-26)," in Transforming Visions: Transformations of Text, Tradition, and Theology in Ezekiel, ed. W. A. Tooman and M. A. Lyons (PTMS 127; Eugene, OR: Pickwick, 2010) 1-32; G. T. Manning Jr., Echoes of a Prophet: The Use of Ezekiel in the Gospel of John and in the Literature of the Second Temple Period (JSNTSup 270; T & T Clark, 2004); T. D. Mayfield, Literary Structure and Setting in Ezekiel (FAT 2/43; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2010); A. Mein, Ezekiel and the Ethics of Exile (OTM; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001); S. Moughtin-Mumby, Sexual and Marital Metaphors in Hosea, Jeremiah, Isaiah, and Ezekiel (OTM; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2008); M. F. Rooker, Biblical Hebrew in Transition: The Language of the Book of Ezekiel (JSOTSup 90; Sheffield: JSOT, 1990); C. Rowland, "Ezekiel's Merkavah in the Work of William Blake and Christian Art," in The Book of Ezekiel and Its Influence, ed. H. J. de Jonge and J. Tromp (Aldershot: Ashgate, 2007) 183-200; M. Saur, Der Tyroszyklus des Ezechielbuches (BZAW 386; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2008); D. L. Smith-Christopher, A Biblical Theology of Exile (OBT; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2002); T. Stordalen, Echoes of Eden: Genesis 2-3 and Symbolism of the Garden in Biblical Hebrew Literature (CBET 25; Leuven: Peeters, 2001); M. A. Sweeney, Reading the Hebrew Bible after the Shoah: Engaging Holocaust Theology (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2008) 128-46; L.-S. Tiemeyer, "The Watchman Metaphor in Isaiah LVI-LXVI," VT 55 (2005) 378-400; idem, "God's Hidden Compassion," TynBul 57 (2006) 191-213; idem, "To Read—or Not to Read—Ezekiel as Christian Scripture," ExpTim 121 (2010) 1-8; C. C. Torrey, Pseudo-Ezekiel and the Original Prophecy (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1930); J. Tromp, "'Can These Bones Live?' Ezekiel 37:1-14 and Eschatological Resurrection," in The Book of Ezekiel and Its Influence, ed. H. J. de Jonge and J. Tromp (Aldershot: Ashgate, 2007) 61-78; W. Zimmerli, "Jahwes Wort bei Deuteriojesaja," VT 32 (1982) 104-24.

L.-S. Tiemeyer

EZEKIEL: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION

From the beginning, the book of Ezekiel has offended, challenged and inspired those who would seek to interpret it. However, as cultural mores and theological views have altered over time, different aspects of the book have been deemed interesting or offensive. For example, modern readers often are offended by the prophet's graphic language and his supposed endorsement of violence against women in Ezekiel 16; 23, while being largely untroubled by the book's apparent conflicts with other canonical texts. In contrast, ancient readers were far more concerned about the latter than the former, which they dealt with by simply allegorizing the text. As with other biblical books, there has also been sustained debate in the modern period over Ezekiel's authorship and unity, both of which were largely taken for granted during the premodern period. This article traces the history of the book's interpretation from its earliest reception down to the contemporary period.

1. From the Beginning to the New Testament
2. Rabbinic and Early Christian Interpretation
3. Medieval and Reformation Interpretation
4. Modern Interpretation

1. From the Beginning to the New Testament.

The immediate impact of the prophecies of Ezekiel and of the book that bears his name is not easy to ascertain. During his own time, the prophet had the opportunity to address the elders of the people (Ezek 14:1) and crowds of fellow exiles (Ezek 33:31). Yet in those days, he was regarded by many as merely a singer of popular songs: they listened to him perform as entertainment, but had little appetite to have their lives changed by his message (Ezek 33:32). This was exactly what the Lord himself told Ezekiel would happen: had he been sent to a foreign nation, there might have been an openness to listen, but the house of Israel would not listen to Ezekiel because their foreheads were hard and their hearts stubborn (Ezek 3:7).

However, D. Block argues that the influence of Ezekiel was largely responsible for a dramatic spiritual transformation in the hearts of the *exiles, from the moral and theological chaos of the preexilic situation to a renewal of spiritual interest and hope in the ancient promises of God (1997, 43). Certainly, the fall of Jerusalem would have dramatically validated his prophetic claims, yet it is not clear how widespread the acceptance of his message was, even among the exiles in Babylon. There was no attempt to implement his radical vision of a new Israel in a renewed land when the Judeans returned home. To be sure, some aspects of his vision, such as his design for the new *temple, would have been virtually impossible to construct, but other aspects, such as the transformation of the annual pilgrim festivals (ch. 46), would certainly have been practicable. Perhaps this legislation was not implemented because the Judeans rightly recognized that that was never intended to be its purpose. It was designed to convey the prophet's message of purification and separation from *evil through the medium of legislation, just as the same message was conveyed through the medium of architecture (40-42) and geography (47-48).

In terms of the rest of the OT, Ezekiel's writings certainly influenced the prophecies of *Zechariah, especially the passage addressing the shepherds of Israel in Ezekiel 34, which forms the background for Zechariah 11. There are plausibly also some connections with the Book of *Daniel as well, though little sign of influence on the other post-exilic writings exists. Ezekiel is only rarely mentioned in the inter-testamental period as well. Ben Sirach includes him in his list of famous Israelites (49:8), while 4 Macabbees, written in the first century AD, praises a man for being someone who "affirmed the word of Ezekiel." Josephus attributes two books to Ezekiel, which presumably refers to the so-called "Apocryphon of Ezekiel" in addition to his canonical book (Ant. 10.5.1). The *Dead Sea Scrolls attest to strong influence by the prophet, especially in their defense of Zadokite claims to the priesthood. The community was also interested in the opening vision of the Lord seated on his chariot-throne borne by the cherubim, and in motifs such as the marking of the foreheads of those who will be saved. They saw these people who mourned over the defilement of Jerusalem as a group like themselves – a faithful remnant of an unfaithful people (Cothenet, 1988).

The NT never quotes Ezekiel directly, though his influence is nonetheless present. Ezekiel's favorite title for himself ("son of man," in the sense of "mortal one") is picked up by Jesus, who used it to evoke the ambiguity of his mission: given its contrasting use in Ezekiel and Daniel 7, it was the perfect title for the one who came to identify with us in our humanity, but who is also the exalted Lord of heaven. The clearest influence is on the apostle John, who quotes Jesus as the Good Shepherd, the one who reflects the fulfillment of Ezekiel 34.

The influence of Ezekiel on John is also clear in the Book of Revelation (Moyise, 1995). John picks up on Ezekiel's prophecy of a final cataclysmic battle against the forces of evil, led by Gog (Rev. 20:8-9). Similarly, his vision of a New Jerusalem is clearly modeled after Ezekiel's new temple, though with striking and crucial differences, not least its name: Ezekiel's city was deliberately named "The Lord is there" rather than Jerusalem. What is more, John's city has no temple and is itself at the center of the vision, while it has gates that stand wide open to the redeemed from all nations, in contrast to Ezekiel's central temple with its towering gatehouses and high walls. Whereas Ezekiel described a temple in which no human being ever had access to the Holy of Holies, John describes a city which has itself become a giant Holy of Holies, a perfect, golden cube with God's throne at the center, offering free access to all those who have washed their robes in the blood of the Lamb (Rev. 21). In other words, John shows us Ezekiel's vision refracted through the lens of fulfillment in Christ. The temple and city that were separated in Ezekiel to preserve the temple's sanctity have now been reunited and merged in the New (and sanctified) Jerusalem, the heavenly bride of Christ. All those who were once far off from God through their sin now have open access to the throne of God's holy presence in Christ, who has become our great High Priest. Yet in keeping with Ezekiel's vision, there still exists a realm of "outside," where the unclean dwell forever, closed off from access into the realm of the holy (Rev. 22:15). Just as Ezekiel anticipated, a time is coming when the holy will no longer be defiled by the intrusion of the profane (see Prophets in the New Testament).

2. Rabbinic and Early Christian Interpretation.

In the rabbinic writings there is a particular fascination with the opening and closing visions of Ezekiel, along with a stress on the difficulty and danger of reading his words. According to Jerome, Jews under thirty years of age were forbidden from reading the beginning and ending of the book, and the cautionary tale is recorded of a child who picked up a copy of the Book of Ezekiel at his teacher's home and apprehended the true meaning of the extremely obscure and much-debated Hebrew word ḥāšmal the substance of which the divine figure appears to be comprised in Ezekiel 1:27. Instantly, fire came out from the ḥāšmal and incinerated him (b. ag. 13a). Yet a symbolic understanding of this opening vision was crucial to the survival of Judaism after the destruction of the temple in AD 70. In a situation reminiscent of the Babylonian exile, they once again had to live without the sign of the Lord's presence in their midst. In this situation, the *vision of the Lord seated on his merkabâ, or throne-chariot, became central to their thinking as a symbol of the Lord's transcendence and immanence with his people. Through this mobile presence, the sovereign Lord of all of the universe could still dwell with his people wherever they found themselves.

At the other end of the book, the Rabbis had problems with Ezekiel's temple vision in chapters 40-48. Here the chief difficulty lay in harmonizing the regulations of Ezekiel with the very different ones prescribed by Moses in the Pentateuch. For example, Ezekiel described two very similar annual festivals which were hard to align with the three different annual festivals (Passover, Weeks and Tabernacles) that had been established by Moses. One of the Rabbis, Hananiah ben Hezekiah, is said to have hidden himself away in his attic and burned three hundred barrels of oil in his lamp in his search for a reconciliation between the different laws. It was thanks to the success of his labors that the book of Ezekiel as a whole was saved from being excluded from the canon (b. Shab. 13b). Unfortunately, the fruits of his work were not preserved and, bereft of his wisdom, others among the Rabbis gave in to the counsel of despair, referring their pupils to a higher authority: Elijah would explain it all when he came (b. Mena. 45a).

It is fair to say that the Book of Ezekiel was not the primary OT text expounded in the early church, though a number of its images were popular in Christian art. Irenaeus identified the four faces of the living creatures in Ezekiel 1—the lion, the man, the ox and the eagle—as representing the fourfold picture of Christ revealed in the four Gospels (Haer. 3.11.8). The vision of the valley of the dry bones attracted attention as a proof text for the resurrection of the body and was explained as such by Tertullian (De carnis resurrectione) and Hilary of Poitiers. Origen preached a series of sermons on the parts of Ezekiel that were included in the liturgical calendar, expounding the prophet in allegorical terms, and apparently also wrote a commentary on larger parts of the book, which, however, has not survived. During the threatening days when Rome was under siege between 410 and 414, Jerome wrote a lengthy commentary on Ezekiel, reflecting in a letter to his friend Eustochium, "It seemed as though I was sharing the captivity of the saints." Gregory I (540-604) preached a series of sermons on the book during a later siege of Rome, focusing on the first and last visions of the prophet. Augustine preached two sermons against the Donatists on Ezekiel 34 and made significant use of chapters 18, 22 and 34 in his dogmatic works.

3. Medieval and Reformation Interpretation.

Much of the medieval work on Ezekiel was a reworking of earlier scholarship. Rabanus Maurus (c. 780-856) wrote a commentary that is essentially a compilation of Jerome and Gregory the Great, with a few original comments and citations of other more recent scholars. His contemporary, Haimo of Auxerre, did likewise. These works formed the foundation for the later Glossa Ordinaria, a monumental attempt to provide a biblical text with notes and citations from the church Fathers and Jewish commentators, as well as pictures and diagrams. In contrast to this continuation of the pattern of allegorical exegesis, Richard of St. Victor (d. 1173) explored the literal sense of the prophet's words, especially his portrayal of the new temple, seeing it as a promise to Israel that the temple and city would eventually be rebuilt. His focus on the literal meaning of the text reflected his greater access to, and appreciation for, Jewish interpretation.

One specific passage which attracted significant interest during the medieval period was Ezekiel 44:1-3, with its description of the closed east gate of the temple. This text was used to argue that in the incarnation, Christ entered the world in the normal way (Ratramnus; Part. Mar. 3:14), or alternatively that since Christ was able to pass through closed doors, he came into this world without any of the pain and suffering that was normally associated with childbirth (Radbertus; De assumptione Sanctae Mariae Virginis). For Thomas Aquinas, Ezekiel 44 was the classic proof text for the perpetual virginity of Mary, since it clearly states that no man has passed through it but only the Lord, after which it remains shut forever (Summa Theologica III Q.XXVIII art. 3).

Martin Luther first engaged with Ezekiel when he was preparing his translation of the Bible into German. Strikingly, he published his translation of Ezekiel 38—39, which deal with the assault of Gog on Israel, separately from and in advance of the rest of the Bible. Luther's interest in this *apocalyptic portion came against the background of the imminent threat of invasion by the Turks, who threatened Hungary in 1527 and had advanced as far as Vienna in 1529. Luther read these chapters of Ezekiel in conjunction with Revelation 20 and identified the Muslim Turks as the personification of Gog, while the church was the true Israel that was depicted under siege in the prophecy (LW 45.202). The devil was stirring these enemies up in a last ditch, desperate assault on the Lord's people: together with the Pope, the Turks were Satan's last and greatest weapon against the church. Luther also took a strongly christological approach to interpreting the prophecy: for example, the throne chariot in the opening vision is "the spiritual vehicle of Christ on which he rides in this world," while the new temple in Ezekiel 40—48 pictures the kingdom of Christ surviving on the earth until its final day (LW 35.293).

Even though they broke with Rome, the Reformers did not completely reject medieval patterns of exegesis. Huldreich Zwingli followed Aquinas in seeing Ezekiel 44:1-3 as a proof text for the perpetual virginity of Mary (SW 14.685-741). Yet he did not follow Luther in making contemporary application of Ezekiel 38—39; instead he saw it as having been completely fulfilled in the oppression of the Jews in the days of Alexander the Great. Meanwhile, John Calvin never completed a commentary on Ezekiel. Although he preached a series of sermons on Ezekiel in the 1550s, he only began to write his commentary on it at the close of his life and left it unfinished at chapter 20. His hermeneutical approach was more historical than Luther's, recognizing the context of the original readers in the Babylonian exile, while still applying their message to Christ and his church. Thus, for Calvin, the vision of the valley of dry bones was not primarily to be understood as a prophecy of the resurrection, as it was for the church Fathers, but rather as a depiction of the captivity and restoration of Israel. As such, however, it also conveyed a lesson of hope to the church and to individual Christians. Since he also did not write a commentary on Revelation, it may be that he found apocalyptic texts less appealing and immediately relevant than Luther had done.

Seventeenth century English exegetes showed more interest in Ezekiel than Calvin. The early scholar of apocalyptic, Joseph Mede (1586-1639), identified the New World as the true home of Gog. He believed that its Native American inhabitants were descended from the Scythians and would assault Europe in the last days. Meanwhile, the Puritan William Greenhill published five volumes on Ezekiel over the period 1645-1667, volumes that began as a lengthy series of expository lectures. Like much Puritan exegesis, they alternate between awareness of the original historical context and the desire for practical application that at times leads them into allegorical exposition, fastening on superficial similarities between the text and the preacher's context. In spite of that, Greenhill resisted the temptation to identify Gog as any contemporary foe; after surveying many different interpretations from the past, ranging from the Pope and the Turks all the way back to Alexander the Great, he left the identity of this enemy of the church open. He confessed that he found much of the detail about the temple in chapters 40-48 virtually incomprehensible, but asserted nonetheless that the overall message of this portion is a depiction of the Christian church and its worship under the figures and types of the old covenant. A little later in America, the eighteenth century scholar Cotton Mather was forced to interact with Joseph Mede's conjecture about the identity of Gog. He took it as a serious, though far from established, possibility, but stressed rather the positive aspect of his New England forefather's errand into the wilderness and the prospect of redemption for even this previously god-forsaken land. He drew on the image in the prophet of "the waters in Ezekiel's vision growing and rising still" to express his optimism about the future of this project to establish a new and pure community of the faith (Bercovitch, 1972).

4. Modern Interpretation.

Well into the modern period, the single authorship of Ezekiel was regarded as firmly established. S. R. Driver's comment that "the whole from beginning to end [bears] the stamp of a single mind" represents the vast majority opinion of nineteenth century scholarly opinion. However, dissenting voices started to emerge at the beginning of the Twentieth Century and received considerable impetus from the work of G. Hölscher, published in 1924. Hölscher argued that the original prophet was a poet, and using that and other criteria, asserted that a mere 144 verses out of the 1,273 that make up the book belonged to the prophet himself. The tension between poetry and prose paralleled the tension between the prophetic (poetic) persona of the prophet and his priestly (prosaic) interests. Following Wellhausen's reconstruction of Israel's history, it was believed that these belonged to separate groups from distinct historical periods, and therefore could not both have come from the same pen. Ezekiel's prophecies were also thought to contain a strong stress on "individual responsibility," which appealed to scholars as a progressive idea, but alongside that they also contained much interest in ritual and the cultus, which were thought to be regressive.

In the 1930s the idea that the book was a pseudepigraphic work from significantly after the Judean exile was popularized by C. C. Torrey. His work flowed from seeing a tension between material in the book that required a Judean location and the purported setting of the book in exile in Babylon. He argued, therefore, that the book was written in the third century BC in Judah and was originally set in the 30th year of Manasseh, but had then been later revised to fit a new, exilic date. Other scholars picked up and adapted the idea of a Judean ministry for the prophet, either for the whole or part of his career.

By the 1950s, these speculative attempts to divide up the book and to divorce parts of it from its putative setting were losing steam. Form and tradition criticism continued to identify individual portions and strata of the book as secondary, a movement that reached its height in the work of Zimmerli. Yet these movements tended to be relatively conservative in their conclusions in the case of the Book of Ezekiel, allowing a substantial majority of the book to be the prophet's own work, with many of the later accretions coming from members of the prophet's school. Those who were critical of Zimmerli's work tended to attack the idea of a long and lingering transmission process, through otherwise unattested "schools," in favor of fewer and more substantial redactors (Clements, 1982). There have continued to be a few scholars maintaining more radical views, such as Garscha and Pohlmann, but their arguments have not generally found favor. Meanwhile, the traditional case for essential composition by a single author writing in the Babylonian exile in the sixth century BC has continued to be defended by M. Greenberg and D. Block.

In the early part of the twentieth century much of the theological interest in Ezekiel revolved around psychological questions. As was mentioned earlier, many scholars saw Ezekiel as advancing a new religious insight, "individual responsibility." Ezekiel 18 in particular was seen as the herald of something radically distinct from the views of older texts, which stressed corporate responsibility. Yet more recent scholarship has recognized the fact that this passage is more about generational responsibility than individual responsibility: the history of any generation does not simply depend on the behavior of their father's generation but on their own (Joyce, 46). *Repentance is always an option for a community, not just for an individual. So the prophet's views were not as radical as earlier imagined.

There have also been attempts to psychoanalyze the prophet and thus to account for his strange behavior (Broome; Halperin). As a result, Ezekiel has been diagnosed as having suffered extreme problems in his relationship with his mother, probably in addition to having suffered serious childhood sexual abuse (see Prophecy and Psychology). These too have not found much following, not least because psychoanalyzing a historical person based solely on their writings must always be a highly speculative venture, while unusual *sign acts were part and parcel of the ministry of the prophets, especially when their calling was to hostile audiences (Friebel, 1999).

Equally speculative have been the attempts to identify the vision of the divine throne-chariot of chapter 1 as an interaction between the prophet and a spacecraft. This view was first introduced by Erich von Däniken in his 1968 book, Chariots of the Gods?, in which he argued that many features of ancient civilizations and religions stemmed from early contacts with UFO's. Although not garnering any scholarly support, von Däniken's colorful thesis has since become a staple of science fiction and the tabloid press. Similar associations between Ezekiel's vision and spacecraft have been identified in a variety of modern cults, especially in the teachings of Elijah Muhammed, the founder of the Nation of Islam (Lieb, 1998).

Other popular writers have returned to Luther's speculative approach to identifying the actors in the final battle of Ezekiel 38-39 with modern people and nations. Hal Lindsey's bestseller, Late Great Planet Earth (1970), was merely the most prominent publicity vehicle for a movement, when it identified the Rosh of Ezekiel 38:2 with Russia, Meshech with Moscow and Tubal with Tobolsk. These ideas had already been put forward in the early part of the century in the notes of the dispensationalist Scofield Reference Bible. Lindsey developed these ideas into a complex jigsaw linking biblical names and places with current events around the world, which he then used to argue for the imminent rapture of the church and the end of the world, events that he said would certainly take place during the 1980's. In spite of the failure of his detailed timelines, he and others continue to argue in the same vein and have a large public following in fundamentalist and conservative evangelical circles.

More recently, a number of *feminist scholars have been highly critical of Ezekiel's depiction of women, especially in chapters 16 and 23. This has been described as "pornographic" and repressive to women's sexuality, as well as being likely to lead to the abuse of women by their husbands (Van Dijk Hemmes; Exum). However, no evidence has been produced to demonstrate that these chapters were ever intended to be interpreted in those ways, or that they have ever actually been used as the foundation for such conclusions. These feminist readings have more in common with allegorical exegesis, in which any superficial resemblance between text and application could be justified on the basis of the practical utility of the application. Rather than being legitimate attempts to interpret the text in its original context, these readings seek to critique and resist those ancient texts on the basis of modern Western criteria of right and wrong (Patton, 2000).

Over the past few years, there have been a growing number of academic studies of Ezekiel taking the final form of the text seriously as the source for theological reflection (see Canonical Criticism). Building on the work of Greenberg and Block, there has been more skepticism about the ability of modern scholarship to identify redactional layers, and a corresponding desire to treat the text more holistically. There has been a growing interest in the *rhetorical form of the book (Renz), its connection with ancient Near Eastern background materials (see Ancient Near Eastern Prophecy) and the interplay between the prophetic and priestly roles of Ezekiel (Odell & Strong; Patton & Cook), the concept of *retribution in Ezekiel (Duguid; Wong), and the connection between the Book of Ezekiel and *ethics (Lapsley; Mein). Meanwhile, more traditional diachronic explorations of the text have continued as well, often in fruitful dialogue with the more holistic approaches (Tuell). These diverse approaches and methods show the vitality of the field of study at this time and show promise of yet more insights from the Book of Ezekiel in the years ahead.

See also EZEKIEL: BOOK OF; FEMINIST INTERPRETATION; HERMENEUTICS; PROPHECY AND ESCHATOLOGY IN CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. S. Bercovitch, "Cotton Mather," in Major Writers of Early American Literature, ed. E. Emerson (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1972) 93-150; D. I. Block, Ezekiel 1-24 (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, - 1997); idem, Ezekiel 25-48. (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); E. C. Broome, "Ezekiel's Abnormal Personality," JBL 65 (1946) 277-92; J. Calvin, Ezekiel I, trans. D. Foxgrover and D. Martin (repr., Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994); idem, Ezekiel II, trans. T. Myers (repr., Grand Rapids: Baker, 1989); idem, Sermons sur le livre des révélations du prophète Ézéchiél chapitres 36-48, ed. E. A. de Boer and B. Nagy (Supplementa Calviniana: Sermons inédits, 10/3; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 2006); R. E. Clements, "The Ezekiel Tradition: Prophecy in a Time of Crisis," in Israel's Prophetic Tradition, ed. R. Coggins, A. Phillips and M. Knibb (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982) 119-36; S. L. Cook and C. L. Patton, eds., Ezekiel's Hierarchical World: Wrestling with a Tiered Reality (Atlanta: SBL, 2005); E. Cothenet, "Influence d'Ezéchiél sur la spiritualité de Qumrân," RQ 13 (1988) 431-439; E. A. De Boer, John Calvin on the Visions of Ezekiel: Historical and Hermeneutical Studies (Leiden: Brill, 2003); S. R. Driver, An Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament (New York: Scribners, 1913); I. M. Duguid, Ezekiel and the Leaders of Israel (SVT 56; Leiden: Brill, 1994); J. C. Exum, Plotted, Shot and Painted: Cultural Representations of Biblical Women (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1996) 101-128; K. G. Friebel, Jeremiah's and Ezekiel's Sign Acts: Rhetorical Non-verbal Communication (JSOTSup 283; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1999); J. G. Galambush, "Ezekiel, Book of," in Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation, ed., J. H. Hayes (Nashville, TN: Abingdon, 1999) 1.372-375; J. Garscha, Studien zum Ezechielbuch (Berne and Frankfurt: Peter Lang, 1974); Gregory the Great, "Homiliarum in Ezechielem Prophetam Libri Duo," PL 76.785-1072; M. Greenberg, Ezekiel 1-20 (AB; Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1983); W. Greenhill, An Exposition of Ezekiel (repr.; Edinburgh: Banner of Truth, 1994); D. Halperin, Seeking Ezekiel: Text and Psychology (State College, PA: Pennsylvania State University, 1993); G. Hölscher, Hesekiel: der Dichter und das Buch (BZAW 39; Giessen: Töpelmann, 1924); Jerome, "Commentariorum in Ezechielem Prophetam Libri Quatuordecim," PL 25.15-490; P. Joyce, Divine Initiative and Human Response in Ezekiel (JSOTSup 51; Sheffield: JSOT, 1989); J. K. Jue, Heaven Upon Earth: Joseph Mede (1586-1638) and the Legacy of Millenarianism (Dordrecht: Springer, 2006); J. E. Lapsley, Can These Bones Live? The Problem of the Moral Self in the Book of Ezekiel (BZAW 301; Berlin: De Gruyter, 2001); M. Lieb, Children of Ezekiel: Aliens, UFOs, the Crisis of Race, and the Advent of End Time (Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1998); H. Lindsey, The Late, Great Planet Earth (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1970); M. Luther, Luther's Works (55 vols.; St. Louis: Concordia; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1955-1986); C. Mather, Magnalia Christi Americana (Boston, 1702); A. Mein, Ezekiel and the Ethics of Exile (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002); J. Mede, "A Conjecture Concerning Gog and Magog in the Revelation," in The Works of the Pious and Profoundly Learned Joseph Mede (London, 1664) 713; M. Odell and J. T. Strong, eds., The Book of Ezekiel: Theological and Anthropological Perspectives (Atlanta: SBL, 2000); C. L. Patton, "Should Our Sister Be Treated Like a Whore?: A Response to Feminist Critiques of Ezekiel 23," in The Book of Ezekiel: Theological and Anthropological Perspectives, ed., Odell and Strong (Atlanta: SBL, 2000) 221-38; F. Pohlmann, Ezechielstudien (BZAW 202; Berlin: De Gruyter, 1992); Rabanus Maurus, "Commentariorum in librum Ezechielem libri viginti," PL 110.493-1084; T. Renz, The Rhetorical Function of the Book of Ezekiel (Leiden: Brill, 1999); Richard of St Victor, "In Visionem Ezechielis," PL 196.527-600; K. Stevenson and M. Glerup, eds., Ezekiel, Daniel (ACCS; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2008); C. C. Torrey, Pseudo-Ezekiel and the Original Prophecy (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1930); S. S. Tuell, The Law of the Temple in Ezekiel 40-48 (HSM 48; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1992); F. van Dijk Hemmes, "The Metaphorization of Woman in Prophetic Speech," VT 43 (1993) 162-70; E. von Däniken, Chariots of the Gods? Unsolved Mysteries of the Past (London: Souvenir, 1968); K. L. Wong, The Idea of Retribution in the Book of Ezekiel (SVT 87; Leiden: Brill, 2001); W. Zimmerli, Ezekiel, trans. R. E. Clements (Hermeneia; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); H. Zwingli, Sämtliche Werke, ed. E. Egli (Zürich: Verlag Berichthaus, 1956-59).

I. M. Duguid

F

FAITH

Faith in the OT, and particularly in the prophetic literature, usually is portrayed in terms of fidelity to *covenant obligations or to *ethical expectations as communicated by the prophet. For this reason, faith (or faithfulness) serves as the basis for the relationship between *God and the people. As the following discussion observes, the prophetic call to remain faithful to covenant obligations is applied in various directions in the prophetic literature. In addition, the prophets often were concerned to emphasize the unfailing faithfulness of Yahweh, especially within the context of historical developments.

Since much of the prophetic literature of the OT involves exhortation toward certain behavior, varying conceptions of faith can be found among the prophets instead of a uniform expectation of what faith should be. Moreover, the subject of faith is rarely addressed as an isolated topic. Rather, prophetic understandings of a faithful relationship with Yahweh usually are embedded within the prophetic messages. Thus, for example, one prophet may conceive of faith primarily as the exclusive *worship of Yahweh, while another may proclaim that the proper response of faith is fair and just behavior. In any case, the faith proclaimed by the prophets always has ethical implications for relationships among Israelites and with Yahweh.

1. Terminology
2. Expressions of Faith
3. Ahaz and Hezekiah
4. The Faithfulness of Yahweh

1. Terminology.

Several different words are used in the OT prophetic literature to express the idea of faith.

Relevant terms include the verb ʾmn (Niphal, “to be reliable, faithful”; Hiphil, “to believe”) and related nominal forms, such as ʾōmen (“faithfulness”), ʾāmēn (“faithfulness”), ʾēmet (“firmness, trustworthiness”) and ʾēmūnâ (“faithfulness”). The verb bāṭah (“to trust”) and related nouns (biṭḥâ [“confidence”], biṭṭāhôn [“confidence”], mibṭāh [“trust”]) also refer to faith or confidence in the direction of Yahweh or elsewhere. At the same time, faith is often described in terms relating to covenant obligations. The words hesed (“goodness, faithfulness”) and śedeq/šēdāqâ (“righteousness”) are key expressions that refer to the covenant faithfulness of people or Yahweh. Many of these terms are used together to indicate that faith often is conceived within the framework of covenant obligations between the people and Yahweh, resulting in various implications for ethical behavior on the part of the people.

2. Expressions of Faith.

The concept of faith is applied in a variety of directions in the prophetic literature. The following discussion is not intended to be comprehensive, but instead provides a sample of the many different ways that faith is described in the Prophetic Books. For example, faith often is conceived in terms of the exclusive worship of Yahweh, frequently using the imagery of *marriage fidelity. The classic example of this comes from the book of Hosea, in which Israel’s pursuit of Baal is compared to an unfaithful wife (Hos 2:5, 13; cf. Hos 4:12-13; Ezek 16:1-63).

One predominant theme among the early “writing” prophets is injustice and abuse, particularly in the political and social affairs of Israel and Judah. They seem especially interested in addressing the growing disparity between wealthy landowners and the poor (see Wealth and Poverty). For these prophets, such inequities come under the purview of the faith of the people. For example, Hosea offers harsh critique against the corruption and injustice among the people of Israel (Hos 7:1). In addition, the prophet hands down an indictment against Israel for lacking faithfulness (ʿemet), loyalty (hesed) and knowledge (daʿat) of God (Hos 4:1). Here, collocation of faithfulness with the covenantal concepts of loyalty and knowledge indicates that faithfulness is conceived in terms of covenantal obligations (cf. Hos 2:19-20; 6:4, 6-7). Hosea also calls for sowing righteousness (šēdāqā) and reaping loyalty, instead of plowing wickedness and reaping injustice (Hos 10:12-13) (see Justice, Righteousness). This latter example also includes trusting in its own military capability among Israel's misdeeds (cf. Is 31:1).

Many other prophets echo Hosea's concern for *social justice. In the book of Amos faith often is portrayed in terms of adhering to justice (mišpāt) and righteousness (šēdāqā) (Amos 5:7, 24, 6:12), particularly as they relate to the powerful elite, who "trample the head of the poor into the dust of the earth" (Amos 2:7 NRSV). For Amos, there is no virtue in observing copious festivals and offerings as long as injustice reigns among the people (Amos 5:21-24). What is more, observance of the Sabbath is seen by some only as a hindrance to conducting fraudulent business practices and oppressing the poor (Amos 8:4-6). The exhortation in Amos is to abandon evil and injustice and to seek Yahweh, in the hope that Yahweh might be gracious to a small remnant among the people of Israel (Amos 5:4-6, 14-15). Micah also condemns unfair and oppressive practices, such as bribery (Mic 3:11; 7:3) and the use of dishonest weights (Mic 6:11). There may be no clearer statement of the sort of response to Yahweh that Micah advocates than to do justice (mišpāt), love kindness (hesed), and walk humbly with God (Mic 6:8).

Isaiah joins other eighth-century BC prophets in denouncing injustice, especially among the rich and powerful of Jerusalem. Thus, he speaks out against those who "join house to house" (Is 5:8) and exploit the poor (e.g., Is 3:14-15). In one memorable example Isaiah uses a play on words to describe their injustice and unrighteousness (Is 5:7): "he waited for justice [mišpāt], but instead, bloodshed [mišpāh]; for righteousness [šēdāqā] but instead, a cry [šēʿāqā]!"

Zechariah explicitly recalls the admonition of earlier prophets to act with faithfulness (ʿemet), particularly when dealing with vulnerable members of society, such as widows, orphans and aliens (Zech 7:9-12; 8:16, 19; cf. Zech 1:4, 6). He then announces Yahweh's intent to dwell in Zion, which will be called the "city of faithfulness" (ʿir-hāʿemet [Zech 8:3]).

In addition to matters of justice, sometimes faith is conceived in terms of dependency on Yahweh instead of military capability or international alliances. In the book of Isaiah, for example, King Hezekiah of Judah must trust (bāṭah) Yahweh instead of other nations such as Egypt for the deliverance of Jerusalem from Assyria (Is 36:4-9, 15; 37:10; cf. Is 31:1). This same emphasis resonates in the book of Jeremiah (e.g., Jer 17:5, 7), and Jeremiah 2:36-37 seems to recall the specific circumstances regarding Hezekiah and Isaiah (cf. Jer 46:25). Likewise, Jeremiah often sets trusting in the deception of those who resist Babylon against trusting in the message of Yahweh as delivered by the prophet (Jer 13:25; 28:15; 29:31; 39:18). Along similar lines, Jeremiah's so-called Temple Sermon warns against trusting in the security of the *temple (Jer 7:4, 8, 14). According to Jeremiah, putting trust in such sources for deliverance from Babylon is misguided. Instead, Judah should trust in Yahweh, even if that means submission to Babylon (Jer 13:25). In a similar fashion, Ezekiel speaks against trusting in Egypt (Ezek 17:1-24; 29:16).

Habakkuk 2:4 is frequently cited as an explicit expression of faith in the OT, since it declares that the righteous (šaddīq) live by faith(fulness) (ʿēmūnā). This text can be interpreted in such a way that ʿēmūnā ("faith[fulness]") modifies either the substantive adjective "righteous" ("the righteous in their faith shall live") or the verb "live" ("the righteous shall live by their faithfulness"). In the immediate context of Habakkuk 2 the latter is more likely, as the text describes patient anticipation of a response from Yahweh. This verse is especially significant because of its influence on NT understandings of faith (cf. Rom 1:17; Gal 3:11; Heb 10:38), but there is considerable disagreement about Paul's citation of this passage. While the MT of Habakkuk 2:4 has a third-person pronoun ("his faith"), the LXX translation has a first-person pronoun (“my faithfulness”). Thus, the Hebrew text seems to refer to the faithfulness of the individual (or of the “vision” in Hab 2:3 [see Roberts, 107]), whereas the LXX speaks of “my” (i.e., God’s) faithfulness (Smith, 107; Robertson, 181; Wenham, 10-17). However, in both instances of Pauline quotation of Habakkuk 2:4 (Rom 1:17; Gal 3:11) the pronoun is omitted altogether (Fitzmyer, 236-46). As J. D. G. Dunn observes, it is possible that Paul was aware of both the Hebrew and Greek textual traditions, in which case the omission of the pronoun allows for the widest possible interpretation of the text. Rather than forcing a choice between whether the text speaks of God’s faithfulness or human faithfulness, Paul may very well have been deliberately ambiguous so as to embrace both traditions (Dunn, 44-46).

3. Ahaz and Hezekiah.

Special attention should be given to the portrayal of the faith of the Judean kings Ahaz and Hezekiah, since this accounts for one of the most explicit expressions of faith in the prophetic literature. According to the biblical sources (2 Kings 15:37; 16:5-9; 2 Chron 28:1-27; Is 7:1-9), Rezin the king of Aram and Pekah the king of northern Israel were pressuring Ahaz to join their coalition against Assyrian expansion. When Ahaz refused to take part, Rezin and Pekah proceeded to launch an attack against Judah. This provides the historical background for the well-known interaction between Isaiah and Ahaz in Isaiah 7:1-9. In this passage Yahweh reassures Ahaz that Rezin and Pekah will not succeed in their attack against Jerusalem, but at the same time, Yahweh exhorts Ahaz to strengthen his faith. Using a play on the verb ʾmn, the prophet proceeds to tell Ahaz in Isaiah 7:9 that if he does not believe (taʾāmînu), he will not endure (tēʾāmēnu). Clearly, this text indicates that Ahaz should have faith in Yahweh in the midst of these circumstances, but the precise nature of that faith is not immediately obvious.

As G. C. I. Wong observes, the faith described in Isaiah 7:9 is often viewed in connection with the sort of passivity that seems to be described in Isaiah 7:4, in which Yahweh tells Ahaz to be quiet and not to fear, among other things (Wong, 536-40). Understood one way, Ahaz should passively trust in Yahweh for deliverance rather than taking any steps toward self-defense. However, Wong argues that hiššāmēr (NRSV: “take heed”) in Isaiah 7:4 can also be understood to mean “be alert” or “be on guard,” which hardly necessitates passive inactivity (cf. 1 Sam 19:2; 2 Kings 6:10;). Likewise, the following word, hašqēt (NRSV: “be quiet”), need not refer to inaction (cf. Is 57:20; Jer 49:23).

It is possible that the faith demanded by these verses in Isaiah 7 could be understood as “leaving room for God’s sovereign action, desisting from self-help” (von Rad, 130). At this point in the development of the events, however, Ahaz has not yet been given the option to capitulate to Aram or Israel, so this is an improbable interpretation of the text. It might be more plausible to suppose that this particular instance of faith in Yahweh implies that Ahaz should not turn to Assyria for help against the neighboring coalition. However, the book of Isaiah conspicuously omits that this was precisely Ahaz’s course of action, at great political and economic expense (2 Kings 16:7-9). This leads Wong to conclude that the faith advocated in Isaiah 7 cannot be understood in terms of the rejection of Assyrian assistance (Wong, 540-42). Although these verses do not detail the nature of the faith that Ahaz should have, Wong proposes that the faith that Isaiah 7:4-9 promotes can be broadly conceived in terms of belief in the word of Yahweh as given by the prophet. Thus, Isaiah 7:10-13 critiques Ahaz’s veneer of piety that claims not to require a sign from Yahweh while ignoring the sort of injustice and unrighteousness that the previous chapters of the book describe (cf. Is 1:14-17; 3:13-14; 5:7). As H. Wildberger observes, faith is an act of trust that includes action: “binding oneself to what is promised, obligating oneself to what is demanded, and making use of what is promised as one determines one’s own course of action” (Wildberger, 645-46).

The question of Ahaz’s faith is clarified by setting it alongside the portrayal of Hezekiah’s faith in Isaiah 36:1—37:38. That these two kings are set forth for comparison is indicated by the numerous points of correspondence between the two third-person narratives (Ackroyd, 491-94; Conrad 1991, 38-40). Both accounts involve an imminent military threat against the city of Jerusalem; in the case of Isaiah 7, the threat comes from the Syro-Ephraimite coalition, whereas Isaiah 36—37 is set against the backdrop of the Assyrian king Sennacherib's campaign in Judah. More specifically, the scene for both encounters is set at "the end of the conduit of the upper pool on the highway to the Fuller's Field" (Is 7:3; 36:2 NRSV). This point of detail plays no particular role in either narrative, other than to link the two accounts. Moreover, the "dial of Ahaz" in Isaiah 38:8 provides explicit reference to the former king. In each narrative the king is considerably distressed at the news of the attack (Is 7:2; 37:1), which prompts the interaction with the prophet Isaiah, who says not to fear (Is 7:4; 37:6) and offers words of assurance predicting a failed invasion. Finally, both episodes feature the provision of a sign from Yahweh to confirm the prophetic word (Is 7:11, 14; 37:30; 38:7, 22).

Despite these points of continuity between the two accounts, the differences set Hezekiah's faith against that of Ahaz (Conrad 1988, 73-74). Whereas the prophet Isaiah approaches Ahaz uninvited in Isaiah 7, Hezekiah invites Yahweh's involvement through the ministry of the prophet (Is 37:1-4). Moreover, the Assyrian accusations that Hezekiah is deceiving the people (Is 36:18) and himself (Is 37:10) emphasize Hezekiah's trust in Yahweh for deliverance. To make the distinction of faith between the two kings even clearer, Isaiah 7:9 uses the play on the verb 'mn to describe Ahaz's refusal to believe, while Isaiah 38:3 invokes a related noun ('emet) to refer to Hezekiah's faithfulness in walking before Yahweh. Thus, Ahaz's lack of faith is characterized by his refusal to accept Yahweh's offer of a sign (Is 7:11-12), whereas Hezekiah accepts signs (Is 37:30; 38:7) and even requests them (Is 38:22). The point of emphasis in both accounts is that confidence should be placed in Yahweh's promise to defend Jerusalem for David's sake rather than in foreign alliances (cf. Is 7:2, 13; 37:35). In Isaianic terms, one could say that Hezekiah's faith is a better reflection of the name "Immanuel," meaning "God with us" (Is 7:14) (Conrad 1988, 73-74).

4. The Faithfulness of Yahweh.

Finally, an important concept in the prophetic literature is the faithfulness of Yahweh, which usually is expressed with the term hesed (e.g., Is 54:10; 63:7; Jer 31:3). The subject of Yahweh's faithfulness often is used by the prophets as an implicit contrast with the unfaithfulness of the people. The implication is that Yahweh's faithfulness remains steadfast, while the same cannot be said of Israel and Judah (Is 40:6; Jer 2:2; Hos 4:1; 6:4). Yahweh's faithfulness sometimes is applied in two main ways within the context of Yahweh's punishment of the people. On the one hand, Yahweh's faithfulness provides the basis for his abundant mercy and his reluctance to mete out punishment (Joel 2:13; Mic 7:18); on the other hand, when Yahweh does pass judgment, it is out of his faithfulness and genuine love for his people (Is 54:8; Jer 9:24; 32:18). Thus, judgment against the people of Israel and Judah is viewed as the result of a loving God who cares enough to discipline his people.

See also COVENANT; JUSTICE, RIGHTEOUSNESS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. R. Ackroyd, "Isaiah 36-39: Structure and Function," in "The Place Is Too Small for Us": The Israelite Prophets in Recent Scholarship, ed. R. P. Gordon (SBTS 5; Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1995) 478-94; E. W. Conrad, "The Royal Narratives and the Structure of the Book of Isaiah," JSOT 41 (1988) 67-81; idem, Reading Isaiah (OBT; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); J. D. G. Dunn, Romans 1-8 (WBC 38A; Dallas: Word, 1988); J. A. Fitzmyer, To Advance the Gospel: New Testament Studies (New York: Crossroad, 1981); J. J. M. Roberts, Nahum, Habakkuk, and Zephaniah (OTL; Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1991); O. P. Robertson, The Books of Nahum, Habakkuk, and Zephaniah (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990); R. L. Smith, Micah-Malachi (WBC 32; Waco, TX: Word, 1984); G. von Rad, The Message of the Prophets, trans. D. M. G. Stalker (New York: HarperCollins, 1965); G. J. Wenham, Faith in the Old Testament (Leicester: Theological Students' Fellowship, n.d.); H. Wildberger, Isaiah 28-39, trans. T. H. Trapp (CC; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2002); G. C. I. Wong, "Faith in the Present Form of Isaiah VII 1-17," VT 51 (2001) 535-47.

P. M. Cook

FALSE PROPHECY. See TRUE AND FALSE PROPHECY.

FATHER, GOD AS. See GOD.

FEMALE IMAGERY. See WOMEN AND FEMALE IMAGERY.

FEMALE PROPHETS. See PROPHECY, HISTORY OF.

FEMINIST INTERPRETATION

Within the field of biblical studies one of the more controversial approaches to the biblical text has been feminist interpretation, and yet this interpretation has yielded significant information that has challenged not only the way people hear and read the text but also how they view life. This article explores feminist interpretation in relation to the OT prophetic literature. The discussion begins with a description of feminist interpretation, followed by a thumbnail sketch of the interpretation's history and the various lenses that are part of this approach. Consideration is then given to some of the problems for feminists reading the Bible today. The second part of the discussion focuses on various themes within prophetic biblical literature that have come to the fore as a result of feminist interpretation. The last part of the discussion explores the use of metaphorical language used in the prophetic texts, with a specific focus on the book of Hosea and metaphors associated with God. Feminist interpretation has come of age and continues to be a tour de force in the biblical arena.

1. Description, History and Lenses of Feminist Interpretation, and Problems for Feminists Reading the Bible
2. Themes Explored in Feminist Interpretations of the Prophetic Literature
3. Use and Critique of Metaphorical Language and Imagery in Prophetic Literature
4. Conclusion

1. Description, History and Lenses of Feminist Interpretation, and Problems for Feminists Reading the Bible.

1.1. Description of Feminist Interpretation.

From its earliest stages, feminist interpretation has been associated with a concern for the rights of all people, which included the abolition of slavery, religious freedom, civil rights, just labor conditions, and a striving for world peace. Part of the fabric of liberation theologies, feminist interpretation focuses on issues of oppression, justice and equality. K. O'Connor notes that feminist biblical interpretation emerged from a host of societal changes involving women and how women began to think about life and about themselves and their role in society, and consequently,

"women began to read the Bible with feminist consciousness" (O'Connor, 11). The main enterprise of feminist interpretation is how the Bible can be a saving and liberating word for women. A feminist interpretation begins with a critique of existing patriarchal, hierarchical and unconscious forms of thought and ways of organization and advocates for alternative ways of seeing and living out life. A feminist interpretation privileges women's experiences, voices, values, concerns and differences and argues for more inclusive language and less ambiguous translations. Not all who interpret the Bible from a feminist perspective do so from a religious perspective. Some read the text as a literary or historical document, and thus the Bible's religious authority is neither a concern nor an issue. Furthermore, for many feminist interpreters, God is neither male nor female, and accordingly the use of gender-specific pronouns is avoided.

1.2. History of Feminist Interpretation. Feminist interpretation is not a phenomenon of the twentieth century. Resistance to sexism has occurred throughout history. For example, in medieval times Hildegard of Bingen and Christine de Pizan were among the earliest commentators to critique the Bible from a "woman-focused" perspective. In the eighteenth century Judith Sargent Murray, founder of schools for girls in the United States, cited a nonsexist interpretation of Genesis 2–3 to support her efforts to establish centers of learning. In the nineteenth century the women's movement influenced the development of feminist interpretation. Sojourner Truth and Anna Julia Cooper, along with Jarena Lee and Matilda Joslyn Gage, focused on the emancipatory message of the biblical text in their efforts to challenge both racism and sexism. In 1895 Elizabeth Cady Stanton and a group of women developed The Woman's Bible, a text that examined each book of the Bible to expose how women were treated, both positively and negatively. In the twentieth century the first wave of feminist interpretation occurred with the publications of God's Word to Women: One Hundred Bible Studies on Women's Place in the Divine Economy by Katherine Bushnell, The Bible Status of Women by Lee Anna Starr, and All the Women of the Bible by Edith Deen. The second wave of feminist interpretation occurred in the mid-twentieth century and was an outgrowth of the civil rights movement. Betty Friedan's book The Feminine Mystique (1963) marked the beginning of the second wave in the United States, along with the works of Margaret Crook (Women and Religion), Elsie Culver (Women in the World of Religion), Rosemary Radforth Ruether (Religion and Sexism), Letty Russell (The Liberating Word: A Guide to Nonsexist Interpretation of the Bible), Phyllis Trible (God and the Rhetoric of Sexuality), Mary Daly (The Church and the Second Sex), and Alice Laffey (An Introduction to the Old Testament: A Feminist Perspective). Perhaps the most influential feminist biblical scholar of both the twentieth and twenty-first centuries is Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza, whose critical thought and work have taken feminist interpretation to new heights and depths. She has developed a process of biblical interpretation characterized by a series of hermeneutical moves and turns, specifically, a hermeneutics of (1) experience, (2) domination and social location, (3) suspicion, (4) critical evaluation, (5) creative imagination, (6) re-membering and reconstruction and (6) transformative action for change (Schüssler Fiorenza, 165-90). Unlike many of her colleagues writing in this area of interpretation, Schüssler Fiorenza emphasizes the importance of going beyond gender in order to address the whole range of categories of oppression.

1.3. The Methods of Feminist Interpretation.

Feminist interpretation focuses on the biblical narrative and poem as they are received as text. Feminist interpretation emphasizes reading the text as a product of its own culture, and it uses all sorts of comparative, historical data to reconstruct a picture of women's life in ancient Israel. Feminist biblical interpreters examine texts to see how women are presented or hidden in the Bible, whether or not women are named, to what extent women appear strong, virtuous, victimized or weak. Feminist biblical interpreters also attend to the images and metaphors of God and address biblical laws affecting women adversely. Postmodern feminist interpretation includes literary and sociological analyses as well as reader-response analyses. This type of interpretation considers the class and culture of many women hearing the biblical text today and calls people to conversion. One of the pioneers in a feminist postcolonial approach to the Bible, and to prophetic literature in particular, is Gale Yee, who emphasizes the need not only to study gender but also to analyze elements of class, race and power both in the text and in the interpreters.

Within the area of feminist interpretation several subcategories have emerged. Womanist interpretation draws on African American women's experience to analyze biblical texts in relation to race, ethnicity, class and gender. This area of interpretation stresses the concept of intersectionality, whereby various forms of oppression are unlocked and treated as multidimensional (for a study of the emergence of womanist scholarship and biblical interpretation and its contributions to biblical studies, see Junior). Mujerista interpretation has the survival and liberation of Latinas in North America as its goal and theological criterion. Asian American feminist interpretation views the Bible through the lens of the concerns of women of Asian heritage. Masculist interpretation shares the feminist commitment to mutuality between genders. Biblical interpretation through this lens examines, from a male perspective, the ways biblical texts construct masculinity. Other equally important feminist lens for interpretation include equal rights/liberal feminism, complementarity feminism, gynocentric/radical feminism, lesbian feminism, gender feminism, maternal feminism, relationality feminism, ecofeminism, postmodern feminism, third world/differences feminism, international feminism, religious feminism, postbiblical feminism and critical liberationist feminism (on these and other such lenses, see Schüssler Fiorenza, 60-64). Many of these dimensions of feminist interpretation and its various lenses have influenced and been used in interpreting biblical prophetic literature, especially with regard to the book of Hosea.

1.4. Problems for Feminists Reading the Bible.

Among the many problems for feminists reading the Bible are the scarcity of female characters (see Women and Female Imagery); the androcentric fabric of the biblical text; the sexist language used in regard to people and God that markedly excludes women; texts that encourage violence against women; and the fact that the societies that produced the Bible were, for the most part, patriarchal and hierarchical. Furthermore, the history of interpretation of the Bible indicates a bias against women. Lastly, feminists are divided on the question of authority of the Bible.

2. Themes Explored in Feminist Interpretations of the Prophetic Literature.

2.1. Women and Violence. The rigor of feminist interpretation of the OT Prophet Books has yielded a rich harvest of ideas and has exposed many themes that need to be held up for ongoing critical reflection and hermeneutical assessment. One such theme is women and violence.

In her study on the topic N. Bowen discusses the metaphorical violence of a jealous husband against his wife in prophetic literature. She examines Hosea 1—3; Jeremiah 2—3; Ezekiel 16; 23 (Bowen, 186-99). What becomes clear in each of these texts is that when relationships are hierarchically structured, most often the structure causes the one deemed “superior” by society to reassert control over the “subordinate” one. This reassertion of control sometimes takes the form of physical violence, as in the case of Ezekiel 16.

2.2. War. Related to women and violence is the theme of *war. Feminist interpretation has pointed out that in the prophetic texts men are the ones who make war (e.g., Is 3:2, 25; Jer 11:22; Ezek 9:2; Hos 9:13; Joel 3:9; Amos 1:4, 13; Obad 1:9; Mic 5:5-6; Zech 10:5), and women are the spoils of war (e.g., Jer 38:22-23, Ezek 30:17-18). In times of war women are the most vulnerable, as is expressed through the images of pregnant women’s wombs being ripped out (Hos 13:16; Amos 1:13) and mothers being dashed to pieces with their children (Hos 13:16). These images symbolize devastation and the annihilation of a people in general.

2.3. Marriage. Within prophetic literature feminist interpretation has given much attention to the theme of *marriage and has shown that the metaphorical covenant relationship between Israel and God is hierarchically structured and influenced by the actual cultural reality of marriage in Israel, which itself was hierarchically structured. Women are presented as sexually subordinate to men, and men are in control of women’s sexual reproduction. The portrait of Israel as subordinate to God’s control mirrors the cultural reality. Both of these images come together in the image of Samaria and Jerusalem as God’s wife, a metaphor used throughout prophetic literature. Additionally, cities oftentimes are symbolized as an unfaithful wife who has betrayed God, the faithful husband (e.g., Ezekiel 16), and is therefore deserving of punishment, which includes a host of violent acts, such as being stripped naked (Ezek 16:39; 23:26; Hos 2:3), public exposure, defamation and mockery (Ezek 16:37, 57; 23:10, 29; Hos 2:3, 10), mutilation (Ezek 23:25, 34), gang rape (Ezek 16:40), stoning (Ezek 16:40; 23:47) and death (Ezek 16:40; 23:10, 47). Such imagery often is understood by feminist interpreters to be pornography because it involves objectification, dominance, pain and degradation. The marriage metaphor has been linked to psychological and structural violence. When the threat of violence is used as a means to control, then such a threat becomes psychologically abusive. In a hierarchical setting, when one deemed “superior” uses force for the purpose of subordination and subjugation of one deemed “inferior,” that relationship and its structures hierarchy become relationally and structurally violent. Finally, feminist interpretation has brought to the surface the structural violence inherent in the prophetic marriage metaphors in general and in the book of *Hosea in particular (see 3.2 below; for a cultural understanding of marriage in the ancient world, in biblical times and in the Bible itself, see Pressler; see also Purdue et al.; on the marriage metaphor in Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Hosea, see Baumann).

2.4. Patriarchy. Another theme that surfaces in feminist interpretation is patriarchy. Broadly understood, patriarchy involves systems of legal, social, economic and political relations that not only validate but also enforce the notion of male superiority and the sovereignty of males as heads of families over other dependent persons in any given household. From a feminist perspective, patriarchy violates women because it denies women the right to be autonomous. Within a patriarchal societal structure and household, women are denied the right to construct culture, to control property, to maintain bodily integrity, to formulate their own decisions and to express their own views and opinions. Patriarchy both restricts and prohibits women’s participation in Israelite culture. For example, women are restricted to the margins of cultic life roles, becoming singers and mourners (Jer 9:17; Ezek 33:16). Even though some women function as prophets or in the prophetic role (e.g., Ex 15:20; Judg 4:4; 2 Kings 22:24), women were, for the most part, viewed as illegitimate and dangerous by biblical writers (e.g., Jer 7:18; Ezek 13:17-23). Specific word choice found in prophetic literature betrays Israel as a patriarchal culture. Examples include “man” and “men,” “father” and “fathers,” “son” and “sons,” “brother” and “brothers” when the whole of a society is being inferred. Another example is the naming of people and land after the patriarchs of Israel and Judah (e.g., Is 9:8; Ezek 8:12; Hos 1:10; Amos 2:4, 6; Mic 1:5).

In one of the first introductions to the OT from a feminist perspective, A. Laffey argues that “a patriarchal culture is, by its nature, hierarchical” (Laffey, 152), a reality implied in the listing of people presented in Isaiah 24:2. Thus, one could see from the arrangement of the text references that the priest is superior to the people, the mistress to her maid, the seller to the buyer, the lender to the borrower, the creditor to the debtor, and the father to the son (e.g., Mal 1:6), as Laffey suggests (Laffey, 152). In a patriarchal-hierarchical culture, men would also be considered superior to women and children. This particular kind of culture also sets parameters around worship. Only the priests have charge of the *temple and the altar (Ezek 40:45-46), and the only animals fit for *sacrifice to God are those that are males and without blemish (Ezek 43:22, 23, 25; 45:18, 23; Mal 1:14). The only appropriate wives for priests are virgins of the stock of the house of Israel (Ezek 44:22). Other men could marry widows and divorcees, but these types of women are inappropriate for priests (Ezek 44:22). Thus, within the ranks of both men and women a patriarchal-hierarchical order existed in ancient Israel. Additionally, while all males were circumcised, women were not, and any woman who belonged to an Israelite man was subsumed under the male’s circumcision. Finally, even though Israel condemned all false prophets, the prophet Ezekiel is particularly harsh on false women prophets (Ezek 13:18-23).

2.5. Harlotry. One theme that has drawn extensive comment from feminist scholars is harlotry, which involved the infidelity of Israel and the jealousy of God, particularly in the eighth century BC. This theme of harlotry is most prominent in Hosea 1—3, where, traditionally understood, the marriage between Gomer and Hosea becomes symbolic for the covenant between God and Israel. Both Israel and Gomer were unfaithful to their “spouses.” This theme of harlotry also surfaces in Isaiah 1:21; Jeremiah 2—3; Ezekiel 16; 23; Micah 1:6-7. In the prophetic literature harlotry was not only about sex acts at high places, but also about spiritual whoredom that violated covenant with God. Israel sought other gods and trusted in foreign powers and often solicited protection from foreign powers instead of trusting only in God. Thus, Israel was guilty of apostasy (for a sampling of the scholarly conversation on this particular theme, see Bellis, esp. 177-90; Setel, 86-95, 157-59; Weems 1989; Ortlund, esp. 47-75). G. Yee offers an excellent analysis of the image of faithless Israel in Hosea and challenges some of the more traditional views of the image of harlotry in Hosea (see esp. Yee, 81-109.)

2.6. Menstruation. With respect to natural bodily functions, women during their menstrual cycles are considered “unclean,” and men are not allowed to approach women when they are menstruating (Ezek 18:6; 22:10). Hence, a normal bodily function becomes a stigma for a woman and a cause for her being alienated by others during certain times each month.

2.7. Israel’s History as Men’s History. Feminist interpretation on prophetic literature has pointed out that, for the most part, Israel’s history is the history of men, as is evidenced by how the prophets name their various “houses”: house of Ahab (Mic 6:16), David (Is 7:2; 22:22; Jer 21:12; Zech 12:7-8; 13:1), Esau (Obad 1:18), Hazael (Amos 1:4), Isaac (Amos 7:16), Israel (e.g., Is 5:7; 46:3; 63:7; Jer 2:4; Ezek 3:1, 4; 4:3, 4; Hos 1:6; 5:1; Amos 5:3, 4, 25; 6:14; Zech 8:13), Jacob (e.g., Is 2:5, 6; 10:20; 46:3; Jer 2:4; 5:20; Ezek 20:5; Amos 3:13; 9:8; Obad 1:17, 18; Mic 2:7), Jeroboam (Amos 7:9), Joseph (Amos 5:6; Zech 10:6; Obad 1:18), Judah (e.g., Is 22:21; 37:31; Jer 3:18, 20; 5:11; Ezek 4:6; 8:17; Hos 1:7; 5:12; Zech 8:13; 10:3, 6), Levi (Zech 12:13), Nathan (Zech 12:12) and the king or kings (Jer 19:13; Hos 5:1).

2.8. Men as Israel’s Exemplars. Coinciding with the theme of Israel’s history as men’s history is the theme of men as Israel’s exemplars, another point unearthed by feminist interpretation on prophetic literature. For example, wisdom is associated with Daniel (Ezek 28:3); Jacob is God’s servant (Ezek 28:25; 37:25; cf. Is 58:14; Mal 1:2); Cyrus is God’s anointed one (Is 45:1); Jeremiah is the one consecrated and appointed a prophet to the nations (Jer 1:5); Hosea is the faithful one in his marriage with Gomer (Hos 1:2-9); Isaiah is the recipient of a vision of God in the temple and called to be a prophet (Is 6:1-13); Abraham is God's friend and associated with God's promise of land to Israel (Is 41:8; cf. Is 63:16; Ezek 33:24); David is the recipient of God's covenant and is the shepherd and king of God's people (Is 55:3; Ezek 34:23-24; 37:24, 25); Joseph is the son of a patriarch, and because of that relationship he shares in God's promise not to destroy again the world by water (Is 54:9); and Moses stands renowned for the exodus experience (Is 63:11-12) and as the giver of the law (Mal 4:4). Only one female exemplar is cited: Sarah (Is 51:2). Thus, Israel's self-understanding and consciousness were shaped by male figures that the prophetic biblical texts laud.

2.9. Language Used to Speak of God. Feminist interpretation of prophetic literature has also drawn attention to the language associated with and related to God. This God-language is predominantly male and reflects many of the roles assumed by males in their respective cultures and societies. For example, just as men are fathers, so God is described as "Father," as an "Everlasting Father" (Is 9:6; 63:16; cf. Jer 3:4, 19; Mal 1:6). Just as men are kings, so God is named "King" (Is 41:21; Jer 10:10; 51:57; Ezek 20:33; Zeph 3:15). Just as men are warriors, so God is depicted as a warrior (Is 13:4-5; 42:13; Jer 21:5; Ezek 21:5; Joel 2:11; Zeph 3:17; Zech 13:7-8). Just as men are bridegrooms, so God is a bridegroom (Is 62:5); just as men are husbands, so God is a husband (Is 54:5; Jer 31:32). Furthermore, God is not only a warrior but also the Lord, the God of hosts, the commander-in-chief of the heavenly and earthly powers (Is 1:9; 44:6; Nah 2:13; Zeph 2:9; Zech 1:3; Mal 1:4). God is named after the patriarchs. Israel's God is the "Holy One of Israel" (Is 10:20; 41:16; Jer 50:29), the "God of Israel" (Is 29:23; Jer 9:15; Ezek 8:4; Zeph 2:9), the "Creator of Israel" (Is 43:15), the "Holy One of Jacob" (Is 29:23), the "Mighty One of Jacob" (Is 49:26; 60:16), the "God of Jacob" (Is 2:3; Mic 4:2), the "God of David" (Is 38:5) and the "LORD, who redeemed Abraham" (Is 29:22).

2.10. Women as Men's Possessions. Another theme that surfaces in feminist interpretation of prophetic literature is women as men's possessions. Jeremiah 14:16 makes clear that women "belonged" to men. Hosea 12:12 indicates that Jacob "bought" Leah and Rachel, his two wives, from his father-in-law, Laban. When divine judgment is cast upon Israel, the men of the day will lose their houses and fields and also their "wives," and all will be given to others (Jer 6:12; 8:10; cf. Jer 38:23). Divorce is a man's prerogative, and if a man divorces his wife, the one who sought the divorce would never again take back his former wife because she would be considered "damaged goods" (Jer 3:1; cf. Is 50:1). Only men can initiate divorce; women are not allowed to divorce their husbands. When the prophets exhort against divorce, they address the males of their day, since women are "kept" by the men (Mal 2:14-16).

2.11. Pornography. One last theme featured in feminist interpretation of prophetic literature is pornography. Here the work of T. Setel becomes foundational to the discussion of this particular theme (Setel, 86-95). Setel argues that significant congruencies exist between biblical, and especially prophetic, texts on the one hand, and modern pornographic depictions of female sexuality on the other hand. Setel notes further that in both cases objectified female sexuality is used as "a symbol of evil" (Setel, 86). A. Brenner draws on Setel's work and, referencing Setel, argues that "feminist definitions of pornography vary. However, most of them agree that pornography deals with the objectification and degrading of 'woman' in a manner that makes the abuse of females acceptable or even commendable; that it restricts female sexual choice to an actual act of slavery; and that it stresses the nature and meaning of male power" (Brenner 1993, 185-86). Looking at Jeremiah 3 and Ezekiel 16 in this light, Brenner argues further that "pornography preserves and asserts male social dominion through the control of female sexuality" (Brenner 1993, 186). Brenner concludes that whether or not a historical person named "Jeremiah" was responsible for the pornographic passages attributed to him remains uncertain (Brenner 1993, 193). Brenner's final observation is this: "Whoever composed those passages perceived women and men—not to mention God—and gender relations in a certain way. That vision, that male fantasy of desire which presupposes a corresponding and complementary mystical fantasy of female desire, is pornographic" (Brenner 1993, 193 [see also Brenner 1995]).

2.12. Justice for All. While much of feminist interpretation of prophetic literature focuses on deconstruction, the other side of the spectrum is also represented with a push for a balanced reading of texts, one that takes into account not only the unpleasant, distasteful and offensive elements of and images in the text, but also the complimentary, glorious and inspirational passages of prophetic literature. For example, Micah recognizes women's vulnerability and singles out women for special mention (Mic 2:9). In Amos both women and men are accountable to God and responsible for *social justice. Just as the wayward men of Israel will suffer divine chastisement, so also Israel's women will share in this experience. Amos predicts doom for the idle, rich women who oppress the poor and crush the needy (Amos 4:1-3). Feminist interpretation also brings to the fore another dimension of God, the compassionate one, who is concerned for widows, orphans, slaves, women, sinners and the dispossessed. In Ezekiel 34:15-16 the prophet heralds God's promise to the helpless. God will feed them with justice. One last example is *Zion. A city once debased will be "the city of righteousness—redeemed by justice" (Is 1:26-27), where the needy among God's people will find refuge in "her" (Is 14:32).

3. Use and Critique of Metaphorical Language and Imagery in Prophetic Literature.

3.1. Use of Female Metaphors and Images. Feminist interpretation of prophetic literature explores the use of metaphorical language, especially when those metaphors appeal to the female gender. The main metaphor in the book of Hosea is the faithful husband and the unfaithful wife, symbolizing the covenant relationship between God (Hosea) and Israel (Gomer). This eighth-century BC metaphor allows the woman—the harlot and also the adulteress—to symbolize the practice of *idolatry (see, e.g., Hos 1:2; 2:8-13; cf. Jer 2:20, 33; 3:1-3; 11:15; Ezek 16; 43:7; Mic 1:7; Nah 3:4). In general, Micah describes an evil time in Judah when trust is no longer possible: "Guard the doors of your mouth from her who lies in your embrace" (Mic 7:5). Deutero-Isaiah's way of describing sinners in Judah is to accuse them of being "sons of a sorceress, and offspring of an adulterer and a whore" (Is 57:3). Ezekiel compares bad conduct to women who are impure and unclean on account of their menstrual cycle. Zechariah has a vision of a woman sitting on an ephah. For Zechariah, she is the personification of wickedness (Zech 5:7-8).

Elsewhere in prophetic literature the female gender is used to speak of a city, country and people. Examples of cities include Rabbah (Amos 1:14) and her daughters (Jer 49:3), Samaria (Ezek 16:46; Hos 13:16; Amos 3:9) and her daughters (Ezek 16:53, 55), Zion (Is 1:27) and her daughters (Is 1:8; Zech 2:10), Jerusalem (Is 51:17; Ezek 16) and her daughters (Mic 4:8; Zeph 3:14; Zech 9:9), Sidon (Is 23:4) and her daughters (Is 23:12), Tyre (Is 23:15) and her daughters (Ezek 26:6, 8), Sodom (Ezek 16:46, 48, 49) and her daughters (Ezek 16:53, 55, 56), daughter of Gallim (Is 10:30), daughter of Tarshish (Is 23:10), Bethlehem Ephrathah (Mic 5:2), Gaza (Amos 1:7), Rahab (Is 51:9), Gebal (Ezek 27:9) and Tehaphnehes (Ezek 30:18).

Examples of countries that are personified as women include Moab (Is 16:2), Egypt (Is 19:14; Jer 46:11, 24; Ezek 23:21), Edom (Ezek 16:57; 32:29), Elam (Ezek 32:24), Judah (Jer 3:7-8, 10), the land of the Philistines (Ezek 16:27, 57), Israel (Amos 5:2; Jer 18:13) and Babylonia (Is 47:1; Jer 50:42; Ezek 23:17; Zech 2:7). A. Laffey comments, "A woman may be understood to have much in common with a city or a country: she may be more or less valuable, more or less beautiful, large or small, a greater or lesser source of nurture, faithful or unfaithful. It is a compliment to a city or a country to personify it; it is an insult to women that cities and countries are so personified!" (Laffey, 162).

Furthermore, Israel's enemies are condemned by means of female imagery that connotes vulnerability, powerlessness and inferiority. For example, the Egyptians will be like women (Is 19:16); the Babylonians will become women (Jer 50:37; cf. Jer 51:30); the hearts of the warriors of Moab and Edom will be like the heart of a woman in labor (Jer 48:41; 49:22); and the Assyrian troops have become like women (Nah 3:13).

Two striking instances where female imagery is used to cast aspersions upon infidelity and wickedness occur in Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Unfaithful Zion is compared to a woman dressed in crimson, decked with ornaments of gold, and eyes enlarged with paint, beautified for her lovers (Jer 4:30). In Ezekiel the poet uses two harlots, Oholah and Oholibah, to describe the sordid state and wicked deeds of Jerusalem and Samaria (Ezek 23).

Divine chastisement to be meted out to Judah, Israel and their enemies is captured through the use of female imagery. Many examples have been brought to the fore by feminist interpretation. In some instances women will be deprived of conception, pregnancy and giving birth (Hos 9:11; cf. Is 23:2). Women will experience a miscarriage and dry breasts (Hos 9:14). Their children in their wombs will come to full term, but the women will not have enough strength to bring them forth (Is 37:3). Some children will be brought forth to die (Hos 9:16). A wife will be forsaken (Is 54:6), her skirts lifted up (Jer 13:22, 26; Nah 3:5). Women—wives, mothers, daughters—will be exiled (Jer 22:6; 38:22-23; 41:10). Even Rachel will weep because her children are no more (Jer 31:15).

Prophetic literature also uses female imagery to indicate both fertility and transformation. Jerusalem, a city once forsaken by Israel's God, will now be redeemed. Her land will be married (Is 62:4); her children will marry her (Is 62:5). Mother Jerusalem will provide breasts so that her children can suck and be satisfied from her consoling breast, and she will carry them on her arm and dandle them on her knees (Is 66:11-12).

One particular metaphor that has drawn much attention from feminist interpreters is that of Daughter Zion. C. Mandolfo's bold work deals with the construction of Daughter Zion in the prophets and presents her as finding her own voice, which she uses with clarity, force and power. C. Maier explores the use of this metaphor and its personification in relation to feminist perspectives on the body. Complementing Maier's work is that of F. W. Dobbs-Allsopp, who also explores the female personification of cities in general and Zion in particular. Finally, C. Dempsey looks at the metaphor of Jerusalem/Zion in its transformative state in Isaiah 60—62 (see also Weems 1995; Streeter).

3.2. Metaphorical Language in the Book of Hosea: Traditional Feminist Interpretations and Newer Understanding. One of the Prophetic Books that has attracted substantial interpretation from a feminist perspective is Hosea. The main discussions focus on Hosea 1—3 and the husband-wife metaphor. Faithful Hosea represents God, and unfaithful Gomer represents Israel. The traditional interpretation centers on the theme of adultery on Gomer's and Israel's part, and feminist scholars take issue with the use of gendered language whereby a female is the unfaithful one and the male is the faithful one. Hence, the marriage metaphor of Hosea 1—3 is fraught with problems (for discussion on the gendered language and the marriage metaphor in the book of Hosea, see Day; Sherwood; Bellis; Stienstra; Bird.) A. Keefe proposes alternative views to the typical understanding of Hosea 1—3. She cautions against reading the text against the background of Western androcentrism. She cogently argues that the central metaphor in the book of Hosea 1—3 is familial, not marital.

3.3. Metaphorical Language for God. One of the more thorny issues raised by feminist interpretation is the metaphorical language used to speak of *God. The metaphors range from a mother who births and protects Israel (Is 46:3-4) like a mother bear (Hos 13:8), to an abusive husband (Ezek 16) and a contrite spouse (Is 54:1-10). Whatever the metaphors for God may be, caution is needed to keep the metaphors from being taken literally. Metaphorical language for God is historically, culturally, socially, politically and theologically conditioned, oftentimes used polemically. In a recent study J. O'Brien offers a rigorous critique of the God metaphors used in prophetic literature. O'Brien's study invites further discussion, as it is both scholarly and confessional.

4. Conclusion.

Feminist interpretation of the prophetic literature enjoys a rich, deep and expanding discussion too broad and extensive to capture in a short article such as this one. Feminist interpretation has changed the way audiences read and hear the biblical text and often how people live their lives. Feminist interpretation has blazed a trail that exposes centuries of oppression and injustice endured by women. Yet, the biblical text is not without beams of a hopeful, radiant light that beckons people to continue to search for truth while working for equality and peace. Finally, new directions in feminist interpretation, including the interpretation of the Prophetic Books, are on the horizon. Forthcoming is a new series, the Wisdom Bible Commentary (Liturgical Press), which will examine each book of the Bible from a feminist perspective while incorporating voices from around the globe. Feminist interpretation has yielded much fruit, but the harvest remains plentiful and awaits new laborers from present and future generations.

See also HERMENEUTICS; HOSEA, BOOK OF; MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES; WOMEN AND FEMALE IMAGERY; ZION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. G. Baumann, "Prophetic Objections to YHWH as the Violent Husband of Israel: Reinterpretations of the Prophetic Marriage Metaphor in Second Isaiah (Isaiah 40-55)," in Prophets and Daniel, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 8; London: Sheffield Academic, 2001) 88-120; A. O. Bellis, Helpmates, Harlots, Heroes: Women's Stories in the Hebrew Bible (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1994); P. Bird, "'To Play the Harlot': An Inquiry into an Old Testament Metaphor," in Gender and Difference in Ancient Israel, ed. P. L. Day (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989) 75-94; N. R. Bowen, "Women, Violence, and the Bible," in Engaging the Bible in a Gendered World: An Introduction to Feminist Biblical Interpretation in Honor of Katherine Doob Sakenfeld, ed. L. Day and C. Pressler (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 2006) 186-99; A. Brenner, "On 'Jeremiah' and the Poetics of (Prophetic?) Pornography," in On Gendering Texts: Female and Male Voices in the Hebrew Bible, ed. A. Brenner and F. van Dijk-Hemmes (BIS 1; New York: E. J. Brill, 1993) 177-93; idem, "On Prophetic Propaganda and the Politics of 'Love': The Case of Jeremiah," in A Feminist Companion to the Latter Prophets, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 8; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1995) 256-74; J. Day, "Hosea and the Baal Cult," Prophecy and the Prophets in Ancient Israel: Proceedings of the Oxford Old Testament Seminar (LHBOTS 531; London: T & T Clark, 2010) 202-24; C. J. Dempsey, "From Desolation to Delight: the Transformative Vision of Isaiah 60-62," in The Desert Will Bloom: Poetic Visions of Isaiah, ed. A. J. Everson and H. C. P. Kim (SBLAIL 4; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2009) 217-32; F. W. Dobbs-Allsopp, "Daughter Zion," in Thus Says the Lord: Essays on the Former and Latter Prophets in Honor of Robert R. Wilson, ed. J. J. Ahn and S. L. Cook (LHBOTS 502; London: T & T Clark, 2009) 125-34; N. Junior, "Womanist Biblical Interpretation," in Engaging the Bible in a Gendered World: An Introduction to Feminist Biblical Interpretation in Honor of Katherine Doob Sakenfeld, ed. L. Day and C. Pressler (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 2006) 37-46; A. A. Keefe, Woman's Body and the Social Body of Hosea (JSOTSup 338; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 2001); A. L. Laffey, An Introduction to the Old Testament: A Feminist Perspective (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); C. M. Maier, Daughter Zion, Mother Zion: Gender, Space, and the Sacred in Ancient Israel (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2008); C. R. Mandolfo, Daughter Zion Talks Back to the Prophets: A Dialogic Theology of the Book of Lamentations (SBLSS 58; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2007); J. M. O'Brien, Challenging Prophetic Metaphor: Theology and Ideology in the Prophets (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 2008); K. M. O'Connor, "The Feminist Movement Meets the Old Testament: One Woman's Perspective," in Engaging the Bible in a Gendered World: An Introduction to Feminist Biblical Interpretation in Honor of Katherine Doob Sakenfeld, ed. L. Day and C. Pressler (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 2006) 3-24; R. C. Ortlund Jr., Whoredom: God's Unfaithful Wife in Biblical Theology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1996); C. Pressler, "The 'Biblical View' of Marriage," in Engaging the Bible in a Gendered World: An Introduction to Feminist Biblical Interpretation in Honor of Katherine Doob Sakenfeld, ed. L. Day and C. Pressler (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 2006) 200-11; L. G. Purdue et al., Families in Ancient Israel (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1997); E. Schüssler Fiorenza, Wisdom Ways: Introducing Feminist Biblical Interpretation (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 2001); T. D. Setel, "Prophets and Pornography: Female Sexual Imagery in Hosea," in Feminist Interpretations of the Bible, ed. L. M. Russell (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1985) 86-95; Y. Sherwood, The Prostitute and the Prophet: Reading Hosea in the Late Twentieth Century (JSOTSup 212; London: T & T Clark International, 1996); N. Stienstra, "YHWH Is the Husband of His People: The Marriage Metaphor in the Book of Hosea," in YHWH Is the Husband of His People: Analysis of a Biblical Metaphor with Special Reference to Translation (Kampen: Kok Pharos, 1993) 96-126; G. C. Streete, The Strange Woman: Power and Sex in the Bible (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1997); R. J. Weems, "Gomer: Victim of Violence or Victim of Metaphor?" in Interpretation for Liberation, ed. K. G. Cannon and E. Schüssler Fiorenza (Semeia 47; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1989) 87-104; idem, Battered Love: Marriage, Sex, and Violence in the Hebrew Prophets (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995); G. A. Yee, Poor Banished Children of Eve: Women as Evil in the Hebrew Bible (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2003).

C. J. Dempsey

FLORAL IMAGERY

Truth in the Bible is sometimes communicated through abstract propositions, but also often, and even more frequently, through images. Prophetic literature especially abounds with imagery evoking a cognitive response that tries to explain abstract theological concepts, such as the fleeting nature of human existence in the face of God's transcendence, through metaphorical language: "The grass withers, the flower fades . . . ; surely the people are grass" (Is 40:7). These images are literary in character but refer to an absent literal reality. Literary and literal reality converge in the cognitive concept of an image that is a mediated representation of that mostly absent reality, creating a virtual reality that has been interpreted by the producer (author) and that needs to be interpreted through perception by the recipient (reader/listener). Thus, a tension between the absence of the original object and its substitution is created that establishes meaning and communicates biblical truth in a nonpropositional manner. These images can be reproduced in literature through a variety of devices, such as symbols, similes and metaphor. Metaphor is the most widely used trope in biblical literature, especially in Hebrew poetry, which in turn is the preferred literary mode of the OT prophetic literature.

The Hebrew prophets were as much poets as they were God's mouthpieces. Recent research in cognitive linguistics and its application to biblical metaphor theory demonstrates the importance of metaphor for our understanding of the Bible and the divine (see Des-Camp and Sweetser; Feysaerts). Most of our theological conceptualizations of God are metaphorical in character, as they create an overlap between the unknown domain of God and the known domain of the metaphor through a set of associated commonplaces. The plant-related metaphors of God as a vineyard farmer (Is 5:1-7) or even as a tree (Hos 14:8-9) found in the prophetic literature serve as powerful interactive metaphors that create new meaning through a tension between the differing realities.

1. Floral Imagery and Prophetic Metaphor
2. Floral Imagery in the Prophets
3. Floral Imagery in the Bible and Floral Images of the Ancient Near East
4. Floral Imagery and Its Theological Force

1. Floral Imagery and Prophetic Metaphor.

Floral imagery—here in the sense of flora, referring to all plant life—in the OT Prophetic Books is far more than ornamental in nature and communicates important prophetic themes and theological motifs through the usage of metaphor and symbols. Prophetic metaphor often draws on plant imagery that can be linked to the prophetic engagement with *covenant theology. The covenant promises that are intrinsically connected to the physical makeup of the land often refer to its bountiful vegetation (e.g., Deut 8:7-8) and are as often contrasted through prophetic critique with the desolation of the land and its vegetation because of the disobedience of the people (e.g., Joel 1:10-12). Within this metaphorical repertoire, the usage of floral imagery serves to refer to the broad prophetic themes of judgment and restoration with a further range of related meanings.

Floral imagery can be communicated by reference to the actual plant or by using lemmas such as prh ("to sprout, bud, bloom, blossom"), smh ("to sprout, spring up"), šws ("to flourish, bloom") and prh ("bear fruit, be fruitful"), which in their verbal forms express the dynamic idea of extraordinary, spontaneous growth as well as the state of glorious beauty and splendor and the bearing of fruit. However, a reading of biblical imagery cannot be approached only with the help of a concordance search, since metaphors are invoked implicitly rather than explicitly. Thus, in order to identify the respective floral imagery, a much broader reading of the prophetic texts is needed that is informed and guided by an understanding of metaphor theory.

2. Floral Imagery in the Prophets.

In an attempt to organize the floral images found throughout the Prophetic Books, here they are presented according to the major themes that they develop, first within negative contexts of judgment and then within positive contexts of restoration. This is followed by miscellaneous other usages. Each section follows a rough outline of different plant groups preceded by the usages of the verbal forms.

2.1. Floral Imagery of Judgment. Isaiah is the author who employs floral imagery most frequently among the Hebrew prophets. Through verbal forms, in the context of three eschatological “in that day” sections that form part of the oracles against the nations (Is 13:1–20:6), Isaiah describes how the foreign seedlings of false religion and political realism that Israel has planted have budded and blossomed (prh) into grief and pain (Is 17:10–11). In an interesting application of metaphorical incongruence, Ezekiel uses two verbal forms of floral imagery to underline the certainty of the impending judgment over Judah and Jerusalem: the rod of violence is blooming (swš) and arrogance is budding (prh). In Habakkuk 3:17 judgment is represented by the failing economic agricultural base of Israel, where the fig trees no longer are budding (prh). However, floral imagery expressed through verbal roots is more frequently found in the images of restoration.

2.1.1. Trees. The most frequent usage of floral imagery found in the Prophetic Books is linked to trees, especially trees used in Israelite agriculture and forestry (fig, olive, almond, cedar, palm, cypress, etc.). Often nations and kings are likened to trees, and judgment usually is expressed in the cutting down of a tree (Is 6:13; 9:14 [terebinth, oak, sycamore, cedar]; 14:8 [cypress, cedar]; 37:24 [cedar, cypress]; Jer 11:16 [olive]; Ezek 31:3–8 [cedar]; Dan 4:4, 11, 14; Amos 2:9 [cedar]; Zech 11:2 [cypress, cedar, oak]). Furthermore, the destruction or drying up of trees as the agricultural base for Israel’s economy is used to illustrate God’s judgment against his people (Is 2:13 [cedar, oak]; 9:14 [palm]; Joel 1:7 [fig]; 1:12 [fig, palm, apple, pomegranate]). The lack of fruit on the trees demonstrates Israel’s lack of faithfulness toward God (Jer 8:13 [fig]; Hos 9:10 [fig]), and the beating of an olive tree in order to harvest the fruit is a metaphor for God’s judgment of the nations (Is 24:13). Isaiah in particular employs tree metaphors widely, and while there are a variety of motifs expressed by them, they become the communicative strategy to transmit the important though paradoxical theological theme of judgment (the cutting down of a tree) and restoration as exemplified by the *remnant that even can point as far as the messianic restoration (the shoot that will sprout out of the stump [Is 4:2]).

2.1.2. Shrubs. Shrubs used as floral imagery for judgment are mainly centered on the word pair “briers and thorns,” which communicates the pervasive entanglement with injustice (Is 9:18; 10:17; 27:4; Ezek 2:6; Mic 7:4) and the devastating after-effects of judgment (Is 7:23–25; 32:13; 34:13; Hos 10:8) when undesired vegetation takes over. Thorns, briers, weeds or nettles on their own communicate the same notions (Is 7:19; 33:12; Jer 4:3; Hos 2:6; 9:6; Jon 2:5; Nahum 1:10; Zeph 2:9). In the context of a polemic against Israel’s *idolatry, Hosea metaphorically connects Israel’s worthless oaths and empty covenants to impending judgment that will sprout like poisonous weeds (Hos 10:4). The metaphorical incongruence between God’s judgment and the poisonous plants increases the impact of the imagery. The bitter juice of the wormwood shrub, sometimes used for medicinal purposes, is used to symbolize God’s punishment (Jer 9:15; 23:15) and is also contrasted with the sweet fruit of righteousness (Amos 5:7; 6:12). Reeds and papyrus plants are appropriately mentioned in connection with judgment over Egypt (Is 18:2; 19:6; Ezek 29:6) and the castor-oil shrub in whose shade Jonah rests overlooking Nineveh serves as an illustration of God’s judgment and grace.

2.1.3. Flowers. Flowers, especially their blossoms (šš), in judgment imagery are most frequently connected to the concept of the temporal limitations of beauty (Is 28:1, 4; 40:6–8) and power (Nahum 1:4), usually in the face of God’s judgment (Is 5:24; 18:5). The flax flower, an important resource for the ancient weaving industry, is also mentioned in contexts of judgment (Is 19:9; Hos 2:5, 9).

2.1.4. Grass. The usage of grass in prophetic imagery follows along the same lines as that of flowers, where its withering usually is an expression of God’s judgment (Is 15:6; 37:27; Jer 14:5).

2.1.5. Vines. The familiar imagery of Israel as a choice vine echoes the care of God for his chosen people and highlights the contrast between his election of Israel and his rejection by Israel (Is 5:2, 5, 6; Jer 2:21), which does not bear fruit. Consequently, the wood of the vine is only good to be burned (Ezek 15:2).

2.1.6. Grain. Hosea observes the lack of sprouting grain and interprets it as a sign of God’s judgment (Hos 8:7; Joel 1:10), indicating that without God’s blessings, the wheat that has been sown turns into thorns (Jer 12:13).

2.1.7. Gardens. As part of the plagues cycles, Amos 4:9 makes reference to gardens that have been destroyed by blight and mildew through divine intervention so as to motivate Israel to repentance. The garden in prophetic imagery often connects to the paradise motif, and its destruction indicates the spiritual distance between Israel and its creator. The plants in this garden, as has been observed above, are mostly functional rather than ornamental and serve an economic purpose. These are the plants of the covenant promise that within the context of judgment illustrate the tangible and spiritual reversal of the blessings. The floral imagery of judgment thus drives home the point of how far Israel has removed itself from the covenant and how deeply its spiritual existence and physical subsistence have been affected by this.

2.2. Floral Imagery of Restoration. Floral imagery of restoration is frequently used in contrast to judgment imagery, sharpening the distinction between an unfaithful and faithless people and the ideal situation of what could have been otherwise. Numerically, the usages of floral imagery within the context of restoration are about half as many as those related to judgment, but interestingly, the metaphorical repertoire corresponds mostly between the two themes.

2.2.1. Verbal Forms. While, as just noted, the restoration usages of floral imagery are disproportionate to those related to judgment, verbal forms are used more frequently in restoration imagery than in judgment imagery and naturally lend themselves to the idea of restoration. Hosea, within the context of a tree metaphor representing Israel's restoration by a growing cedar and olive tree, sees the nation also blooming (prh) like a lily (or rose?) and a garden that recalls the eschatological garden motif of Eden restored (Hos 14:5, 7). The metaphor moves beyond the familiar in Hosea 14:8, where Yahweh is likened to a cypress or, more likely, a juniper (Juniperus excelsa), which is further qualified by the adjective ra'ānān ("flourishing, luxuriant, full of leaves"), denoting its superior appearance in comparison to Israel as a growing cedar and olive tree. The choice of tree for Yahweh is further underscored by its extensive usage in the construction of the *temple (e.g., 1 Kings 5:22). While the blending of metaphor is surprising and needs to be understood within the context of tree metaphors throughout the OT, it becomes clear that Israel can grow and flourish only under the protection of its divine king, Yahweh. The dynamic smh ("sprout, spring up") is mainly used by Isaiah, and on an abstract level he makes reference to new things that spring up (Is 42:9; 43:19) in the context of the description of the work of the messianic Servant of Yahweh. There is also salvation, righteousness, praise (Is 45:8; 61:11) and healing (Is 58:8; 66:14) springing up, as well as the descendants of Jacob, who will sprout like trees (Is 44:4). Further, the eschatological blossoming (šwš) of Israel describes the nation in terms of restoration. Finally, in a messianic vision, Ezekiel sees an individual sprouting like a horn that serves as an ancient Near Eastern symbol of strength and power. The verbal root smh is related to the noun šemah ("shoot" or, alternatively, "vegetation, growth"), which is used by Jeremiah, Zechariah and to a lesser extent by Isaiah and Ezekiel as a specific messianic term (Jer 33:15; Ezek 29:21; Zech 3:8; 6:12).

2.2.2. Trees. A wide variety of trees are used for the imagery of restoration, often grouped together representing the floral bounty of Israel and indicating to the modern reader the level of forestation and agricultural activity in ancient Israel. In a reversal from desolation to restoration, Isaiah foresees a reforestation of the wilderness (Is 41:19 [cedar, acacia, myrtle, olive, cypress, plane, pine]). He later picks up on the same group of conifers (Is 60:13 [cypress, plane, pine]) in describing the rebuilding of *Zion and the beautification of its sanctuary. As much as the olive tree was beaten in the context of judgment (Is 24:13), the restoration image of a remnant is found in the gleanings that are left on the olive tree after the harvest (Is 17:6). The same concept of the remnant is referred to in the stump of a terebinth or an oak (Is 6:13) from which the holy seed will arise. Palm trees figure prominently in Ezekiel's vision of the restoration of the temple (Ezek 40:16; 41:18), where they were used there as ornamental elements symbolizing life, sustenance and peace. During the postexilic restoration the prophet Haggai indicates that from the day the foundation of the temple was laid, God's blessing has returned to his people in that the fruit trees are producing again (Hag 2:19 [vine, fig, pomegranate, olive]).

2.2.3. Shoots. The shoot or branch (šemah) is used as a messianic title by various Hebrew prophets. As part of the tree metaphor, the shoot first establishes the Davidic credentials of the *Messiah (Jer 23:5; 33:15), but it also conveys the concept of the remnant coming forth from the stump (Is 4:2). Zechariah combines the messianic shoot with the Servant of Yahweh title (Zech 3:8; 6:12). The shoot as nēšer has similar messianic connotations (Is 11:1; cf. Dan 11:7), but also it can be extended to God's people as a whole (Is 66:21).

2.2.4. Shrubs. Among the shrubs in restoration imagery, the briars and thorns are now removed (Ezek 28:24) and replaced by more pleasant vegetation, the cypress and the myrtle tree (Is 55:13). Reeds are representative of flowing fresh water that turns the *wilderness into a garden (Is 35:7). Finally, the fragile reed that will not be broken becomes an image of God's careful restoration (Is 42:3).

2.2.5. Flowers. The crocus (narcissus?) and the lily are mentioned among the flowers within the imagery of restoration. The exact identification of the various biblical species remains a point of botanical interpretation, but both flowers blossom as a result of the restorative changes that the land is experiencing by way of divine intervention and are connected to the image of bountiful abundance in contrast with a previously waterless and dry wasteland that God is restoring (Is 35:1-2; Hos 14:5).

2.2.6. Grain and Vines. Finally, grain and vines (together with fig trees) are mentioned in Isaiah as a false promise of restoration made by Assyrian envoys who are trying to convince Hezekiah to surrender Jerusalem (Is 36:16-17).

2.3. Miscellaneous Usages of Floral Imagery. Floral imagery as denoting blessings and curses that are ultimately related to the notion of judgment and restoration are also employed in the prophetic literature of the OT. Similar to the tree imagery in Psalm 1, Jeremiah describes the person who places trust in the Lord as a tree planted by streams of water (Jer 17:7-8), whereas the person who trusts human beings instead of the Lord is likened to a shrub in the desert (Jer 17:5-6).

There are a number of usages of floral imagery within the Prophetic Books that cannot be easily grouped under the two main themes of judgment and restoration. Trees and plants are used within the literary context of a prophetic parable or riddle used by Ezekiel to prophetically sketch the final history of Judah before the exile and to confront Zedekiah with his unfaithfulness towards Nebuchadnezzar. The cedar treetop (Ezek 17:3-4) refers to Jehoiachin and the nobles of Judah. Then there is a seed that is planted by an eagle (Nebuchadnezzar) and grows into a vine (Zedekiah) that in turn stretches its roots toward a second eagle (Egypt), only to be finally uprooted (Ezek 17:5-10). The section ends in a rich messianic parable using the same floral imagery repertoire (Ezek 17:22-24) but applying it to the Messiah and his people. Nevertheless, one can also here detect the two motifs of judgment and restoration couched within the parable. Another parable is presented in Isaiah 28:24-26 that uses the image of a sowing farmer planting his field with different herbs and grains in order to demonstrate God's sovereignty in dealing with his people.

There are also a number of literal usages of plants in the Prophetic Books, such as Amos introducing himself as a sycamore dresser (Amos 7:14), the description of the pomegranate decorations of the temple that were taken away by the Babylonians during the destruction of Jerusalem (Jer 52:22-23), and the polemics against the artisans who make idols (Is 44:14; Jer 10:3). However, these literal usages of plants demonstrate the proximity of the prophetic imagery to its ancient audience as well as its usage as source domain in the process of metaphor blending.

3. Floral Imagery in the Bible and Floral Images of the Ancient Near East.

It has become apparent that floral imagery in the Hebrew prophets centers on the themes of judgment and restoration, which are intrinsically connected to covenant theology. The repertoire of imagery employed by the prophets arises from the flora of ancient Israel and the daily interaction with it through agriculture and industry. However, as outlined in the introduction, the literary usage of the imagery in most instances goes beyond a mere literal understanding of the flora, and the different plants metaphorically convey important theological motifs. The cognitive processes underlying this literary metaphor creation can be linked to iconographic images that surrounded the Hebrew prophets and influenced their choice of imagery. As an example, the widely used tree metaphor may be taken: trees are likened to nations and kings, which are cut down or dried up within judgment imagery, or sprout again, grow and bear fruit under God's restorative power.

The motif of the sacred tree is found throughout the ancient Near East, and depictions of trees appear in various contexts on a variety of media. As part of a complex image found on a storage jar at Kuntillet 'Ağrud, stemming from the eighth century BC, there is a stylized palm tree with lotus flowers flanked by two caprids and a striding lion below. The stylized tree can be interpreted as a representation of the goddess Asherah in a context of fertility. Or there is a stamp seal of unknown provenance from the seventh century BC on which is depicted a palm tree representing the goddess Asherah flanked by two dancing worshipers. The widely used stylized sacred trees of ancient Near Eastern iconography are found mostly in contexts of fertility and adoration. However, there is a critical engagement by the Hebrew prophets with this iconographic repertoire, and Isaiah engages in polemic against the artisans who make idols (Is 44:14) and the Asherim (Is 17:8; 27:9), which most probably were cult objects with stylized tree representations of Asherah. This demonstrates how the prophets interpreted the floral imagery differently and in contrast with the cultural and religious environment in which Israel existed during the period of the Hebrew prophets.

4. Floral imagery and Its Theological Force.

Floral imagery and nature as a whole in the Hebrew prophets are always instrumental in God's redemptive interventions in history, whether in contexts of judgment or of restoration. The theological strength of metaphors that are connected to the world of nature is related to the veracity of the imagery, especially from the point of view of an ancient agrarian Israelite culture. The unknown—abstract divine concepts of covenant exemplified through judgment and restoration—is interactively illuminated through the known reality of everyday life and its constant interaction with the flora of Syro-Palestine. That there are at times surprising, even shocking, images only enhances the depth of understanding that is provided by revelation to make known the issues of salvation to humankind. These images only serve to underline the otherness of Yahweh over against the other gods of the ancient Near East, echoing the strong monotheistic message of the Hebrew prophets.

See also ANIMAL IMAGERY; LAND; WILDERNESS, DESERT.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. B. A. Asen, "The Garlands of Ephraim: Isaiah 28:1-6 and the Marzeah," JSOT 71 (1996) 73-87; A. Berlin, The Dynamics of Biblical Parallelism (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1985); A. Bloch, "The Cedar and the Palm Tree: A Paired Male/Female Symbol in Hebrew and Aramaic," in Solving Riddles and Untying Knots: Biblical, Epigraphic, and Semitic Studies in Honor of James C. Greenfield, ed. Z. Zevit, S. Gitin and M. Sokoloff (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1995) 13-17; I. Cornelius, "Paradise Motifs in the 'Eschatology' of the Minor Prophets and the Iconography of the Ancient Near East," JNSL 14 (1988) 41-83; I. J. de Hulster, "What Is an Image?" in Iconography and Biblical Studies: Proceedings of the Iconography Sessions at the Joint EABS/SBL Conference, 22-26 July 2007, Vienna, Austria, ed. I. J. de Hulster and R. Schmitt (AOAT 361; Münster: Ugarit-Verlag, 2009) 226-32; M. T. DesCamp and E. E. Sweetser, "Metaphors for God: Why and How Do Our Choices Matter for Humans? The Application of Contemporary Cognitive Linguistics Research to the Debate on God and Metaphor," Pastoral Psychology 53.3 (2005) 207-38; K. Fey-aerts, ed., The Bible through Metaphor and Translation: A Cognitive Semantic Perspective (RD 15; Oxford: Peter Lang, 2003); O. Keel, The Symbolism of the Biblical World: Ancient Near Eastern Iconography and the Book of Psalms, trans. T. J. Hallet (New York: Seabury, 1978); M. G. Klingbeil, "Del caos al orden: Temas mitológicos en el libro de Isaías," Theologika 14.1 (1999) 66-85; K. Nielsen, There Is Hope for a Tree: The Tree as Metaphor in Isaiah (JSOTSup 65; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1989); J. M. O'Brien, Challenging Prophetic Metaphor: Theology and Ideology in the Prophets (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 2008); B. Oestreich, Metaphors and Similes for Yahweh in Hosea, 14:2-9 (1-8): A Study of Hoseanic Pictorial Language (Friedensauer Schriftenreihe Reihe A, Theologie 1; Frankfurt: Peter Lang, 1998); L. Ryken, J. C. Wilhoit and T. Longman III, eds., "Flowers," Dictionary of Biblical Imagery (Downers Grove: InterVarsity Press, 1998) 294-96; C. Sticher, "Die Gottlosen gedeihen wie Gras: Zu einigen Pflanzenmetaphern in den Psalmen; Eine kanonische Lektüre," in Metaphors in the Psalms, ed. P. van Hecke and A. Labahn (BETL 231; Leuven: Peeters, 2010) 115-34; T. Stordalen, Echoes of Eden: Gen- esis 2-3 and Symbolism of the Eden Garden in Biblical Hebrew Literature (CBET 25; Leuven: Peeters, 2000); United Bible Societies, Fauna and Flora of the Bible (Helps for Translators 11; London: United Bible Societies, 1972); J. G. Westenholz, Sacred Bounty Sacred Land: The Seven Species of the Land of Israel (Jerusalem: Bible Lands Museum, 1998); M. Zohary, Plants of the Bible: A Complete Handbook to All the Plants with 200 Full-Color Plates Taken in the Natural Habitat (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982).

M. G. Klingbeil

FORCED MIGRATION. See EXILE.

FORGIVENESS

Messages of judgment permeate the OT Prophetic Books. The prophets frequently warn their audiences about coming judgment and the *wrath of God (see Retribution). These prophets clearly found no joy or satisfaction in doom-laden messages (Jer 9:1). Their messages of doom and warnings of judgment make sense only in the context of the prophets' belief in the compassion and forgiveness of *God. The prophets called on the people to repent because they believed that this would lead to a gracious divine response of forgiveness and the withdrawal of the threatened judgment (Ezek 18:23). When the people failed to respond, making judgment inevitable, many of the prophets looked forward to a new beginning when Yahweh would once again reign over a cleansed and forgiven people who would acknowledge and obey him (Is 11:6-9).

In order to understand the significance of forgiveness in the Prophetic Books, we must study the vocabulary related to forgiveness. However, a study of vocabulary alone does not exhaust the subject because a message of judgment may presuppose that forgiveness is available to those who heed the message. Thus, here the introduction to the vocabulary of forgiveness will be followed by a study of the main themes relating to the prophetic understanding of forgiveness.

1. Vocabulary
2. Main Themes Relating to Forgiveness in the Prophets
3. Conclusion

1. Vocabulary.

The three main verbs that relate to the concept of forgiveness in the prophetic books (and indeed in the entire OT) are sālah ("to forgive"), kipper ("to atone") and nāṣā ("to lift up, carry").

The most frequent use of the verb sālah in prophetic literature is in the book of Jeremiah, where it occurs six times. The first two occurrences express the view that Yahweh will not forgive Israel because of the seriousness of their *sins and their refusal to *repent (Jer 5:1, 7). However, Jeremiah uses the same verb to highlight the prospect of the future restoration and forgiveness of Israel (Jer 31:34; 33:8; 36:3; 50:20). The verb also occurs once in Isaiah, where those who return to Yahweh are assured of being pardoned abundantly or freely (Is 55:7). Daniel and Amos beseech God to forgive his people (Dan 9:19; Amos 7:2). God is always the subject of this verb; it is never used in relation to humans forgiving one another.

The verb nāṣā often means "to lift up, carry." When used in relation to sin, it usually refers to bearing sin like a burden or bearing the consequences of sin (Is 53:12; Ezek 4:5-6; 44:10, 12). However, occasionally it refers to taking sin away in an act of forgiveness (Is 2:9; 33:24; Hos 1:6; 14:2; Mic 7:18).

The verb kipper usually means "to atone, make atonement." It refers to covering sin or blotting it out and thus is closely linked with the idea of forgiveness. Sins that are atoned for, or covered, may be forgiven so that reconciliation between the suppliant and God may take place. Isaiah's sins were "atoned for" when the burning coal from the altar touched his lips (Is 6:7). God himself will make atonement for the shameful things that Israel has done (Ezek 16:63). Ezekiel envisages a time in the future when sacrifices will be offered to make atonement (Ezek 45:15, 17). However, Jeremiah prays that God should not provide a means of atonement for those who are trying to kill him (Jer 18:23).

Although these are the three main verbs relating to forgiveness, the concept is also conveyed by the verb ḥānan ("to be gracious"), which often implies the idea of forgiveness (Is 30:18-19; 33:2). Furthermore, the noun "forgiveness" occurs once in Daniel 9:9, and in Isaiah 40:2 the announcement of forgiveness to the exiles includes the idea that their sins have been "paid for" (rāṣā).

The experience of forgiveness is sometimes expressed using metaphorical language. Hezekiah praised God for casting all his sins behind him (Is 38:17). Dramatic language is used by Micah as he describes God subduing iniquity and casting sins into the depths of the sea (Mic 7:19).

2. Main Themes Relating to Forgiveness in the Prophets.

2.1. God Is Gracious and Forgiving. The prophets taught that God was long-suffering and gracious and took no pleasure in the punishment of the wicked (Ezek 18:23, 30-32; Hos 11:8). In the context of a chilling forecast of disaster and judgment, Joel reassures his audience that if they repent, Yahweh will respond in mercy because "he is gracious and merciful, slow to anger, and abounding in steadfast love; and he relents over disaster" (Joel 2:12-13 esv).

The prophet Jonah was reluctant to preach to the citizens of Nineveh because he knew that the Lord was "a gracious God and merciful, slow to anger and abounding in steadfast love, and relenting from disaster" (Jon 4:2 esv). Since Jonah hoped that Nineveh would be destroyed, he did not want God to be gracious, and this is why he attempted to avoid the commission to preach to them.

However, this message of God's grace and mercy was understood in the context of God's intolerance of sin. The prophetic message was conditioned by an understanding of Yahweh as gracious and forgiving, but also as the holy God, who punishes sin and wrongdoing wherever he finds it. Although Israel had a special relationship with God, this did not mean that they could sin with impunity (Amos 3:2). Sin always created a barrier between Yahweh and his people (Is 59:1-2). Although Israel's God was gracious and forgiving, Israel must meet the necessary conditions in order to receive forgiveness.

Therefore, there is a tension in the prophets' message between Yahweh's mercy and his anger against sin and rebellion. This is clearly seen in Hosea's portrayal of Yahweh struggling within himself because although the nation deserved punishment, he wanted to forgive and not punish because of his great compassion for them (Hos 11:8-10; cf. Is 2:9). As M. Boda points out, "Hope therefore lies not with Israel's ability to repent but rather with Yahweh's grace in spite of Israel's apostasy" (Boda, 302).

2.2. Cultic Activity Does Not Guarantee Forgiveness. Frequent references to sacrifices provide evidence that many people relied on them to provide atonement for their sins without giving due thought to repentance and obedience. As J. Oswalt observes, "Israel was surrounded by religions that promised automatic propitiation and blessing without commitment or ethical change" (Oswalt, 97). However, the prophets taught that deliberate sin and persistent rebellion could not be rectified through the sacrificial system (Is 1:10-20; Jer 7:21-23). Even enthusiastic cultic activity and the offering of a great number of sacrifices could not substitute for repentance and a humble submission to Yahweh's law (Amos 5:21-24; Mic 6:6-7). Thus, Hosea warned the people that even though they would come with their flocks and herds to seek Yahweh, they would not be able to find him because "he has withdrawn from them" (Hos 5:6). Instead of their altars being places of atonement and forgiveness, they had become "altars for sinning and Yahweh is not pleased with them" (Hos 8:11-13; 9:4 esv; cf. Amos 4:4).

Jeremiah also had to deal with people who believed that their adherence to the sacrificial cult and temple was all that Yahweh required. Jeremiah's early ministry overlapped with Josiah's religious reformation, but he did not see this as the answer to the problem of the nation's guilt. Jeremiah's approach was that the reformation of the cult was an outward religious movement that could be effective only if accompanied by an inner change (Jer 3:10). The reformation conducted by Josiah failed to lead to God's forgiveness because it was not accompanied by genuine repentance and transformed behavior. Repentance at a much deeper level was required (Jer 3:21-4:4). As V. Eldridge points out, "What is in these verses is no shallow, self-centred sorrow for sin but the removal of every influence and attraction which was in competition with Yahweh for a place in his people's love (Jer 4:1)" (Eldridge 327-28). The prophets called on people to take God seriously and not to be lulled into a sense of false security by a misuse of the sacrificial system.

2.3. Forgiveness Is the Divine Prerogative. Although the prophets emphasized the mercy of God, they also taught that forgiveness could not be assumed. Forgiveness was not the automatic response of God to certain righteous acts or meritorious behavior. Thus, Joel declares that the Lord is "gracious and merciful, slow to anger, and abounding in steadfast love,” but immediately following this affirmation he emphasizes that forgiveness cannot be taken for granted, and he asks, “Who knows whether he will turn and relent?” (Joel 2:14 ESV; cf. Amos 5:15; Zeph 2:3). Forgiveness was the divine prerogative, and human beings must humbly rely on God’s mercy rather than presumptuously claim forgiveness as their right. The prophetic message that Yahweh was gracious and forgiving was not an invitation to complacency. There were conditions to be fulfilled before forgiveness could be received, and it could never be taken for granted.

The prophets’ understanding of the character and nature of God convinced them that the ethical and social implications of worshipping Yahweh could not be ignored if forgiveness was to be received. In particular, the concept of justice was high on the prophetic agenda (see Social Justice). As the righteous judge of all the earth, Yahweh could not condone unethical behavior. Amos establishes his understanding of Yahweh’s justice by showing that it extended even to the behavior of other nations (Amos 1:1–2:3). If Yahweh punishes the nations for their war crimes, then Israel should also expect condemnation and punishment for the sinful and unethical behavior that characterized society. Yahweh looked for lives that were compatible with his just demands, and Israelite society had become an affront to his standards of righteousness and justice (Amos 5:21–24).

Isaiah calls for a personal encounter with Yahweh (Is 1:18–20). Although there has been much discussion about the exact meaning of Isaiah 1:18, J. Willis has argued convincingly that attempts to deny that it offers forgiveness to the obedient have been unsuccessful (Willis, 35–49). The passage is set in a court context, and Israel is invited to debate the issues relating to sin and judgment. The pathway to forgiveness begins with obedience. The contrast between the colors highlights the dramatic change that forgiveness can bring in making sins that are like scarlet become white as snow (Is 1:18). An obedient response to Yahweh’s challenge (“Come now”) would lead to the forgiveness of most deeply dyed sins and transgressions. On a practical level, Israel is offered a choice between obedience that would lead to the enjoyment of the benefits of the land and disobedience that would result in being destroyed and removed from it. Forgiveness would be possible only in the context of obedience and a restored relationship with God. Isaiah uses language that highlights God’s willingness to forgive and balances it with a clear indication that this offer of forgiveness is conditional.

Thus, the prophets maintained a careful balance between their understanding of Yahweh as a merciful and gracious God and their knowledge of the majestic holy God who championed justice and would not tolerate sin. As Nahum points out, the gracious nature of God does not undermine his justice or mean that the guilty will escape punishment (Nah 1:3). God does not ignore sin. Sin cannot simply be forgiven without an adequate response (Jer 46:28). The prophets sought to convince their hearers that forgiveness was the divine prerogative, and it was to be humbly sought through obedience and faith.

2.4. Israel’s Future. Did the prophets believe that Israel would be forgiven, or were they convinced that judgment and not forgiveness would be Israel’s future prospect? There are some passages that suggest that forgiveness was impossible because of the nation’s refusal to repent (Is 22:14).

Ezekiel pointed out that because of Israel’s persistent sin and rebellion, forgiveness was unavailable to the present generation (Ezek 9:9–10). Early in his ministry Jeremiah may have believed that Israel could and would repent and be forgiven (Jer 3:12–13; 7:5–7; 26:1–3). However, later in his ministry Jeremiah became convinced that in the immediate future the nation would experience the wrath of God and not his forgiveness, and it was even pointless to pray for forgiveness (Jer 5:7; 7:16). This conclusion was based not on an unwillingness to forgive on Yahweh’s part but rather on the unwillingness of Israel to repent, which the prophet realized was just as unlikely as a leopard changing its spots (Jer 13:23).

One particularly puzzling passage apparently suggests that the preaching of the prophet would make forgiveness less likely. During Isaiah’s call, Yahweh instructs him to preach and to “make the heart of this people dull, and their ears heavy, and blind their eyes” (Is 6:10 ESV). This command to “make the heart of this people dull” suggests that Isaiah’s ministry will make forgiveness less likely. The dull hearts are not simply the result of Israel’s negative response to Yahweh's message; rather, this is part of the judgment on the nation that just as Pharaoh's heart was hardened because he was Yahweh's adversary, Israel was now out of harmony with God and in no fit condition to receive his message. G. von Rad comments that this section of Isaiah's call "sounds as if it shuts the door on everyone, and it was intended to be understood in this way" (von Rad, 2:154). This seems to indicate that forgiveness is impossible, but we must remember that in this same passage God provided atonement and forgave the prophet himself when the coal from the altar touched his lips (Is 6:7). Thus, the prophet is living proof that God is still willing to forgive the repentant and to restore individuals to harmony with himself. However, for the rebellious nation of Israel, the future promised judgment and not forgiveness.

This inevitability of immediate judgment did not deter Isaiah from a positive understanding of Yahweh's intention for the future of the nation. The name of his son Shear-jashub (Is 7:3) means "a remnant shall return." This future hope of a forgiven *remnant shines through the gloom of the predictions of judgment (Is 4:3; 10:20-21; 11:11, 16; 28:5). Hope for the future is one of the main themes in the later chapters of the book of Isaiah, where Yahweh pronounces comfort for his people because "her iniquity is pardoned" and "she has received from the LORD's hand double for all her sins" (Is 40:1-2 ESV). Forgiveness is offered freely to those who "Seek the LORD" and who "call on him." Those who "return to the LORD" will be welcomed by his "compassion," and "he will abundantly pardon" (Is 55:6-7 ESV). Central to Isaiah's message is the role of the "servant" who becomes a sacrifice and bears the iniquity of the people (Is 52:13—53:12) (see Servant of Yahweh). Through the undeserved suffering of the servant come peace, healing and the removal of sin (see Boda, 208).

Judgment followed by future hope and a restored relationship are also clearly presented in the book of Hosea. The names of Hosea's children are initially linked to coming judgment. However, the warning is accompanied by the promise that the meaning of the names will be reversed, and they are linked to restoration and blessing. One of the main themes of Hosea is the divorce of the unfaithful wife. However, it is the concept of "steadfast love" that is most prominent, and there is an overwhelming hope that the faithless wife will be brought back home again (Hos 2:14-23). Hosea perceives a remarkable tension within the heart of God because God's overwhelming desire is to forgive and not punish. Thus, God states, "My heart recoils within me; my compassion grows warm and tender. I will not execute my burning anger" (Hos 11:8-9 ESV).

The concept of a new *covenant is introduced by Jeremiah as Israel's hope for the future. The concept is introduced in the context of Israel's failure. It is argued that Israel had broken the covenant made at Sinai even though it had given the nation great privileges as Yahweh's spouse (Jer 31:31-32). Israel's flirtation with heathen gods and practices had destroyed the covenant relationship with God. The concept of a new covenant was a message of hope that the relationship between God and his people could be renewed. The success of this new covenant was guaranteed because it was God's initiative, and he would ensure that it did not fail. The new covenant represented a new opportunity, a new beginning and a new start for God's people. In the past they had not turned to him with all their hearts (Jer 17:1, 9), but now the new covenant would be written upon their hearts and not merely on stone. The emphasis will be on the individual's personal knowledge of Yahweh, and he will forgive all their sins (Jer 31:34; 50:20).

Zechariah expressed hope for the future using the concept of a "cleansing fountain" (Zech 13:1). This image highlighted the prophetic faith that God's future agenda for his people was forgiveness and mercy. This unilateral provision of a cleansing fountain evoked ideas of continual effective forgiveness.

3. Conclusion.

The prophetic messages warned Israel that sin must be taken seriously. Yahweh would not ignore sin, and if it was not dealt with, it would incur his wrath and bring terrible judgment on the nation. However, Yahweh loved his people and would graciously forgive them if they turned from their evil ways. Sacrifices alone would not ensure forgiveness, and they needed to be accompanied by sincere repentance and a genuine change of behavior on the part of the worshipers. Forgiveness was always the undeserved gift of a gracious God.

See also GOD; JUSTICE, RIGHTEOUSNESS; REPENTANCE; RETRIBUTION; SACRIFICE AND ATONEMENT.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. J. Boda, A Severe Mercy: Sin and Its Remedy in the Old Testament (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2009); W. Brueggemann, Texts That Linger, Words That Explode: Listening to the Prophetic Voice (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2000); W. Eichrodt, Theology of the Old Testament (2 vols.; London: SCM, 1967); V. J. Eldridge, "Jeremiah, Prophet of Judgement," RevExp 78 (1981) 319-30; J. Goldingay, Old Testament Theology, 2: Israel's Faith (Downers Grove, IL: IVP Academic; Milton Keynes: Paternoster, 2006); J. G. McConville, "The Judgement of God in the Old Testament," ExAud 20 (2004) 25-42; J. P. J. Oliver, "סלח," NIDOTTE 3:259-64; J. N. Oswalt, The Book of Isaiah: Chapters 1-39 (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1986); G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, trans. D. M. G. Stalker (2 vols.; London: SCM, 1975); J. T. Willis, "On the Interpretation of Isaiah 1:18," JSOT 25 (1983) 35-54. J. McKeown

FORM CRITICISM

Form criticism is a method used to analyze biblical literature with respect to categories of genre and social background, examining both broad categories of kinds of prophecies or stories, as well as their particular instantiation. It is possible to identify two major streams or waves of scholarship with respect to this analysis of genre (German Gattung) and form (German Form), which one might identify as classic form criticism and new form criticism. The purpose of this article is to explore the inception and evolution of form criticism as a critical method both generally and with a particular interest in form criticism of the biblical prophetic literature. This will include exploring both of these major movements of form criticism and offering some reflections on the further development of form criticism as a methodology for the examination of the prophetic literature.

This article is structured in four major sections followed by a conclusion. The first section gives a very brief overview of the history and development of form criticism (for a more detailed history of form criticism in the early and middle twentieth century, see March, 141-57; Westermann, 13-89), noting some of the major scholars who have been involved in form critical work in the prophetic literature especially. The second section examines classic form criticism. This examination proceeds not as a history, noting the work of every important critic along the way, but instead with an eye for important elements of form criticism as a methodology. These elements include the question of originally oral subunits in prophetic literature, genre and the development of prophetic traditions, and the vitally important concept of Sitz im Leben. This section closes with a brief overview of those prophetic genres commonly identified by classic form criticism. The third section examines the so-called new school of form criticism. Much of what this new school offers exists as a critique of the work of the classic form critics. Consequently, the third section follows a structure similar to that of the second. The third section examines the problems related to orality and literacy, the question of historicism and the world behind the text, and the question of both literary and social contextualization with respect to genre. The fourth section includes a comparison of the work of a classic form critic (H. Wolff) to that of a new form critic (E. Ben Zvi) with respect to a specific piece of prophetic literature, in this case Micah 7:1-7.

1. A Brief History of Form
2. Classic Form Criticism
3. New Form Criticism
4. A Form-Critical Exercise: Micah, Old and New
5. Conclusion

1. A Brief History of Form.

It is generally accepted that H. Gunkel was the first to propose the notion of a systematic analysis of genres in the OT, likely due to his interest in the folklore work of Jakob and Wilhelm Grimm (Tucker, 5). This is not to say that nobody before Gunkel had studied the various genres of literature found in the OT. Indeed, as M. Buss has shown, the study of genre both generally and with specific regard to the biblical literature has a very long history (Buss 1974, 1-31). What Gunkel brought to the endeavor that was unique and new was his focus on the history of Israelite literature as a history of genre development (Gunkel 2001, 33). Gunkel was very interested in examining the historical development of Israelite religion of the religious literature of ancient Israel, but since he believed that providing an accurate history of the authorship, collection and redaction of the biblical literature was impossible due to practical limitations, he suggested instead that biblical criticism should begin with an examination of the history of genres, as these represented much deeper and more fixed social realities (Gunkel 2001, 32).

Gunkel's call to the study of genres was taken up by a wide variety of biblical critics. Gunkel himself gave only sparse attention to the prophetic literature (e.g., Gunkel 1969), spending considerably more time on narrative texts (Gunkel 1901) and Psalms (Gunkel 1967). Scholars such as H. Gressmann and S. Mowinckel should be mentioned alongside Gunkel, as both studied with him personally, though Mowinckel is particularly known for his extensive work in Psalms. The very basic genres found in the prophetic literature described by Gunkel himself (Gunkel 1906, 32-33; 1969) received considerable expansions and clarification by later writers such as Gressmann (Gressmann 1910; 1929), who explored various types of oracles against foreign nations, and J. Lindblom (Lindblom 1924) and L. Köhler (Köhler 1945), who were among the first to identify the messenger speeches in the prophetic literature, particularly as indicated by the phrase "thus says Yahweh" (March, 147-48). Also of significant importance is the work of C. Westermann, who both refined and extended the work of prior form critics (see especially his extensive review of previous research, Westermann, 13-89), particularly with regard to both messenger speeches and oracles of salvation and destruction. In addition to these we should also note the work of G. Tucker in his Form Criticism of the Old Testament and K. Koch in his Growth of the Biblical Tradition.

On December 18, 1968, at the annual meeting of the Society of Biblical Literature, J. Muilenberg offered as his presidential address his paper "Form Criticism and Beyond." This paper, in which Muilenberg sounds not unlike Gunkel's own call for a move beyond literary criticism, points out the many benefits, but also the potential limitations, of the form-critical method. Muilenberg suggested that the time had come to move beyond form criticism to a new method that would examine "the structural patterns that are employed for the fashioning of a literary unit" (Muilenberg, 8). He referred to this new method as "rhetorical criticism" (Muilenberg, 8). Intriguingly, while this appears to be the first sign of the end of form criticism as an active methodology, Muilenberg's call to a focus on the structure of the final form of the text is only shortly thereafter found as a matter of significant concern in the work of self-identified form critics. Indeed R. Knierim's "Old Testament Form Criticism Reconsidered" moves form criticism explicitly into the realm of structuralism (e.g., Knierim, 439-40) and suggests that Muilenberg's call to move beyond form criticism is entirely unnecessary because the "way he summarizes 'rhetorical criticism' . . . could also be part of an article on the form-critical method" (Knierim, 458n91). What Knierim's paper heralds is the beginning of a new school of form criticism. This new form criticism is marked particularly by a focus on the literary text as we have it (as opposed to underlying oral precursors) and by an interest in the literary situation (Sitz im Literatur) as opposed to the social situation (Sitz im Leben) of genres. Several scholars deserve mention here. M. Sweeney's introduction to his commentary on Isaiah represents a particularly systematic presentation of the program of the new form criticism (Sweeney 1996). Sweeney's work is of particular interest with regard to *intertextuality and the Sitz im Literatur of prophetic texts. Also of great importance is the work of E. Ben Zvi, who has gone so far as to identify the "prophetic book" as a genre unto itself (Ben Zvi 2000a). Also of note is Buss's recent collection of essays, which present his "relational form criticism" (Buss 2010). For a selection of essays that represent the various concerns of the new form critics, see Sweeney and Ben Zvi.

The relationship between classic form criticism and new form criticism could be described in a variety of ways. It may indeed be legitimate to regard the new form criticism as a total inversion of Gunkel's original project (so Sudermann). Alternatively, one might regard the new form criticism as a project that, along with classic form criticism, exists within the fold of a greater continuum that we might refer to as genre criticism. In any case, whether one sees either (or both) of these schools of thought as an aberration or mutation, the fact remains that they are important methods that have been used (to greater and lesser effect) to examine the genres of the biblical literature. We turn now to a fuller examination of how each of them has attempted to go about this task.

2. Classic Form Criticism.

In order to understand form criticism as it was conceived by Gunkel and developed by his later intellectual heirs, one must take note of three essential assumptions of the method. First, the biblical literature generally, and the prophetic literature particularly, was originally an oral phenomenon (Gunkel 1969, 61). Second, there existed a long and complicated tradition of development in which the prophetic sayings were transmitted orally and then finally collected and edited into the written forms that were transmitted as the Prophetic Books. Third, both the original oral communication and the oracles as they were developed by the tradition correspond to a vitally important social situation or institution that made them first meaningful. The examination of genre in the Prophetic Books in this stream of critical thought both began with and is founded upon these assumptions, and it made use of the concepts of genre and form to describe more completely the world behind the prophetic texts and the consequent meaning of prophetic oracles.

For Gunkel, the prophet was the mouthpiece of God, a person whose life and voice were co-opted by the divine in order to present the words of God to the people. "As when a lion roars no one asks whether or not one should be frightened, but anyone feels involuntarily afraid, so everyone becomes a prophet who hears Yahweh's voice" (Gunkel 1969, 49). God speaks through the prophet, and prophecy is the only available response. This is a key element of Gunkel's conception of prophets and prophecy. Ancient prophecies were not carefully considered and highly reflective speeches or works of literature; they were spontaneous explosions, always orally delivered. Westermann suggests that Gunkel stops short of accepting an "ecstatic theory," but if this is so, it is only just so (Westermann, 24; cf. Gordon, 7). Thus, any exploration of the nature of prophecy, and of the basic types of prophecy, must necessarily begin (for Gunkel at least) with these original, oral speeches.

This conclusion is founded in part upon the various narratives that center on prophets (e.g., the narrative of Elijah and Elisha) and in part as an extrapolation of some oral features found in the Prophetic Books. Thus, "We must try and imagine [the prophetic] sayings being uttered orally, and not as they stand on paper, if we are to understand them" (Gunkel 1969, 61). Of course, this conclusion is based on the assumption that the Prophetic Books present themselves as the utterances of a prophet to the people. Note, as an example, Ezekiel's call. He has a personal confrontation with God (Ezek 1—2), after which he is told to go and speak to the people (Ezek 3:1). Clearly, oral declaration is a significant component of Ezekiel's calling as a prophet of Yahweh.

Following Gunkel, it was taken as given that underneath the prophetic literature lay the speeches of the prophets themselves. Therefore, in Westermann's words, "One begins with that which a word in the Old Testament really is—a personal event to which speaking as well as hearing belongs; a kind of happening that moves from the person (the one speaking) to another person (the one hearing)" (Westermann, 93 [see also Tucker, xi; Zimmerli, 23; Koch, 27n2]). But for such communication between humans to be accessible and comprehensible, it was argued, it must take on a recognizable, and relatively generic, guise (Koch, 14). Therefore, these oral communications needed to be classified into groups or genres and analyzed.

The questions that necessarily follow involve the nature of the spoken prophecies. Who speaks, and to whom? What is the content of that speech? What is the structure of that speech? The answers to the first and second questions are that God speaks, through the prophet, to the people. A review of the prophetic literature then provides two broad categories of addressees: the nations and Israel/Judah. With regard to content and form, these speeches were announcements, either of judgment or of salvation (Westermann, 93-94).

From this it was suggested that prophetic speech is messenger speech. The prophets are the messengers of Yahweh. Note the formula "thus says the LORD" (kōh 'āmar yhw'h), which is found throughout the OT, particularly in the Former and the Latter Prophets (Tucker, 59). Not only is the kōh 'āmar formula found with Yahweh as the referent, but frequently the utterance that is being reported comes from the mouth of a king through royal messengers

(e.g., Ex 5:10; 1 Kings 2:30; 20:3, 5; 2 Kings 1:11; 9:18-19; 18:19, 29). Gunkel suggested that this formula indicates that the prophets saw themselves as messengers relating a message directly from Yahweh (Gunkel 1969, 67; see also Westermann, 38). If this is accurate, and the prophets saw themselves as messengers, "then there is a foundation of formulas, speech forms, and speeches which have been passed down, where one can be assured of encountering the self-understanding of the prophets and of being on solid ground" (Westermann, 39). It is, then, upon this foundation of the messenger formula that the analysis of oral prophetic forms is built.

Before we proceed, a number of elements of this project must be pointed out. Note first of all Westermann's incredibly confident tone, speaking in terms of assurance and certainty. Though not quite universal, this supreme confidence in assured results is indicative of much of the classic form-critical venture. But the point about the messenger formula raises a significant question. Why should the existence of messenger formulas suggest to us that the historic prophets thought of themselves as messengers? This characterization of them as messengers of God serves to juxtapose God's sovereign voice with the voices of earthly kings and rulers. This is particularly evident in Exodus 5, where Pharaoh's refusal to heed God's pronouncement and issuing of his own counterpronouncement lead directly to a curse from God. The message is relatively straightforward: God is powerful, and his messengers must be heeded. Although this may be indicative of a prophetic speech pattern that was generally recognized, such a conclusion is neither necessary nor assured. This could just as well be a literary trope meant for those who read the biblical texts.

As has been noted, the conception of the prophet as divine messenger serves as the foundation for the further characterization of prophetic speech patterns. The prophets were oral preachers. "Since their authority came not from men but from God, they spoke whenever and wherever they felt compelled to do so" (Tucker, 70). This is rather similar to Gunkel's conception of the prophets as ecstatic preachers, though in Tucker's description the preaching is not involuntary. Tucker's words suggest that the prophets existed as a particular social class within Israelite society, and that their authority (if they were true prophets) was recognized (note that not all classic form critics saw prophecy as a social institution unto itself). They were known as the messengers of God, and one of the things that made them known was the use of formulaic language. Thus, Westermann critiques H. Wolff's suggestion that prophetic speech consisted of both revelation and comment by the prophet. For Westermann, all that follows the messenger formula in the original oral pronouncement must be the very word of God (Westermann, 57-58, 74-75, 95).

Eventually, of course, these pronouncements made by the prophets themselves were recorded and transmitted to later generations. For many of the classic form critics, it is here that the prophecies themselves died (Koch, 58). But this literary funeral was not immediate. Before being set down in writing, the words of the prophets enjoyed a lengthy history of oral transmission. Beginning with the now common assumption that prophetic speech was the short and direct saying of the prophet himself (e.g., the very words of Isaiah [see Mowinckel 2002, 11, 53]), it followed that those words, which Isaiah himself likely did not write down, were somehow transmitted to the next generation.

The types of prophetic literature enable the modern researcher to see a kind of continuity, a prophetic tradition. Thus, according to Tucker, "In this endeavor we are not trying to recover the ideal and hypothetical 'prophet' by means of a 'standard' prophetic genre or genres; we are looking for that continuity which should aid us in understanding each individual" (Tucker, 55). Each individual prophet stood within a tradition of prophecy, and so understanding the tradition will aid in our understanding of the individual. This is a question of what the social institution was that was connected to the prophecy, and how the prophet and the oral tradition of his prophecy were connected to that institution.

The prophets were recognizable figures with disciples who followed them and recorded and transmitted their words (see Is 8:16-18) (Tucker, 69). Zimmerli suggests that there is evidence for "a typical scene from the prophetic 'school'" to be found in the scenes where the prophet sits together with the elders or heads of house from the people (Ezek 8:1; 14:1-11; 20:1-44; 33:31; 2 Kings 6:32) (Zimmerli, 109). Whether or not the prophets had disciples, Zimmerli's account is rather unconvincing, particularly the evidence from Ezekiel. These passages seem analogous not to some theorized prophetic school, but instead to the interactions between the prophet and the king in Isaiah and Jeremiah. These elders appear to have authority among the exiled community (they have no king now), and so they come to the prophet for counsel regarding the will of God (see Ezek 20:3, where God responds to the elders through Ezekiel).

Whether or not we can identify these so-called prophetic schools or groups of prophetic disciples from the text itself, the assumption has generally been made that the Prophetic Books themselves are a product of the gradual development of complexes, or groups, of sayings that came together and were associated with one another over the history of the tradition. "Sayings have come to form tradition complexes because they share the same catchword, have similar content, have the same addressee, or are from the same period in the prophet's work" (Mowinckel 2002, 44). For Mowinckel, the task of source, form, and tradition-historical criticism is the recovery of that which is more original, and the identification of the development of the given tradition. The entire tale must be told from beginning to end or, to put it differently, from spoken oracle (ipsissima verba) to final canonical literature. To do anything less is to fail in the task of tradition-historical criticism, to be like "a horse 'refusing the fence'" (Mowinckel 2002, 78). The principal role of form criticism in this task is to identify units of prophetic speech and to tie those types to social situations (Sitz im Leben). The critic is thus, in theory, able to distinguish those elements that are more original (down to the very words of the initial prophet) from those elements that have been added by later tradition (Mowinckel 2002, 80, 145n17). Some later critics expressed doubts regarding the recovery of the original words of the prophet and hope only for more original strata (Koch, 52).

This identification of individual units, a purely objective enterprise in Mowinckel's view, is accomplished by examining the text and identifying the various markers that generally open and close individual prophetic oracles (Mowinckel 2002, 43). In this sense, form criticism picks up where the old higher critics leave off, taking the disparate segments identified, establishing their generic qualities and classifying them, whether as oracles of salvation or judgment (or some other genre), and then examining them in light of the social situation (in the sense of social institution) to which those prophetic genres belong.

Mowinckel (among others) suggests that the development of the tradition history serves the purpose of making the initial prophecies usable by later generations. "This trend . . . led in several cases to a transformation and a new edition of an older prophetic saying so that it also came to express the hope of restoration in the new situation" (Mowinckel 2002, 79 [so also Zimmerli, 23-24]). Thus, the design of the Prophetic Books as we have them facilitates (in some instances at least) the reactualization of the prophetic material by later generations. As we will see, the new form critics at times make similar suggestions. The hallmark of the classic approach is that Mowinckel desires to move beyond the text itself to the more original, older material as well as to the world that stands behind the theoretical reconstructions of earlier textual and oral stages in the transmission process.

This is the point at which transmission and Sitz im Leben meet. The primary proposed benefit of form criticism for the tradition-historical project is the identification of an ongoing social context in which a given oracle (or complex of oracles) was transmitted. "A tradition that remains alive and even has a history does so only because it is an expression of some aspect of the life of society and exercises a social function, whether in the cult, public life, or the more private life of the family. The form, together with its contents, points exactly to the social location of the tradition; the form is socially and psychologically given, the one appropriate in the particular situation" (Mowinckel 2002, 7). This is Mowinckel's presentation of Sitz im Leben. It is not so much particular or general cultural context, but instead the social tradition or institution in which and from which the oracle takes its form. The original Sitz im Leben is the social situation of the original oral utterance, and all the subsequent developments within the tradition either are tied to this original Sitz im Leben or find their oral and literary afterlife by being appropriated into some other literary type with its own Sitz im Leben (Koch, 35). It is within these social situations and institutions that prophecy finds its place, and from them that the prophets have taken the structure and, to some degree, the content of their prophecies (i.e., the genre of the prophecies).

For Mowinckel in particular there is a relationship between the transmission of the prophetic tradition and the Sitz im Leben of the various prophetic oracles. The oracles themselves continue to exist only because some social institution is maintained in which they are recognizable and intelligible. This may be a process of adaptation, or it may indicate that a given social institution has been maintained, but in any case the oracle cannot survive without some social situation to give it context and meaning.

In contrast to this, Tucker sees the prophetic role as a social institution in and of itself. No other social institution is required to explain the maintenance and transmission of the complex of oral tradition. Thus, the Sitz im Leben for Tucker is the "prophetic role," since prophecy is a very specific institution in ancient Israel (Tucker, 76).

There is some material support for Mowinckel's views to be found in a text such as Jeremiah, as the two different extant collections (MT and LXX) suggest a set of Jeremiah material that was circulating in unarranged form, and that this material came together into two different versions of the final book. The difficulty is that while we may extrapolate something like the development of tradition that Mowinckel envisions from this evidence, we simply do not have the oral complexes to which he refers, let alone specific evidence of the ipsissima verba. We have no record whatsoever of a set of well-known sayings or oracles that were transmitted together in some social institution or other. What is more, even though we know something of the literary history of Jeremiah (due to the Greek and Hebrew versions), we do not have similar evidence for the other biblical books. Any suggestion made regarding other books in the prophetic literature must be extrapolated based upon what we know of Jeremiah's transmission history and upon what we guess about the relationships between various oracles in a given prophetic work. Furthermore, we must make those guesses based upon other guesses about the existence and function of social institutions within ancient Israel. It is here that the enterprise begins to crumble.

The purpose of form criticism, according to Tucker, is to "relate the texts before us to the living people and institutions of ancient Israel" (Tucker, xi). As has been noted, there are problems with this view, and we will examine further difficulties below. However, it must also be noted that an important and accurate concept underlies this statement. Communicative actions—and that certainly is what texts are—do indeed have underlying social situations and institutions that have an effect upon interpretation. Communication does not occur apart from some kind of social situation. This cannot be denied. Additionally, certain fixed forms do occur both in everyday speech and in various kinds of literature. Think, for instance, of the English phrase "good morning," which functions as a simple greeting and need not indicate that a given morning is good at all. Or, with regard to literary forms, consider the clichéd introductory phrases "It was a dark and stormy night" and "Once upon a time." The question is not whether some broader context must be sought, or whether genre categories may be useful, but what context that might be and the way in which a category or categories could be useful.

In addition to the important, if problematic, concepts discussed above, classic form criticism has also produced an entire set of helpful general genre categories into which much of the prophetic literature may be said to fall. In defining genres there is a tension between too much structural definition and too little. Tucker, for instance, criticizes Westermann for his overly defined categories. There is a twofold problem. First, many prophecies that should (in Tucker's view) be included within a given genre are excluded, and second (and more important), Westermann's highly defined categories suggest some kind of "ideal or the original pattern appropriate for prophetic speech" (Tucker, 64n94). Tucker suggests instead that it is helpful to describe, in very general terms, the features and characteristics of broad types of prophecy and to allow interpreters to then explore their relationships to the various instantiations of actual prophetic oracles. What is included in the list given below, therefore, is defined in very broad strokes.

As early as Gunkel we find two basic forms of prophetic oracle, both of them negative: accusation of the people and announcement of judgment (Westermann, 18). Westermann emphasizes that the prophets are not preachers of repentance, though some other form critics identify the oracles in this way. The prophets are principally preachers of doom (Westermann 19, 65-70). Given this, he revises Gunkel's categories and speaks in terms of oracles of destruction and oracles of salvation as the two broadest and most ubiquitous types of prophecy. There are a number of other significant prophetic forms, listed below, but judgment and salvation are the mainstays of the prophetic literature—judgment particularly so.

The following is a list of types of prophetic speech, as listed principally by March (March, 159-69). Note that in all of these the question of Sitz im Leben seems to be the least settled and most often disputed, obviously due to lack of evidence:

1. Prophecy of disaster—This category, in particular, and the next one (prophecy of salvation) are the most notable and important, but determining the Sitz im Leben for both is difficult, as is determining whether or not these are original to the prophets of Israel or borrowed from neighboring cultures.
 - a. indication of situation
 - b. prediction of disaster
 - c. concluding characterization
2. Prophecy of salvation—This is essentially the same as the prophecy of disaster.
 - a. (optional) appeal for attention
 - b. indication of situation
 - c. prediction of salvation (promise)
 - d. concluding characterization
3. Woe oracle—This is considered a secondary type, borrowed.
 - a. introduced by hōy
 - b. participle or substantive, which indicates the subjects of the oracle
 - c. second participial clause + finite verb indicating offense
 - d. announcement of judgment
4. Trial speech
 - a. summons to trial
 - b. trial, including speeches by participants
 - c. sentencing
5. Rib speech, a possible subcategory of the trial speech (see Is 1; Mic 6; Jer 2)
 - a. introduction, including call for hearing

- b. questioning of witnesses and statement of accusation
 - c. prosecutor's speech
 - d. derogatory statements regarding cult and need for compensation
 - e. declaration of guilt and threat of destruction
6. Disputation speech
7. Call to repentance—This type has been disputed. Wolff suggested that any element of repentance should be considered subordinate to the associated oracle of destruction or salvation. T. Raitt identifies this form, citing twenty-nine examples, preponderantly in Jeremiah. These often occur in relation to oracles of salvation.
 - a. appeal with messenger formula
 - b. motivation with promise/threat

There is no doubt that classic form criticism has helped to move the study of OT prophecy forward. It has provided important reflection upon the possible oral origins of the prophetic literature, as well as questions concerned with the theoretical history and development of the prophetic texts as we have them today. The concept of Sitz im Leben hits upon the vitally important fact that communication occurs in context. "Still the definition of the Sitz im Leben remains a pressing problem in the study of prophetic speech forms" (March, 176). The problem with Sitz im Leben is fairly obvious: we lack evidence from which to draw in order to construct a convincing Sitz im Leben. It is not that there may not have been just such a phenomenon, but how could one know if it had been isolated and described accurately? In all cases we must rely only upon other literature, and we have no experience of the culture of ancient Israel directly. What is particularly striking about this problem is that uncovering the Sitz im Leben is one of the hallmark promises of form criticism (Deist, 583). It is difficult to avoid disillusionment with a methodology that cannot accomplish one of its chief aims. This is the situation that has led, more than anything else, to the move away from Sitz im Leben and toward a search for a situation in literature or book. The enterprise is, in many ways, relatively similar. It is the goal that differs markedly.

The new form critics do not depart entirely from the work of the older generation. "Rather, the limitations of the older methods are more frankly acknowledged and the desirability of a more sophisticatedly flexible approach to the biblical texts is being recognized" (Gordon, 19). We find a shift to the text, as opposed to the world behind the text. This does not negate the impulse to know more about the cultural milieu of ancient Israel and postexilic Judah. Comparative studies, as well as the narrative sections of the Latter Prophets and the tales of the Former Prophets, remind us of the flesh-and-blood prophets who inhabited the ancient Near East. Although it is perhaps impossible to truly get behind the text to the social situations and traditions in which these various prophetic figures worked, it does not follow that they did not exist or that they are merely constructs of later redactors (Gordon, 21).

As R. Gordon notes, "It would be a pity if doctrinaire dismissals of older approaches were to turn the idea of a 'paradigm shift' into a euphemism for a neologistic tyranny which, in the familiar way of some Old Testament scholarship, assumed far more about what cannot be known about the workings of Israelite prophecy (for example) than the evidence justifies" (Gordon, 26). This is a very good corrective to the creation of a new "orthodoxy" with regard to form and tradition. The evolution of the form-critical methodology in recent years has its own flaws, some which are even reminiscent of classic form criticism.

However, as the star of classic form criticism sets, we do see the rise of new emphases in scholarly examinations of the genre and structure of the prophetic literature, including a greater focus on final forms and the importance of the role of the redactor in the creative production of the text (Deist, 595-96; see also Knierim). In this project, which is referred to here as the new form criticism, we begin with one of the shoals upon which the classic project foundered: the basic and almost shockingly obvious truth that the prophetic literature is, in fact, literature.

3. New Form Criticism.

In the middle-to-late twentieth century, developments in philosophy, linguistics and literary theory began to challenge reigning presuppositions about how texts developed and what we can and cannot know about this process (Sweeney and Ben Zvi, 3). One of the most significant developments for the form-critical enterprise was a move to a focus on the whole text (Campbell, 23). One may speak now of a great diversity of form-critical approaches, making use of a variety of interdisciplinary methods. "They advance synchronic and diachronic literary analyses as well as studies of the interrelationships between text and language, text and society (and social structures), text and culture, texts and audience, and texts and other texts" (Sweeney and Ben Zvi, 5). Form criticism is now a method in progress (Sweeney and Ben Zvi, 9). One of the notable features of this movement is, of course, critical engagement with the classic form-critical project. This examination and analysis of new form criticism will mirror, therefore, section 2 above. First, we will examine the concept of an oral/literate divide and what it means that prophetic literature appears as literature. Second, we will explore the possibilities and problems involved with engaging in a world behind the text. Third, we will survey the concept of context and ask, among other things, "Sitz im What exactly?"

Although we may refer to a new school of form criticism, it must be noted that for some who promote and practice this new form criticism, many of the initial assumptions and goals of classic form criticism remain. The divorce between these two camps is not total, but there are some significant changes in emphasis, as E. Blum makes clear: "OT exegesis asking for the historical, intended meaning of the texts will always be dependent on 'genre investigation' in Gunkel's sense. It will be dependent on the question of the form and meaning of the individual texts in their intended reception, which is pursued with literary-critical methods" (Blum 2003, 45). Note that while Blum retains a concern for history and intention, this concern shifts to an intended readership as opposed to the oral background or the intentions of the prophet. Although many shifts and changes are involved, and although scholars such as Blum (and many others cited here) are very careful and nuanced in their examination of data, it must be emphasized that the rumors concerning the death of historical criticism have been greatly exaggerated.

As we noted above, the fact that the prophetic literature is indeed written literature must be taken into account (Floyd 2000, 111). "In fact, this feature has a substantial bearing on the social role of these books, the status of their composers and readers (as opposed to those to whom the text must be read), the social function of high literacy, the construction of language and discourse, and the role of writing as the propagation of theological/ideological viewpoints, including particular views of society and its hierarchy" (Ben Zvi 2000a, 8). Regardless of the precise origins of the prophetic literature, the only thing that we have before us are texts, and those texts represent the work of a highly literate subculture (see Writing and Prophecy). They have their own characteristics (aesthetic, epistemological, theological and otherwise) that, in the end, are the responsibility of those who collected, edited and transmitted them (Ben Zvi 2000a, 8; Campbell, 23). What is more, these texts appear to have functioned as divine revelation to these literate editors and transmitters (Ben Zvi 2000a, 12). Although it is entirely possible (perhaps even probable) that the prophetic literature was at some point an oral phenomenon, we simply have no direct evidence of this. We have only the text.

Additionally, the strong focus on orality that characterized classic form criticism is not without ideological underpinning. M. Floyd notes that for modern interpreters, the prophet acts as a kind of savage protoromanticist, and the scribe as a kind of protorationalist (Floyd 2000, 114, 119). This certainly is true of Gunkel, whose work evinces strong romanticist leanings, which often have the flavor of a kind of historical paternalism; the wise scholar observing the noble savage with amusement and grudging respect (Gunkel 1901, 1, 61). Floyd is tremendously concerned with the residual effect on biblical studies of the thinking of Wellhausen and Gunkel in this regard. He indicts these scholars for creating stereotypes of the scribe and prophet that are maintained today: "On the one hand, prophets were active in Israel's history from its primitive beginnings. They were basically oral poets or orators, not writers. . . . On the other hand, scribes became active in Israel's cultural history at a relatively late date. They were basically rationalistic intellectuals at home in academic institutions or schools" (Floyd 2000, 120 [see, likewise, Campbell, 18]). We see this in the form-critical focus on the original, the oral, as the more important. The later, written scribal work represents the death of the vibrant and culturally connected oral kernel.

What is needed here is not simply a total shift from a focus on orality to a focus on literacy in our study of prophetic literature. The problem is much more complex (see Ong). It is essentially certain that the vast majority of the population of both ancient Israel and postexilic Judah were illiterate (Ben Zvi 2000a, 5n8, 6, 10, 21n60). Given this, the prophetic literature must have been collected, edited and transmitted by a relatively small subsection of the populace with specialized skills. These are Ben Zvi's famous literati, (Ben Zvi 2000a; also throughout Ben Zvi's work). But it is important not to overemphasize the divide between oral and written. Although these were written texts in their later reception, it seems very likely that they also had a significant oral life. The literati who interacted with these texts were most likely an elite class, but they also must have fulfilled some function in the community if that community were to tolerate their presence.

As K. van der Toorn suggests, these literati likely were attached in some way to the temple or religious structure, and consequently both they and, one must assume, the texts with which they worked played a role in that setting (see, e.g., Lk 4:16-19) (van der Toorn, 82). Thus, it may be helpful when reflecting on genre and form to consider the possible performative role of a text within a community. "Any given performance of a traditional power or story necessarily evokes, through specific expressions of traditional language, imagery, themes, and patterns, the larger body of stories and poems in the common store of material familiar in varying degrees to performer and audience" (Culley, 50). One of the things that this kind of thinking suggests is the possibility of "orally-derived texts," which are "traditional texts conceived largely in oral terms but still produced in writing" (Culley, 53). Think, for instance, of the manuscript of a modern sermon. Although it is written, and therefore is in a literary medium, it reflects more closely the linguistic register of a particular kind of oral communication. Thus, that a text may have apparently oral features alongside apparently literary features is not at all surprising.

Floyd suggests that "when prophecy is occasionally described as an activity that involves writing, the documents tend to function as a substitute for oral delivery rather than an alternative to it" (Floyd 2000, 103). This does not negate R. Culley's concept of an orally derived text, as indicated by Floyd's reference to Jeremiah 29:1-32; 51:59-64 suggest texts that were indeed intended to be read to the exiles. Although note also that the first letter is sent specifically to the cultural elite (Jer 29:1 [though also with the intent of being read to the people generally]), and the second letter was specifically meant to be read aloud to the people (Jer 51:61). This is an example of orality and literacy functioning side by side.

In addition to this more subtle and difficult conception of the relationship between orality and literacy, new form criticism also challenges the classic attempt to get behind the text as it stands in order to identify the more original sayings, as well as the tradition history of a given text. Instead of conceiving of the Prophetic Books as collections of relatively disparate prophetic sayings (Zimmerli, 23), new form critics begin their investigations with the assumption that these texts are coherent and have been skillfully collected, edited and transmitted.

As Ben Zvi notes, all models for understanding the nature and development of the Prophetic Books are circular to some degree. What sets his apart is that it does, in fact, have access to one indisputably external and objective fact: the existence of written prophetic books (Ben Zvi 2000a, 16). He therefore posits the prophetic book as a form of prophecy in and of itself. Ben Zvi's basic definition of "book" is "a written work that presents itself as a self-contained unit—with a clear beginning and conclusion—and shows a significant degree of textual coherence and distinctiveness" (Ben Zvi 2000a, 1n2 [see also Ben Zvi 2003, 279-80]). He further suggests that "an 'authoritative book' is one that communicates an explicit or implicit claim for social and theological/ideological authoritativeness, and was likely accepted as such by at least some substantial sector of the ancient readership and rereadership" (Ben Zvi 2003, 280). Although Ben Zvi's identifying features—a beginning, an end and a middle that stick together to some degree—may seem somewhat sparse, this is a significant step away from the assumption that the Prophetic Books were relatively haphazard collections with many internal seams and flaws. By positing a beginning-middle-end structure, Ben Zvi suggests a written text that was developed intentionally and skillfully.

These simple structural ties help to indicate a unit in which a reader can hope to find some degree of cohesion. Within this relatively loose macrostructure, Ben Zvi suggests that a prophetic book generally contains sets of readings. These readings may be roughly analogous to traditional literary subunits, and consequently their structures may in some instances be analogous to traditional form-critical genre categories. The fundamental difference is that Ben Zvi views these traditional genre categories not as representative of some earlier, oral social situation, but as intrinsically connected to the greater category of "book." Therefore, "since 'prophetic reading' is the only genre present in the body of a prophetic book, the entire body of the prophetic book is associated primarily with a single setting in life, namely, the reading of prophetic books by those able to read and reread them" (Ben Zvi 2003, 287). Such a text would, as he notes, suggest material of great value to the literate (and likely illiterate) community.

Ben Zvi emphasizes again and again that the prophetic books were "meant to be read, reread, meditated upon, again and again, to be read (and reread) to others who cannot read by themselves, and certainly not to be read once and then discarded" (Ben Zvi 2003, 280n16). This reminder is of vital importance to modern people who may not think about books or literature in these kinds of terms. There were no public libraries or bookstores with coffee shops in ancient Israel or postexilic Judah. It must be emphasized that there is a vast gap between the highly (indeed, almost universally) literate culture of the modern West and the culture in which the prophetic literature was produced. If a book was important enough to record in the manner that the scriptural texts were recorded (as opposed, say, to being written on shards of pottery, as with the Lachish letters), then almost certainly they were important enough to be reread and mused over as Ben Zvi suggests. The written form must be taken seriously indeed.

At least one of the social locations that matter, then, is that of the literate readers for whom the final form of the book presumably was intended. Given Floyd's comments regarding orality and literacy, however, it probably is necessary to also take into account (if possible) audiences to whom the text may have been read (see Neh 8, where Ezra reads from the law to all of the people). And so we see that new form criticism does indeed reconstruct the social milieu of those people who edited and preserved these books. However, this is done in relatively general terms and on the basis of what is usually considered accepted assumptions (e.g., limited literacy in the general population). But, in all of this, we must always remember that just as Gunkel's or Mowinckel's reconstructions of the original, oral, social situation of a given genre were highly theoretical, so also are present social reconstructions decidedly theoretical in nature (Kim, 96). The need for caution and humility in the face of relatively sparse evidence cannot be overemphasized.

But this focus upon the final form of the text, and upon its later reception and the social milieus involved in that process, bring to mind again the question of contextual situation. If all communication must be contextualized, both culturally and situationally, how might one speak of context in the new form criticism? Clearly, the traditional concept of Sitz im Leben, tied so closely as it is to the original, oral communication and to the development of the prophetic tradition, is more or less done away with. What stands in its place depends upon the already noted concept that the Prophetic Books were meant to be read, reread and meditated upon.

Here H. Kim, citing J. Crenshaw, notes that recovering the actual date or historical setting of any of the biblical books is fraught with problems, and in many cases it may be impossible apart from making significant assumptions (Kim, 93n19). Kim suggests that the way forward is R. Melugin's textually created context. Thus, we speak less of a Sitz im Leben and more in terms of "Sitz im Text, Sitz im Buch, Sitz im Literaturi (Literatur), and Sitz im Reder" (Kim, 94). I would add to this Sitz im Kanon or Sitz im Kollektion (e.g., the Latter Prophets, or the Book of the Twelve). Note, for instance, the form-critical concerns that arise when Ben Zvi suggests that the Former Prophets should be read as prophetic and not historical literature (a genre distinction [Floyd 2003, 306-7]). Such a reconceptualization of contextual situation brings to the fore work on allusion and intertextuality in the prophetic literature, work which takes as significant the various points of allusion and intersection between the various components of different corpora of literature within the prophetic corpus (see Sweeney 2005). Additionally, this suggests that the Prophetic Books need not be read in linear fashion, as is our wont in the modern world, but could better be thought of as mosaics and could be read "section by section, and searched for their tapestry-like interconnections" (Floyd 2003, 305).

Of course, one of the dangers of this kind of reading is that it may completely unhinge the text from the historical realities in which it was produced. Again, regardless of how much we wish to think the contrary, language is intimately tied to social situations, and all acts of linguistic communication are tied to some social setting or another. Kim is correct, therefore, to say that "if a text portrays life forward as well as in the present, it also portrays it backward. Otherwise, that text loses its account of history, of the past" (Kim, 95). All of the hermeneutical and historical spheres must be examined, though of course not all need be examined in every instance. Additionally, whichever context an interpreter chooses, that context (both textually and sociohistorically) must be taken into account at all times (Kim, 100).

But whichever context one might choose, when we speak of form criticism in this way—that is, as a text-centered enterprise—what we are exploring is the intersection of genre and form, of category and instance, of abstraction and text (Campbell, 23; Sweeney and Ben Zvi, 9). The search that we undertake is not for an ideal genre category, nor for an underlying situation, but rather for a heuristic tool. Genre is, then, an abstraction based on the content and structure of many individual texts. It is a way of drawing connections between various units in the hope that drawing these connections will help to elucidate the individual units in light of one another.

4. A Form-Critical Exercise: Micah, Old and New.

We turn now to an exercise that should make very clear the extraordinary practical differences between classic and new form criticism and also demonstrate the general characteristics of each endeavor. In what follows I will draw a brief comparison between H. Wolff's and E. Ben Zvi's commentaries on Micah. Both are explicitly form-critical in their approach, but as will become clear, the two methodologies are very different. These commentaries will be compared first with regard to their introductions to Micah as a prophetic work, particularly with regard to questions of genre and setting. Then they will be compared with regard to the ways these two critics analyze a specific passage of prophetic literature, Micah 7:1-7.

Wolff begins his commentary by setting the book within its historical milieu. This includes both the time of the historical prophet Micah (the neo-Assyrian era) and the time of the transmission of Micah's prophetic tradition (the neo-Babylonian era [Wolff, 1]). Wolff is certain that "Micah of Moresheth appeared in the second half of the eighth century," and that "the book contains numerous sayings that stem not from Micah but from a much later period" (Wolff, 1). The career of the prophet himself is discussed at length. Wolff, examining the book's superscription, presents comparative evidence from Kings and other ancient Near Eastern historical texts and discusses the chronology of Israel's eighth-century BC kings, all the while attempting to reconcile various elements of Micah's prophecies with the historical occurrences recorded in his various other sources (Wolff, 2-5). In the end, he assigns some material to Micah himself in the eighth century BC, and some material is assigned to various anonymous additions ranging from the seventh century BC to the postexilic period. "The historical background of all the prophecies contained in the book of Micah comprehends, therefore, a span of time of about 300 years" (Wolff, 5).

After discussing the dates of the various prophecies in Micah, Wolff goes on to examine the life of Micah himself. Wolff suggests where Micah's proclamations took place (both in Moresheth and Jerusalem), and also that Micah likely held a position of authority in Moresheth, perhaps as an elder of some kind (Wolff, 6-7). Wolff also concludes that Micah himself was active as a prophet "between 733 and 722," and that the following passages can be assigned to the prophet: Micah 1:6, 7b-13a, 14-16 (excluding the first word of v. 14); 2:1-4, 6-11; 3:1-4, 5-8, 9-12 (Wolff, 8-9). Wolff thus reconstructs both the work and the general historical milieu of the man Micah and also shows which prophecies are not original to Micah and in what historical milieu those non-Micah oracles best fit.

Compare this procedure to Ben Zvi's point of departure. While agreeing with the general consensus of earlier scholarship (including Wolff's) that much of Micah is from post-586 BC, he has no interest in attempting to determine which prophecies were written in which period (Ben Zvi 2000b, 9). "Contrary to these redaction-critical studies . . . this commentary has its starting point in the book of Micah as it stands, rather than on the putative words of the prophet Micah" (Ben Zvi 2000b, 10). Ben Zvi's setting, then, is neither the eighth century BC nor any point on Wolff's three-hundred-year continuum. Instead, he focuses on the period in which the book of Micah was likely (for Ben Zvi) to have been collected and edited into a literary whole. This is some time in the Persian II period (450-332 BC), and the social situation to which the text is connected is the temple community (Ben Zvi 2000b, 10). The people behind the production of the text are the literate elite of that community, and the book was intended as divine revelation. The genre that Ben Zvi designates is, therefore, that of a prophetic book (Ben Zvi 2000b, 8-9).

In regard to the superscription of the book and the fact that it is ascribed to the prophet Micah, these elements are, for Ben Zvi, tools to help create the text world of the book (Ben Zvi 2000b, 16). It is not that these prophecies originated with Micah himself, nor is it that these prophecies are the work of a school of later disciples who wished to emulate Micah's work. Micah is instead called upon as an authoritative, non-Jerusalemite, voice from the past who can legitimately preach the Jerusalemite theology of the litterati (Ben Zvi 2000b, 22).

Obviously, we are in different worlds when we read these two different methodological approaches, but how are these disparate approaches applied to a particular text? In his examination of Micah 7:1-7 Wolff reads the text very closely in an attempt to determine if these words belong together as an original unit. He suggests that Micah 7:4b is a later addition, tied to Micah 7:11-12 due to the use of "day." He notes that although the admonitions and warnings of Micah 7:2-4a differ from those in Micah 7:5-6, these do constitute an original unit based on fact that in this type of lamentation a combination of different admonitions on a similar theme occurs elsewhere (Jer. 9:1-5; 12:6) (Wolff, 202-3). Thus, form-critical grounds are used to establish the connection between these verses. With regard to setting, Wolff suggests that the speaker is a prophet, though neither Micah nor a contemporary, living in the postexilic community characterized by instability and some degree of social disorder, which would have led to the lack of confidence in neighbors, officials and even family (Wolff, 204). In his discussion about the purpose of the passage Wolff notes the variation from the typical features of such a lament text. Although such texts generally include some kind of announcement of judgment or vindication, here we find only "lament upon lament" with no announcement of punishment (Wolff, 209). So we see that Wolff here compares this specific instantiation of a prophetic lament with a more general, or typical, genre category.

Ben Zvi also suggests that Micah 7:1-7 constitutes a single unit, but for entirely different reasons. This is the case because "the text strongly suggests to its intended readers" that these verses belong together (Ben Zvi 2000b, 166). With respect to setting, Ben Zvi reviews the proposals of previous scholars who suggest that this is a lament for a festival or perhaps an instance where the speaker is the king, but Ben Zvi rejects these proposals because they "clearly deal with issues that stand beyond the limits of what can be known with any reasonable degree of certainty" (Ben Zvi 2000b, 171). Since there is no explicit evidence in the text itself tying it to any given historical setting, Ben Zvi suggests that this is an intentionally dehistoricized text, meant to be reapplied by later reading communities (Ben Zvi 2000b, 171). Apart from this, the only social setting for this passage is the same as the setting for the rest of the readings in Micah (and the rest of the prophetic literature for that matter): the socially and economically elite literati (Ben Zvi 2000b, 172). With regard to genre, Ben Zvi does note that this is a lament of some kind, and that it is also a prophetic "reading" designed to be reread and ruminated upon (Ben Zvi 2000b, 170-71). The readers are meant to identify with the speaker and to ponder the questions of injustice that he raises.

This very brief comparison reveals both the similarities and the dramatic differences that these two versions of form criticism bring to a text. Although both work with essentially the same unit delimitation, come to similar conclusions regarding the history of the text (e.g., postexilic), and even assign a similar genre label to the unit (lament), their approaches to reading are drastically different. Wolff, working on very limited evidence, attempts to recreate both the general historical and social situation of the historical Micah and of the later editors responsible for Micah 7:1-7, all in the hope of providing a sense of the social situation that gave rise to these words. Ben Zvi, because the evidence is very limited, disregards the possibility of recreating the historical background of the book's creation and instead focuses on the reception of the final form by a theoretical community that would have been likely to receive, reread and recopy this text. The differences in setting have a significant impact upon how one might study this passage. On the one hand, we have the words of a prophetic figure spoken against the oppressive powers of his time, lamenting the social disorder that pits son against father; on the other hand, we have a community of socially elite literati (the fat cats themselves, as it were) rereading and transmitting this text to later generations.

5. Conclusion.

While it is clear that some aspects of the form-critical venture have been severely critiqued, and that there are components of the project that perhaps should be abandoned, it does not follow that a sensitive examination of genre and form is of no value in our examination of biblical prophetic literature. What is needed, above all, is that we return to a foundational dependence upon the text itself as our best source of data, and that we practice our analysis of genre categories with care and caution.

Genre categories are best understood neither as ideal structures nor as simple products of social institutions. Instead, genre should be thought of, for the biblical literature, as a general category abstracted from particular instances. Thus, we begin with particular units of prophetic texts, and in comparing these units we abstract common elements and take note of significant differences. In this way, it becomes possible to offer legitimate grounds for comparison that are drawn from the text, while yet taking seriously the fact that the resulting genre categories are abstractions. Then the use and function of a particular structure within a particular unit of text may be examined in light of both the abstracted genre and other instances of similar forms. In addition, we may also analyze the use and function of a particular text and its genre within the book or collection in which it is found, thus comparing the interplay between multiple genres.

Moving forward, this type of analysis can benefit from continued interdisciplinary interaction. By drawing on the insights of discourse analysis, sociolinguistics and various forms of literary criticism, we may hope to be able to use a variety of tools to describe those textual elements from which we might abstract genre characteristics. In all of this, however, we must take note of the many difficulties that surround this type of examination.

The tensions that exist between classic and new form criticism remind us that although questions of genre and form remain helpful (and perhaps necessary) categories, such projects must be strongly constrained by the text as we have it. Of course, as has been noted repeatedly above, context matters in communication. These texts arose in some cultural situation, whether as ecstatic oral pronouncements or as refined religious literature, and all communication is situationally conditioned to some degree. This remains a serious problem not only for the form-critical enterprise, but also for biblical interpretation in general. Despite its checkered past with regard to Sitz im Leben, however, form criticism is still a valuable contextual tool. We certainly should be hesitant and cautious in speaking of specific social and historical settings for which the text offers no direct evidence, but we must remember that the text itself offers us a setting. It is hoped that careful examination of the text, using tools designed for this very purpose, will help to glean information that can further our conversation with the ancient prophetic literature.

Recent critiques and advancements related to form criticism have helped, not to destroy or dismantle the form critical project, but instead to breath fresh life into it. As form critics continue to examine the text carefully and continue to reflect upon how various passages both resemble and differ from one another, form criticism continues to offer a set of tools that can be of great use. Increasing subtlety and methodological diversity have the potential to ensure that form criticism not only survives but also thrives in the discipline of biblical studies.

See also CANONICAL CRITICISM; CONVERSATION ANALYSIS; EDITORIAL/REDACTION CRITICISM; FORMATION OF THE PROPHETIC BOOKS; INTERTEXTUALITY AND INNERBIBLICAL INTERPRETATION; LITERARY APPROACHES; PERFORMANCE CRITICISM; PROPHECY AND SOCIETY; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES; WRITING AND PROPHECY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. E. Ben Zvi, "Introduction: Writings, Speeches, and the Prophetic Books: Setting an Agenda," in Writings and Speech in Israelite and Ancient Near Eastern Prophecy, ed. E. Ben Zvi and M. H. Floyd (SBLSymS 10; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2000a) 1-29; idem, Micah (FOTL 21B; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2000b); idem, "The Prophetic Book: A Key Form of Prophetic Literature," in The Changing Face of Form Criticism for the Twenty-First Century, ed. M. A. Sweeney and E. Ben Zvi (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003) 276-97; E. Blum, "Formgeschichte—A Misleading Category? Some Critical Remarks," in The Changing Face of Form Criticism for the Twenty-First Century, ed. M. A. Sweeney and E. Ben Zvi (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003) 32-45; M. J. Buss, "The Study of Forms," in Old Testament Form Criticism, ed. J. H. Hayes (TUMSR; San Antonio: Trinity University Press, 1974) 1-56; idem, The Changing Shape of Form Criticism: A Relational Approach, ed. N. Stipe (HBM 18; Sheffield: Sheffield Phoenix, 2010); A. F. Campbell, "Form Criticism's Future," in Changing Face of Form Criticism for the Twenty-First Century, ed. M. A. Sweeney and E. Ben Zvi (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003) 15-31; R. C. Culley, "Orality and Writeness in the Prophetic Texts," in Writings and Speech in Israelite and Ancient Near Eastern Prophecy, ed. E. Ben Zvi and M. H. Floyd (SBLSymS 10; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2000) 45-64; F. Deist, "The Prophets: Are We Heading for a Paradigm Shift?" in "The Place Is Too Small for Us": The Israelite Prophets in Recent Scholarship, ed. R. P. Gordon (SBTS 5; Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1995) 582-99; M. H. Floyd, "'Write the Revelation!'" (Hab 2:2): Re-Imagining the Cultural History of Prophecy," in Writings and Speech in Israelite and Ancient Near Eastern Prophecy, ed. E. Ben Zvi and M. H. Floyd (SBLSymS 10; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2000) 103-43; idem, "Basic Trends in the Form-Critical Study of Prophetic Texts," in The Changing Face of Form Criticism for the Twenty-First Century, ed. M. A. Sweeney and

E. Ben Zvi (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003) 298-311; R. P. Gordon, "A Story of Two Paradigm Shifts," in "The Place Is Too Small for Us": The Israelite Prophets in Recent Scholarship, ed. R. P. Gordon (SBTS 5; Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1995) 3-26; H. Gressmann, Der Messias, Forschungen zur Religion und Literatur des Alten und Neuen Testaments, 43. Heft (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1929); H. Gressman, H. Gunkel, M. Haller, H. Schmidt, W. Stärk, and P. Volz, Die Schriften des Alten Testaments in Auswahl, 7 vols. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1910); H. Gunkel, The Legends of Genesis, trans. W. H. Carruth (Chicago: Open Court Publishing, 1901); idem, The Psalms: A Form-Critical Introduction, trans. T. Horner (FBBS 19; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1967); idem, "The Israelite Prophecy from the Time of Amos," in Twentieth Century Theology in the Making, 1: Themes of Biblical Theology, ed. J. Pelikan (London: Fontana, 1969) 48-75; idem, "Israelite Literary History," in Water for a Thirsty Land: Israelite Literature and Religion, ed. K. C. Hanson (FCBS; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2001) 31-41; H. C. P. Kim, "Form Criticism in Dialogue with Other Criticisms: Building the Multidimensional Structures of Texts and Concepts," in The Changing Face of Form Criticism for the Twenty-First Century, ed. M. A. Sweeney and E. Ben Zvi (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003) 85-104; R. Knierim, "Old Testament Form Criticism Reconsidered," Int 27 (1973) 435-68; K. Koch, The Growth of the Biblical Tradition: The Form-Critical Method (New York: Macmillan, 1988); L. Köhler, Kleine Lichten: 50 Bibelstellen Erklärt, Zwingli-Bücherei, 47 (Zürich: Zwingli-Verlag, 1944); J. Lindblom, Die literarische Gattung der prophetischen Literatur: Eine literargeschichtliche Untersuchung zum Alten Testament (UUA 1; Uppsala: A.-b. Lundequistska Bokhandeln, 1924); T. Longman III, "Israelite Genres in Their Ancient Near Eastern Context," in The Changing Face of Form Criticism for the Twenty-First Century, ed. M. Sweeney and E. Ben Zvi (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003) 177-95; W. E. March, "Prophecy," in Old Testament Form Criticism, ed. J. Hayes (TUMSR; San Antonio: Trinity University Press, 1974) 141-77; S. Mowinckel, The Psalms in Israel's Worship, trans. D. R. Ap-Thomas (2 vols; New York: Abingdon, 1962); idem, The Spirit and the Word: Prophecy and Tradition in Ancient Israel, ed. K. C. Hanson (FCBS; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2002); J. Muilenburg, "Form Criticism and Beyond," JBL 88 (1969) 1-18. M. Nissinen, ed., Prophecy in Its Ancient Near Eastern Context: Mesopotamian, Biblical, and Arabian Perspectives (SBLSymS 13; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2000); W. J. Ong, Orality and Literacy: The Technologizing of the Word (London: Routledge, 1991); T. Raftt, "The Prophetic Summons to Repentance," ZAW 83 (1971) 30-49; M. A. Sweeney, Isaiah 1-39: With an Introduction to Prophetic Literature (FOTL 16; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1996); idem, Form and Intertextuality in Prophetic and Apocalyptic Literature (FAT 45; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2005); M. A. Sweeney and E. Ben Zvi, eds., The Changing Face of Form Criticism for the Twenty-First Century (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003); G. M. Tucker, Form Criticism of the Old Testament (GBS; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971); K. van der Toorn, Scribal Culture and the Making of the Hebrew Bible (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2007); C. Westermann, Basic Forms of Prophetic Speech, trans. H. White (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1991); W. Zimmerli, The Fiery Throne: The Prophets and Old Testament Theology, ed. K. C. Hanson (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2003).

C. M. Toffelmire

FORMATION OF THE PROPHETIC BOOKS

It is an axiom of most scholarship on the Prophetic Books that they are composite, that they are the product of a complex, often lengthy, process of development. Rather than being written out from scratch by a single hand, most of these books were "made," incorporating sources, sometimes rearranging these or commenting upon them to serve a fresh role in their new literary contexts. Thus, we can speak of the "formation" of prophetic literature. The importance of this topic issues from two distinct but related lines of inquiry: reconstructing the original words of the prophets behind these books and, alternatively, probing the rationale of the final form of this literature.

1. Evidence
2. Methodological Considerations
3. The Formation of a Prophetic Book
4. The Formation of the Prophetic Corpus
5. Implications

1. Evidence.

How do scholars know that the prophetic books of the OT were made and not merely written in the sense just mentioned? The composite nature of these works is strongly suggested by two types of evidence.

1.1. Empirical Evidence. The composite nature of the prophetic books is suggested by what has been called “empirical evidence” (Carr 37-101; Tigay). We have “texts whose evolution can be documented by copies from several stages in the course of their development” (Tigay, xi). In certain cases, therefore, the earlier source (or a copy of it) has been preserved alongside the later text that incorporated it, the one depending literarily on the other. Instances of such empirical evidence have come to us from the cuneiform literature of ancient Mesopotamia (second millennium BC) and the *Dead Sea Scrolls (Second Temple period). Significantly, these two bodies of evidence frame the period within which the Prophetic Books were produced. Not surprisingly, therefore, the Bible itself preserves such evidence. Chronicles, a long recognized example of this phenomenon, rewrites its source (Genesis through 2 Kings), omitting, rearranging and adding material to create a new work with its own aims and strategies. Both the source and the rewriting have come down to us in the record.

But do we have any empirical evidence relating to the Prophetic Books themselves, evidence demonstrating that they were made in this fashion, that ultimately they are the product of many hands? A positive answer emerges from two well-known examples.

1.1.1. Jeremiah LXX/MT. The book of *Jeremiah is preserved in two different versions, the first reflected in the Masoretic Text (Jeremiah MT), and the second in the Greek translation (Jeremiah LXX). Some have regarded the differences between these two versions as the work of the Greek translator, but most would now trace the majority of these differences back to the Hebrew text used by the translator (Tov, 363-84). Supporting this are two Hebrew manuscripts of Jeremiah discovered at Qumran (4Q71; 4Q72a) that agree at several points (though not in every detail) with Jeremiah LXX against Jeremiah MT.

Many see the shorter text underlying the LXX and preserved in 4Q71 and 4Q72a as the earlier of the two versions, the other being the longer form reflected in the MT. This in turn has enabled scholars to describe an added layer of material in version II, a layer reflected in the MT but not in the LXX. Some of these additions seem rather mundane, but others appear strategic. For example, Jeremiah MT 25:14; 27:7 are postexilic additions dealing with the punishment of Babylon after seventy years (Tov, 382-83), an issue of interpretation surfacing in several other texts related to this period (2 Chron 36; Ezra 1; Dan 9). Another such addition, likely related to the two just mentioned, is Jeremiah MT 33:14-26, a passage promising the return of Davidic rule (“a righteous branch”) and a firm covenant. This addition draws from other passages in Jeremiah, combining Jeremiah 23:5-6, the promise of a true branch for David’s line, with Jeremiah 29:10, the promise of return from *exile at the end of Babylon’s seventy years (Schmid, 207-21). Whatever the meaning of these additions, they underscore that the two versions of Jeremiah present us with empirical evidence for the composite nature of a prophetic book.

1.1.2. Isaiah 36—39 and 2 Kings 18:13—20:19. The same may be said for Isaiah 36—39 and its parallel account in 2 Kings 18:13—20:19. Apart from a few differences, the two accounts are nearly identical, so that one likely depends on the other, one being the source and the other the borrower. For good reason, most scholars regard the 2 Kings version as the earlier of the two, the source borrowed into Isaiah 36—39 (Williamson 1994, 189-211). In this case, not only was an earlier source borrowed into Isaiah, but also it was modified in the process. To this narrative was added a psalm of Hezekiah (Is 38:9-20), which ends by expressing the hope for a return to the “house of the LORD.” In connection with this hope, the “sign” given Hezekiah in 2 Kings 20:5-11 has been split in two by the Isaiah editor (Is 38:5-8, 21-22), who placed that aspect of the sign concerning the “house of the LORD” just after the reference to this at the end of the newly introduced psalm (Stromberg 2011b, 205-22). The point is that we have a copy both of the source (2 Kings 18:13—20:19) and of its reworking into Isaiah (Is 36—39). Once again, then, we have empirical evidence suggesting that the Prophetic Books were made and not simply written, that they are composite texts incorporating sources, the products of multiple hands. If this is correct, then (even without the help of such empirical evidence) we can reasonably expect to find signs within the Prophetic Books that they were in fact made in this manner, which leads into the next point.

1.2. Inferential Evidence. The other line of evidence suggesting that the Prophetic Books had a complex history of formation may be called “inferential evidence.” In this category, we do not have copies of the source text to compare with the borrowing text. Rather, through a process of “informed speculation,” the composite nature of the books can be inferred from the features of the texts themselves, features explained most simply by appeal to editing of sources.

Since several examples of this type of evidence are given later (see 2 below), only one instance will be mentioned here. Jeremiah 36 narrates an incident in which Jeremiah tells his scribe to write what he dictates to him on a scroll. The scroll, a warning to the people of Judah, is then read publically, but ultimately it is destroyed. In response, Jeremiah gives another scroll to his scribe, who proceeds to write “all the words of the book that King Jehoiakim of Judah had burned in the fire; and many words similar to them were added” (Jer 36:32). Thus, the narrative tells of two stages in the scroll’s development: there was an earlier, shorter version of it and also a later, longer one. Since the scroll itself is an element within the narrative looking back on the incident, the scroll and the book of Jeremiah (which contains the narrative) would have to be two separate documents. If we accept, as many have done, that some form of this scroll ultimately found its way into the book of Jeremiah (or at least that the book would have us think that it did), then it stands to reason that here the book presents itself as the product of multiple stages of literary activity, which is true even if the narrative itself is a complete fiction, a position rejected by Reimer (Reimer, 209-16). Identifying the historical level at which this claim applies is not without difficulty, but there is no reason to reject this aspect of the book’s own self-presentation: it developed over time, incorporating at least one source itself expanded.

Probable though it is, this conclusion must be inferred entirely from the book’s present form, so that it presents a line of evidence quite different from the empirical sort discussed above. Baruch’s first scroll was totally destroyed, leaving nothing to posterity. Inferential evidence such as this remains by far the largest body of evidence that we possess for the composite nature of the Prophetic Books. Almost all copies of the sources used to make these books have been lost to history.

2. Methodological Considerations.

If for the most part all we have is evidence of the inferential sort, this raises an obvious question: how can one get at the formation of these books if all we have is the end product of this process—their present, final forms? By what means can scholars perceive depth in a text and then reconstruct a history of its development? Important here are the observations made in “redaction criticism”—that is, the study of how texts were edited in ancient Israel (see Editorial/Redaction Criticism). Here only some of the most important points are presented.

2.1. A Single Book or Passage with Historically Dissimilar Material. A single book may contain material whose assumed historical background differs from one passage to the next such that a single author could not have composed the whole from scratch. In this case, the historical background assumed by a passage may help distinguish it from another passage in the same book. One of the best-known examples of this comes from the book of Isaiah (Stromberg 2011a, 1-54). Some material in Isaiah 1–39 assumes an earlier period before the exile, during the ministry of the prophet Isaiah when Assyria ruled. At the same time, however, Isaiah 40–66 assumes that the Babylonian exile had taken place. Note, for example, Isaiah 64:11-12, which is not prediction or even prophecy but rather is lament—lament leading to supplication for restoration after Babylonian invasion, when the temple was destroyed (“Our holy and beautiful house . . . has been burned with fire”). Consider also Isaiah 48:20, where the people are told, “Come out of Babylon, flee from the Chaldeans.” This is an imperative not a prediction, an imperative that makes sense only if spoken to a people already in exile in Babylon. Such passages, to which others could easily be added, show that the latter half of Isaiah presumes rather than predicts a postdestruction setting, making Isaiah the prophet a very unlikely author for these texts. Observations like these allow scholars to distinguish the material in terms of authorship, while enabling them to discern which of it was written earlier and which of it later.

2.2. Rough Edges in the Text. Because many biblical books (including the prophets) were not composed from scratch, but rather used preexisting sources, their literary character often includes rough edges. Many of the Prophetic Books are like a patchwork quilt, made of different pieces. Where these different pieces join, one often finds a rough edge, a disjuncture in the text better explained as the result of editing preexisting material than as wholly new composition. Scholars differ in their judgments as to what constitutes a disjuncture, and whether or not any one particular rough edge points to a composite feature of the text; but such edges exist, and the Hebrew text of the Prophetic Books abounds with them.

Take, for example, the opening verses of Ezekiel (Ezek 1:1-4), which, beginning with the first person in verse 1, shift abruptly to the third person in verses 2-3, and then without warning move back to the first person in verse 4. Also, “by the river Chebar” in verse 3 is slightly redundant, since this location is already given in verse 1. Thus, verses 2-3 usually are explained as an addition (Zimmerli, 100-101). Indeed, removing verses 2-3 produces a seamless text: “I saw visions of God . . . and I looked, and behold, a storm wind.” Part of the purpose of this addition was to locate the date in verse 1 (“the fifth day of the month”) in the time of Jehoiachin’s exile, employing a form of title found elsewhere (e.g., Hag 1:1). Such disjunctures are often easiest to explain by positing the work of an editor, and attention to these throughout a book can yield insight into the editor’s larger aims.

2.3. Differences in Style, Language or Theological Outlook. In conjunction with these first two points, one often finds differences in style, language or outlook. In the Gog oracles of Ezekiel 38—39, for example, W. A. Tooman notes several stylistic differences between this section and the rest of the book (Tooman, 65-72). While occasionally it is possible to explain such differences in terms of the strategy of a single author, this is not always the case; sometimes they do not appear to serve any particular function. When this is so, attention to editorial features of the text can often explain the shift. Thus, Tooman observes two discontinuities between Ezekiel 38—39 and the book: (1) the Gog oracles depict the restoration community in a manner “which does not correspond with its description in 33.1-37.28,” for example, by dividing the restoration into two periods; (2) the Gog oracles interrupt the connection between “the summary of restoration in 37.24-28 and its visionary depiction in chapters 40-48,” a connection suggested by the fact that temple rebuilding is mentioned only in these two passages in the book (Tooman, 72-84). In the light of these discontinuities as well as the change in style, Tooman argues that the Gog oracles are a late insertion into the book, and he shows that these oracles have borrowed locutions from other biblical books (notably the Torah and the Prophets), being built up like a scriptural mosaic.

2.4. Fortschreibung. One feature of book formation in ancient Israel receiving renewed attention is known in German scholarship as Fortschreibung. Here a scribe or editor writes up new material in light of, and onto, the preexisting sources being used. This technique seems to have been especially important in the editing of the Prophetic Books (Kratz, 37-39). R. G. Kratz identifies at least three contexts from which such additions draw and for which they present themselves as guides to reading. (1) They can draw from the larger context of a book to which they are added (e.g. Jer MT 33:14-26 [see 1.1.1 above]). (2) Orienting themselves toward a whole book, these additions can also draw on a larger literary corpus outside that book, both to situate the book within that corpus and to supplement that larger literary context (e.g. Ezek 38—39 [see 2.3 above]). (3) Other such additions can draw from a narrow context but be oriented toward a larger strategy in the book.

Such is the case with Isaiah 7:15, which scholars have long argued is an addition reformulating the announcement of Immanuel’s birth. Birth announcements in the OT are highly regular, in that where the explanation of the child’s name is signaled by the conjunction kî (“because”), the explanation follows immediately after the announcement of his birth (so Is 8:3-4). In the case of Isaiah 7:14-17, the comment in Isaiah 7:15 breaks the pattern found everywhere else, so that it looks secondary to the original form of the sign. Strengthening this, Isaiah 7:15 appears to be a piece of Fortschreibung, composed by drawing on Isaiah 7:16 and Isaiah 7:22.

“For, before the lad knows to reject the bad and choose the good, the land whose two kings you dread will be forsaken" (Is 7:16).

"For, everyone left in the midst of the land will eat curds and honey" (Is 7:22b).

The italic material in these verses is drawn together in Isaiah 7:15.

"Curds and honey he will eat until he knows to reject the bad and choose the good" (Is 7:15).

Apart from slightly different syntax in "to know" (probably necessitated by the joining of these two "pieces"), Isaiah 7:15 does not actually contain any new words. Thus, it is a model example of Fortschreibung that draws on its immediate context. Even so, this bit of editing should not be viewed narrowly. The same editor probably was at work in Isaiah 36–39, which shows many connections to Isaiah 7 and was also edited with respect to a "sign" given the king. All of this likely formed part of a larger strategy seeking to affirm the Davidic promise after exile (Stromberg 2011a, 107-27; 2011b, 205-28).

Paradoxically, such redaction aimed at the reader also reflects the earliest reception of the prophets, being explanation of the sources by the redactor. The broader methodological point here, however, is that by studying such allusions (or textual dependencies) scholars are able to gain further leverage on which texts came first and which came later in the process of formation.

2.5. The Cumulative Argument. The last principle to be mentioned is probably the most important: the cumulative nature of arguments about the formation of a passage or book in the prophetic literature. Although it probably is always possible to find an alternative explanation for any one of the features listed above when that feature stands alone, such an explanation becomes increasingly improbable the more such features appear in a single passage, as is the case with the examples mentioned above. When several of these features appear, a cumulative case begins to emerge wherein each adds weight to the other, so that an editorial explanation becomes the most plausible one.

3. The Formation of a Prophetic Book.

What were the motives behind and stages in the formation of a prophetic book? We can expect that each book will have had a unique history, but still there are lines of continuity to be drawn that help sketch a general picture of this process.

3.1. Motives. Before looking at the possible stages in the formation of a prophetic book, we should first consider the motives or impulses behind its production. Why, once the words of a prophet were written down, were these then made into a book receiving so much attention by the author(s) and editor(s) involved? What motivated these bookmakers?

A variety of motives are ascribed to these individuals (Childs; Clements, 217-29; Kratz, 32-48), but two features present themselves fairly consistently to the careful reader of these texts: (1) the editors of these books regarded the words that they had inherited as inspired and authoritative; (2) it was precisely this which motivated them to seek to enable that word (through editing) to speak in a new literary context and to new situations to which (it was presumed) it did speak (Stromberg 2011a, 84). Indeed, such a motive was anticipated by those first responsible for putting the prophets' words into writing, preserving these words for posterity seeing them as inspired. For example, Isaiah 8:16-18 and Isaiah 30:8-9 tie preserving the prophetic word with an anticipation of its future divine fulfillment (Kratz, 42, 45-46; Williamson 2000, 293-99). The importance for this process of putting the prophet's words in written form in the first place can scarcely be overemphasized. The prophetic word, once written, was able to become the object of studied reflection and in its new material form was able to live on beyond the prophet's own day, speaking to the circumstances of subsequent generations.

3.2. The Prophet's Message. Before the prophetic book there was the prophetic message. Any evaluation of the formation of this literature is bound to be guided by some notion of what was said by the actual prophet whose name the book bears. The problem of reconstructing the prophet's message arises above all else in connection with prophecies of *salvation and judgment, both of which are now found side by side in the Prophetic Books.

In reconstructing the preaching of the prophets, scholars have proposed different models for relating these contrasting prophecies (Köckert, Becker and Barthel; Kratz, 32-48). At least four views are presented on the matter. (1) The prophets preached both destruction and salvation, the tension between the two arising either from different audiences addressed or from development in the prophets' thinking. (2) The prophets exhorted their audiences to *repentance, announcements of judgment scaring them into this posture, and words of salvation coaxing them into it. (3) The prophets preached inevitable judgment, the words of salvation only referring to wasted chances at restoration or being altogether secondary. (4) The prophets originally preached hope and salvation, as may be suggested by (in some cases) their close ties to the royal court. In this view, the prophecies of judgment are secondary.

The prophetic message also had a form. Many have argued their message was first and foremost oral, being short and poetic (Clements, 218-19). While this may have been the case for certain prophets in certain periods, the prophetic corpus preserves material generated over hundreds of years, over which time the content and the form of prophetic preaching were likely to have changed. Some prophecy may have focused on writing from the start (e.g., Ezekiel), some of it perhaps being purely literary with little or no connection to the message of a prophetic figure (e.g., Jonah, Malachi).

When decisions about a prophet's preaching are made the starting point in tracing the formation of a prophetic book, they inevitably determine the outcome. An alternative to this approach begins with the present form of the literature and works backwards to a conclusion. In practice, however, most scholars have oscillated between these two approaches.

3.3. From Prophet to Text. The messages of the prophets eventually were put into written form, some of them no doubt being written from the beginning (see Writing and Prophecy). This stage presented an opportunity to shape the prophetic message (Kratz, 39-46). Some recent work on this, looking at Assyrian prophetic texts in particular, argues against the long-held critical consensus that the prophets' message was primarily one of judgment. Noting that what a prophet said was bound up with what a prophet was, M. J. de Jong, for example, has made the case that the prophets functioned as servants of the state, of which they were, as a consequence, always supportive. It follows, then, that all of the prophetic material announcing irrevocable judgment on the state must be secondary to the actual message preached by the prophets. Judgment entered their message when their words first received written form, judgment being read retrospectively into the earlier oracles in the light of the downfall of Israel and Judah to the Assyrians and Babylonians respectively. It remains to be seen whether such an argument persuades. The Assyrian prophecies are hardly representative of the whole phenomenon of prophecy in the ancient Near East; moreover, there is a closer analogue (the Deir 'Alla text) that points in the opposite direction (Blum). Also, it needs to be asked whether such a view can do justice to the literary history of the Prophetic Books themselves, first-order evidence that must be dealt with in its own right.

3.4. From Text to Book. Once the prophetic message took on written form, it then was made into a book, a process that employed several editorial techniques: (1) compilation, whereby the separate oracles were gathered into a collection; (2) Fortschreibung, whereby new material was written in light of and onto the old (see 2.4 above); (3) juxtaposition, whereby the separate oracles sometimes were juxtaposed with each other in an effort to provide an interpretive context (as T. S. Hadjiev has argued for Amos 3:12; 9:9-10); (4) the order of preexisting material sometimes was rearranged, as with the oracles against the nations in Jeremiah that are found in the middle of the book in the LXX but at its end in the MT (Tov, 362n1). The result, at least for the Major Prophets, was a broad compositional design, summarized by some scholars in the following sequence: oracles against Israel/Judah, oracles against the nations, hope for Israel/Judah (so Isaiah, Jeremiah LXX, Ezekiel). It is everywhere evident that such editorial work aimed at producing strategies to guide the reader through the material.

The editors employing such techniques had at their disposal at least two methods for introducing their changes. They could write their addition into the margin of the scrolls (cf. IQIs^a XXXVIII, 21-22), or they could put the changes directly into the text when recopying the scroll (Stromberg 2011b, 143-45). At some point, major editorial work on these books ceased, and they were regarded as more or less complete. Once this occurred, the Prophetic Books entered a phase that scholars have called “transmission,” wherein efforts were focused on preserving the scroll and faithfully recopying it, though even here sometimes additions of various sorts could be made (Stromberg 2011a, 99-102). The upshot of all of this is that some features of these texts owe their existence to source, others to strategy, and still others to transmission.

4. The Formation of the Prophetic Corpus.

The formation of the prophetic corpus was inseparable from the making of the books themselves, and, after a certain point, vice versa. Moreover, this formative process did not take place within a vacuum, but rather in the midst of, and as a force behind, Israel’s history.

4.1. Historical Moments in the Formation of the Prophetic Corpus. With caution, we can pinpoint decisive moments in Israel’s history that shaped the prophetic corpus, producing broad patterns throughout the whole. R. E. Clements describes three key moments in the process that produced the prophetic canon, outlining its effect on “prophetic eschatology” (Clements, 191-202).

First, when the northern kingdom of Israel fell to the Assyrians (722 BC), there arose a period of hope centered on Judah, a possible example being Hosea 3:5: “in the last days” the children of Israel “will seek the LORD their God and David their king.”

Second, when the southern kingdom of Judah fell to the Babylonians (587 BC), there arose among the prophets a great voice of hope, leading to a reshaping and reinterpretation of the whole collection of antecedent prophecy. Thus, Hosea 3:5 will have been re-read in the light of the destruction of Jerusalem as referring to an even further distant future. This destruction probably also led to the exilic prophecies of restoration in Isaiah 40—55 becoming the lens through which were read the preexilic prophecies of Isaiah 1—39 (Williamson 1994). This whole process arose out of Babylonian destruction, according to Clements, and gave the prophetic corpus a pattern of judgment followed by hope, hope for return to and restoration in the land.

Finally, of great significance to this process was the reestablishment of political and religious life in Jerusalem under Persian rule (539 BC). The actual “restoration” under the Persians fell far short of the expectations set by that great voice of hope that arose after Babylonian destruction. This caused those responsible for the prophetic literature in this period to look to a more remote and transcendent future for fulfillment, a process clearly evident in, for example, the postexilic Isaiah 56—66 (Stromberg 2011b, 12-13, 74-141).

For Clements, the reinterpretation of older oracles that these events inspired took place within the formation of a canonical corpus of prophecy, a corpus that encouraged the development of a unifying frame of reference by which each of the Prophetic Books was affected. Thus, the formation of the books intersected with the formation of the prophetic canon, an important ingredient of which was the interpretive and editorial search for restoration (see Williamson 2000).

4.2. Collection and Composition. At some point the individual prophetic books were read together and in connection with this collected together into a prophetic corpus. Clements’s essay raises an important question regarding this process: to what extent was composition a part of the process of collecting the individual prophetic books together?

This question can be illuminated by the Minor Prophets. Many now regard this collection as a book rather than a mere anthology, calling it the “Book of the Twelve.” Not denying that this is a collection of more or less twelve books, they note that the earliest references to it indicate that it was written on a single scroll and regarded as a unity (e.g., Sir 49:10; Acts 7:42). They also note evidence suggesting that these books were intentionally arranged with respect to one another, via the repetition of certain phrases, for example (e.g., Joel 3:16 // Amos 1:2). This line of research has now reached the point where several scholars have argued that the formation of this collection entailed editorial additions seeking to bind the whole together (Wöhrle). If so, this would be a clear instance where composition belonged to the process of collecting individual prophetic books together.

Is there any evidence, however, that such a process lay behind the prophetic collection as a whole? Again, the Book of the *Twelve may suggest an answer. Scholars draw attention to the last few verses of Malachi, which come at the end of the Twelve and therefore at the end of the Prophets as a whole in the traditional Hebrew canon. These verses (Mal 4:4-6 [MT 3:22-24]) seem to be an editorial expansion corresponding to a similar addition at the end of the Pentateuch (Deut 34). Thus, just as the whole Pentateuch has been given a conclusion in Deuteronomy 34, so has the whole prophetic collection in Malachi 4:4-6. Supporting this conclusion, scholars observe a parallel set of additions at the beginning of Joshua and in Psalm 1 (Josh 1:8; Ps 1:2-3). Together, these expansions focus on the importance of the tôrâ ("instruction") of Moses and the return of prophecy. From this there emerges a redactional line across the whole of Scripture in whatever form it had at the time (see those cited in Wöhrle, 421-27).

In a striking manner, this redactional pattern aligns itself with the ordering of the OT books in the traditional Hebrew *canon (the Tanak: Torah [Pentateuch], Nebiim [Prophets], Ketubim [Writings]) (see table 1).

Torah	Nebiim	Ketubim
Deut 34	Josh 1:8 Mal 3:22-24	Ps 1:2-3

Table 1. Redactional Pattern of Hebrew

This, however, should not necessarily be taken to imply that the creation of the one coincided in time with that of the other; the Tanak may simply be a later reflection of the conception underlying this redaction, though one cannot rule out an early tripartite scriptural collection (note, e.g., Luke 24:44 and the prologue to Sirach [see Barrera]). However this is resolved, there is a great deal to be said for the probability of the redactional layer uncovered, and this view seems to be gaining ground in the debate. If this is correct, Malachi 4:4-6 presents us with evidence that the process of collecting the whole of the prophetic corpus entailed composition, composition oriented toward that collection, framing it in terms of eschatological expectation (cf. Clements above). This editorial work (if it is such) will have been undertaken in a period with changing notions about what a prophet was (Barton), so that, for example, Daniel (quite different from the other books and in fact excluded from the "prophets" in the Hebrew canon) was nevertheless eventually thought of as such.

5. Implications.

Two implications for the study of the Prophetic Books follow from this survey. First, if the prophetic literature had such a complex history of development, then it is no simple task to reconstruct the prophetic figures that stand behind these books. Second, much more attention needs to be given to how these books were to be read in the first place. Recent research in this area has undergone something of a sea change in how it regards the process driving the formation of this literature and, as a result, the final forms of the books that it produced (Kratz, 32-48; Stromberg 2011a, 55-94). Past scholarship tended to view these texts as the result of a series of unrelated, almost haphazard, additions, so that the books themselves received their present forms more by chance than intention. Scholars are now beginning to recognize the extent to which this process was highly deliberate, giving the prophetic literature shape and strategy, often embedded at the level of the whole book. Thus, these books, though composite, have literary strategies not discoverable by looking at the original isolated sayings of the prophets in their respective historical contexts.

See also EDITORIAL/REDACTION CRITICISM; FORM CRITICISM; INTERTEXTUALITY AND IN-TERBIBLICAL INTERPRETATION; PROPHECY AND TRADITION; WRITING AND PROPHECY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. T. Barrera, "Origins of a Tripartite Old Testament Canon," in The Canon Debate, ed. L. M. McDonald and J. A. Sanders (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2002) 128-45; J. Barton, Oracles of God: Perceptions of Ancient Prophecy in Israel after the Exile (New York: Oxford University Press, 1986); E. Blum, "Israels Prophetie im altorientalischen Kontext: Anmerkungen zu neueren religionsgeschichtlichen Thesen," in "From Ebla to Stellenbosch": Syro-Palestinian Religions and the Hebrew Bible, ed. I. Cornelius and L. Jonker (ADPV 37; Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 2008) 81-115; D. Carr, The Formation of the Hebrew Bible (New York: Oxford University Press, 2011); B. S. Childs, "Retrospective Reading of the Old Testament Prophets," ZAW 108 (1996) 362-77; R. E. Clements, Old Testament Prophecy: From Oracles to Canon (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1996); M. J. de Jong, "Biblical Prophecy—A Scribal Enterprise. The Old Testament Prophecy of Unconditional Judgement Considered as a Literary Phenomenon," VT 61 (2011) 39-70; T. S. Hadjiev, "The Context as Means of Redactional Reinterpretation in the Book of Amos," JTS 59 (2008) 655-68; M. Köckert, U. Becker and J. Barthel, "Das Problem des historischen Jesaja," in Proph- tie in Israel: Beiträge des Symposium "Das Alte Testament und die Kultur der Moderne" anlässlich des 100. Geburtstags Gerhard von Rads (1901-1971), Heidelberg, 18.-21. Oktober 2001, ed. I. Fischer, K. Schmid and H. G. M. Williamson (ATM 11; Münster: LIT Verlag, 2003) 105-36; R. G. Kratz, Prophetenstudien: Kleine Schriften II (FAT 74; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2011); D. J. Reimer, "Jeremiah Before the Exile?" in In Search of Pre-exilic Israel: Proceedings of the Oxford Old Testament Seminar, ed. J. Day (JSOTSup 406; London: T & T Clark International, 2004) 207-24; K. Schmid, Schriftgelehrte Traditionsliteratur: Fallstudien zur innerbiblischen Schriftauslegung im Alten Testament (FAT 77; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2011); J. Stromberg, An Introduction to the Study of Isaiah (London: T & T Clark, 2011a); idem, Isaiah after Exile: The Author of Third Isaiah as Reader and Redactor of the Book (OTM; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2011b); J. H. Tigay, ed., Empirical Models for Biblical Criticism (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1985);

W. A. Tooman, Gog of Magog: Reuse of Scripture and Compositional Technique in Ezekiel 38-39 (FAT 2/52; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2011); E. Tov, The Greek and Hebrew Bible: Collected Essays on the Septuagint (VTSup 72; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1999); H. G. M. Williamson, The Book Called Isaiah: Deutero-Isaiah's Role in Composition and Redaction (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1994); idem, "Hope under Judgement: The Prophets of the Eighth Century BCE," EvQ 72 (2000) 291-306; J. Wöhrle, Der Abschluss des Zwölfprophetenbuchs: Buchübergreifende Redaktionsprozesse in den späten Sammlungen (BZAW 389; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2008); W. Zimmerli, Ezekiel 1: A Commentary on the Book of Ezekiel, Chapters 1-24, trans. R. E. Clements, ed. F. M. Cross and K. Baltzer (Hermeneia; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979).

J. Stromberg

FOUR EMPIRES. See DANIEL: BOOK OF.

FUTURE. See ESCHATOLOGY.

G

GOD

It has been asserted that God is the “center” of OT theology. If it is true of the OT as a whole, it is especially true in the prophets. Here he is not only the primary character; he is also the primary speaker, with much of the material said to have been received in verbal form directly from him. He is the one who calls Israel to account, begging, pleading, cajoling, thundering, cursing and judging. He intrudes into the historical experience of the people at every level, refusing to let them escape from him in the easy practice of ritual or in the syncretism that was always so attractive. As such, he reveals himself to Israel in a variety of roles, which we will explore below.

1. Overview
2. Revealer
3. Creator
4. The Only God
5. Lord of History
6. Sovereign King
7. Covenant Partner
8. Father
9. Shepherd
10. Judge
11. Deliverer/Redeemer

1. Overview.

Much of the revelation of God in the prophets is shaped on the anvil of the geopolitical issues confronting the prophets during the period when the prophetic literature was first spoken and written. While it is true that from the biblical perspective prophetic ministry spanned the entire period of Israel’s experience from Abraham to Malachi, the recorded prophetic literature covers a much shorter time span, from about 775 BC to about 425 BC (both dates being subject to decisions about the dating of the book of Joel [some wish to date the completion of the book of Daniel to 167 BC]). During that period Israel and Judah were confronted with a succession of three different “world” empires: Assyria, Babylon and Persia (see Israelite History). Thus, most of the prophetic utterances were made against that backdrop. In particular, these utterances addressed the question of interpreting that historical situation. What did the rise of these great powers mean for Israel’s understanding of Yahweh? If Israel and Judah were conquered, did this mean that Yahweh had failed them? If not, why would he have allowed or, worse yet, caused these conquests to occur, given the favored status with Yahweh that Jacob’s descendants supposedly enjoyed?

Readers of the prophetic literature, whether first-time or frequent, often share the same reaction, that the picture of Yahweh here is so negative. In fact, the widely held opinion that the God of the NT is not the same God as the one found in the OT is largely based on conclusions drawn from a reading of the prophetic books. To be sure, the reaction is not without basis. As A. Heschel famously observed a half-century ago, Yahweh is a God of pathos. He cares deeply about his people; he is jealous for them. He is neither Plato’s “The Good” nor Aristotle’s “Unmoved Mover.” He is overjoyed when his creatures find their true potential in a wholehearted loving relationship with him, doing what they were made to do, and he is furious when they prostitute themselves in relationships that are self-serving and ultimately destructive. Two factors dictate that there will be more of the latter divine response than the former in the Prophetic Books. The first is that humans are predisposed to self-destruction. This is first described as early as Genesis 6:5. We are not neutral in regard to God; we are inclined away from him. This predisposition to serve self rather than God (in spite of a sworn covenant) was coming to its climax in Israel and Judah during the period when the prophets were writing. Yahweh could not be neutral about the patterns into which his bride was settling.

The second factor is the historic setting of international *warfare and conquest during which the prophets spoke and wrote. Destruction, bloodshed and oppression were the norms. How was this to be interpreted? Were these conditions something that existed in spite of the wishes of a mild and essentially helpless heavenly observer? Or did he directly cause them as expressions of an essentially vindictive and vengeful character? Or did he use *sinful human behaviors to accomplish what he intended to be curative outcomes? The latter is the interpretation that the prophets were inspired to give. But even here we do not see an uninvolved practitioner administering certain palliatives. Hardly! God sees his beloved unconcernedly throwing herself into an abyss, and although he intends to use that experience for ultimate redemption, he can in no way forgo his horror and fury that she would do this to herself and to him.

But this description of God in the Prophetic Books highlights an important point. These books are not intended to be read in isolation from the rest of the canon. The God of the prophets is also “the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of compassion and the God of all comfort” as the apostle Paul styles him (2 Cor 1:3). This is precisely the point that the church fathers were seeking to make when they refused to give up the thirty-nine books of the OT. The NT perspective of Yahweh is part of a larger revelation, functioning as a corrective and a redressing of the balances. But in the same way, the prophetic picture corrects the sentimental understanding of God that can emerge from reading the NT alone. The thundering judge in the Prophetic Books is at the same time the beckoning savior in the NT. Both of these aspects must be held in tension if we are to have a correct understanding of the biblical God.

At the same time, it should not be thought that the NT perspective is an alien one somehow imposed as a corrective on a resistant OT. It is precisely because God loves not just his people, but all people, that he cares so deeply for them. Jonah knew this when he tried to avoid going to Nineveh. He knew that if even the cruel Assyrians would *repent, Yahweh would be quick to *forgive them (Jon 4:2). In substantiating his statement, the prophet clearly is alluding to the expression of God’s tenderness and grace found already in Exodus 34:6-7. We might think also of the divine cry of love for Israel found in Hosea 11:8-9. So also, when the postexilic Judeans were accusing Yahweh of not blessing them enough, his first utterance is not condemnation but rather a proclamation that he has always loved them (Mal 1:2). So if the dominant motif in the prophets is divine anger, it must not be allowed to blot out the reality of the underlying divine compassion.

Finally, it should be said that God is described in so many ways in the prophets that any attempt to organize these descriptions into discrete categories will involve a good deal of theological interpretation, and that will certainly be the case in this essay.

2. Revealer.

In recent years a good deal has been made of the fact that persons in other cultures around Israel spoke messages that they reported to have been received from a god (see Ancient Near Eastern Prophecy). This is especially the case at Mari, an Amorite city on the middle Euphrates dating about the middle of the second millennium BC. In particular, many of these messages include a formula such as “This is what X [the god] says.” This has led some scholars to suggest that there is really nothing unique about the Israelite prophetic messages. To be sure, it is said, they are longer and more complex, but in terms of their basic idea—a spoken message received from a divine personage—they are of the same genre.

As with many other points of biblical theology, we can agree that these structural similarities clearly exist. However, that does not mean that the two literatures are the same thing, or that they are doing the same thing. In particular, they are not the same kind of revelation (if the Mari prophecies are revelations at all). Prophecies in the ancient Near East were almost entirely given to the business of predicting the future for the benefit of the prophet’s patron. This sort of prophecy existed in Israel at various points, as the Bible reports (1 Kings 22:5-6). But those prophetic messages of which the biblical books of prophecy consist are of a very different order. Here prediction of the future is not the primary point; to be sure, it is essential, but it is secondary to the main point. That main point is a challenge to the moral behavior of the hearers, which moral life is clearly defined by the moral character of Yahweh as that character was defined in the covenant. This is precisely the difference between a false prophet and a true prophet in biblical terms. The true prophet conditioned his predictions of the future upon the responses of the people to these moral challenges. The false prophet confirmed the people in their faulty moral choices with unconditional promises of a rosy future (see Jer 23:16-18).

Some, however, will point out that the prophets at Mari and elsewhere in the ancient Near East did not only make predictions about the future, but also they revealed the will of the god in the same way that the Israelite prophets revealed the will of Yahweh. Again, this is misleading. Elsewhere, the will of the gods is almost entirely related to specific questions or events. To be sure, there are instances where that took place in Israel (although the reports of the incidents are frequently accompanied by prophetic retorts that this is not what the questioner should be concerned about, as in the case of King Jeroboam's wife and the prophet Ahijah [1 Kings 14:1-18]). But in the Prophetic Books the revealed will of God rarely has to do with specific events. Instead, it is regularly addressed to issues of moral character.

This emphasis on the God who speaks is at the heart of the biblical message. It is so because of the understanding of reality that prevails throughout the Bible. That understanding is grounded in the concept of transcendence. Yahweh is not continuous with the cosmos. He is discontinuous with it; he is other than it. In the opposing worldview deity is coterminous with the cosmos. Thus, to experience the cosmos is to experience deity. To know the cosmos is to know deity. In that understanding language is distinctly secondary. Immediate experience is the preferred means of knowing. This is not the case in the Bible. Since God is not the cosmos, experience of the cosmos is not, de facto, to know God. So how are the creatures to know the transcendent Creator, if they are to know him at all? It is through the means whereby persons, who are by definition discontinuous with each other, communicate: language. Words are the means of sharing experience and knowledge across the divide. Thus, it is no accident that Yahweh speaks creation into existence. It does not emerge from his body, nor is it an effusion of his being. He is other than it.

This understanding permeates the prophetic literature. God communicates with persons in complex language. Thus, the prophets are not mere mouthpieces for God, but dialogue partners. *Form critics, insisting upon the commonality of Hebrew prophecy with prophecy elsewhere in the ancient Near East, sometimes hypothesize that the initial messages of the prophets must have been short statements that have then been expanded in the mouth of God by the prophets. But the evidence for such claims is questionable at best. Instead, the text has long, complex messages from God, which the prophets sometimes question or to which they even object. Yahweh, in revealing himself to the prophets, is modeling the kinds of relationships that he is seeking with all people. The expectation is not that the prophet's personality will be submerged into God's, or that the prophet will become merely a mouthpiece for God. Rather, the prophet is expected to be a willing partner with God, conscious of the issues and paying the price for this demanding and dynamic relationship.

The dynamics of the divine revelation are seen in the prophetic calls narrated in the text. They range from Amos's "the LORD took me" (Amos 7:15) to the markedly indirect "Whom shall I send?" of Isaiah (Is 6:8). Between these extremes are the call of Ezekiel, with its visual cues culminating in a clear command to eat a scroll whose bitter words he found strangely sweet (Ezek 3:1-3), and Jeremiah's back-and-forth dialogue concerning his suitability (Jer 1:4-10). Whatever else we may see in these accounts, we do not see any formulaic sameness. Yahweh is not communicating formulae; he is in a complex, life-and-death dialogue through the prophets with people about whose life and character he is passionately concerned. Thus, he communicated in a variety of forms and manners, given differing situations, in order to cross the uncrossable divide between the Creator and his creatures. Something of this variety is seen in the visual means of communication that God used. We can think of the decayed loincloth, the marred pot, and the broken pot in Jeremiah (Jer 13:1-7; 18:1-4; 19:10-11). Or we can see Ezekiel lying on one side and then the other for many long days (Ezek 4:4-6). Then there is the urbane Isaiah going naked for three years (Is 20:3). All of these "signs" are accompanied by words, but without the visual markers the words would be far less effective (see Sign Acts).

To be sure, there are some formulae used especially to mark the openings and closings of blocks of communications. The most common of these is "Thus says the LORD," which occurs more than 350 times. However, it is not simply a stock formula, as is demonstrated by the clustering of its usages. While the phrase occurs thirty-six times in Isaiah, 149 times in Jeremiah and 123 times in Ezekiel, it does not occur at all in Hosea, Joel, Jonah, Habakkuk, Zephaniah or Malachi. The absence of the phrase in these books short-circuits a possible response to its absence in Daniel, which is that Daniel is not really to be considered a prophetic book. Another formula of revelation is "the *word of the LORD" ("Hear the word of the LORD" 31x [Isaiah 4x; Jeremiah 14x; Ezekiel 10x; Hosea 1x; Amos 2x]; "The word of the LORD came" 62x [Jeremiah 10x; Ezekiel 48x; Zechariah 4x]). Daniel says that "a word went forth" in response to his *prayer, and the angelic messenger is detailed to declare it (Dan 9:23), and in Daniel 10:1 it is said that "a word was revealed" to Daniel. Isaiah also uses the same term in the context of verbal communication four times (Is 22:14; 23:1; 40:5; 53:1) Others are "the mouth of the LORD has spoken" (Is 1:20; 40:5; 58:14; Jer 9:12; Mic 4:4) and the simple "the LORD spoke to me" (Is 8:5, 11; Jer 28:1; Ezek 2:2; 3:24). But these are markers, and they do not confine in any way what follows, which may range from admonition to exhortation to announcement of judgment to announcement of *salvation. This variety has been one of the confounding factors for form critics. In several cases there are no comparable forms to be found elsewhere, as is the case with most of the so-called salvation oracles in the Bible. And in others the freedom with which the prophets handle the supposed forms seems inexplicable. Critics too often have resorted to large-scale emendation in order to make the passages conform to the expected norm. All this is to say that the communication from Yahweh that the prophets claim to have received is only consistent with a complex and creative personality who wishes to communicate and not merely to make pronouncements.

3. Creator.

It is widely known that the verb "to create" (Heb bara') occurs more frequently in Isaiah than in Genesis (Isaiah 21x, Genesis 11x, with seven of the eleven in Genesis referring to the creation of humanity). The majority of the occurrences in Isaiah (13x) are found in Isaiah 40—45, where the prophet is insisting that Yahweh is the only God, and that he alone knows the future. The usage of bara' in the OT shows that it is speaking of bringing into existence something that had never existed before or of causing something to happen that had never happened previously (cf. Num 16:20). This point is critical to Isaiah's argument. He is insisting that the gods, being part of this world, are unable to materially affect the course of things by doing something new. Since they are only personalized expressions of the psychosocio-physical forces of the cosmos, they are captive to its cycles and cannot change those in any significant way. But the God who brought the cosmos into existence can change its patterns in any way he chooses. He can cause springs to erupt in the desert, or he can dry up the Euphrates (Is 43:19-20).

This idea was of extreme importance to the Judean exiles. In all the history of the practice of exile, we never hear of anyone going home again. This was one of the purposes of the practice: to destroy the distinctive culture of the various people groups and integrate them into the larger culture of the empire. Thus, from that point of view, it was foolish to think of being delivered from captivity and returning home with one's culture in some sense intact. If it had never happened before, it was impossible for it to happen now. Isaiah agrees with that point: the gods had never done a new thing in the past and certainly could not do a new thing in the future. But, the prophet insists, Yahweh is not a personified cosmic force. He is the one who brought the cosmos into existence, and thus he can do something that had never been done before: take his people back out of the hand of the conqueror.

The idea of God as revealer is directly associated with his role as the Creator (see Creation Theology). The idol worshipers were challenged to report just one time when one of their gods had specifically predicted a future event prior to its occurrence (Is 43:9; 44:7-8). The clear answer is that it had never happened. It had not happened for two reasons. First, since the gods were only the personified forces of the cosmos, they were incapable of complex speech dealing with unknown variables in keeping with the unique situation and needs of a dialogue partner. But it was not beyond Yahweh. Through the prophet, Yahweh reminded them that he had specifically predicted the *exile, when all the conventional wisdom of Israelite theology had seen that as impossible. But even more astonishing, he had predicted return from exile at the hands of a pagan ruler whom he dared to name far in advance. How could he speak in these ways? It was simply because he was not a captive of the cosmic system, but rather had created it.

The second reason why Yahweh's challenge could not be answered by the idol worshipers was that the gods were incapable of doing anything new. They could not predict what the cosmic system would do in the future except insofar as it replicated the general patterns of the past. The thunderstorm hardly knows what track it will take, except that it might "know" that it will not move from east to west in the northern hemisphere. The gods had not created the cosmos as a brand new thing, but had only ordered the chaotic matter that was eternally existent. Thus, they could hardly inform their worshipers of some new and unique thing that they would do in the future that had never happened before. They were incapable of doing such things, and furthermore, there is no way of accounting for new things, given that worldview. If events did occur that had no precedence, then some way had to be found at once to integrate them into the preexisting system and, in effect, to make them "not new," because something genuinely new would call that entire understanding of reality into question.

On the other hand, the glory of Yahweh is that as Creator he is constantly doing new things. Thus, in Isaiah 43:18, after a clear allusion to the *exodus, he tells the people to forget the former things because he is about to do something new. He was not going to replicate the exodus in this deliverance. Why should he?

He had already done that once! Clearly, the hearers were expected to remember the former things in regard to what they taught about the goodness, power and dependability of God. But when it came to freezing what he had done and how he had done it, they were to forget all that. Why are humans inclined to do those things? It is because of our inveterate need for control. The entire thought system of paganism stems from this need. If we can find ways of integrating whatever happens into what always happens, we protect ourselves from unfortunate surprises and give ourselves the illusion of control. But the Creator is not subject to our control.

Another term that Isaiah uses to speak of Yahweh as creator is "maker" (ʿōšê [Is 17:7; 29:16; 51:13; 54:5; see also Is 45:12]). The prophet uses the term to connote the folly of the thing that has been made disputing the terms of its making with its maker, of the fact that in the end those who have endured judgment will turn back to their maker, of despair being a result of forgetting who has made us, and of the fact that God is not merely our maker but also is our husband and redeemer. Fundamental to all of these is the idea that the one who made us not only has the right to pass judgment on our behavior, but also is able to break into the endless circle of cause and effect and deliver us into a new plane of living. This is possible because Yahweh, the Creator and the Maker, is himself the ultimate cause and is not captive to any other causes.

But if the teaching of God as the Creator is especially prominent in the book of Isaiah, it is by no means missing from the other prophets. Although the term bara' with reference to God occurs only in Jeremiah (Jer 31:22), Amos (Amos 4:13) and Malachi (Mal 2:10), the concept of Yahweh as the sole originator of the cosmos is to be found in several of the other prophets, especially in Jeremiah. At times it is expressed in the context of diatribes against *idolatry, as in Isaiah. So Jeremiah can say that the gods who did not make the heavens and the earth will perish, whereas God made the earth, the world and the heavens by his own power and wisdom (Jer 10:10-16). The concept is also used to provide the basis for God's judgment of his people (Amos 4:12-13; 5:7-10) and his redemption of them. So, Zechariah uses Yahweh's role as creator to explain how it is that tiny Jerusalem will become "a cup of stumbling" for the surrounding *nations (Zech 12:1-2). These are possible because the Creator is necessarily the lord of history (see 5 below). It is because Yahweh is the Creator that he can turn over all the nations to his servant Nebuchadnezzar (Jer 27:5) (although Daniel does not appeal to creation, he makes a similar argument with regard to God's absolute sovereignty [see 5.2 below]). Likewise, in his prayer recorded in Jeremiah 32:17-25, Jeremiah makes creation the basis for Yahweh's lordship of history. Thus, he is able to bring about both judgment and redemption (Jer 33:2). Additional occurrences of the concept appear in Hosea, Jonah and Malachi. Hosea charged that instead of trusting their Maker, Israel was turning to fortifications and palaces (Hos 8:14). Jonah confessed to the terrified sailors that he served the God who made the sea and the land (Jon 1:9), which truly terrified them. Malachi argued that since Israel was created by the one God, the Israelites have an obligation to one another (Mal 2:10).

4. The Only God.

The idea that Yahweh is the Creator of the cosmos is directly related to the idea of his uniqueness. It would be difficult to say which of these concepts came first, however, and it may be that both sprang from the understanding that Yahweh is not a part of the cosmos, is transcendent. Clearly, there can only be one Being in the universe who is other than all other beings. In the same way, then, it is appropriate to believe that this Being is the cause of the existence of the cosmos. He is not merely the orderer of pre-existent and eternal matter as is the chief god in the misnomered "creation accounts" among Israel's neighbors; rather, he brings something into existence that did not exist before. He is the only God.

As with creation, the uniqueness of Yahweh is given special prominence in Isaiah. Several times it is said that Yahweh is God, and there is no other (Is 45:5-6, 14, 18, 21-22; 46:9; see also Joel 2:27). But even when the point is not expressed this directly, there is no question of its presence. The significance of the repeated attacks against idolatry lies here. This is not to say that it would be permissible to worship other gods if they were not represented by idols; rather, it is precisely because the worship of other gods is inextricable from idolatry that it is wrong to worship them. They are not gods; they are like the sticks and stones representing them, the creations of human ingenuity. Thus, idols are an abomination (tô'ebâ), an offense to the creation order, as is the worship of them (Is 41:24; 44:19; 66:3; Jer 13:26; 16:18; 32:32, 34; 44:22; Ezek 5:11; 6:9, 11). Ezekiel's customary reference to idols as gillûlîm ("round things"), probably a scatological term, reinforces this inference. We may *worship our Maker, or we may worship what we have made. But what we have made is not worthy of the term "god." There is only one worthy of that term. This truth is expressed in the Bible in the phrase "the living God" (as opposed to the lifeless gods). Thus, it is significant that King Darius calls Yahweh this in response to Daniel's deliverance from the lions (Dan 6:26). Another term of derision applied to the gods is šiqqûš, something disgusting and worthless. So Daniel sees the setting up of the šiqqûš šomēm ("the abomination of desolation") in the *temple in Jerusalem as signaling the beginning of the final struggles of earth. It is a contest between the living God and the antithesis of God: something made attempting to usurp the power and prerogatives of the Maker (see also Hos 8:6; 14:3; Hab 2:18-20). In Jonah the point is made by implication: it is Yahweh who is the God of Assyria, not some other. Habakkuk (Hab 1:12) speaks of his God as the one who will not die (in contrast to the other gods, who are already dead). Zechariah predicts that the day will come when the very names of the idols will perish from the land (Zech 13:1), and ultimately the name of Yahweh will be the only divine name on the earth (Zech 14:9; so also Mal 1:11).

The transcendence of God that makes him the only God is especially underlined in the prophets by their univocal attacks on religious ritual performed on the basis of sympathetic magic. In paganism, where the gods are simply personifications of the forces of the cosmos, a fundamental doctrine is correspondence: the god is the tree, and the tree is the god. Therefore, what is done to the tree is necessarily done to the god. This becomes the whole rationale for ritual. One's attitudes toward the god and behavior in other areas of life have no bearing on the efficacy of the ritual. If the ritual is done correctly, then the links between humanity, nature and deity are intact, and the desired result is guaranteed. This is a very comfortable doctrine because it gives humans the illusion of control. It was no less attractive to the Israelites than it was to their neighbors. Yet, the prophets, from Isaiah to Malachi, are uniform in their attacks on ritual conceived in this way. This is so much the case that one even finds Amos, speaking for God, saying, in effect, "I never commanded you to offer sacrifices" (Amos 5:21-26), an obviously hyperbolic statement intended to convey the point that the people thought that *sacrifices were the end, when in fact the people themselves were the end, as seen in the command to love the Lord with their whole hearts. The faithful offering of sacrifices would be pleasing to God if that activity actually represented wholehearted devotion to God (Joel 2:15-17; Mal 3:3-4), but when it was engaged in as a means of placating God while "worshippers" kept their lives for themselves, it was deeply disgusting to God (Is 1:10-15; 65:1-5; Jer 14:12; Hos 5:6; Amos 4:4, 5; 5:21; 8:10). Since this manipulative understanding of ritual is at the heart of paganism, when the Israelites worshiped Yahweh in this way they soon fell prey to the worship of the manufactured gods of their neighbors. To this the prophets reacted with even greater violence. Ezekiel's vision of the defiled temple in Jerusalem (Ezek 8:1 – 10:22) is the most notable expression of this outrage, but it is found in many of the other prophetic writings as well (e.g., Jer 7:1-11; Hos 4:11-13; Zeph 1:4-6).

A transcendent God cannot be manipulated through earthly rituals. So how is he to be related to? The only possibilities are surrender and trust. But those are so intangible; how can we know we have done these things? The evidence, the prophets tell us, is lives that reflect the character of Yahweh. If we do what he does and act as he acts, then it is clear that we are wholly devoted to him. So Isaiah says that instead of ritualistic religion we should be practicing good and rejecting *evil by seeking justice, rebuking the oppressor, defending the fatherless and pleading for the widow (Is 1:16-17). This thought is echoed again and again (Jer 5:26-29; Ezek 22:6-12; Dan 9:10; Hos 4:1-2; Amos 5:10-15; Mic 6:6-8; Zeph 3:11-13; Zech 7:9-10; Mal 2:7-8) (see 7 below). It is as we value humans as ends and not as means that we testify to the amazing character of the biblical God. When we care for those who are incapable of returning the favor, we show that we do indeed know God, who is defined by self-denying, self-giving love.

Another way of expressing the uniqueness of God in the prophets is found primarily in the book of Isaiah. This is the title "the Holy One of Israel." The title occurs only thirty-one times in the Bible (including the one occurrence of "the Holy One of Jacob" in Isaiah), of which twenty-six are in Isaiah. It is tempting to believe that the overwhelming nature of the experience of God's holiness described in Isaiah 6 stamped itself on Isaiah's thinking in an unforgettable way. "Holiness" is a way of expressing divine otherness, and the threefold "Holy, holy, holy is the LORD of hosts" (Is 6:3) is saying that Yahweh is the only truly holy being in the universe. He alone is "Other," and thus it is that the whole earth is full of his glory and not that of any other.

5. Lord of History.

5.1. A Different Understanding of Time. One of the most remarkable features of the Israelite prophetic understanding is that human choices in the present can affect the future. This idea that the future is not merely a recycling of the past, and the present is directly related to the two concepts of Yahweh as creator and revealer. In the worldview of continuity the future is dictated by what has already happened. So the outcome of one's life is shaped by the position of the stars on the day of one's birth. Time is a never-ending cycle, coming from nowhere and going nowhere, without overall meaning or purpose. But once it is granted that there was a distinct beginning to time, that this beginning was purposive, and that this purpose can be known, progress in time becomes a real possibility. Coupled to those ideas is the idea that humans are persons in the image of God, which means that their actions are free, not compelled by continuities with forces outside of themselves. The final component that the Bible brings to this confluence of ideas is that God speaks promises in the present whose fulfillment in the future is contingent upon subsequent human choices. When all of these concepts are brought together, as they are in the Bible, a whole new way of thinking about time becomes possible.

This new way of thinking can be seen in the interchange between divine pronouncements, human choices and the eventual outcome. God can make an unequivocal statement about something bad that is going to happen in the future, something that is a result of a series of bad choices in the past. These choices were bad because they did not conform to the character and purpose of the Creator, as revealed either explicitly (as in the covenant) or implicitly (through reflection on the creation). So Jonah was detailed to inform Nineveh that in forty days time the city would be destroyed. There were no contingencies in that pronouncement; it would happen. However, the Assyrian people chose to repent of their bad choices, and God changed his mind, something that Jonah knew was a distinct possibility. He knew this because he knew that Yahweh's purpose is not to destroy the wicked, but rather to move them to changed behavior (Jon 3:4—4:3; see also Ezek 18:23). The same point is implicit in Jeremiah. The prophet repeatedly says that Judah has no hope of avoiding the coming exile. The sins of Manasseh had come to their full fruition, and the end was irreversible (Jer 15:4). Yet, at the same time, Jeremiah fervently called for repentance on the part of the people. The implication is clear: even at that late date, if the Judeans had responded with genuine, far-reaching repentance, the exile would not have happened.

The principle remains in effect even when the predicted bad outcome was not the result of bad choices. So Isaiah informed Hezekiah that he was going to die, and as with Assyria, there were no contingencies in the pronouncement (Is 38:1). But Hezekiah entered into a dialogue with Yahweh, reminding him of all the good choices that he had made in his life, as summed up in the claim that he had walked before Yahweh with a whole (i.e., undivided) heart. As a result, he was granted fifteen more years of life. Obviously, Hezekiah was not telling Yahweh something that he did not already know. Once again, it is divine-human dialogue that is in play, with a possible purpose of helping Hezekiah recall what was important for his own life in any future that he might have.

None of this is to say that the prophets think that human choices are never constrained, or that they know nothing of historical conditioning. It seems very probable that this is the point in the mysterious command of Yahweh to Isaiah in his call. The prophet was told to preach a message that would blind eyes, deafen ears and fatten hearts. It seems that what is being said is that if Isaiah is faithful and preaches the full counsel of God, his own generation was so far gone that his message would only drive them farther from God. It would have to be a later generation—in fact, one after the exile—that would be in a position to hear. That understanding is supported by the prophet's words in Isaiah 8, where he seals his message and entrusts it to his disciples. All this is to say that the prophets do not consider Yahweh's lordship over history in some simplistic way. Just as the prophetic message came through a complex communicative interaction between the prophets and God, so the shaping of history was the result of such a complex historical dialogue between the Creator/Revealer and human persons whom he wished to see make the right historical choices.

5.2. Events in Time and Space under God's Control. In the ancient Near Eastern world of the prophets it was understood that when nations fought, their gods were fighting as well. Thus, geopolitical realities reflected divine realities. Whichever nation triumphed did so because its gods had triumphed over the conquered nation's gods. This undoubtedly lay behind the Israelite conviction that they could not fall to the Mesopotamian powers that were sweeping westward on their way to dominating Egypt. After all, in Israel's view, Yahweh was supreme over the other gods. In that light, he could not allow his people to be defeated. A variant on this theme appears in the Assyrian interchange with Hezekiah and his ambassadors in Isaiah 36—37. Here, the Assyrian emperor, Sennacherib, does not even invoke his gods, instead claiming in his own power to have conquered the gods of all the nations and "thrown them into the fire" (Is 37:19; see also Is 10:10-11). But the point remains the same: if a nation is defeated, it is because its gods were defeated. The one caveat that must be entered regarding this pattern has to do with some of the ancient Near Eastern laments over city destructions. In these cases, the city was understood to have been destroyed because its god or goddess had abandoned it. Thus, the god was not defeated per se, but voluntarily surrendered his or her property.

The understanding of the Hebrew prophets does not conform to any of these. The geopolitical events in Israel's world have one cause alone: the will of Yahweh. He directs the movements of nations; they are merely tools in his hand. So Assyria is merely the axe in Yahweh's hand (Is 10:15). It may think that it swings itself, but that is no more the case with Assyria than it is with a literal axe. Furthermore, the events that were taking place during the tumultuous years of 850 BC to 400 BC were not the result of self-made tyrants choosing to exalt themselves; rather, they were the outworking of a divine strategy that had been in effect from the beginning (Is 14:26-27; 46:10; 55:11; Jer 29:11). This is not to say that these nations were mere puppets conforming to some timeless blueprint that admitted of no exceptions. As noted above, Yahweh was, and is, infinitely flexible in light of good and bad human choices. But his strategy—restoring the world from the effects of human sin—is unchanging, and the actions of Assyria, Babylon and Persia were made to fit seamlessly into that divine strategy.

This point is nowhere made more clearly than in the narratives of Daniel. Nebuchadnezzar understood himself to be the ruling figure in the world and to be where he was and what he was as a result of his own superior ability and intellect. But that was not the case; it is Yahweh who makes and deposes kings and kingdoms. Nebuchadnezzar had been allowed to hold the place he did by the gracious permission of Yahweh, and unless he acknowledged that fact, he was no more than one of the cattle in the field (Dan 4:31). The fact is that “the Most High rules in the kingdom of men and gives it to whomever he chooses” (Dan 4:17, 25, 32; 5:21). This is an important insight into the prophetic understanding of the divine-human relationship: unlike the animals, humans have the capacity to recognize the gifts a good God has given them. If we do not recognize that fact, we are no better than the animals. With regard to Nebuchadnezzar, Jeremiah makes a similar point: Nebuchadnezzar is to be obeyed and his covenant with Judah is to be kept because he is Yahweh's servant, doing Yahweh's work in the world (Jer 27:6-8). Ezekiel makes a similar point: in attacking Tyre, Nebuchadnezzar is Yahweh's worker, carrying out Yahweh's judgment, and if that attack is not completely successful, he will be given Egypt in compensation (Ezek 29:18-19). So much for lofty imperial pretensions to independent action! A further example of this lordship over history as it relates to persons is found in Isaiah's references to Cyrus. This Persian emperor, undoubtedly the most powerful person in the world of his day, is claimed in the present book to have been named 125 years before his birth and given the function of restoring exiled Israel to its homeland. For doing this, he, like Nebuchadnezzar, before him, will be given not only Egypt, but Ethiopia as well. The book goes so far as to name Cyrus as Yahweh's māšîaḥ, his “anointed one,” for the purpose of restoring Jerusalem (Is 44:28—45:1).

One final expression of Yahweh's lordship over history is found in the oracles against the nations. Collections of the oracles appear in Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel, and the books of Nahum and Obadiah are each such an oracle, against Assyria and Edom respectively. Habakkuk 2 is an oracle against Babylon, and Zephaniah 2 is composed of brief oracles against several nations. In Zechariah there are no oracles as such, but the first three visions (Zech 1:7—2:13) make the point that Yahweh has made it so that the nations no longer pose a threat to his people. Then, in Zechariah 14, the final chapter, Yahweh uses his people to destroy the enemy nations. Finally, Amos 1 is composed of a series of judgments pronounced on various nations around Israel. All of these are a way of expressing the point that the whole world is under the lordship of Yahweh and will be held accountable for the historical choices that the nations have made. For the prophets, Yahweh is not one of the gods of the world; he is the only God, and there is no nation that can independently shape its own destiny without reference to him.

In the three Major Prophets the placement of the collections is significant. In Isaiah they appear in Isaiah 13—23, just after the section composed of Isaiah 7—12, which details the full implications of Ahaz's disastrous choice to rely on Assyria rather than the Lord for protection from Israel and Syria. In this position the oracles are showing that it is foolish to trust any of the nations of humanity because all of them are historically accountable to Yahweh, and because the only final hope that they have is in Yahweh. In Ezekiel the oracles are positioned between Ezekiel 1—24, which lead up to the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 BC, and Ezekiel 33—48, which flow from that destruction and promise the return. In this position the oracles confirm that none of the nations surrounding Judah would benefit from the destruction, and that none of the nations upon which the Judeans were tempted to rely, such as Egypt and Tyre, could be of any assistance at all. In short, Judah's destiny was not in the hands of the nations; rather, their destiny was in the hands of Judah's God. Likewise, the positioning of the oracles in Jeremiah is significant, and the different positioning in the LXX and the MT reflects that significance. In the LXX they follow Jeremiah 25, in which Jeremiah predicted the return from exile. In that chapter the prophet said that if Yahweh punished "the city that bears my name" for its misdeeds, how did the nations think that they could escape similar punishment? The issue is not geopolitical maneuvering, but rather moral responsibility to the one God of the universe. In the LXX the oracles follow that general statement as a particularization of it. In the MT the oracles appear after Jeremiah 45, after the narrative of Jerusalem's destruction and the events flowing from it. This placement likewise says that Judah's God is God of the whole world, and that if Judah is accountable to him for its actions, the rest of earth's nations are no less accountable. As such, they cannot prevent God's restoration of Judah.

6. Sovereign King.

Yahweh is not just the lord of history in the Prophetic Books; he is in fact the lord of everything. The phrase "the Lord Yahweh" ('ādōnāy yhw̄h) appears more than 250 times in the prophets, primarily in Isaiah (30x, of which eleven are "Lord Yahweh of hosts"), Jeremiah (13x, of which five are "Lord Yahweh of hosts"), Ezekiel (194x, most of which occur in announcement formulae, with either "thus says" [kōh 'āmar] or "declares" [nē'um]), and Amos (20x, of which one is "Lord Yahweh of hosts"). The phrase is also found at least once in Daniel, Obadiah, Micah, Zephaniah and Zechariah. With this use of the term 'ādōnāy in conjunction with the divine name, these prophets are witnessing to their conviction that Yahweh is characterized by sovereignty. The "I Am" is indeed lord of the universe. One wonders if this combination and this understanding, especially as it occurs with such extreme frequency in Ezekiel, may be one of the reasons why 'ādōnāy eventually came to replace yhw̄h altogether in classical Judaism. In any case, it is clear that the prophets understood Yahweh's rule to be absolute.

The prophets also refer to Yahweh as king, a concept that they share with the psalmists. So

Isaiah recognized that although Uzziah was dead, Isaiah had seen the true king, "Yahweh of hosts" (Is 6:3). Later, he was to say that in place of all the false human leaders of the nation, Yahweh was the true lawgiver, judge and king (Is 33:22). When Isaiah presents Yahweh's case against the idols, Yahweh's kingship is given prominent play (Is 43:15; 44:6, 21). Isaiah 44:6 is especially dense with theological import: "Thus says Yahweh, the King of Israel, and his Redeemer, Yahweh of hosts, 'I am the first and I am the last; and apart from me there is no God.'" Jeremiah makes a similar point when he says that Yahweh is "the true God; he is the living God and the everlasting King" (Jer 10:10). Both of these prophets, who were well aware that the pagans around them visualized their pantheons in terms of a royal court, were insisting that there is only one Being who truly qualifies as king: the one, transcendent, "I Am." Three times in Jeremiah's oracles he has "the King, whose name is Yahweh of hosts," giving a stinging command to one of the nations (Jer 46:18; 48:15; 51:57). Finally, in Zechariah and Malachi the concept appears again. Zechariah says that at the end of time Yahweh's kingship will be recognized over all the earth (Zech 14:9, 16, 17). Like Isaiah and Jeremiah, he links the idea of kingship with uniqueness: "And Yahweh will become king over all the earth. On that day Yahweh will be one and his name will be one" (Zech 14:9). Fittingly, the last reference among the prophets combines several of these kingly titles: "sacrifices to the Lord what is blemished. For I am a great King, says Yahweh of hosts, and my name is feared among the nations" (Mal 1:14).

The title "Yahweh of hosts" (yhw̄h šēbā'ôt) deserves special attention in this section because of its connotations in regard to sovereign power. The "hosts" in question are heavenly armies (cf. NLT: "LORD of Heaven's Armies"). That is confirmed by the narrative in 2 Kings 6:8-23, where the Syrian army surrounding the village where Elisha was staying were themselves surrounded by horses and chariots of fire that were invisible to all but Elisha and, after prayer, his servant Gehazi (although the term itself does not appear in the narrative). An alternative form in which this appellation occurs is "Yahweh, God of hosts." This phrase occurs in the prophets thirty-one times, primarily in Isaiah, Jeremiah and Amos (once in Hosea [Hos 12:5]). “Yahweh of hosts” occurs 216 times (Isaiah 51x [44x in Is 1—39]; Jeremiah 70x; Micah 1x; Nahum 2x; Habbakuk 1x; Zephaniah 2x; Haggai 13x; Zechariah 52x; Malachi 24x). Of these, the vast majority occur in the context of speaking (“thus says Yahweh of hosts,” “declares Yahweh of hosts,” “the word/words of Yahweh of hosts,” etc.). It is also interesting to observe that proportionally more of the occurrences are found in the postexilic prophets than elsewhere, except for Isaiah and Jeremiah. In light of the fact that many of the occurrences in Isaiah and Jeremiah are found in those two prophets’ oracles against the nations, it begins to appear that these references to Yahweh as having absolute power are especially prominent in those situations where the nation of Israel seems powerless before the other nations of the world. This might explain the complete absence of the phrase in Ezekiel, where Judah’s powerlessness is not an issue.

7. Covenant Partner.

7.1. Covenant as Essential Foundation. Although the term covenant* is not especially frequent in the Prophetic Books (61x), it is everywhere understood that the covenant with Yahweh forms the basis for Israel’s relationship with him. This is especially the case with Jeremiah, as might be expected with the discovery of the Book of the Law during the temple renovations in the reign of Josiah (2 Kings 22:8). So we read, “Tell them this is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says, ‘Cursed is the man who does not obey the terms of this covenant—the terms I commanded your forefathers when I brought them out of Egypt, out of the iron-smelting furnace.’ I said, ‘Obey me and do everything I command you, and you will be my people, and I will be your God’” (Jer 11:3-4). Ezekiel echoes this foundation when he repeats the formula “You will be my people, and I will be your God” numerous times (e.g., Ezek 11:20; 14:11), as well as the other exodus formula “Then you will know that I am Yahweh” (e.g., Ezek 6:7, 10; 7:4). But even when these more explicit references to, or reflections of, the Sinai covenant are not present, that covenant is everywhere assumed by the prophets from Amos onwards (on the permanence of covenant, see Goldingay, 182-92). So while the other nations are judged for basic inhumanity to others, Judah and Israel are judged for their failure to keep the terms of the covenant (Amos 2:4-8). Hosea can simply say that people who give sacrifices rather than love (hesed), refusing to “know God,” have “broken [God’s] covenant” (Hos 8:1), with the apparent expectation that his hearers will understand what covenant he is talking about. In the same way, Isaiah begins with Yahweh bringing a charge of rebellion against Israel (Is 1:2). This charge is directly related to the covenant stipulations. The people have fixated on the ceremonial aspects of the covenant (Is 1:11) while neglecting what the covenant is really seeking to produce: godliness. Thus, he charges them with having neglected the widow, the orphan and the stranger (Is 1:17). Likewise, Micah could say that God did not want rivers of oil or mountains of sacrifices, but rather justice, love and a humble walk with God. All of this presumes that the people should have known these things, and that it is fair to punish them for not having done them.

7.2. Covenant in Terms of Marriage. That the prophets saw the covenant in personal terms rather than in merely legal ones is made clear by their expressing the covenant in terms of marriage*. Hosea in Israel in the eighth century BC and Ezekiel in Judah in the sixth century BC are notable for having done this, and this spread in time and space gives some indication of how pervasive this understanding was. Evidence of this understanding is found in many of the other prophets as well. It is especially clear when we find sin being expressed in terms of prostitution (Is 57:3; Jer 3:2; 13:27; Mic 1:7). It is not merely that Yahweh’s law* has been broken, but his heart as well. This divine anguish is portrayed powerfully in the cry recorded in Hosea 11:8: “How can I give you up, Ephraim?” Further evidence is found in the use of yādaʿ (“to know”) in relation to God. It seems probable that the connotations of personal intimacy associated with this word across the span of its usage would have affected the ways in which it was understood in texts such as Isaiah 43:10; Jeremiah 2:8; Daniel 11:32; Joel 3:17. The use of the term in this way in Hosea would tend to confirm this understanding (Hos 4:1-2; 5:4).

This nuptial understanding of the covenant, especially as expressed in Ezekiel and Hosea, underlines that the basis of the covenant between Yahweh and Israel is radically different from that of the Hittite suzerainty treaties upon which the Sinai covenant is formally modeled. In the suzerainty treaty the basis was conquest. The emperor had conquered a hostile people and now imposed upon them a covenant that they could not resist if they wished to avoid national annihilation. With Israel and Yahweh the situation was vastly different, as illustrated in two different ways by Hosea and Ezekiel. In both cases, we find Yahweh offering something that he did not have to offer to someone who was in a position to offer little back but love. In Hosea's case, it is the offer to give the prostitute the legal standing and social position of a wife. In Ezekiel's case, it is assuming the parental obligation for an unwanted child. In both cases, the basis is free grace, nothing more. That Yahweh hopes in both cases to benefit from the relationship by gaining the love of the other person in no way affects the gracious basis of the covenant. And that basis is further illustrated in both cases when the partners, having initially accepted the terms, and have either been married or tacitly accepted the offer of marriage, then turn around and repudiate the husband's love. In the case of Hosea, he buys back his wife, promising to woo her again (Hos 3:1-4). In the case of Ezekiel, though the bride-to-be has gone after other lovers and has been abused by them, the guardian offers to take her back, promising an "everlasting covenant" with her (Ezek 16:60; see also Is 55:3).

If this marriage metaphor shows that grace is understood by the prophets to be both the basis and the modus operandi of the covenant, it also underlines a point that Deuteronomy makes very clear: the motivation for keeping the terms of the covenant is love, not coercion. If the imagery of sovereign and servant provides one apt metaphor for the relation between God and humans, it is by no means the only metaphor, and perhaps not always the best one. We keep the covenant not because we must or be destroyed, but because we wish to and in so doing will find our deepest fulfillment in intimacy with our Creator and Maker, our divine husband. The NT underlines the importance of this understanding when it speaks of the church as the bride of Christ (Eph 5:27; Rev 21:1) and envisions the inauguration of eternal bliss as a wedding feast (Rev 19:9).

8. Father.

Yet another way in which the prophets expressed their understanding of Yahweh was as father. It was not uncommon for the high god, such as Anu among the Sumerians or El among the Canaanites, to be referred to as the father of the gods. But here the emphasis is upon the engendering function of the father. This god sexually engendered all the others through Ki or Asherah, his wife. There is no trace of this understanding among the Hebrew prophets. The closest one comes to it is the statement in Jeremiah 31:9 that Yahweh will restore his people "because I am Israel's father and Ephraim is my firstborn son." Obviously, this is not understood in any literal sense, but rather asserts that God's care for his people is like that of a father for a firstborn son. Other occurrences use "father" in similar ways. So Isaiah 63:16 has the people saying that even if their actual father, Abraham, would disown them, Yahweh would adopt them as his own children. Isaiah 64:8 says that since Yahweh is their father, he cannot be angry with them forever. In Jeremiah 3:19 the movement is from the other direction as Yahweh protests that he thought that his people would call him "Father" and not turn aside from following him. In that vein, Ezekiel says that on the basis of their behavior, their father must have been an Amorite and their mother a Hittite (Ezek 16:3, 45). Finally, Malachi pleads with the people that since they have one Father (i.e., one Creator), they ought to think of one another in determining their course of behavior (Mal 2:10). It should also be noted here that on two occasions in Isaiah it is said that Yahweh acts like a mother (Is 49:15; 66:13).

9. Shepherd.

Although a shepherd was in the lowest social stratum in the ancient world, it was fairly common for kings to refer to themselves as the shepherds of their people. This practice was carried on in Israel as well, and the prophets frequently castigated the kings for being rapacious shepherds who ate their flock instead of caring for it (Is 56:11; Ezek 34:8-10; Zech 11:16-17). So just as Yahweh was the true king of his people, he also was the true shepherd. Interestingly, most of the occurrences where Yahweh is seen in this role are in the context of the return from exile. The flock that was scattered, in part because of the failure of its human shepherds, would have to be supernaturally regathered. So Isaiah 40:11 speaks of him carrying the lambs in his arms, and Jeremiah 31:10 has him gathering the scattered flock. Ezekiel 34:12-22 has an extended treatment of this image, with Yahweh gathering the flock, making them lie down to rest. But it also depicts him as protecting the weaker sheep from the more aggressive ones. But a new twist is added when Yahweh, having said, "I myself will be the shepherd of my sheep" (Ezek 34:11, 15), says, "I will set up over them one shepherd, my servant David" (Ezek 34:23). That interplay seems to be continued in both Micah and Zechariah. In Micah 7:14 it appears that Yahweh is called upon to shepherd his people, but in Micah 5:4 it is the ruler to be born in Bethlehem who is depicted as the shepherd. Likewise, in Zechariah both Yahweh and the one whom he appoints are said to be the shepherd (Zech 10:3; 11:4).

10. Judge.

One of the key ways in which the prophets see God is as judge. However, the English term judge is much more constrained than the Hebrew one being translated. The Hebrew term šōpēṭ does not primarily refer to a legal officer who passes judgment in criminal cases; rather, the judge comes to establish an order in which right prevails and wrong receives its just due. To understand this, one should think of the activities of those persons designated "judges" in the biblical book of that same name. Thus, in the prophets the coming of the judge, as it is in the book of Psalms, is just as often a cause for rejoicing as it is a cause for apprehension (Is 11:4; 61:3; cf. Ps 96:11-13). If the judge will condemn the idolatry, adultery, greed, oppression and self-indulgence of his people (Ezek 7:8), he will also take vengeance upon those who have oppressed and violated his people (Ezek 35:11). He will not let the pride, greed or brutality of the oppressors go unpunished (Hab 2:2-20). The same arm that tenderly gathered the lambs is raised to smash down those who slaughtered the lambs (Is 40:10-11).

The role of the judge in establishing the divinely intended order is seen in the passage duplicated in Isaiah and Micah: "He shall judge between the nations, and shall decide disputes for many peoples; and they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war anymore" (Is 2:4; Mic 4:3). The actions of the judge will be for the purpose of bringing about justice on the earth. But again, there is a discrepancy between the Hebrew and English words in their connotations, with the Hebrew original having much wider connotations than the English. Whereas the English term justice connotes fairness, legal equity and the guaranteeing of what may be considered rights, the Hebrew word mīšpaṭ connotes much more. It connotes that cosmic order which the Creator intended (see Jer 5:4-5). The justice that Yahweh intends to bring to the earth through his servant (Is 42:1, 4) is no less than a restoration of a marred and sullied earth to its original intended state. This is by no means to diminish the importance of establishing and enforcing equity and fairness for the oppressed of earth (Is 61:8; Jer 5:28; Ezek 18:8; Amos 5:15). It is only that justice does not stop there, but only begins.

11. Deliverer/Redeemer.

While the occurrence of "Savior," "saved," "Redeemer" and "redeemed" is largely limited to Isaiah 40—63 (8x, 5x, 13x, 10x respectively), the concepts are not so limited. They are found in the first part of Isaiah (e.g., Is 1:27), in Jeremiah (Jer 14:8), Ezekiel (Ezek 36:29), Daniel (Dan 3:17), Zephaniah (Zeph 1:18), Micah (Mic 6:4) and Zechariah (Zech 10:8). The point that is made so forcefully in Isaiah is repeated in the other prophets. It was Yahweh who delivered his people into the hands of the oppressors, and therefore he was fully able to deliver them from the hands of the oppressors should he wish to do so (Is 50:1-3). And indeed he did so wish. In fact, such a deliverance is presented as a display of his "rightness" (šēdāqā [Is 51:8; 56:1]). Clearly, it would not be "right" for this God to leave his people in captivity, although in view of their breaking of the covenant it might be perfectly just to do so. Again, we see that Yahweh did not conceive of the covenant merely in legal terms, but rather as a vehicle for shaping the "walk" that he wished to have with his creatures (cf. Gen 17:1). But he was not going to be limited by any limitations that the vehicle might have had. He would deliver his people, not only for love (Hos 14:4), but also to demonstrate his essential nature to the world (Ezek 36:22-24).

See also DIVINE COUNCIL; DIVINE PRESENCE; FORGIVENESS; IDOLS, IDOLATRY, GODS; PRAYER; SPIRIT OF YAHWEH; WORD OF GOD; WORSHIP.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. Brueggemann, The Prophetic Imagination (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978);

idem, Hopeful Imagination: Prophetic Voices in Exile (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); M. Buber, The Prophetic Faith (New York: Macmillan, 1949); R. E. Clements, Prophecy and Covenant (London: SCM, 1965); A. Coppedge, Portraits of God: A Biblical Theology of Holiness (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2001); W. Eichrodt, Theology of the Old Testament (trans. J. Baker; 2 vols.; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1961-1967); J. Goldingay, Old Testament Theology, 2: Israel's Faith (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2006); D. Gowan, Theology of the Prophetic Books: The Death and Resurrection of Israel (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1998); A. Heschel, The Prophets (New York: Harper & Row, 1962); W. Houston, "What Did the Prophets Think They Were Doing? Speech Acts and Prophetic Discourse in the Old Testament" BibInt 1 (1993) 167-88; J. Oswalt, The Book of Isaiah: Chapters 1-39 (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1986); idem, The Book of Isaiah: Chapters 40-66 (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); O. Steck, The Prophetic Books and Their Theological Witness, trans. J. Nogalski (St. Louis: Chalice, 2000); G. von Rad, The Message of the Prophets, trans. D. M. G. Stalker (New York: Harper & Row, 1965). J. N. Oswalt

GODS. See IDOLS, IDOLATRY, GODS.

GREEK OLD TESTAMENT. See TEXT AND TEXTUAL CRITICISM.

GUILT. See SIN, SINNERS.

H

HABAKKUK, BOOK OF

This article describes the current understanding of literary and stylistic features, historical contexts and canonical significance of the book of Habakkuk. It elucidates the sometimes cryptic text using rhetorical, dialogical and historical methods.

Some scholars consider the name “Habakkuk” (ḥābaqqûq) to derive from the name of an Akkadian garden plant (Roberts, 86). The Hebrew root (ḥābaq) means “to embrace,” especially as a means of keeping warm when there is no other shelter (e.g., Job 24:8; Lam 4:5). God’s revelation of Judah’s coming devastation was embraced by Habakkuk in faith (Hab 3:17). The embrace of God’s dialogue with him became a shelter for Israel, when it appeared that every other means of shelter would be removed.

1. Theological, Literary and Historical Contexts
2. Content of Habakkuk
3. Canonical Issues

1. Theological, Literary and Historical Contexts.

1.1. Central Themes.

1.1.1. The Burden of Faith. Habakkuk 1:1 speaks of “the oracle that the prophet Habakkuk saw” (cf. Amos 1:1; Mic 1:1). “Oracle” (maśśā’) is closely related to the word “burden” (maśśā’). This oracle was given to the prophet in a *vision of dialogue with God (Hab 2:1; cf. Jer 28:10-15). The burdensome message for Jerusalem was the imminent arrival of the Babylonians, who would soon destroy the city. Habakkuk called the people not to despair, but to live by *faith (Hab 2:4b) and to share his joy in the Lord (Hab 3:18).

1.1.2. The Lord Prepares His People for Devastating Change. The Lord told Habakkuk that Ju-dah’s prosperity and autonomy would end, and that his protection would be withdrawn. The Lord promised that things would improve after the devastation if they could cling to their memory of his past faithfulness (Hab 3). They had the benefit of forewarning and the witness of a faithful and believing prophet (Hab 3:17-19).

1.1.3. A Dialogical Complaint and Response.

The vision (ḥāzôn) that God commanded Habakkuk to write (Hab 2:2) included the prophet’s probing questions, God’s responses and a concluding psalm of trust. Habakkuk began with a complaint against local corruption but was drawn into a progressively more difficult understanding of faith. God took Habakkuk’s persistent question of theodicy, “Why do you . . . ?” (Hab 1:3, 13), and made the prophet wrestle with a broader international reality.

The increasingly difficult word from the Lord caused a faith struggle for the prophet. He believed that the Lord could not tolerate wickedness, yet he noted that evil prospered. Habakkuk sought an explanation he could pass on to his audience (Hab 2:1), but none was forthcoming. By the end of the conversation he realized that the near future would lack visibly manifest reasons to believe, leaving only faith in God’s promise. Without immediate material evidence of God’s love, he would have to say, “Although the fields produce no food . . . yet I will rejoice in the LORD” (Hab 3:17-18).

1.1.4. Knowledge of the Glory. The words “For the earth will be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the LORD, as the waters cover the sea” are both the centerpiece of the five woes (Hab 2:12-14) and the physical center of the book. This declaration refers to God’s intention to bless all the nations of the world through Israel, bringing the whole creation back to the Creator (see Ex 9:16; Num 14:21; Is 11:9).

1.2. Genres. Habakkuk contains a variety of classic biblical genres typical of the Prophetic Books, but they are used in unusual ways for surprising *rhetorical purposes. Most scholars take the combination of genres as evidence of an uncertain redaction history by the author and/or editors (see Editorial/Redaction Criticism). The genres include an individual *lament used in a dialogical complaint (Hab 1:1-4, 12-17); a judgment oracle (Hab 1:5-11); a complaint-response oracle (Hab 2:2-4); woe oracles given as taunts (Hab 2:6-20); and a theophanic psalm (Hab 3:1-15) combined with a psalm of trust (Hab 3:16-19). Several applications of genres stand out.

1.2.1. Lament Used in a Dialogical Complaint (Hab 1:1-4, 12-17). Habakkuk's questions of lament/complaint are also found throughout the psalms: "How long?" (Ps 6:3; 13:1-2; 79:5; 89:46); "Why do you . . . ?" (Ps 10:1; 44:23-24; 74:11). The inclusion of God's response has similarities to the book of Job. Habakkuk's and Job's questioning is presented as faithful protest (cf. Job 42:7-8). Each of them conversed directly with God (cf. Job 30:2-23, 31:6, 35). The Lord led both of them out of older theological constructs into new understandings of God's way in the world (Hab 1:5, 12-13; 2:2-6; 3:16-19; cf. Job 42:1-9).

1.2.2. Woe Oracles Given as Taunts (Hab 2:6-20). The five woes are rhetorically remarkable in their use as a promise by God. Some argue that here hōy is a simple exclamation (cf. Is 55:1: "Hey, everyone who thirsts" [NET]) introducing the taunts, rather than meaning "Woe!" (Roberts, 118), but the setting of captivity does befit the woe of a dirge. In context, these oracles are given before the exile, to be voiced by the future captives. "Will not all of them taunt him with ridicule and scorn, saying, 'Woe . . . ?'" (Hab 2:6a). Woes usually are voiced against the people by God (e.g., Is 5:8-23), but here God's voice is democratized for all *nations and peoples (Hab 2:5b-6a). Captives do not usually taunt their persecutors, yet they will have God's voice as a prophetic weapon of hope. It is "subversive literature" (Prior, 243). Set in this literary context, it is a rhetorically brilliant and sociologically complex gift (Bruckner, 228-34, 243-48).

1.2.3. The Psalm (Hab 3). Habakkuk 3 is a complete psalm with superscription (Hab 3:1) and concluding musical instructions (Hab

3:19b). It begins with a theophanic song (Hab 3:3-15) linked to the final psalm of trust (Hab 3:16-19) by means of the prophet's first-person voice (Hab 3:2, 16). The theophany describes a physical manifestation of the presence of the Lord (Hab 3:2-15; cf. Ex 15:3-12; 19:16-19; Judg 5:4-5; Ps 18:6-19; 68:4-19), visible in the elements of his creation: sun, lightning, flood, plague and earthquake. God strides forth upon the earth as a warrior against crime, and people and the earth tremble at his power.

Some argue that Habakkuk 3 was added much later, as it is missing from DSS commentary (1QpHab). The majority think that it is part of the original MT tradition (Andersen, 259-60), confirmed in the second-century Minor Prophet scroll found at Wadi Murabba'at and present in the early LXX versions and in the Naḥal Heber first-century Greek manuscript. The more archaic language of the chapter is in keeping with the liturgy of theophanic visions (Sweeney, 1:479; Roberts, 148-58). It is also a fitting response after the prophet's questions and God's revelation in the first two chapters (Hiebert 1986, 129-49).

1.3. Literary Style. Habakkuk's abrupt changes in speaker, subject matter, historical referent and genre make it difficult to follow. In the first chapter, God does not directly answer Habakkuk's questions, but responds to the prophet's lamenting petition with a judgment oracle for Judah (Hab 1:5-11). God does not defend his goodness, but rather complains with the people against the wicked (Hab 1:11). His most direct response comes in the second chapter, "The righteous shall live by faith" (Hab 2:4b), in the midst of the rhetorical complexity of the woes (Hab 2:6-20).

The third chapter recollects past demonstrations of the God's power. Here a theophanic psalm functions as part of the prophet's lament, longing for the days of God's more obvious presence (Hab 3:2-15). The lamenting context is established at the end of the theophany, in the first-person voice (Hab 3:16). The dialogical setting of the introduction and conclusion hold this unusual book together, and the canonical setting implies inspiration by God, even of the questioning complaint (Hab 1:1).

1.4. Historical Setting. Habakkuk was a temple musician-prophet (Hab 3:19b) (Bruce, 832), a contemporary of *Nahum, *Zephaniah and *Jeremiah, who prophesied during violent upheavals at the end of the seventh century BC. The book is a collection of oracles written during dramatic political change in Jerusalem (Hab 2:2) (see Israelite History).

The first chapter describes Jerusalem before *Babylon's defeat of Egypt at Carchemish (605 BC). The prophet's complaints focus on corrupt King Jehoiakim, who ruled Jerusalem as a vassal of Egypt (609-605 BC) and then of Babylon (605-601 BC). Jehoiakim killed innocents who opposed him, and he refused to pay poor laborers (2 Kings 23:35-37; Jer 22:13-19). Under his administration, prophets and priests committed adultery and abused authority (Jer 23:1-2, 9-11). He killed the prophet Uriah for prophesying that Jerusalem would fall (Jer 26:20-23), and he burned Jeremiah's hand-written prophecy (Jer 36).

The second chapter's five woes/taunts (Hab 2:6-20) imply Babylon's future defeat of Jerusalem. After the Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar secured a victory at Carchemish (605 BC), he retained Jehoiakim as his vassal until 601 BC, when Jehoiakim rebelled by refusing to pay tribute. Babylon marched on Jerusalem, and in 597 BC Jerusalem surrendered. When Jehoiakim died, he was replaced by his son Jehoiachin, who was taken to Babylon with the educated and skilled population of Jerusalem. The monarchy ended with Zedekiah, propped up by Nebuchadnezzar as Judah's last king (597-586 BC). The psalm of hope in the third chapter also reflects the situation of the exiles.

2. Content of Habakkuk.

2.1. Habakkuk 1. The first chapter records two sets of prophetic questions posed to God. First, "Why do you tolerate wrongdoing?" (Hab 1:2-4). God's response is indirect: "Look, . . . I am raising up the [more wicked] Babylonians" (see Hab 1:5-11 [author's paraphrase]). The second set of questions reasserts, "Why then do you tolerate the treacherous?" (Hab 1:12-17 NIV). They rephrase, intensify and expand the original question in light of the new information given in God's response.

2.1.1. Habakkuk 1:1-4. Habakkuk wonders how long he must wait for God's help against violence (Hab 1:2). Judah's problems with corruption are addressed in three matched pairs: injustice (āwen*) and wrongful suffering (āmāl); destruction (šōd) and violence

(hāmās*); strife (rîb*) and conflict (mādôn*). The latter two are legal terms marking the many lawsuits and legal quarrels in the courts. These six problems have four results, also presented in poetic pairs: the law is paralyzed, and justice never prevails; the wicked hem in the righteous so that justice is perverted (Hab 1:4). In a few brief words Habakkuk describes a ruined society full of crime, violence, corruption, mock legal battles and the defeat of the righteous, and he wants to know why God tolerates it.

2.1.2. Habakkuk 1:5-11. God's response rhetorically matches Habakkuk's complaint without directly answering the questions and redirects from local to international violence. God graphically describes the greater corruption and power in seven verses (Hab 1:5-11). Habakkuk: "Why do you make me look at [r'h] injustice? Why do you tolerate [nbṭ] wrong?" (Hab 1:3). God: "Look at [r'h] the nations and watch [nbṭ]" (Hab 1:5). To bring an end to Judah's corruption and violence, God would raise the cruel, impetuous Babylonians. Some translations have "the Chaldeans," a biblical name for neo-Babylonians, especially under Nebuchadnezzar's rule (see 2 Kings 25:1-13; Jer 21:4; Ezek 23:23).

The Babylonians' terrifying reputation is described in Habakkuk 1:6. They were "ruthless" (mar*), galling and fierce. They were "impetuous" (māhar*) and swift. The rhyming Hebrew words described an army that could rapidly change political structures. The Babylonians were feared and dreaded because they were "a law to themselves" (Hab 1:7). They would function as God's agent but would not be the permanent solution to Habakkuk's complaint about Judah's rulers.

The Babylonians' swift advance to Jerusalem is compared to wild animals: their "horses are swifter than leopards"; they are "fiercer than wolves at dusk, the cavalry gallops headlong, from afar"; they fly "like vultures swooping to devour" (Hab 1:8-9). Nebuchadnezzar demonstrated his military aggression following the battle at Carchemish (605 BC) by pursuing the defeated Egyptian army more than one hundred and fifty miles to crush them completely (Roberts, 96). Once the Babylonians had defeated both the Assyrians at Nineveh (612 BC) and the Egyptians (605 BC), no one could stop them. They could "scoff at rulers." Once they controlled trade routes, they could "laugh at all fortified cities," building earthen ramps to go over city walls.

2.1.3. Habakkuk 1:12-17. Habakkuk struggles to accept the prospect of the more wicked Babylonian rule in Jerusalem and rephrases the questions based on the new information (Hab 1:12). “Why do you tolerate the [more] treacherous [than Judah]?” (Hab 1:13 [author’s paraphrase]). In Habakkuk 1:14-16 the prophet expands the question with a fishing metaphor and concludes (Hab 1:17) by again pushing the question of God’s toleration of the wicked.

The intensification of Habakkuk’s renewed complaint begins abruptly in response to the news of the Babylonian advent. He quotes to God what he knows about God, “You are from everlasting, my God, my Holy One,” adding, “We will not die!” (Hab 1:12). The prophet refers to the eternal promises to Abraham and to David at the heart of Israel’s faith (see Gen 12:1-3; 15:4-6; 17:5-8; 2 Sam 7:13, 16; 1 Kings 2:45; 9:5). He appeals to the traditional reputation of the Lord: “Your eyes are too pure to look on evil, you cannot tolerate wrong” (Hab 1:13a). This appeal sets up the questions that follow: “Why do you tolerate the treacherous [Babylonians]” and “Why are you silent while the wicked swallow up the more righteous?” (Hab 1:13b).

The heart of his objection is the enjoyment and success that the wicked find in their cruel actions (Hab 1:15b). Habakkuk offers nine objections via a metaphor. The wicked fisherman pulls the righteous up with hooks, catches them in his net, gathers them up in his dragnet, rejoices, is glad, sacrifices to his net, burns incense to his dragnet, lives in luxury, and enjoys the choicest food. The first three objections concern the wicked fisherman’s abusing. The fourth and fifth concern his happiness. The sixth and seventh object to his false worship, amplifying God’s observation in Habakkuk 1:11b. The last two wonder about his high standard of living.

Habakkuk ends the nine-point list with another form of his original questions (Hab 1:3, 13) that could be paraphrased, “Are you going to keep on tolerating this? If so, how long?” (Hab 1:17). This forms the primary question of the book. The answer in the second chapter will be “Yes, for a while.”

2.2. Habakkuk 2. The prophet waits on the city wall to see what answer the Lord will give (Hab 2:1). The Lord tells him to write and publish two ways in the world: faith or puffed-up desire (Hab 2:2-6a). The first way is for the righteous: “The righteous will live by faith.” The second way in the world, “puffed-up desire,” leads to five woes from the mouths of Babylonian captives (Hab 2:6b-20). These woes form God’s second response to Habakkuk’s questions about the toleration of wicked people. God will act through the faithful living of the righteous and through the woes that will befall the wicked.

2.2.1. Preparing for an Answer (Hab 2:1-3). The prophet needed a more detailed response for his constituency. “I will look to see . . . what I will answer to my complaint” (Hab 2:1b [author’s translation; KJV and NASB have “when I am reproved,” which refers to the prophet’s worry about what the people will say]). The news about the Babylonian onslaught would raise serious questions in Jerusalem (Hab 1:5b), and Habakkuk had no words of his own to offer. He had to wait (cf. Jer 42:1-7).

Habakkuk 2:2 is the only place where the Lord is introduced as the speaker (Hab 2:2a). God says, “Write down . . . make plain on tablets so a herald may run with it” (Hab 2:2). The debated meanings of “run” include the following: even one running can read it; one who reads will run in terror; one who reads will live by it; the reader’s eye will run easily over it. The point is that the message may be easily understood.

The Lord’s second comment (Hab 2:3) is a repetitive warning that the way of faith would require waiting for his vindication during seventy years of exile (see Jer 25:12). It “will not prove false,” and “it will certainly come” (Hab 2:3). These introductory words prepared them for answers about the future of the righteous (Hab 2:4b) and the success of the wicked (Hab 2:6-20).

2.2.2. Two Ways: Faith or Puffed-up Desire (Hab 2:4-5). Habakkuk 2:4-5 is the apex of God’s message to the prophet. “See, he is puffed up; his desires are not upright” (Hab 2:4a [other translations have “his soul”]). “Puffed-up” (‘āpal [NRSV: “proud”]) is an odd expression: being swollen like a tumor or swollen with presumptive pride (see Num 14:44). It refers to the earlier invectives, “a law to themselves” (Hab 1:7) and “whose own strength is their god” (Hab 1:11). “His desires are not upright” is a fundamental response to Habakkuk’s complaint (Hab 2:4a). “Desire” (nepēš, often translated as “soul”) refers to “life in relation to others.” The Babylonians’ “desires” could be upright or not. The Lord will not take away their will to choose or examine their “desires” or (“soul”).

Habakkuk 2:5 adds three descriptive details to the “way of the puffed up.” Excessive wine “is treacherous,” deceiving the drinker into unwarranted self-importance (cf. Hab 2:15; Is 28:7-8). Some translations use the Syriac, Qumran (1QpHab) and some Greek versions’ word “wealth” (hwn) instead of the Hebrew “[the] wine” (hyn). Many accept “wealth” in spite of the Babylonian reputation (Prior, 241). The second mark of the puffed-up is arrogance. Third, they are never “at rest” because of their greed. “Like death,” the Babylonians are never satisfied.

Habakkuk 2:4b describes the way of the righteous person: “The righteous will live by their faith.” “Faith” (ʿemūnā) here refers to faithfulness, trust and steadfastness. In canonical context, “living by faith” means believing the word of the Lord given through Habakkuk (Crenshaw, 14). It means commitment to the radical faith sung of in chapter three (Hab 3:17-19).

2.2.3. The Voice of Captives (Hab 2:6-20). The five woes describe the true consequence of wicked living. Joy is not their reward, as the prophet observes (Hab 1:15). God’s justice will be accomplished through the natural judgments of societies against the corrupt and violent.

In the first woe, victims of extortion will take revenge (Hab 2:6b-8). The most common form of extortion was to demand tribute in exchange for not leveling a city, as in 597 BC Jerusalem. The Babylonians carried off the treasures of the* temple and the palace. Babylon’s crimes were against people as well as against the earth (Hab 2:8b).

In the second woe, history will remember acts of violence (Hab 2:9-11). Those who build security by unjust gain will be exposed to public shame (see Honor and Shame). Even the “wall-stones and woodwork will cry out” against them. The Babylonian crime was “the ruin of many peoples” to build “household” security, “to set his nest on high, to escape the clutches of ruin.” The metaphor of the nest echoes “the vulture swooping to devour” (Hab 1:8). The distinct hissing sound of the Hebrew letter ṣ (“ts”) resounds in the key words of the text: “builds gain” (bōṣēa ṣ *beṣa*ṣ), “to escape”

(lēhinnāṣēl), “you have plotted” (yāʿaštā), “the ruin of” (qēṣōt) and “woodwork” (mēʿēṣ). The creaking house will call out the shame of the ruined builder (Hab 2:11).

The third woe of the puffed-up will be the knowledge that they spent their lives for nothing. Those who build profit through bloodshed and crime will forfeit not only their lives, but also the glory of the Lord that will fill the earth (Hab 2:12-14). Babylon’s crimes were perpetrated against the many cultures of the ancient East (Hab 2:5-6), but also against the Lord (Hab 2:14).

The fourth woe concerns those who entice others to drunkenness. They will succumb to the terror of trees and *animals (Hab 2:15-17). It implies a practice of inducing drunkenness and also serves as a symbol of their stripping of trees, animals, lands and cities. The Babylonians’ “glory” (Hab 2:16a, 16b) in these practices will itself be covered by shame. This “glory” stands in stark contrast to the “glory of the LORD” that will “fill the earth” (Hab 2:14).

The “cup in the LORD’s right hand” refers to his interceding power (see Ex 15:6; Ps 17:7; 20:6; 44:3). The tables will be turned. Babylon’s cup will be “filled up,” but with shame (Hab 2:5, 16a). Their acts of destruction will remain with the perpetrators as a terrifying memory.

The fifth woe of the puffed-up is futility for those who trust in lifeless created things (Hab 2:18-20). Their silent idols cannot teach or respond to their trust. This taunt is sevenfold. An idol has no value because it is made by a human, teaches lies, cannot speak, cannot come to life, cannot wake up, cannot give guidance and has no breath. The concluding expression is dramatically sarcastic: “It teaches! Look! It is gold and silver! And full of breath! Oh, there is not any in it” (Hab 2:19). By contrast, the Lord is present in the temple (see Divine Presence). He has created, teaches truth, is speaking, alive, awake, gives guidance, and is the one who gives the breath of life. Conversely, “silence” is for the people to keep in his presence (Hab 2:20b). No one has to call out to wake God for insight. He is already speaking.

2.3. Habakkuk 3. The third chapter is a psalm to the Lord in response to the dialogue of the first two chapters. The “I-you” dialogue with the Lord is not over. Habakkuk accepts the Lord’s responses in a psalm of trust, struggling to express his deeply rooted faith in the Lord. This psalm was sung, the last verse giving instrumental direction to the music leader (Hab 3:19). "On Shigionoth" is the (unknown) musical setting for singing (cf. Ps 7:1). Its probably derives from šāgā, meaning "to stumble" or "to go astray," perhaps a reference to Habakkuk's need for God's guidance.

The structure begins with a formal refrain, perhaps an antiphonal response, "LORD, I have heard of your fame" (Hab 3:1). The song continues in three musical stanzas and a concluding bridge. Its structure is established by the word selā as follows: refrain (Hab 3:2); stanza one (Hab 3:3-8); stanza two (Hab 3:9-13a); stanza three (Hab 3:13b-15); musical bridge (Hab 3:16-19). The three stanzas are introduced by half-verses that function as titles. The title of stanza one is Habakkuk 3:3a and ends with selā. The lyrics follow (Hab 3:3b-8) until the second stanza title in Habakkuk 3:9 (again followed by selā).

Habakkuk's song struggles to retain dearly held beliefs about God's way of power in the world. He recounts in three stanzas the Lord's reputation for visible displays on Israel's behalf. He longs for them to "be renewed" (hayyēhū, "let them live" [Hab 3:2]). Although the stanzas express the prophet's faith in God's past deeds, it is a subtle form of protestation. Not until the concluding bridge (Hab 3:16-19) does the prophet relinquish the plea for immediate intervention and accept the revelation of Babylon's rise given in the second chapter.

2.3.1. Renew Your Fame and Your Deeds, O Lord (Hab 3:2). The main themes of Habakkuk's song are contained in this refrain. "Your fame" (šim'ākā) is from the root meaning "heard." He "heard" that the Lord delivered Israel from Egypt and from the later assaults of the Philistines (see Josh 9:9; Is 66:19). He pleads in the third and fourth phrase that the Lord will return to this mode of operation in the world. Finally, the prophet sings for mercy to accompany the Lord's *wrathful response to sin.

2.3.2. In Days of Old God Came Forth (Hab 3:3-8). The first stanza describes the days of old when God came forth as a brilliant warrior for Israel against their enemies in lightning, plague, earthquake and storms on the waters (Hab 3:3-8). The Deuteronomistic history recounts how God used earthquake (Josh 6), torrential rains (Judg 4—5), thunderstorm (1 Sam 7), wind (2 Sam 5) and a plague (2 Kings 18—19) to rout Israel's enemies (see Warfare and Divine Warfare).

Temán is in southern Palestine and the Paran Mountains are on the eastern edge of the Sinai Peninsula. There, God's formation of Israel began after their deliverance from the Egyptian army at the Sea (Ex 14—15). Habakkuk 3:7 describes the distress of Cushites and Midianites, who were in distress because the Creator was present with Israel (see Num 31:7; Judg 3:10) and perhaps because of their idolatry ('āwen*, "distress" or "idolatry"). The three rhetorical questions of Habakkuk 3:8 sound the central theme, highlighting God's dramatic display of power. Habakkuk longs for this kind of intervention against the Babylonians.

2.3.3. He Uncovered His Bow and Arrows to Deliver Israel (Hab 3:9-13a). The second stanza (Hab 3:9-13a) declares the purpose of the Lord's wrath: to save his chosen people, who are, in this poetic parallelism, his "anointed" one (see Ex 19:6; Ps 28:8). When the Lord arrives as a bowman (see Deut 32:23; Ezek 5:16), the memories of Israel are the background of this psalmic collage (cf. Ps 77:11-20). Earth, water and fire acknowledge the Creator and act for his delivering purposes (Hab 3:10-11a).

2.3.4. You Crushed the Leader of Wickedness (Hab 3:13b-15). The third stanza describes the paradigmatic victory over Pharaoh. The "crushing of the head" of the chaos monster, Leviathan (as in Ps 74:12-14), means that the Lord establishes cosmic order and justice (see Ps 89:9-10; Job 26:12-13; Is 27:1; 51:9-10). The memory of the Lord's intervention against evil is the hope that holds Habakkuk's audience in face of impending devastation. They believe that the Lord will eventually defeat Babylon too.

2.3.5. The Fear, Faith and Joy of Habakkuk (Hab 3:16-19). The psalm concludes with Habakkuk's honest fear about the Babylonian conquest and his faithful joy in the Lord (Hab 3:16-19). The prophet finally acknowledges he has "heard" the Lord's word about Babylon's coming triumph (Hab 3:16). Although terror stricken, he accepts that the Lord will work in a different and unsettling way to accomplish his purpose (Hab 2:14) through *exile and return. He declares his unconditional allegiance no matter what the consequences.

In Habakkuk 3:17 the prophet lists the primary sources of food and agricultural commerce of the ancient East: figs, grapes, olives, produce, sheep and cattle. Even in their absence Habakkuk stalwartly resolves to be joyful (Hab 3:18-19). His emphatic confession consists of two sets of parallel statements with his confession of faith at the center: "The Sovereign LORD is my strength."

Joy is a typical theme in Hebrew psalms. Habakkuk's joy stands in contrast, however, to the usual rejoicing over God's good gifts and protection (cf. Ps 5:11-12; 13:5-6; 16:5-11; 47:1-4). Habakkuk rejoices even without them. His joy stands also in contrast to that of the Babylonians, who rejoice because they live in luxury and enjoy the choicest food (Hab 1:15-16).

Habakkuk 3 creates and maintains hope in the face of a calamitous future, providing a lasting resource for survival. It demonstrates the geography of hope in two ways: looking back by reciting the Lord's victories on Israel's behalf (cf. Deut 26:1-11; Ps 78) and by looking up at creation's wonders as a sign of the Creator's presence and power (cf. Ps 19:1-4; Is 40:12-31; 42:5-25).

3. Canonical Issues.

Habakkuk expresses many facets of Israel's rich heritage. Habakkuk 3 echoes the exodus, *wilderness wandering and entrance to the promised *land. The close dialogue with God in Habakkuk 1 parallels the book of Jeremiah. The struggle with the prosperity of the wicked is likewise lamented in the psalms and in the wisdom of Ecclesiastes and Job. The book is a bridge to the enduring faith established in the Babylonian exile and of the Diaspora (Hab 3:16-19).

A widely discussed issue in the history of interpretation is the meaning of Habakkuk 2:4b, usually translated as "the righteous will live by his faith" (be'ēmūnātô [RSV, NASB]). A better translation is "by their faithfulness" (cf. NIV; NET), taking the pronominal suffix in its common inclusive form and 'emūnâ in its common meaning of "faithfulness," meaning "steady trust." Another translation possibility is "by its faithfulness," referring to the word of God given to Habakkuk in the "revelation" (Hab 2:2-3) (Roberts, 105). Related to this alternate possibility is the LXX rendering, "the righteous shall live by my faith [ek pisteōs mou]"—that is, by God's faithfulness. In any case, the primary social context of "faith/faithfulness" in Hebrew is expressed as a child's trust in the faithfulness of a nursemaid to carry the child (Is 60:4 NIV: "carried"; Ruth 4:16 NIV: "cared for"). One has faith in God and in the word of revelation when one lives faithfully. The point is that when Babylon destroys Jerusalem, God's people will live by faith/faithfulness and not material measures.

When Habakkuk 2:4b is quoted in the NT, the reference points shift (Rom 1:17; Gal 3:11; Heb 10:38). All three texts are without the pronoun, having simply "by faith" (ek pisteōs), thus generalizing the source. In Romans Paul quotes "the righteous shall live by faith" as a universal message for all cultures and peoples (Rom 1:15-17; cf. Gen 15:6; Rom 4:3; Gal 3:6). He used this quotation to connect the older concept of "the righteous," referring to Jews of integrity who lived faithfully in the community before God, with the new revelation of "a righteousness from God," which is Jesus Christ, for the Gentile (Rom 3:21; cf. 1 Cor 1:30; 1 Pet 3:18; 1 Jn 2:1).

Paul returned to this quote (Gal 3:11) in order to convince Gentiles not to seek righteousness by means of the Jewish law. He explained, "Clearly no one who relies on the law is justified before God, because 'the righteous will live by faith'. . . . He redeemed us in order that the blessing given to Abraham might come to the Gentiles through Christ Jesus, so that by faith we might receive the promise of the Spirit" (Gal 3:11, 14 NIV). Paul was not setting up a dichotomy between faith as "assent" and living a life of patient trust and endurance (see Hiebert, NIB 7:643). He argued that Christ Jesus had become righteousness in place of the law. He expected Christians to assent to Christ as their righteousness by living patiently within that righteousness. The meaning of the verse remains similar, while the referent has changed.

In Hebrews 10:38 the primary referent of "faith" is persevering in difficult times, as in Habakkuk (Hab 10:25-39). The difference between the texts is the object of the faith. Habakkuk called the people to live with confidence (Hab 2:6-20) that the Babylonians would be destroyed and the Lord would appear again on the earth in power (Hab 3:1-15). The object of the NT text is the promise that God will judge the wicked and receive the forgiven upon Christ's return (Heb 10:17-19, 23).

See also BABYLON; BOOK OF THE TWELVE; EVIL; EXILE; FAITH.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. E. Achtemeier, Nahum-Malachi (IBC; Atlanta: Westminster/John Knox, 1986); F. I. Andersen, Habakkuk: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (AB 25; New York: Doubleday, 2001); D. Baker, Nahum, Habakkuk and Zephaniah: An Introduction and Commentary (TOTC; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1988); L. Boadt, Jeremiah 26-52, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Nahum (OTMes 10; Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier, 1982); W. P. Brown, Obadiah through Malachi (WestBC; Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1996); J. K. Bruckner, Jonah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah (NIVAC; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2004); F. F. Bruce, "Habakkuk," in The Minor Prophets: An Exegetical and Expository Commentary, ed. T. McComiskey (3 vols; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1992) 2.831-96; J. Crenshaw, "Theodicy in the Book of the Twelve," SBLSP 41 (2001) 1-18; R. D. Haak, Habakkuk (VTSup 44; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1992); T. Hiebert, "The Book of Habakkuk," NIB 7.623-55; idem, G-d of My Victory: The Ancient Hymn in Habakkuk 3 (HSM 38; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1986); R. Mason, Zephaniah, Habakkuk, Joel (OTG; Sheffield: JSOT, 1994); J. Neusner, Habakkuk, Jonah, Nahum and Obadiah in Talmud and Midrash: A Source Book (SJud; Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 2007); G. M. O'Neal, Interpreting Habakkuk as Scripture: An Application of the Canonical Approach of Brevard S. Childs (SBL 9; New York: Peter Lang, 2007); D. Prior, The Message of Joel, Micah and Habakkuk: Listening to the Voice of God (BST; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1999); J. J. M. Roberts, Nahum, Habakkuk, and Zephaniah: A Commentary (OTL; Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1991); O. P. Robertson, The Books of Nahum, Habakkuk, and Zephaniah (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990); R. L. Smith, Micah-Malachi (WBC 32; Waco, TX: Word, 1984); M. Sweeney, The Twelve Prophets (2 vols.; Berit Olam; Collegeville, MN: Liturgical, 2000).

J. K. Bruckner

HAGGAI, BOOK OF

Haggai is second only to *Obadiah in brevity among the books of the Hebrew Bible. It contains several prophetic oracles, accompanied by precise dates and set in a chronological framework. Its principal thematic concerns are the rebuilding of Yahweh's house (Hag 1:2-15; 2:1-5), its purification (Hag 2:10-19) and future glorification (Hag 2:6-9), as well as the future of the Davidic line and the promises attached to it (Hag 2:20-23). The book provides no biographical information about Haggai, but it does manifest profound interest in his status as a prophet (Hag 1:1, 3, 12, 13; 2:1, 10), his role in the restoration of the *temple and the life of the community, and the unparalleled success that he enjoyed. Once disdained in scholarly circles as a late and inferior form of prophecy, this book has enjoyed a resurgence of interest and has been extensively examined for its value as a source regarding political, religious and societal life in Yehud in the early Persian period (522-515 bc), as well as its creative theological reflection and innovative reconfiguration of earlier Israelite traditions (Petersen; Meyers and Meyers; Wolff; Verhoef; Kessler 2002; Tollington).

1. Text, Form and Structure
2. Compositional History
3. Reading Haggai
4. Theological Vision and Message
5. Significance

1. Text, Form and Structure.

The *text of Haggai is well preserved and poses only a few significant text-critical problems. Chief among these are the reference to "the word which I covenanted with you when you came out of Egypt" in Haggai 2:5 (missing in the LXX) and the phrase "once again, in a little while" in Haggai 2:6 (LXX: "still once"). In both cases the MT is to be preferred (Barthélemy). A significant textual and translational issue occurs in Haggai 1:2a. Whereas many translations render this "the time has not come," a better translation is "it is not the time to come" (Kessler 2002, 103-4; Barthélemy, 923). The book's form is difficult to define. Unlike prophetic texts such as Isaiah and Jeremiah, it does not consist of a series of juxtaposed prose and poetic oracular and narrative materials. Rather the book consists of a series of prophetic oracles and a brief narrative redactionally arranged to chronicle Haggai's role in the Judean community's transition from disappointment and frustration to renewed hope. Some have seen the book as a "brief historical narrative" (Petersen). Others have noted a greater stress on prophecy than narrative (Floyd 2000, 261) and designated it as a "dramatized prophetic compilation" (Kessler 2002, 246; Meadowcroft, 10). The book is structured according to an A/B/A/B' pattern. The A sections (Hag 1:1-11; 2:10-19) are characterized by reproaches against the people with prospects of hope, while the B sections (Hag 2:1-9, 20-23) focus on encouragement and promise. A brief narrative (Hag 1:12-15) intervenes between the first two A/B sections. It describes the results of the prophetic word and moves the dramatic progress of the book forward. Each of the sections is loosely structured around four elements: (1) introductory formula (Hag 1:1; 2:1, 10, 20); (2) dramatic conflict (temple in ruins, populace unconcerned [Hag 1:2]; builders discouraged [Hag 2:2-3]; pervasive impurity [Hag 2:14]; implied: Israel subject to the nations [Hag 2:21-22]); (3) divine challenge to obedience and *faith (Hag 1:4-7, 9-11; 2:4-5, 14-17); (4) declaration of promise (Hag 1:8; 2:6-9, 18-19, 21-23).

2. Compositional History.

Scholars generally see Haggai as a series of oracles set in a redactional framework (see Editorial/Redaction Criticism). Opinion regarding the book's date tends to favor either an early date close to the proclamation of the oracles as dated in the book (Meyers and Meyers, xliii-xlv; Kessler 2002, 31-57; Wolff, 17-19) or a far later date reflecting a lengthy period of redaction, up to one hundred years (Beuken, 184-216, 331-36; Ackroyd 1951; 1952), possibly in combination with the formulation of Zechariah 1—8 and Malachi (Sérandour 1995; 1996) or with the twelve Minor Prophets (Nogalski 1993). One way to assess these opinions is to ask when the dates were attached to the oracles, and when the framework was completed.

2.1. The Date Formulae. The oracles in Haggai are grouped around four specific days, from August to December during the "second year of Darius": (1) day 1/month 6 (Hag 1:1); (2) day 24/month 6 (Hag 1:15); (3) day 21/month 7 (Hag 2:1); (4) day 24/month 9 (Hag 2:10, 18, 20). The precision and concentration of these dates is unparalleled in the OT (although Zech 1—8 and Ezekiel display significant attention to precise dates). Certain scholars have suggested that the dates were attached to the oracles as much as one hundred years after their proclamation (Ackroyd 1951); however, several factors would indicate that these dates were attached to the oracles close to their proclamation. First, comparison of the form of the dates in Haggai to both biblical and extra-biblical material reveals a closer affinity to earlier dating practices than later ones. Second, the date formulae are not self-consistent (the order of the elements differs) and display no obvious ideological tendency, making it unlikely that they were added later for theological purposes. Third, the common Persian-period practice of compiling and dating prophetic oracles makes it unlikely that Haggai's oracles were preserved but not dated for a lengthy period (Kessler 2002, 41-51).

2.2. The Redactional Framework. If it may be affirmed that the book's dates were attached to the oracles close to the time of their proclamation, what date may be posited for the assembling of these dated oracles into the broader redactional framework present in the text as we have it? While some have argued for a date in a significantly later period, several indicators favor an earlier date: (1) the oracle predicting Zerubbabel's exaltation (Hag 2:23) is transmitted without any attenuation, suggesting that he still held office (Kessler 2002, 51-52); (2) the temple's rededication ceremony (515 BC) is not mentioned (Meyers and Meyers, xlii-xliv); (3) no attempt is made to distinguish Darius I (Hag 1:1) from Darius II (Verhoef, 10); (4) the eschatological fervor of the oracles is left largely intact (Mason, 1977) (Haggai stands in contrast to much later Persian period literature [Chronicles, Ezra-Nehemiah], which displays much less eschatological interest); (5) the date formulae are closely woven into the redactional frame (Floyd 1995, 476-79), indicating that the two should be considered together, not separately. In sum, the book as a whole may be read as reflecting the period between Haggai's proclamation and the temple's rededication (520-515 BC).

3. Reading Haggai.

3.1. Historical Context. Haggai's oracles are set in the early years of Persian rule over the former kingdom of Judah (see Israelite History). While a broader knowledge of Israelite history of the sixth century BC is extremely important for understanding Haggai, the following points are essential. Early in the sixth century BC Jerusalem and its temple were devastated, and a portion of the Judean population was *exiled to Babylon. Judah ceased to be a kingdom under Davidic rule, dashing earlier hopes invested in the nation and its royal house. Under the Persians, Judah was reduced to a small province (called “Yehud”), ruled by a governor and consisting of a greatly reduced territory comprising Jerusalem and its environs to a radius of about 25 km (Lipschits, 134-84; 258-71; Le-maire). A small contingent of returnees had arrived in Yehud during the reign of Cyrus the Great (ruled ca. 558-530 BC), however work on the temple was not undertaken until the reign of Darius I (ruled c. 522-486 BC). At that time, subsequent to the arrival of Zerubbabel the governor (of Davidic descent), Joshua the Zadokite priest and a contingent of exiles, Haggai reproaches the community for its neglect of the temple. Work is begun, and the temple is completed and rededicated in 515 BC (see Ezra 6:15-16).

3.2. Oracles and Framework. Several scholars maintain that the book contains two distinct perspectives: that of the prophet himself, and that of the book’s editors (Beuken; Wolff; Mason 1977). Some maintain that Haggai was a nonexiled Judean (Wolff, 17) who spoke primarily to the nondeportees but whose words the editorial framework then transformed into a message designed to refute the claims of the Samaritans to the north (Beuken, 228-29, 334). Others see the prophet as addressing only the people, while the framework draws attention to the importance of Joshua and Zerubbabel (Sérandour 1996, 11), placing special emphasis on Zerubbabel, who has rebuffed the offer of Samaritan aid (Wolff, 19-20). Some view the oracles as strongly eschatological. The redactional framework, however, sought to attenuate such fervor. These approaches have been strongly criticized. First, the supposition that Haggai was a nonexiled Judean and representative of that group is highly speculative and rests entirely on inference. Second, it is doubtful that there is any allusion to Samaria at all in Haggai (see below on Hag 2:10-19). Third, distinctions between the theological perspectives of the oracles and framework are tenuous, given the difference in the types of material in the two sections (framework, consisting of names, dates, formulae concerning the reception of the prophetic word, versus oracles drawing on traditional motifs from Deuteronomistic, priestly and Zion theological streams [see Steck]). Fourth, there are several indications of linguistic continuity between the two sections. For example, the epithet “LORD of hosts” (yhwh šēbā’ôt) occurs in the oracles in Haggai 1:2, 5, 7; 2:7, 8, 9a, 9b, 23 and in the framework in Haggai 1:14. For a fuller discussion see Kessler 2002, 52-55. Fifth, there is a lack of consensus among scholars as to precisely which words ought to be assigned to the framework. Thus, though undoubtedly there was redactional activity whereby the original oracles of Haggai were collected and set within a broader framework reflecting specific theological concerns (e.g., to place a greater emphasis on the role of the political and religious leadership), there is not enough data available to make fine distinctions between the two (Floyd 1995, 473). One can access the “historical Haggai” only through the framework’s portrait of him. While some differences in emphasis between the oracles and the framework must be acknowledged, it is more prudent to see in the book a continuity of perspectives between the oracles and framework regarding several issues facing the community during the early years of Persian rule.

3.3. Political Peace or Chaos? Scholars have debated whether the “second year of Darius” (Hag 1:1, 15; 2:10) refers to 521 or 520 BC. In 521 BC the empire was in upheaval, as Darius I, who had recently come to power, faced an orgy of revolt in various regions. Several scholars (e.g., Bickerman) saw a relationship between the shaking of the nations in Hag 2:6-9, 21-22 and the political instability in the empire. The oracle of Zerubbabel in Haggai 2:23 was thought to be an indication of a messianic movement (Waterman) that sought to gain independence and install the governor as king. This, it was argued, was why Zerubbabel suddenly disappears from view. Recent scholarship (Kessler 2002; Wolff, 74-76) has largely rejected these suggestions and views the year in question as 520 BC. Thus, Haggai’s oracles were delivered in 520 BC on August 29 (Hag 1:1), September 21 (Hag 1:15), October 17 (Hag 2:1 [the seventh day of the Feast of Tabernacles]) and December 18 (Hag 2:10, 18, 20). Haggai’s words regarding the coming shaking of the nations, glorification of the temple (Hag 2:6-9) and exaltation of Zerubbabel (Hag 2:20-23) should be read against the backdrop of imperial peace and stability. Thus, they reflect an ongoing hope for Yahweh’s decisive intervention in history despite the stability of the Persian empire and its firm grip on Yehud (cf. Zech 1:11-12).

3.4. A Fragmented or Unified Community? Several biblical texts reveal conflict between those Judeans exiled to Babylon (the golah) and other groups of Yahwists, particularly those who remained in the land (Jer 24; 42—44; Ezra-Nehe-miah [see Japhet]). At times the conflict concerned land tenure (see Ezek 11:14-21; 33:23-29). Can traces of such a conflict be seen in Haggai? Probably not, for two reasons. First, there is little archaeological evidence that the golah returnees settled in areas where the nonexiled Judeans lived (Lipschits, 237-71). Second, no clear evidence can be found in Haggai for any preference for one group over another. Zerub-babel and Joshua (Hag 1:1) are returnees, while the “people of the land” (Hag 2:4) refers to the Judean population, whether remainees or returnees (Wolff, 78-79). The reference to the “all the remnant of the people” who respond to Haggai’s preaching (Hag 1:13) stresses the responsiveness of the entire community (Kessler 2002, 141-42; Tollington, 54). There is neither reference to those who do not obey nor any indication that the faithful constitute a distinct group (Hag 2:1-5; cf. Mal 3:16-18). It is also significant that Haggai makes no mention of the exile or the Diaspora. The book thus minimizes whatever fractures may have existed within Yahwism, to reinforce the theme of the success of the prophet and the dawning of a new day.

3.5. Relationship to Other Texts. Exegetes differ on whether Haggai should be read as an independent unit or as a part of a broader structure. C. Meyers and E. Meyers and J. Wöhrle see it as structurally united with Zechariah 1—8, A. Sérandour with Zechariah 1—8 and Malachi, and still others with the twelve Minor Prophets as a whole (Nogalski 1993; House). A variety of matters of form and content (especially the book’s theological vision of the community and covenant) render it likely that Haggai is a distinct work containing one of the earliest Persian-period voices (Kessler 2008). As such, it should be read as a self-contained unit. Nevertheless, it is also probable that Haggai was incorporated into other emerging compilations of prophetic works, or that other texts (such as Zechariah and Malachi) may even have been written in light of it (Kessler 2002; 2008).

4. Theological Vision and Message.

Haggai was produced at a time when Israel’s understanding of its institutions (monarchy, national independence, *covenant, future role among the nations) and very identity were in profound crisis. Earlier theological beliefs could have been seen as worthless, having been invalidated by recent events. Haggai affirms that the tiny community in Yehud, under foreign domination and a shadow of its former self, was nevertheless the theological heir of monarchic Israel, and that its institutions were intact, although provisionally existing in somewhat different forms. Haggai achieves this continuity between past and present through the creative reconfiguration of earlier theological ideas (called “traditions” in scholarly literature) stressing constancy in substance despite change in form. This phenomenon can be seen in the major sections of the book. In Haggai 1:1-11 the people are portrayed as self-indulgent, preferring their own comfort to concern for Yahweh’s house. They view poor harvests as justifying their inactivity, making the delaying of work on the temple out to be the “wisest” choice (Kessler 2002). The prophet responds by interpreting the community’s misfortunes as divine judgments—a concept deeply rooted in Deuteronomy 28; Leviticus 26; Amos 4 (see below)—designed to alert them to their sin and prod them to action. Haggai’s interpretation of these events indicates that he views the Sinai covenant as still functioning, despite the people’s disobedience (see Hag 2:5).

Haggai views the reconstruction of the Jerusalem temple as a profoundly important duty. This is significant since temple building is not demanded in earlier Deuteronomistic (Deuteronomy, Joshua—2 Kings) or priestly (Leviticus) traditions. In Haggai’s vision, however, restoration would be incomplete without the Jerusalem temple, and he views neglect of it as evidence of disdain for Yahweh (Hag 1:3-11; cf. Deut 28:58-59). To underscore the great importance of this task, Haggai creatively applies terminology associated with extreme covenant violation in the Deuteronomistic and priestly traditions to the community’s neglect of the temple (compare Hag 1:6a with Deut 28:38a; Hag 1:6b with Lev 26:26; Hag 1:9 with Deut 28:38a; Hag 1:10 with Lev 26:19-20, Deut 11:17a, 28:23-24; and Hag 1:11 with Deut 28:51). The book contains numerous allusions to other OT texts and themes, and creative configurations of them, in light of the new realities of the Persian period. In Haggai 1:12-15 the leaders and people are described as obeying the prophet's message. Their response is phrased so as to contrast it with the community that refused to heed Jeremiah (cf. Jer 43:4), indicating that the renewed community is now responding as it should have done earlier. In Haggai 2:1-5 the prophet addresses the people's disappointment at the appearance of the temple under construction. Using a traditional formula of encouragement, Haggai urges the builders to be strong (cf. Deut 31:6-7; Josh 1:6, 9) and unafraid (cf. Gen 15:1; Ex 14:13; Deut 1:21; Is 35:4) and assures them that Yahweh is with them (cf. Gen 26:24; 28:15) and will very soon intervene and glorify his house (Hag 2:6-9). Such inner-biblical allusions serve to emphasize the continuity between Haggai's hearers and earlier moments in the people's history (for further examples, see Kessler 2002, 153-57; 183-95; 218; 239-42). Haggai's stress on continuity with the past is also underscored in that he does not refer to a first or second temple, but to Yahweh's one house, which had been glorious in the past, was recently in ruins and is presently of poor appearance, but whose future will be stupendous (Hag 2:3, 9).

In Haggai 2:10-14 the prophet consults the priests on a ritual matter and uses their response to express the "impure" condition of the community (Hag 2:14). Some have seen Haggai's concern here as the people's ethical failures (Mason 1982, 144), or their wrongful inclusion of the Samaritans in the temple building (Wolff, 90-96). However, Haggai 2:10-19 more likely refers to the need for the ceremonial ritual purification of the temple (Petersen, 93; Kessler 2010) from its earlier defilement by both the people's sin (cf. Ezek 6:4-5; 9:7-9; 20:43; 22:6-16) and the Babylonian invaders (Kessler 2002, 214-15). Such practice is well known from Mesopotamian sources (Boda and Novotny; Ellis; Hurowitz, 264-69). The prophet declares the refoundation ceremony undertaken by the people on day 24/month 9 (Hag 2:10, 15, 18) to have cleared away the defilements of the past and assures them of Yahweh's blessing (Hag 2:18-19; cf. Zech 4:7).

Haggai 2:20-23 addresses the question of the future of the promise of an eternal dynasty to David (2 Sam 7:4-17) and the seeming rejection of that promise in Jer 22:24-30. In Haggai 2:6-7, 21-22 the prophet describes Yahweh's coming shaking of the heavens and the earth, which will usher in a new era of blessing. Such language evokes Yahweh's interventions in the past (Hag 2:21-22; cf. Ex 14:9; 15:1; Judg 7:22) as well as existing eschatological hopes (Hag 2:21-22; cf. Is 19:2; Ezek 38:19-21). The oracle in Haggai 2:23, using language saturated by earlier tradition, affirms that Zerubbabel, like the nation (Deut 7:6), David (1 Kings 8:16) and Jerusalem (1 Kings 11:13), has been chosen by Yahweh, and that he is truly Yahweh's servant (cf. Abraham [Gen 26:24]; Moses [Num 12:7-8]; David [2 Sam 7:5]). Furthermore, unlike Jehoiachin, whose faithlessness evoked Yahweh's rejection, and who is likened to a signet ring thrown away (Jer 22:24), Zerubbabel has been faithful and will experience future exaltation by Yahweh, who will "take" him (Hag 2:23; cf. Israel [Ex 6:7]; the Levites [Num 3:12]; David [2 Sam 7:8]), restore and exalt him like a signet recovered, leaving the promise to David intact (Kessler 2006).

5. Significance.

Despite its brevity, Haggai is a highly important book. The temple that Haggai championed played a crucial role in the life of Israel, Jesus of Nazareth and the early church (see Acts 2:46-47). The book furthermore stressed the ongoing importance of the prophetic office at a time when prophecy's relevance was questioned. The prophetic word was Yahweh's most powerful agency for effecting change. Thus, although Yahweh controlled the climatic conditions and harvests (Hag 1:2-11) and could cause upheavals in the cosmos and terrify the nations (Hag 2:6-9, 21-22), it was only his word through Haggai which was able to stir up the hearts of his recalcitrant people (Hag 1:13-14). The book's creative reconfiguration of Israel's earlier theological concepts enabled this community to adapt to the new and unforeseen conditions of life under foreign rule, affirming that, contrary to appearances, Yahweh's covenant and promises were intact, and his work of renewing his community had begun. Thus, Yahweh's people could labor in confident hope of his coming intervention for them. The promise to Zerubbabel (Hag 2:23) assured the community that the promise to David (2 Sam 7:14) had not been removed. The NT sees the ultimate fulfillment of that promise in Jesus of Nazareth, the descendant of Zerubbabel (Mt 1:12; Lk 3:27). Furthermore, Hebrews 12:25-28 views Haggai's prophecy of the shaking of the heavens and earth as referring to both to the kingdom of which the Christian community was already part and the anticipated parousia, when it would be consummated (see Prophets in the New Testament).

See also TWELVE, BOOK OF THE; EXILE; TEMPLE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Commentaries: J. G. Baldwin, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi: An Introduction and Commentary (TOTC; London: Tyndale, 1972); M. J. Boda, Haggai, Zechariah (NIVAC; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2004); T. Meadowcroft, Haggai (RNBC; Sheffield: Sheffield Phoenix, 2006); C. L. Meyers, and E. M. Meyers, Haggai, Zechariah 1-8 (AB 25B; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1987); D. L. Petersen, Haggai and Zechariah 1-8 (OTL; London: SCM, 1985); P. L. Redditt, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi (NCBC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995); P. A. Verhoef, The Books of Haggai and Malachi (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); H. W. Wolff, Haggai: A Commentary, trans. M. Kohl (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1988). Studies: P. R. Ackroyd, "Studies in the Book of Haggai," JJS 2 (1951) 163-76; idem, "Studies in the Book of Haggai," JJS 3 (1952) 1-13; D. Barthélemy, ed., Critique textuelle de l'Ancien Testament, 3: Ezéchiel, Daniel et les 12 Prophètes (OBO 50/3; Fribourg: Editions Universitaires; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1992); W. A. M. Beuken, Haggai-Sacharja 1-8: Studien zur Überlieferungsgeschichte der frühnachexilischen Prophetie (SSN 10; Assen: Van Gorcum, 1967); E. J. Bickerman, "En marge de l'écriture," RB 88 (1981) 19-23; M. J. Boda and J. Novotny, eds. From the Foundations to the Crenellations: Essays on Temple Building in the Ancient Near East and the Hebrew Bible (AOAT 366; Münster: Ugarit-Verlag, 2010); R. S. Ellis, Foundation Deposits in Ancient Mesopotamia (YNER 2, New Haven: Yale University Press, 1968); M. H. Floyd, "The Nature of the Narrative and the Evidence of Redaction in Haggai," VT 45 (1995) 470-90; idem, Minor Prophets: Part 2 (FOTL 22; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2000); P. R. House, The Unity of the Twelve (JSOTSup 97; Sheffield: Almond, 1990); V. Hurowitz, I Have Built You an Exalted House: Temple Building in the Bible in Light of Mesopotamian and Northwest Semitic Writings

(JSOTSup 115; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1992); S. J. Japhet, "The Concept of the 'Remnant' in the Restoration Period: On the Vocabulary of Self-Definition," in From the Rivers of Babylon to the Highlands of Judah: Collected Studies on the Restoration Period, ed. S. Japhet (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2006) 432-49; J. Kessler, The Book of Haggai: Prophecy and Society in Early Persian Yehud (VTSup 91; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2002); idem, "Haggai, Zerubbabel, and the Political Status of Yehud: The Signet Ring in Haggai 2:23," in Prophets, Prophecy, and Prophetic Texts in Second Temple Judaism, ed. M. H. Floyd and R. D. Haak (LHBOTS 427; New York: T & T Clark, 2006) 102-19; idem, "Tradition, Continuity and Covenant in the Book of Haggai: an Alternative Voice from Early Persian Yehud," in Traditions in Transition: Haggai and Zechariah 1-8 in the Trajectory of Hebrew Theology, ed. M. H. Floyd and M. J. Boda (LHBOTS 475; New York: T & T Clark, 2008) 1-39; idem, "Temple Building in Haggai: Variations of a Theme," in From the Foundations to the Crenellations: Essays on Temple Building in the Ancient Near East and the Hebrew Bible, ed. M. J. Boda and J. Novotny (AOAT 366; Münster: Ugarit-Verlag, 2010) 357-80; A. Lemaire, "Populations et territoires de la Palestine à l'époque perse," Transeu 3 (1990) 31-74; O. Lipschits, The Fall and Rise of Jerusalem: Judah under Babylonian Rule (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2005); R. Mason, "The Purpose of the 'Editorial Framework' of the Book of Haggai," VT 27 (1977) 413-21; idem, "The Prophets of the Restoration," in Israel's Prophetic Tradition: Essays in Honour of Peter R. Ackroyd, ed. R. Coggins, A. Philipps and M. Knibb (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982) 137-53; J. Nogalski, Literary Precursors to the Book of the Twelve (BZAW 217; New York: de Gruyter, 1993a); idem, Redactional Processes in the Book of the Twelve (BZAW 218; New York: de Gruyter, 1993b); A. Sérandour, "Réflexions à propos d'un livre récent sur Aggée-Zacharie 1-8," Transeu 10 (1995) 75-84; idem, "Les récits bibliques de la construction du Second Temple: Leurs enjeux," Transeu 11 (1996) 9-32; O. H. Steck, "Theological Streams of Tradition," in Tradition and Theology in the Old Testament, ed. D. Knight (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977) 183-214; J. E. Tollington, Tradition and Innovation in Haggai and Zechariah 1-8 (JSOTSup 150; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1993); L. Waterman, "The Camouflaged Purge of Three Messianic Conspirators,” JNES 13 (1954) 73–78; J. Wöhrle, “The Formation and Intention of the Haggai-Zechariah Corpus,” JHScr 6.10 (2006) <http://www.arts.ualberta.ca/JHS/Articles/article_60.pdf>.

J. Kessler

HARLOTRY. See FEMINIST INTERPRETATION; WOMEN, FEMALE IMAGERY.

HEAVEN. See COSMOLOGY.

HEAVENLY BEINGS. See ANGELS, MESSENGERS, HEAVENLY BEINGS.

HEBREW LANGUAGE

There are many striking features of the Hebrew language of the Prophetic Books. These include oracular forms, both native (e.g., the accusation-threat pattern of judgment speech, woe oracles) and borrowed (e.g., funeral dirge, trial speech), typical prophetic phrases (e.g., messenger formulae such as kôh ’amar yhwh [“thus says the LORD”] and ne’um yhwh [“oracle of the LORD”]), metaphoric and parabolic speech (e.g., Ezek 16) and cryptic expressions (e.g., Is 28:10, 13). Most such features constitute distinct and independent topics in their own right (e.g., form criticism, metaphor). By contrast, the linguistic peculiarities in the Prophetic Books generally are absorbed into the critical discussion of their composition and dating. At the same time, some of the most debated issues in the translation and interpretation of the Prophetic Books revolve around questions of the poetic form of prophetic speech and the temporal orientation of prophetic passages as indicated most frequently by verbal forms. This article surveys the role of language in critical introductory discussion of the Prophetic Books and focuses in particular on the issues of poetry and temporality.

1. Poetry in the Prophetic Books
2. Language and Composition of the Prophetic Books
3. Temporal Orientation of the Prophetic Books

1. Poetry in the Prophetic Books.

The major portion of the Prophetic Books is treated as poetry, while several distinct sections clearly are prose narrative (see 2 below on individual books; on the difficulties in distinguishing prose and poetry in Biblical Hebrew in light of the lack of visual versification, see Cook, DOTWPW 260-67). The “prose particle count” method developed by F. Andersen and A. Forbes aims at distinguishing prose and poetry based on the density of certain grammatical words that are recognized as being common in prose narrative and infrequent in unambiguous poetic texts. F. Andersen and D. Freedman report that according to this measure, most prophetic literature is neither clearly poetic nor clearly prose but rather is “an intermediate mode” (Andersen and Freedman 1989, 145). C. Meyers and E. Meyers reflect this view when they explain that although a prose-particle count clearly identifies Haggai and Zechariah 1–8 as prose, they contain smaller units that are “clearly ‘poetic’” and might be properly termed “oracular prose” (Meyers and Meyers 1987, lxvi-lxvii).

Similarly, A. Hill, using the same prose-particle procedure, identifies the book of Malachi as prose while also recognizing the “elevated” style of the oracles, evident from the numerous poetic devices employed (Hill 1998, 24, 38-39). Hill also observes that much of German scholarship has followed H. Gunkel in treating the oracles of Malachi as poetry, while British and American scholars have tended to treat them as prose (Hill 1998, 23). Unsurprisingly, then, it is easy to find differences between modern versions and translations with respect to the visual layout of prophetic passages. For example, the NRSV presents Ezekiel 30 as almost all poetry (Ezek 30:1, 5, 9, 20 are set as prose). The REB is mostly in agreement with the NRSV, except that it also sets off Ezekiel 30:7-8, 12b as prose. By contrast, the NAB and the NJB treat Ezekiel 30 as prose.

The distinction between prose and poetry in the Prophetic Books is part of, and sometimes confused with, the more crucial issue of the distinction between literary and oral. That is, a major question within compositional historical research on the Prophetic Books is which parts of these books originated as oral proclamations by the prophets and which began as literary compositions. Andersen and Freedman note that oral speech, as a general rule, is more “poetical” than literary composition (Andersen and Freedman 1980, 61). This observation, while valid, served in past generations as a justification for the assumption that all poetic prophetic texts began as oral speeches and all prose prophetic texts are the product of editorial, literary work (e.g., G. Hölscher attributed to the prophet just 144 verses of the sixteen poetic and five elevated prose sections in the book of Ezekiel). However, in recent decades this assumption has been shown to be simplistic (e.g., see Block, 1:17-23 on Ezekiel in this regard, and see Floyd on the relationship between oral and written prophecy generally). It seems groundless to assume that prophets could relate God's messages to the people only in poetic form or that redactors could compose only prose. In Jeremiah, for example, we find a mixture of more poetic and more prosaic prophetic speeches along with third-person narratives by the prophet, often attributed to the work of his scribe, Baruch (see Holladay, 11-16). The book of Ezekiel is notable for being mostly prose, but there is good reason to think that the dated "memoir" style of preserving Ezekiel's prophetic pronouncements derives from his own hand (see Block, 1:20). As new methods for distinguishing oral and literary origins of the biblical literature are developed (e.g., Polak), scholars may be in a better position to discriminate between these categories within the prophetic literature.

In any case, the Prophetic Books have in common with unambiguously poetic books, such as Psalms and Job, numerous poetic devices such as metaphor, word play and alliteration. Examples include the following: (1) word play on qāyīš ("summer fruit") and qēš ("end") in the vision in Amos 8:1-3 (see Alter, 160-61); (2) rhyme/alliteration in Isaiah 5:7: wayēqaw lēmīšpaṭ wēhinnē mīšpāh lišdāqā wēhinnē šē'āqā ("he hoped for justice, but look, oppression; he looked for righteousness, but look, an anguished cry"), and in Isaiah 7:9: 'im lō' ta'āmīnū kī lō' tē'āmēnū ("if you do not believe, you will not be established") (see Wildberger, 675); (3) the frequency of double-duty particles in Jeremiah, that is, the ellipsis of prepositions or other grammatical words, as in Jeremiah 3:23: miggēbā'ōt hāmōn hārīm ("from the hills, [from] the tumult of the mountains") (see Holladay, 75).

2. Language and Composition of the Prophetic Books.

Close attention to the language of the Prophetic Books has long been thought crucial to unraveling their often complex history of composition (see Formation of the Prophetic Books). So strong is this conviction that discussions of their language rarely take place outside of analyses of their composition history. This section surveys the linguistic features and their role in the composition history of each of the Prophetic Books.

2.1. Isaiah. The book of Isaiah is mostly poetic, containing some of the loftiest poetic passages among the Prophetic Books (esp. Is 40—55). H. Wildberger cautions, however, that differences in poetic form (meter) in the book fail to distinguish among the compositional layers in the book (Wildberger, 672). Interpersed within the poetry are several notable prose narrative passages, including the call narrative (Is 6), the narrative of the symbolic names (Is 7—8) and the narrative of Sennacherib's threat to Jerusalem (Is 36—39), which parallels (and probably derives from) the account in 2 Kings 18—20.

Differences between vocabulary and style in Isaiah 1—39 and Isaiah 40—66 are primary data for deciding the critical question of authorship of these sections. There are a few distinctive phrases, notably "the Holy One of Israel" (Is 1:4; 5:19, 24; 10:20; 12:6; 17:7; 29:19; 30:11-12, 15; 31:1; 37:23; 41:14, 16, 20; 43:3, 14; 45:11; 47:4; 48:17; 49:7; 54:5; 55:5; 60:9, 14), spread throughout the book, which some scholars point to as evidence of single author for the book (e.g., Oswalt, 20-21). However, there are numerous other phrases distinctive of Isaiah 40—66 but rare or absent in Isaiah 1—39: bāhar ("to choose") in reference to God's choice of Israel or his servant (Is 14:1; 41:8-9; 43:10; 44:1-2; 48:10; 49:7); the verb hālal ("to praise") (Is 38:18; 41:16; 45:25; 62:9; 64:10) and the noun tēhillā ("praise") (Is 42:8, 10, 12; 43:21; 48:9; 60:6, 18; 61:3, 11; 62:7; 63:7); kī 'ānīyhwh with modifying relative clause ("because I am Yahweh who ...") (Is 41:13; 43:3; 45:3; 49:23, 26; 60:16; 61:8); participle references to God as redeemer (gā'al, "to redeem") (Is 41:14; 43:14; 44:6, 24; 47:4; 48:17; 49:7, 26; 54:5, 8; 59:20; 60:16; 63:16) or creator (bārā', "to create") (Is 4:5; 40:26, 28; 41:20; 42:5; 43:1, 7, 15; 45:7-8, 12, 18; 48:7; 54:16; 57:19; 65:17-18) (see Driver 1908, 238-40). Other differences exhibited between the language of Isaiah 1—39 and Isaiah 40—66 are more difficult to quantify. S. R. Driver summarizes as follows: "There are also literary features of a more general character, which differentiate the author of c. 40-66 from Isaiah. Isaiah's style is terse and compact; the movement of his periods is stately and measured; his rhetoric is grave and restrained. In these chapters [Is 40—66] a subject is often developed at considerable length; the style is much more flowing; the rhetoric is warm and impassioned; and the prophet often bursts into lyrical strain" (Driver 1908, 240-41).

2.2. Jeremiah. The book of Jeremiah shows much more complex a mixture of prose and poetry than Isaiah. Jeremiah 1—25 contains many poetic oracles of judgment, whereas prose narrative accounts of Jeremiah's life are contained mostly in Jeremiah 26—45. Interspersed through these chapters are prose speeches that exhibit in their vocabulary and syntax a relationship with the prose speeches in the books of Deuteronomy, Samuel and Kings. Finally, Jeremiah 46—51 contains poetic oracles against the nations.

This variety of materials is widely understood to indicate a complex composition history. The relationship between the language of Jeremiah and Deuteronomy has been of particular interest, and W. Holladay concludes that there is dependency in both directions: Jeremiah borrowed from proto-Deuteronomic material while latter editors of Deuteronomy in turn borrowed from Jeremiah (Holladay, 53). Further, Holladay discusses possible borrowings of language in Jeremiah from other sources, including the pentateuchal traditions, the Historical Books, and earlier prophetic books (Holladay, 35-70). In turn, Jeremiah's language seems to have had an impact on subsequent biblical texts and writers, including Lamentations, exilic Deuteronomic editors and the later prophetic books of Ezekiel, Second and Third Isaiah, and Zechariah 1—8 (see Holladay, 80-93).

This evidence of widespread *intertextuality in Jeremiah along with disagreements about what data are relevant to drawing a linguistic profile make it difficult to state anything definite about the language of Jeremiah, thus making problematic R. Polzin's use of it as a benchmark in his typology. For instance, Holladay's excellent survey of "Jeremiah's use of language" yields nothing concrete with regard to Jeremiah's particular dialect of Hebrew (Holladay, 75-78). Most of his observations, such as double-duty particles, word plays and ambiguity, merely point to the poetic features in Jeremiah, while more particular uses, such as the pleonastic infinitive absolute for contradictory statements (Jer 4:10; 13:12; 22:10), do not constitute dialectal evidence.

2.3. Ezekiel. The book of Ezekiel is different again from both Jeremiah and Isaiah in that it is mainly prose with only a few poetic passages (e.g., Ezek 7; 17; 19). Even where there are more extended poetic sections, they are interspersed with narrative portions (e.g., the oracles against the nations in Ezek 26—32).

In like manner to the centrality of Deuteronomy in studies of intertextuality in Jeremiah, the focus in Ezekiel studies is on the relationship of its language to the Priestly writings/school. However, while Ezekiel exhibits similar concerns and vocabulary as Priestly books (e.g., Leviticus), it also shows a certain uniqueness of language. W. Zimmerli notes that Ezekiel lacks many terms and verbs found in other portions of the OT while showing a high degree of unique vocabulary (Zimmerli, 22-24). For example, frequently occurring terms for "deliverance" or "salvation" (terms from the roots yšc, g'l, pdh) do not appear in Ezekiel. Similarly, key terms from Deuteronomic thought, such as bātāḥ ("to trust"), hesed ("covenant loyalty" or "loving-kindness") and 'āhab ("to love") are absent from Ezekiel. Compared with Psalms, Ezekiel lacks the language of "to cry out" (šw^c, š^cq, z^cq), and in contrast to the Priestly writings and Holiness Code (Lev 17—26), Ezekiel notably lacks terms such as qāṭar ("to burn incense"), 'iššeh ("fire offering") and nādar ("to make a vow").

Against these absences, Ezekiel contains some 130 unique words. For example, the following verbs occur only in Ezekiel: Piel btq, "to slaughter" (Ezek 16:40); Qal dlh, "to make turbid (waters)" (Ezek 32:2, 13); Qal hḏr, "to penetrate (with a sword)" (Ezek 21:19); Hophal and Pual hṭl, "to be swathed" (Ezek 16:4); Hiphil t'h, "to lead astray" (Ezek 13:10) (cf. t'h); Qal khl, "to paint (the eyes)" (Ezek 23:40); Qal ksm, "to trim (the hair)" (Ezek 44:20); Qal kpn, "to turn toward" (Ezek 17:7); Qal nq^c, "to free oneself, turn away" (Ezek 23:22, 28) (cf. y^cq); Piel shh, "to sweep away" (Ezek 26:4); Qal wg, "to bake" (Ezek 4:12); Niphal šrb, "to be scorched" (Ezek 21:3); Polel qss, "to pluck" (?) (Ezek 17:9); Qal qrm, "to cover" (Ezek 17:8); Piel šsm, "to lead along on a rope" (Ezek 39:2). Some of Ezekiel's unique vocabulary is used multiple times—for example: ʾāḡappīm, “troops” (Ezek 12:14; 17:21; 38:6, 9, 22; 39:4); ʾelgābīš, “hail (stones)” (Ezek 13:11, 13; 38:22); ʾattīq, “passage, street” (?) (Ezek 41:15-16; 42:3, 5); ḥābōl, “pledge” (Ezek 18:12, 16; 33:15); ḥelʾā, “rust” (Ezek 24:6, 11-12); ḥāšmal, some precious stone (?) (Ezek 1:4, 27; 8:2); ḥittīt, “terror” (Ezek 26:17; 32:23-27, 32); mēkūrā, “(ethnic) origin” (Ezek 16:3; 21:30; 29:14); miqsām, “oracle” (Ezek 12:24; 13:7); ʾagābīm, “passions, love songs” (Ezek 23:11; 33:31-32); ʾizzābōn, “merchandise” (Ezek 27:12, 14, 16, 19, 22, 24, 33); pōʾrā, “shoots” (Ezek 17:6; 31:5-6, 8, 12-13); šammeret, “top (of a tree)” (Ezek 17:3, 22; 31:3, 10, 14); rēkullā, “trade” (Ezek 26:12; 28:5, 16, 18); taznūt, “harlotry” (Ezek 16:15, 20, 22, 25-26, 29, 33-34, 36; 23:7-8, 11, 14, 17-19, 29, 35, 43) (see further Zimmerli, 23).

Ezekiel’s language is also notably formulaic (see Block, 1:30-39): the address ben-ʾādām (“son of man”) occurs ninety-three times in the book and elsewhere only in Daniel 8:17; Ezekiel’s favorite designation for his audience is bēt-yiśrāʾēl (“house of Israel”), which occurs eighty-three times in the book, accounting for over half (57 percent) of its occurrences in the Bible; the introductory formula wayhi dēbar yhw̄h ʾelay lēʾmōr (“the word of Yahweh came to me”) occurs more than fifty times, and the messenger formula kōh-ʾāmar ʾādōnāy yhw̄h (“thus says the Lord Yahweh”) occurs over one hundred times; and Ezekiel’s distinctive “recognition” formula wēyādēʾū kī ʾānī yhw̄h (“then they will know that I am Yahweh”) occurs, in several variations, over fifty times. Finally, Ezekiel is replete with commands to Ezekiel to engage in prophetic activities, most frequently hinnābēʾ . . . wēʾāmartā (“prophesy . . . and say”), some twenty-four times.

As in the case of Jeremiah, however, it is difficult to draw clear conclusions from these data regarding the book’s composition. Arguments regarding dating have drawn attention to the extent of Aramaisms in the book (see Zimmerli, 21-22), but disputes over the determination and definition of “Aramaisms” and their significance in dating biblical texts (see Eskhult; Hurvitz) make even their presence or absence in the book equivocal for questions of dialect or dating. M. Rooker has examined the language of Ezekiel in light of Polzin’s typology of “Classical” and “Late” Biblical Hebrew. He concludes that the mixture of late and early features in the book points to its language as “transitional” between the two stages (Rooker, 185-86). The central focus of Rooker’s book is on the thirty-seven Late Biblical Hebrew features found in Ezekiel, which include the areas of orthography (e.g., plene דָּוִד [dāwīd] in Ezek 34:23 versus דָּוִד [dāwīd] spelling of “David” in Ezek 34:24; 37:24-25), morphology (e.g., first-person subject pronoun ʾānī [169x] instead of ʾānōkī [only in Ezek 36:28]; third-person masculine pronoun hēm used in place of the feminine hēn [Ezek 1:5-6; 3:13; 23:47]) (for a full list, see Rooker, 182-83), and syntax (e.g., the use of the direct-object marker ʾet with subjects [Ezek 10:22; 16:4; 17:21; 20:16; 29:4; 35:10; 44:3]). However, Polzin’s typology has been severely criticized in recent years (e.g., Young, Rezetko and Ehrensverd), calling for a reassessment of this and other data with regard to the stages of development of Hebrew.

2.4. Daniel. The language of the book of Daniel has received a good deal of attention, not only because of its curious bilingual Hebrew-Aramaic character (Dan 2:4b—7:28 is written in Aramaic), but also because the language data have been central in dating the book—a debate involving issues of prophecy versus apocalyptic literature and the nature of Scripture. Over a century ago, Driver famously remarked, “The verdict of the language of Daniel is thus clear. The Persian words presuppose a period after the Persian empire had been well established: the Greek words demand, the Hebrew supports, and the Aramaic permits, a date after the conquest of Palestine by Alexander the Great” (Driver 1900, lxiii). Arguments for an earlier date have likewise looked to the linguistic data for support.

K. Kitchen pointed out twenty-one possible Akkadian loanwords (ʾargēwān, “purple”; ʾāšap, “enchanter”; ʾattūn, “furnace”; ḥēkal, “temple”; zīw, “radiance”; zākū, “innocence”; zēmān, “time”; ḥšh, “need”; karbēlā, “hat”; korsē, “throne”; mēnē, “mina”; nēwālū, “dunghill”; sēgan, “prefect”; ʾiddān, “time”; peḥā, “governor”; peḥar, “potter”; parzel, “iron”; pērēs, “half-shekel”; sēzib, “rescue”; sēgal, “concubine”; ʾēlat, “triumvir”) and nineteen Persian loanwords (ʾādargāzar, “counselor”; ʾazdā, “certain”; ʾāḥašdarpan, “satrap”; gēdābar, “treasurer”; dat, “law”; dētābar, “law official”; ḥabrā, “companion”; haddām, “limb”; hamnikā, “necklace”; zan, “kind”; nēbizbā, “present”; nebrēšā, “lamp”; nēdan, “sheath”; sērak, “official"; paṭīš, "shirt"; pitgām, "message"; rāz, "secret"; tiptāy, "police chief"; kārōz, "herald") in the book (Kitchen, 34-35; for discussion of this list, see Collins, 18). More importantly, Kitchen observes that the administrative terms are predominantly Persian loanwords, some of which the Greek translators of the book did not understand (Kitchen, 40, 43). J. Collins notes that while not requiring a pre-Hellenistic date for the book, this fact stands over and against the view that the book wholly originated in the second century (Collins, 19).

The increased finds of Imperial Aramaic (600-200 BC) documents and the Qumran discoveries have greatly advanced the characterization of Biblical Aramaic and the Aramaic of Daniel in particular. There are relatively few linguistic (versus stylistic) differences between the Biblical Aramaic of the fifth-century BC book of Ezra and Daniel besides the preservation of the older third-person plural pronoun himmō in Ezra versus himmōn in Daniel. Collins notes that on the one hand, comparison with the fourth-century BC Samaria papyri shows the Aramaic of Daniel to be later, while on the other hand, the language appears to be older than the Qumran Aramaic in the Genesis Apocryphon (Collins, 16-17). Collins concludes, "The balance of probability, then, favors a date in the early Hellenistic period for the Aramaic portions of Daniel, although a precise dating on linguistic grounds is not possible" (Collins, 17).

The Hebrew of Daniel has more commonalities with Second Temple literature (e.g., Chronicles) than with exilic compositions. Driver lists twenty-five words/phrases that Daniel shares almost exclusively with the latest canonical writings: malkūt, "kingdom" (e.g., Dan 1:1) (cf. mamlākā); miqṣat, "some of" (Dan 1:2, 5, 15, 18) (cf. partitive min preposition); indirect command ʾmr l- versus direct speech (Dan 1:3, 18; 2:2); partēmīm, "nobles" (Dan 1:3); madā, "knowledge" (Dan 1:4, 17); minnā, "to appoint" (Dan 1:5, 10, 11); the numeral following rather than preceding the substantive (e.g., Dan 1:5, 12); ʾāser lammā, "lest" (Dan 1:10); hiyyēb, "to incur guilt" (Dan 1:10); gīl, "age" (Dan 1:10); the order proper name followed by hammelek versus the earlier reverse order (Dan 1:21; 8:1); absence of wayhî ("and it was") before temporal infinitival phrases (e.g., Dan 8:8, 18); tāmīd, to describe the daily burnt offering versus the older ʾōlōt tāmīd (e.g., Dan 8:11, 12); the expression ʿal ʿomdī ("upon my standing") (Dan 8:18); nibʿat, "to be afraid" (Dan 8:17); ʿamad for "to stand up" versus earlier qūm (e.g., Dan 11:2-4, 7); ʾābāl with adversative ("but") force (Dan 10:7, 21); ʿāsar kōāh, "to have strength" = "to be able to" (Dan 10:8, 16; 11:6); šāpīr, "he-goat" (Dan 8:5, 8, 21); rāšam, "to inscribe" (Dan 10:21); heʿemūd, with the sense "to appoint, establish" (Dan 11:11, 13, 14); tōqep, "power, force" (Dan 11:17); bizzā, "prey" (Dan 11:24); ʾappeden, "palace" (Dan 11:45); hižhīr, "shine" (Dan 12:3) (Driver 1908, 506-7).

Collins concurs with Driver's judgment that the "grace and fluency" even of early Second Temple literature is absent in Daniel (Collins, 22). By contrast, the Hebrew of Daniel is characterized by numerous Aramaisms, Persian loanwords (e.g., from Driver's list above: madā, "knowledge"; miqṣat, "some of"; šāpīr, "he-goat"; rāšam, "to inscribe"; gīl, "age"), and by late grammatical constructions and expressions often in common with Qumran literature (e.g., hyh ["to be"] with periphrastic participle in Dan 1:16; 8:5; 10:2 and about fifty times at Qumran; absence of wayhî ("and it was") before temporal infinitival phrases; long first-person forms in Dan 10:16 and regularly at Qumran; the late idiom šām ʿal leb ["to lay upon the heart" = "to resolve"] in Dan 1:8) (see further Collins, 20-23).

Finally, the bilingualism in Daniel has been judged to be more than a stylistic curiosity, but a compositionally significant characteristic: the Aramaic stories (Dan 2-6) may have circulated independently before being incorporated into the book, to which was added an introductory narrative, possibly originally in Aramaic (Dan 1), and the vision account of Daniel 7. Perhaps somewhat later the Hebrew chapters of Daniel 8-12 were added (see Collins, 24).

2.5. The Book of the Twelve (Minor Prophets).

The type of discussions in which the language of the Book of the Twelve (Minor Prophets) features varies from book to book in the collection among three main sorts: identification of "northernisms," intertextuality or dependence on other books within the canon or specifically the Book of the Twelve, or discussions of dating and composition. This last category is consistently interrelated with discussions of the first two sorts. For example, northernisms in Micah 6-7 to some scholars are indicative of northern prophetic authorship; intertextuality, if the direction of dependence can be demonstrated, is crucial in relative dating of the books in the collection as well as identifying the composition of the collection itself. The language of the Book of the Twelve is surveyed here in terms of these three types of discussion.

Northernisms, or instances of Israelian Hebrew, in the Book of the Twelve are limited to Hosea, Amos and Micah 6—7. Northernisms in Hosea are unsurprising, given that the prophet probably was a native of a northern tribe (see the extensive treatment by Yoo), while northernisms in Amos are explained by his prophesying in the north despite hailing from Tekoa in Judah. Micah 6—7 was identified as coming from the hand of a northern prophet by F. Burkitt already in 1926, and the presence of Israelian Hebrew in those chapters is thought to support his thesis. In these books/chapters, grammatical forms appear that align with Aramaic (e.g., rô'eh ["desire"] versus "shepherd") in Hos 12:2; negative 'al used to negate a substantive, wā'al rā' ["and not evil"], in Amos 5:14, as in Deir 'Alla; Hithpael used as a passive, wēyistammēr huqqōt 'omrî ["and the laws of Omri are observed"], in Mic 6:16), Phoenician (e.g., yāsûrû ["to rebel against"], from srr but vocalized as Phoenician ô > û, in Hos 7:14; indefinite use of demonstrative, yôm hû' ["that day"], in Mic 7:12 [cf. Heb hayyôm hahu']), Ugaritic (e.g., third-weak root infinitive ḥakkê in Hos 6:9 vocalized as Ugaritic [cf. Heb ḥakkôt]), or a combination of these (e.g., fem. demonstrative zô in Hos 7:16 like Aramaic and Phoenician [cf. Heb zō'î]; negative bal in Hos 7:2; 9:16 like Phoenician and Ugaritic; narrative use of infinitive absolute in Amos 4:5, wēqatter mēḥāmēs tōda ["and burn a tōda-offering from heaven"], like Ugaritic and Phoenician; particle of existence 'iš in Mic 6:10, cognate with Ugaritic and Aramaic [cf. Heb yēš] [Rendsburg]). Vocabulary items also appear in these books/chapters that G. Rendsburg identifies as part of the lexicon of northern Hebrew (e.g., 'ahab ["love"] in Hos 8:9; 'armôn ["palace, citadel"] in, e.g., Hos 8:14; Amos 1:4; 'etnâ ["price"] in Hos 2:14; ḥēkāl ["palace"] in Hos 8:14; Amos 8:3; ḥēdeq ["brier, thorn"] in Mic 7:4; ḥēleq ["field"] in Hos 5:7; Amos 7:4).

Intertextuality is a notable feature in several of the Minor Prophets. A. Berlin notes that Zephaniah is a "study in intertextuality" and goes on to cite parallels between Zephaniah and Genesis 1—11 (e.g., the Table of Nations in Genesis 10 and the oracles of the nations in Zephaniah 2), Deuteronomic vocabulary (e.g., the description of religious syncretism in Zephaniah 1 and the description found in 2 Kings 23), other prophetic books (e.g., 'āsōp 'āsēp ["I will sweep away"] in Zeph 1:2 and 'āsōp 'āsîpēm ["I will utterly sweep them away"] in Jer 8:13; ḥas mippēnē 'ādōnāy yhwḥ ["hush before the Lord God"] in Zeph 1:7 and ḥas mippānāyw ["hush before him"] in Hab 2:20), Psalms (e.g., 'anwē ḥā'āreš ["humble of the land"] [cf. Ps 76:10]), and Wisdom literature (e.g., 'awlā ["wrong"] in Zeph 3:5, 13, which occurs only three other places in the Minor Prophets [Mic 3:10; Hab 2:12; Mal 2:6] but nine times in Job and in Prov 22:8) (Berlin, 13-17). Similarly, Obadiah shows direct dependence on Jeremiah's Edom oracle (Jer 49), and P. Raabe lists numerous other phrases in Obadiah that parallel other books in the canon (Raabe, 32). In recent decades interest has turned to intertextuality within the Book of the Twelve as a clue to the composition and redaction of the collection as whole. J. Nogalski argues that "catchwords" appear at the seams of the books (i.e., last chapter of one book and first chapter of the next book) as a literary strategy for tying the books together in the collection (Nogalski 1993a; 1993b).

The importance of the language for dating the Prophetic Books is foremost in the case of Jonah, Joel and the postexilic books of Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi. The dating of Jonah and Joel is notoriously difficult, which accounts for the use of linguistic data to narrow possibilities. For instance, J. Crenshaw notes a number of linguistic peculiarities in Joel that argue for a sixth- or fifth-century BC date for the book, including the following: late words such as ḥaššelah ("missile" [Joel 2:8]), ḥūs ("have compassion on" [Joel 2:17]), ṣaḥanā ("stench" [Joel 2:20]), sōp ("rear" [Joel 2:20]) and first-person pronoun 'anî instead of 'anōkî; and late expressions such as bēt ("house" of the temple [e.g., Joel 1:9]) and bēnē-šiyôn ("sons of Zion" [Joel 2:23]) (Crenshaw, 26). At the same time, Joel exhibits intertextuality with other books of the Bible (see the list in Crenshaw, 27-28) and uncertain temporal orientation with regard to the "day of the LORD": are the events past or future (see 3 below)?

Jonah contains a number of "late" or Aramaic-based words or grammatical expressions that feature in discussions of composition date. These include mallāh ("sailor" [Jon 1:5]), sepīnā ("ship" [Jon 1:5]), za'ap ("fury" [Jon 1:15]), qerī'ā ("message" [Jon 3:2]), ta'am ("authority" [Jon 3:7]), ribbō ("myriad" [Jon 4:11]), Hith-pael št ("to intercede" [Jon 1:6]), Qal štq ("to calm down," used with inanimate subject [Jon 1:11]), Piel mnh ("to appoint" [Jon 2:1; 4:6-8]); Piel qdm ("to plan" [Jon 4:2]), Qal ml ("to labor over" [Jon 4:10]); words uncommonly associated with inanimate entities, such as hāšab ("to consider") with the subject "boat" (Jon 1:4), šataq ("to calm down" [Jon 1:11]) and za'ap ("fury" [Jon 1:15]) used of the sea, hūs ("to pity" with the object "plant" (Jon 4:10); and expressions such as hatar ("to dig") used of rowing (Jon 1:13), ʾēlohē haššamayim ("God of the heavens" [Jon 1:9]), the order hannūn weraḥūm ("gracious and compassionate" [Jon 4:2]) versus raḥum wēhannūn (Ex 34:6), the š relative constructions (Jon 1:7, 12, 4:10) and the interchange of the prepositions ʾel and ʾal (Sasson 1990: 22-23).

The language of the postexilic prophetic books—Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi—have been subjected to an analysis within the framework of Polzin's typology Late Biblical Hebrew in an effort to sort out precisely when these books might be dated relative to the other postexilic writings—Ezra, Nehemiah, Chronicles (for summary, see Hill 1982; 1983; 1998, 395-400). Polzin's typology Late Biblical Hebrew is based on analyzing the frequency of nineteen different features within Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah and selections from the J and E source in the Pentateuch, the various layers of the Priestly code, the court history (2 Sam 13—1 Kings 1) and portions of the work of the Deuteronomist (i.e., framework of Deuteronomy and parts of the Deuteronomistic history) (see Polzin, 85-90). Polzin concluded that JE, the court history and the Deuteronomist are Classical Biblical Hebrew, while the Priestly code is Late Biblical Hebrew, as are Chronicles, Ezra and Nehemiah. Hill has argued that using the same set of features places the postexilic prophetic books—Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi—typologically between Classical Biblical Hebrew and Late Biblical Hebrew of the later parts of the Priestly code, which are dated to the period of Ezra and Nehemiah (c. 600-450 BC). More specifically, Hill concludes these prophetic books, along with Jonah and Joel, should be dated to around 500 BC (Hill 1998, 400).

Given how late in the prophetic stream of writing these postexilic prophetic books are, it is unsurprising how much intertextuality is found in them. Meyers and Meyers discuss the numerous "correspondences" of language between Haggai and Zechariah 1—8 (Meyers and Meyers 1987, xlviii-l), and in their treatment of Zechariah 9—14 they list the numerous correspondences between those chapters and other parts of the Hebrew Bible (Meyers and Meyers 1993, 35-45). Hill's assortment of intertextual links, set out in a verse-by-verse list, shows how rich these latest of prophetic books were in their use and reuse of vocabulary from earlier parts of the canon (Hill 1998, 401-12).

Linguistic discussions of the books of Nahum and Habakkuk, apart from intertextuality within the Book of the Twelve, are largely confined to philological discussions of difficult verses, which are plentiful, or identification of Akkadian loanwords (e.g., the connection of mēšurā in Nah 2:1 [MT 2:2] and māšôr in Hab 2:1 with Akk nāšar ["guard"], interpreted as "guard tower" in both cases).

The foregoing characterizations of the language of the Prophetic Books (e.g., descriptions such as "late" language and "Aramaisms") have recently become controversial, with a few scholars arguing that linguistic data cannot be reliably used to date the biblical texts either relative to one another or absolutely (e.g., Young, Rezetko and Ehrensverd), and others responding with new assessments of the existing data (e.g., Miller-Naudé and Zevit).

3. Temporal Orientation of the Prophetic Books.

Perhaps no characteristic of Hebrew language is more troublesome for the interpretation of the Prophetic Books as the temporal contours of its verbal system. The tense-aspect-mood system of Biblical Hebrew is still not fully understood, and the switching among various verb forms in the prophetic literature, especially the poetic sections, is such that in places it defies explanation. Such problems are exacerbated in the Prophetic Books by the caricaturing of the prophets as "foretellers," which casts into further confusion the uncertainties about whether the prophets in places are making pronouncements about the past, the present, the future, or a combination of

Habakkuk	Verb + gloss	Hebrew	NRSV	REB	NAB	NJB	NJPS
1:2a	šiwwa' tî , "I cry out"	perfect	future	noun	present	present	future
1:2b	tîšmā' , "you hear"	imperfect	future	future	present	future	(future- implied)
1:2c	'ez' aq , "I cry out"	imperfect	future	present	present	present	future
1:2d	tôšîa , "you save"	imperfect	future	present	present	future	(future- implied)

Table 1. Verb Translations of Habakkuk 1:2

these. For example, J. Barton makes this stunning admission: "Nothing can really be said about the time references in Joel on the basis of the verb forms used" (Barton, 69). The variety of ways the verbs in Habakkuk 1:2 ("O LORD, how long shall I cry for help, and you will not listen? Or cry to you 'Violence!' and you will not save?" [NRSV]) have been rendered by modern translators is a good illustration of the difficulties (table 1 is based on Andersen, 103).

The difficulties evident here can be multiplied many times over. They emerge from uncertainty with the overall temporal orientation (Is he complaining of things that have happened or of things that will happen? Is he crying out, or has he cried out, or both?), the uncertain syntax (Does the initial interrogative influence the interpretation of the perfect verb that follows, or should it be treated as extending only to the vocative: "How long, LORD? I have cried out!"), and ambiguity of meaning for some forms (Are "will not hear" and "will not save" temporal statements, or are they descriptions of God's unwillingness to respond?).

Behind such passage-specific issues stand several features of the Hebrew verbal system that feed into such ambiguities. First, tense is not encoded in the morphology of the two main verbal forms, the perfect and imperfect. Instead, these two verb forms contrast in terms of the way they portray events: either as a whole event with beginning and end point in view (perfect), or as in the process of unfolding (imperfect) (see Cook 2001; 2006). In the realm of past tense, this distinction may be analogically illustrated by the contrast between English simple past ("it flew") and past progressive ("it was flying"). Nevertheless, these two verb forms imply a "default" temporal interpretation (see Smith), such that the perfect is generally interpreted as referring to past events, and the imperfect refers to nonpast events. Nevertheless, crossover is possible and demonstrates their lack of explicit temporal indications—for example, 1 Samuel 1:10, "She prayed to Yhwh and she was weeping greatly" (imperfect), and Genesis 15:18, "To your descendants I hereby give this land" (perfect). Difficulties with the temporal interpretation of these forms are particularly evident in the sphere of present time, where the two forms most overlap, such as in proverbial statements (see Cook, DOTWPW 260-67) or in prophetic passages such as Habakkuk 1:1-2, cited above.

Second, both the perfect and imperfect forms can express both statements of fact (indicative mood) and statements of possibility (nonindicative mood). Nonindicative statements most frequently are expressions of the speaker's will (e.g., Jer 7:27: "You shall speak [irreal perfect = waw-consecutive perfect] to them these words"; Ezek 5:17: "And a sword I will bring [imperfect] upon you") or the expression of hypothetical or conditional/contingent events, as in this following passage: "If you are willing [imperfect] and obey [irreal perfect = waw-consecutive perfect], the good of the land you shall eat [imperfect]; but if you refuse [imperfect] and rebel [irreal perfect = waw-consecutive perfect], by the sword you shall be devoured [imperfect]" (Is 1:19-20).

The difficulties with interpreting the verbs in the Prophetic Books are well illustrated by the grammatical category "prophetic perfect," which appears already in the medieval grammatical discussions of the biblical prophets (see Rogland, 53-56). This category was developed to explain instances of the perfect(ive) verb that seem to refer to an indicative future event in prophetic literature, such as Isaiah 5:13a: "Therefore my people will go into captivity [perfect] because they lack knowledge of me" (REB). Other examples include "be full" in Isaiah 11:9, "dry up" in Isaiah 19:7 and "capture" in Jeremiah 48:41 (see Klein).

The "prophetic perfect" explanation has taken several forms, but generally grammars point to the imminency and vividness of a future event so expressed by the perfect verb (see Rogland, 53-54). If we treat this as a rhetorical device, we can see a certain analogy with the "historical present" tense found in so many languages, including English and NT Greek (e.g., Mk 15:24: "And they crucified [present tense: staurōsin] him"). However, as analogous as these might appear, the identification of prophetic perfects has proved uncertain. Quite a number of examples that some grammarians or commentators treat as clear cases of future events expressed by the perfect verb, other authorities interpret as past events. Thus, it is only as an ad hoc process of elimination that examples of the prophetic perfect can be identified (see Klein). On this basis, M. F. Rogland has argued that many of the passages brought forward as examples of the prophetic perfect are misidentified (Rogland, 58-113). Rather, the perfect verb is functioning with much more "normal" senses (i.e., past and perfect expressions), which senses are missed by scholars because they overlook the possibility of future perfect expressions ("this will have happened") or temporal shifts such as quoted speech or visionary narratives.

In fact, the principles that Rogland puts forward to narrowly explain the prophetic perfects are more widely explanatory of the variety of verb forms found in prophetic literature. In particular, three issues need to be taken into account: (1) the temporal (deictic) shifts occasioned by quotations and visionary passages; (2) the means available to the prophets for expressly signaling future time; (3) the conditional nature of prophetic threats as over and against the caricatured interpretations of their pronouncement as "prediction." These three issues are treated here in turn.

In *vision reports we find the prophets describing events that may be past or future, but the vision itself is present before their eyes. As a result, these static descriptions may utilize a number of different verb forms, including both perfects (especially with stative predicates) and imperfects, as well as the participle and null-copula/verbless expressions. The vision report in Habakkuk 3 is a good illustration of the variety of verb forms that may appear in such a context. The visionary portion extends from Habakkuk 3:3-15, and the mixture of various verbs (thirty-two in all) is quite diverse, yet the NRSV, NIV and NKJV translate all as past verbs, while the REB, NAB and JB mostly use present verbs, and the NASB and NLT both show a split between present verbs in Habakkuk 3:3-7 as past verbs in Habakkuk 3:8-15. Some authorities claim that the verbs should be interpreted as future on the basis that the perfect forms in the passage are "prophetic perfects" (de Regt, 92).

The alternation between imperfect and perfect verbs may be clarified by attention to characteristics of temporal immediacy in a vision report, such as in Habakkuk 3. On this basis, the passage, which begins mainly with imperfect verbs (Hab 3:3-5), is best translated with present progressive verbs, which convey the events as going on at the very moment in which they are described by the prophet. The stative perfect in Habakkuk 3:3 expresses a present state, as is typical (see Gibson, 61).

^{3:3}Eloah from Teman is coming [imperfect], and the Holy One from Mount Paran.
His glory has covered [perfect] the heavens, and his praise fills [stative perfect] the earth.

^{3:4}His splendor is [imperfect] like a light —rays from his hand, and there is his power.

^{3:5}Before him is going [imperfect] pestilence, and plague is coming [imperfect] forth at his feet.

The change from the dominance of the imperfect verbs in Habakkuk 3:3-5 to perfect and past narrative forms (= waw-consecutive imperfects) in Habakkuk 3:6-7 conveys a shift away from a temporal immediacy of the report. This shift coincides with the shift of focus on God's arrival to the earth's reaction to his arrival: only the actions of Eloah stand in narrative order expressed by past narrative verbs, underscoring that "the earth quaked" and "the nations shook" as a direct consequence of Eloah's standing and looking (Hab 3:6). The prophet's reference to himself in Habakkuk 3:7 ("I saw") underscores the distancing of himself from the visionary experience, as he is able to reflect upon his watching of the vision. The shift in verbal dominance to perfects and pasts points to a past progressive rendering of the imperfect in Habakkuk 3:7.

^{3:6}He stood [perfect] and the earth
quaked [past],
he looked [perfect] and the nations
shook [past], and the ancient mountains shuddered [past], the everlasting hills sank on his everlasting path.
^{3:7}Under disaster I saw [perfect] the tents of Cushan, the curtains of the land of Midian were trembling [imperfect].

A similar alternation appears in the second half of the poem (Hab 3:8-15): the predominance of imperfect verbs coincides with a description of God's theophanic approach (Hab 3:8-9, 12), and the predominance of perfect verbs with a description of the earth's reaction (Hab 3:10-11). And in the final alternation (Hab 3:13-15) the prophet once again distances himself from the temporal immediacy of the visionary experience with perfect verbs, this time to reflect on the significance of God's arrival: he has come to save his people.

^{3:8}Is it with the rivers you are angry
[stative Perfect], Yahweh, or at the rivers (is) your anger, or at the sea (is) your wrath, that you are riding [imperfect] your horses,
your chariots of victory;
^{3:9}(that) you are brandishing [imperfect]
your naked bow
—oaths of (your) tribes, a command; (that) you are cleaving [imperfect] rivers in the earth?
^{3:10}The mountains have seen you [perfect], are writhing [imperfect],
a torrential downpour has passed [perfect], the deep has given [perfect] its voice, its high hand the sun has raised
[perfect],
^{3:11}the moon has stood [perfect] in its lofty abode—

at the light of your arrows (which) are coming [imperfect], at the splendor of the flash of your spear.
^{3:12}In fury you are marching [imperfect]
on the earth,
in wrath you are threshing [imperfect]
the nations.
^{3:13}You have come forth [perfect] for the salvation of your people, for the salvation of your anointed.
You have crushed [perfect] the head of the wicked house
—laying bare the foundation to the neck.
^{3:14}You have pierced [perfect] with your staff the head of its warriors —(who) were storming [imperfect] to scatter me;
their exultation (is) as to devour the poor in secret.
^{3:15}You have trodden [perfect] in the sea with your horses
—great foaming waters!

By contrast, the prophets sometimes cast their descriptions quite unambiguously into the future. One of the ways they do this is by using a tense-indicating copula verb. The copula "to be" verb is extremely frequent in the Bible, appearing most frequently either as a marker of past events (past narrative = waw-consecutive imperfect wayhî ["and it was"]) or future events (irreal perfect = waw-consecutive perfect wehâyâ ["and it shall be"]). About half of the occurrences of wehâyâ ("and it shall be") appear in the Prophetic Books, usually alone but sometimes in a set phrase such as "and it shall be on that day" or "and it shall be at time." The following passage from Zephaniah 1 illustrates the use of this verb to unambiguously portray the events described as happening in some future time when God takes action, as he has announced earlier in the chapter that he intends to do (I have placed the circumlocution "and it will be," as found in older translations, in parentheses and italicized the future auxiliary verb, which is the real significance of the wehâyâ form):

^{1:7}Hush before the Lord God, for the day of the LORD is near.
Indeed, he has prepared a sacrifice, consecrated his guests.

^{1:8}(And it will be) on the day of the sacrifice I will punish [irreal perfect] the officials and the king's sons and all who dress themselves in foreign attire.

^{1:9}And I will punish [irreal perfect] all who leap over the threshold on that day
 —those who fill their master's house with violence and fraud.

^{1:10}(And it will be) on that day—oracle of the LORD
 —there will be the sound of a cry from the Fish Gate,
 and of a howl from the Second Quarter, and a crash from the hills.

^{1:11}Wail, inhabitants of the Mortar, for all the traders have perished;
 all who weigh out silver are cut off.

^{1:12}(And it will be) at that time I will search [imperfect] Jerusalem with lamps,

and I will punish [irreal perfect] the people who rest complacently on their dregs,

those who say in their hearts, "The LORD will not do good, nor will he do harm."

^{1:13}So that their wealth becomes plunder, and their houses desolation.

And if they build houses, they shall not inhabit them;

and if they plant vineyards, they shall not drink wine from them.

Although the prophets had the means to describe events as unambiguously future, they were not simple foretellers. Much more frequently the description is one of what will happen if God's people will not heed the prophetic warning (see Jer 18:1-11). Following the passage from Zephaniah cited above, the prophet calls for the people to seek the Lord before the day of the Lord comes (Zeph 2:3). For this reason, the description in Zephaniah 1 is not simply cast in future time using wehāyā, but uses non-indicative expressions of what God intends versus indicative expressions of what will happen (e.g., "I will punish" [Zeph 1:8, 9, 12]). These verbs, like the copula wehāyā, are irreal perfects, which makes the statements of God's action conditional threats: "If this, then that." In other words, the entire tenor of the prophecy, via the grammar of the Hebrew, is set not as a forecast of future activities of God, but as a statement of intended action that is contingent upon the people's response.

See also ARAMAIC LANGUAGE; INTERTEXTUALITY AND INNERBIBLICAL INTERPRETATION; WRITING AND PROPHECY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Alter, The Art of Biblical Poetry (New York: Basic Books, 1985); F. I. Andersen, Habakkuk: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (AB 25; New York: Doubleday, 2001); F. I. Andersen and A. D. Forbes, "'Prose Particle' Counts in the Hebrew Bible," in The Word of the Lord Shall Go Forth: Essays in Honor of David Noel Freedman in Celebration of His Sixtieth Birthday, ed. C. Meyers and M. O'Connor (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1983) 165-83; F. I. Andersen and D. N. Freedman, Hosea: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (AB 24; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1980); idem, Amos: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (AB 24A; New York: Doubleday, 1989); J. Barton, Joel and Obadiah (OTL; Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 2001); A. Berlin, Zephaniah: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (AB 25A; New York: Doubleday, 1994); D. I. Block, The Book of Ezekiel (2 vols.; NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997-1998); F. C. Burkitt, "Micah 6-7: A Northern Prophecy," JBL 45 (1926) 159-61; R. P. Carroll, Jeremiah (OTL; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1986); B. S. Childs, Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); J. J. Collins, Daniel (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); J. A. Cook, "Hebrew Language," DOTWPW 260-67; idem, "The Hebrew Verb: A Grammaticalization Approach," ZAH 14.2 (2001) 117-43; idem, "The Finite Verbal Forms in Biblical Hebrew Do Express Aspect," JANES 30 (2006) 21-35; J. L. Crenshaw, Joel: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (AB 24C; New York: Doubleday, 1995); L. de Regt, "Hebrew Verb Forms in Prose and in Some Poetic and Prophetic Passages: Aspect, Sequentiality, Mood and Cognitive Proximity," JNSL 34 (2008) 75-103; S. R. Driver, The Book of Daniel (CBSC; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1900); idem, An Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament (ITL; New York: C. Scribner's Sons, 1908); M. Eskhult, "The Importance of Loanwords for Dating Biblical Hebrew Texts," in Biblical Hebrew: Studies in Chronology and Typology, ed. I. Young (JSOTSup 369; London: T & T Clark, 2003) 8-23; M. H. Floyd,

- "Prophecy and Writing in Habakkuk 2,1-5," ZAW 105 (1993) 462-81; J. C. L. Gibson, Davidson's Introductory Hebrew Grammar: Syntax (4th ed.; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1994); A. E. Hill, "Dating Second Zechariah: A Linguistic Examination," HAR 6 (1982) 105-34; idem, "Dating the Book of Malachi: A Linguistic Reexamination," in The Word of the Lord Shall Go Forth: Essays in Honor of David Noel Freedman in Celebration of His Sixtieth Birthday, ed. C. Meyers and M. O'Connor (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1983) 77-89; idem, Malachi: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (AB 25D; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1998); W. L. Holladay, Jeremiah 2: A Commentary on the Book of the Prophet Jeremiah, Chapters 26-52 (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989); G. Hölscher, Hesekiel, der Dichter und das Buch: Eine literarkritische Untersuchung (BZAW 39; Giessen: Töpelmann); A. Hurvitz, "Hebrew and Aramaic in the Biblical Period: The Problem of 'Aramaisms' in Linguistic Research on the Hebrew Bible," in Biblical Hebrew: Studies in Chronology and Typology, ed. I. Young (JSOTSup 369; London: T & T Clark, 2003) 24-37; K. A. Kitchen, "The Aramaic of Daniel," in Notes on Some Problems in the Book of Daniel, ed. D. Wiseman (London: Tyndale, 1965) 31-79; G. L. Klein, "The 'Prophetic Perfect,'" JNSL 16 (1990) 45-60; C. Meyers and E. Meyers, Haggai, Zechariah 1-8: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (AB 25B; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1987); idem, Zechariah 9-14: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (AB 25C; New York: Doubleday, 1987); C. Miller-Naudé and Z. Zevit, eds., Diachrony in Biblical Hebrew (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, forthcoming); J. Nogalski, Literary Precursors to the Book of the Twelve (BZAW 217; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1993a); idem, Redactional Processes in the Book of the Twelve (BZAW 218; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1993b); J. Oswalt, The Book of Isaiah: Chapters 1-39 (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1986); F. H. Polak, "Style Is More Than the Person: Sociolinguistics, Literary Culture and the Distinction between Written and Oral Narrative," in Biblical Hebrew: Studies in Chronology and Typology, ed. I. Young (JSOTSup 369; London: T & T Clark, 2003) 38-103; R. Polzin, Late Biblical Hebrew: Toward an Historical Typology of Biblical Hebrew Prose (HSM 12; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1976); P. R. Raabe, Obadiah: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (AB 24D; New York: Doubleday, 1996); G. Rendsburg, "A Comprehensive Guide to Israelian Hebrew: Grammar and Lexicon," Orient 38 (2003) 5-35; M. F. Rogland, Alleged Non-Past Uses of Qatal in Classical Hebrew (SSN 44; Assen: Van Gorcum, 2003); M. F. Rooker, Biblical Hebrew in Transition: The Language of the Book of Ezekiel (JSOTSup 90; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1990); J. M. Sasson, Jonah (AB 24B; New York: Doubleday, 2000); C. S. Smith, "The Pragmatics and Semantics of Temporal Meaning," in Proceedings: Texas Linguistic Forum 2004, ed. P. Denis et al. (Somerville, MA: Cascadilla, 2006) 92-106; L. Stulman, The Prose Sermons of the Book of Jeremiah: A Redescription of the Correspondences with Deuteronomistic Literature in the Light of Recent Text-Critical Research (SBLDS 83; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1986); W. G. E. Watson, Classical Hebrew Poetry: A Guide to Its Techniques (JSOTSup 26; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1986); H. Wildberger, Isaiah 28-39, trans. T. Trapp (CC; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2002); Y. J. Yoo, "Israelian Hebrew in the Book of Hosea" (Ph.D. diss., Cornell University, 1999); I. Young, R. Rezetko and M. Ehrensverd, Linguistic Dating of Biblical Texts (London: Equinox, 2008); W. Zimmerli, Ezekiel 1: A Commentary on the Book of the Prophet Ezekiel, Chapters 1-24, trans. R. Clements, F. Cross and K. Baltzer (Hermeneia; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979).

J. A. Cook

HELLENISTIC PERIOD. See ISRAELITE HISTORY.

HERMENEUTICS

Hermeneutical questions arise in connection with the OT Prophetic Books in a variety of ways. As opposed to interpretive questions regarding how to interpret the specific texts (on which, see the articles on each of the Prophetic Books), hermeneutical questions concern how one evaluates the various interpretive options, and what sorts of criteria are pertinent to the wise handling of the scriptural texts. Such questions have classically considered the temporal range of prophetic prediction and the nature of prophetic fulfilment, most particularly in Christ in the NT, but also in the time of the reader. More recently, hermeneutical questions have in particular considered questions of canon and canonical setting, both internal to the prophetic corpus and in regard to the links between the prophetic canon and the rest of Jewish and Christian Scripture, as well as questions about the social location of prophecy and reader-oriented questions regarding how the texts are appropriated today. In general, hermeneutics succeeds in bringing fresh questions to bear on the reading of the texts rather than in the offering of substantive interpretations. It is therefore rightly to be understood as one auxiliary discipline (among others) that will assist the interpreter to be well placed for proceeding to interpretive engagement with the text rather than prejudging what such engagement should look like.

1. Hermeneutical Frameworks
2. Modes of Reading the Prophetic Texts
3. Hermeneutical Approaches to the Reading of Prophetic Texts Today
4. Discerning the Prophetic Word Then and Now

1. Hermeneutical Frameworks.

How one reads scriptural texts always depends in large part on the interpretive goals one has in reading. Broadly speaking, the majority of such interpretive goals may be grouped into a limited number of overlapping categories: the historical, the literary and the theological. In this section we consider background issues in these three categories, all of which play their part in framing the interpreter's approach to the text.

1.1. Historical Interests. Questions about the historical contexts of the prophets whose words are recorded in these books are to a limited extent invited by the texts themselves. Prophetic collections (either whole books or subsections [e.g. Ezek 24]) usually begin with a sentence that orients the reader to some historical setting. Typically, this is a time period during which the word of Yahweh came to the prophet, although only about half the Minor Prophets do this. Isaiah 1:1 is a straightforward example: a reference to "the days of Uzziah, Jothan, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah." This time period, extending through much of the second half of the eighth century BC, serves as an indication of the historical period of Isaiah's ministry, although little of the book of *Isaiah requires specific reference to historical events for its interpretive significance. Thus, for example, Isaiah 1:7-9 reads as a text that makes sense against the putative background of the Assyrian siege of Jerusalem in 701 BC, but the text of Isaiah 1 neither compels nor requires such a reference (see History of Israel). Rather, the point is that Yahweh is the one who leaves survivors even in the midst of desolation, very probably in 701 BC, but in other circumstances too.

The books of *Ezekiel and *Daniel offer various ways in which a reader might construct a chart of dates against which to map individual textual units, but these markers are hardly key to the flow of the finished book in either case, and there is little interpretive gain from laying out the disordered chronology of each book. The reader of Daniel, for instance, does not seem to be expected to correlate Daniel 7:1 or Daniel 8:1 with Daniel 5, nor to find much significance in Daniel 9's location in the same time period as Daniel 6. Likewise, early readers of *Amos may have known the specific time indicated by "two years before the earthquake" (Amos 1:2), but the loss of this historical reference point to later readers does not make problematic the reading of the book of Amos. Amos 7:10-17 gives indication of some of the historical setting of the prophet Amos, and it has long been standard for critical commentaries to begin their accounts of the book with this information. Perhaps it is significant, though, that the compilers of the book of Amos evidently did not think that the reader needed to start here. A book such as *Joel is notoriously difficult to locate with reference to any dates at all; the best that interpreters can do is postulate possible dates for invasions by what are referred to as "locusts" (Joel 1:4-12; 2:25) (though it is an open question as to whether this is a reference to an invading army or actual locusts), or try to deduce information about the state of the priesthood from passing references to temple practice (Joel 2:15-17). Reading Joel for information regarding its historical setting is manifestly a reading "against the grain."

Most likely, the claim of superscriptions such as Jeremiah 1:1; 25:1; 26:1 and so forth is to emphasize that the prophetic word comes in specific places and times, and that the word of Yahweh is deeply engaged with the lived social realities of God's people (and, to a lesser though significant extent, other people). In particular, it is generally the case that prophetic texts are appropriately situated with respect to the sixth-century BC exile of the southern kingdom. Those who warn of impending *exile, or who point to exile as the grim vindication of their word, need to be read with this particular historical context in mind. Postexilic prophetic voices (found prominently in the later chapters of Isaiah as well as *Haggai-*Malachi) tend to operate with different agendas (e.g., regarding the nature of the restored people in the land). It is rare that the interpreter needs to press further than this general level of observation with regard to historical specificity.

On the other hand, it is undoubtedly true that the interpreter will be assisted by recent studies that have sought a “thicker” sociohistorical description of the phenomenon of exile itself. Thus, “exile” is today often read through the rubric of “forced migration,” and this sheds considerable interpretive light on the complex issues concerning what proportion of the population was deported, who stayed behind, and how these different traditions negotiated the recombination of Israelites after the “return.” Such studies of the world “behind the text” offer hermeneutical insights into the matters taken up in the text, especially those concerning matters of power, authorization, cooperation and so forth (for a compelling analysis that draws links with the situation of today’s readers with respect to power, see Smith-Christopher 2002).

A further level at which historical contexts are relevant is the level at which the spoken oracle becomes the written text (see Writing and Prophecy). This leads more naturally to literary and canonical questions concerning the finished collections of prophetic sayings, to which we now turn.

1.2. Literary Collections. How did the spoken word of the prophet become the literary collection of oracles going under the prophet’s name? The traditional answer in both Jewish and Christian understanding was that the prophets themselves were responsible for the literary compositions bearing their names. With the rise of historical consciousness in the modern world, and awareness of the significance of oral tradition in the process of transmission of the prophetic word, critical scholarship settled on a model more akin to a prophetic speaker and a literary editor who were not normally thought to be the same people. Scholarly interest initially focused on isolating historical contexts for individual oracles, but in more recent times it has broadened to include also a concern to understand the redactor’s (literary) art and the potential theological significance of the collected text (see Childs 1979, 305-10).

The texts themselves offer little indication of how the process of transmission and collection might have worked (see Formation of the Prophetic Books). Such clues as there are remain difficult to assess. One obvious focus of attention is the account in Jeremiah 36 relating the story of how the prophet’s spoken oracles are consigned to writing by the scribe Baruch. The initial written version is burned, but a rewritten and expanded scroll (see Jer 36:32) is commissioned. In the context of the book of Jeremiah this account is intended to emphasize the enduring power of the prophetic word, lasting beyond its original oral context and even, in this very narrative, surviving King Jehoiakim’s attempt to destroy the written version. Such a reading of the “plain sense” of the text of Jeremiah 36 does not, however, straightforwardly address historically oriented questions about how the spoken word is linked to its written representation. Attempts to correlate the scrolls mentioned in Jeremiah 36 with versions of the material in the finished book of Jeremiah have been inconclusive, and scholarly judgments range from those who, in a largely historicizing approach, see the historical Jeremiah’s words gathered by his “colleague and friend, Baruch the scribe” (Lundbom 2004, 254; see also Lundbom 1986), through to those for whom the account of Jeremiah 36 is, as is much of the rest of the book, part of its ideologically motivated argument for receiving the text of Jeremiah as authoritative (Carroll 1986).

A possible insight into the “behind the scenes” working of the prophetic collections occurs in Isaiah 8:16, “Bind up the testimony, seal the teaching among my disciples,” which some have argued indicates a reference to something like an “Isaianic school.” This may then be read in conjunction with Isaiah 29:11-12, which depicts a scroll already in existence—a sealed document that can be understood only by those who grasp Isaiah’s prophetic message, in contrast to uncomprehending “outsiders” (cf. Is 29:13-14). One might have here an indication of a group of Isaiah’s followers who operate with a written testimony to his spoken words originating, in the first instance, with the prophet himself. Once such a collection is in existence, it then makes sense to suppose that further words could be added to it as those involved awaited the day when the scroll would be “opened” to all (or at least to the faithful in Israel) (Blenkinsopp, 1-55).

What is the hermeneutical significance of such an account? First, it should (rightly) complicate our notions of authorship with respect to ancient texts. That the eighth-century BC prophet Isaiah is present as a voice in the book of Isaiah does not amount to the claim that he “wrote the book.” Historical enquiries regarding how the literary collections came about (e.g., Williamson) thus work with no hermeneutically significant category corresponding to the modern notion of authorship (Barton, NIDB 1:354-55). Although it is common to postulate a distinction between oral prophets and literate scribes, with the latter co-opting the oracles of the former for the purposes of centralizing and controlling the social impact of the word of Yahweh, more recent accounts have rightly challenged whether it is realistic to think of the two groups as quite so distinct (Floyd). The written prophetic text might best be understood on the analogy of a musical score awaiting performance: the function of the text is as an aide-mémoire, best performed/read by one who knows the content and flow of the overall text, though in extremis capable of being read by a literate newcomer. The literary collections thus serve as vehicles for the prophetic reenactment of the original oracles, still bearing the force of being a revelation of Yahweh (Doan and Giles). In this way, we can see that what have traditionally been called “prophetic *sign acts,” such as Jeremiah’s breaking a yoke or Ezekiel’s lying on his side before a model of Jerusalem (Friebel 1999), are special cases of what was in fact the normal manner of representation of the prophetic: as enacted performance (see also Stacey 1990). It is an important hermeneutical point to recognize that authorship then and now is not the same phenomenon, and failure to grasp this had led to attempts to critique or to defend largely anachronistic notions of authorship in the prophetic corpus.

A relatively concise example of the complex compositional processes involved may be found in the book of Amos, which assumes a later and somewhat distinct perspective in its final verses (Amos 9:10-15, with 9:8b looking like a late insertion too). Such an addition makes sense in the context of the literary work that is the finished book, but not as part of a historical occasion on which the prophet Amos might have added such a hopeful oracle to his generally relentless pronouncement of doom and imminent judgment upon the northern kingdom. What is at stake theologically in such a literary observation will be taken up in 1.3 below.

The final sections of the *Book of the Twelve (on which, see 1.3 below) also indicate their separate literary origins by way of superscriptions saying simply “an oracle” (maššā’ [Zech 9:1, 12:1; Mal 1:1]). The resultant “books” of Zechariah and Malachi are literary creations, dependent upon spoken words at particular historical points, but now operating in a new context of reception.

A good example of the difference it makes to read a prophetic text with an ear for its literary dimensions concerns the famous question of Isaiah in 6:11: “How long, O Lord?” Isaiah is wrestling with the demanding commission to spread a prophetic message that will not be heeded, indeed to spread it with the specific intent that people will not turn. Perhaps significantly, he asks how long such a situation will endure (rather than, e.g., why he is to minister in this way). The answer is “until,” followed by a series of descriptions of what must happen before arriving at the final “holy seed,” which appears to be all that will be left by the time he is done. One can accept that such a divine commissioning occurred at some point in Isaiah’s ministry. However, the question that confronts the reader of the literary work that is now the book of Isaiah may be put like this: does the reader now read after the “how long/until” dynamic has played out, or is the reader still reading within the period of hardening described in 6:9-10 (van Wieringen, 49)? Some have suggested that part of the achievement of the complex finished book of Isaiah is to show how this hardening works out until the new word of comfort pronounced in Isaiah 40 (e.g., Conrad 1991). The reader, on this view, is invited to reflect on how the ministry described in Isaiah 6:9-13 has its effect, without being the implied addressee of that message. It is clear that the reader of Isaiah in the context of Christian Scripture is being invited to revisit this question again in the light of Matthew 13:10-17, as well as NT citations of the text such as in Acts 28:25-27, perhaps to reflect in new ways on the questions of divine hardening and human repentance in the wake of Jesus' ministry (see Moberly 2003).

1.3. Canonical Considerations. Reading prophetic texts in their canonical setting clearly draws upon and presupposes each of the framing perspectives considered thus far: the historical and the literary. The groundbreaking analysis by B. Childs (Childs 1979) urges that a focus upon the canonical context(s) of biblical books is key to reading them "as Christian scripture" (see Canonical Criticism). In many ways, his analysis of the book of Isaiah is a paradigm example of what is at stake (Childs 1979, 311-38; see also Childs 2000).

Childs does not dispute that the oracles collected in the sixty-six chapters of Isaiah derive from a range of historical circumstances, not all recoverable by the attentive reader. The situation is undoubtedly more complex than the notion of "First Isaiah" (Isaiah ben Amoz, of Jerusalem [see Is 1:1]) providing Isaiah 1-39 in the eighth century BC, "Second Isaiah" writing words of comfort and hope in the exile (Is 40-55), where Jerusalem is told that her sins are paid for (i.e., the end of exile is nigh), and then "Third Isaiah" writing after the return from exile (Is 56-66). Several passages do not fit this threefold division very easily, such as Isaiah 24-27, which looks like a late *apocalyptic text. Nevertheless, the one constant in the midst of such historical reconstruction is the finished text of the book of Isaiah as we have it. Textual variations between different manuscript traditions do not complicate this point unduly. Thus, Childs suggests that what the interpreter of Scripture must do is to wrestle with the finished form of the text, allowing that it contains various historical recensions and signs of literary editing, but pressing on to ask what is at stake in the finished text's reading as it does. In the case of Isaiah: why is judgment (even if it is mitigated in many specific passages of Is 1-39) followed by comfort (Is 40-55), and then why is the great visionary sweep of Isaiah 40-55 followed by the difficult and frequently grim internal tensions of Isaiah 56-66, as evidenced by passages such as Isaiah 63:1-6; 65:13-16?

The case of Amos 9 was mentioned above. Childs's analysis of the ending of the book of Amos makes clear what is at stake in his hermeneutical approach. He argues with respect to the later additions that Amos 9:8b introduces a restriction on the judgment on Israel, which is assumed in Amos 9:9-10, and which "has to do with the ultimate purpose of God in the future of Israel. The discourse moves into the realm of eschatology (11, 13). It turns on the possibility of a new existence after the end has come" (Childs 1979, 407). While this does not soften the message of total judgment, it is important to note that the editor "transcends the perspective of the prophet himself." For Childs's own account, this suggests that we now have Yahweh's perspective in Amos 9:12b. Even if one does not go that far, it is clear that reading Amos in a canonical perspective requires a shift in focus away from the prophet Amos and the historical context of his oracles and toward the purposes for which this collection has been received and passed on for its southern audience, with lessons to learn from the fate that befell the northern kingdom.

Childs's approach to the OT books still sees them largely as independent literary identities, though he allows occasionally for canonical linkages between the books. Such linkages have been explored on a literary level in the "new canonical criticism" of Conrad (Conrad 2003). More recent canonically oriented interpretation has also asked theological questions about the canonical collection as a whole and its function within the canon.

At the most basic level, the identification of a certain collection of books as "prophetic books" or "prophets" makes a claim about their function within the canon. Christian canons tend to gather the Prophetic Books at the end of the OT, beginning with Isaiah. Jewish canons operate with the category of "former prophets" (Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings) and "latter prophets" (broadly the Christian subcollection but without the books of Daniel or Lamentations). For some, this category of prophets is the second of three discrete sections of the Jewish canon: Law, Prophets, Writings (as perhaps attested in Luke 24:44). In a significant study, however, J. Barton has urged that there is a strong tradition of usage (including in NT times) where "prophetic book" meant simply an inspired or authoritative book, and that the only books held in a fundamentally separate category were the five books of the Torah (Barton 1984; see also Barton 1986, 35-95). It follows that when Scripture is referred to as "the law and the prophets," this is to be read as indiating a distinction between the five books of the Torah (the law) and everything else (thus, indiscriminately, what we now call “prophetic books” and any others that followed them). This opens the way for Barton to explore a characterization of the prophetic books of Isaiah through Malachi on grounds internal to themselves: the particular functions of those texts as they might have been received in their original historical contexts (see 2 below).

Contrastingly, S. Chapman has argued that “the law and the prophets” is to be understood as a hermeneutically significant phrase implying an intentional canonical structuring. He suggests that from its earliest “proto-canonical” formation in the mid-sixth century BC, collected Scripture was always in the form of “the law (of Moses) and the words (of the prophets),” and that the development of the canon retained this fundamental theological “grammar.” The “writings,” on this account, eventually become a separate collection in a tripartite canon, although they emerged initially simply as part of the theological claim of the “law and the prophets” that constitutes “the fully mature witness of Israel to a dialectic that continues to be constitutive of the reality of God” (Chapman, 292). Chapman’s thesis works by way of a historical reconstruction of the development of the canon. It is developed in a theological and hermeneutical direction in the work of C. Seitz, who urges that this understanding gives a stable theological center to authoritative Scripture in NT times. This is a stability based on the theological significance of the “law and prophets” framework, which may stand alongside a recognition that the development of “writings” as a separate category might still be in process at the time of Jesus. One significant hermeneutical implication of this approach concerns the role of Scripture in helping to settle what is at stake in NT times, as against accounts suggesting that it is essentially “the rule of faith” that is fundamental to the formation of the NT canon (e.g., Allert). Thus, the “prophets” play their role in theological witness to the God of Israel, known also through the Torah, and now newly revealed as the God and Father of Jesus Christ. Such an account clearly emphasizes the theological significance of the prophets in the scope of Christian Scripture overall, even if the historical basis behind some of the arguments upon which it rests may remain contested. It is worth noting, though, that this offers a way of conceptualizing the significance of Scripture in NT times alongside the recognition that the canon may not have been closed at this point.

Both Barton and Chapman work with a model whereby any particular moment of “closure” of the prophetic canon remains historically uncertain; but there are different implications drawn (at least in part because they have different interpretive goals). In the former case, the result is that the hermeneutical significance of canonical factors in the interpretation of particular texts (in both the OT and the NT) tends to be downplayed. In the latter case, the argument is that there remains hermeneutical significance regardless of canon closure.

It is worth noting the particular oddity mentioned above concerning the placement of the book of Daniel within the Christian prophetic canon but within the “writings” of the Jewish Bible. Arguably, this can be overinterpreted as a matter of hermeneutical significance with regard to the book itself. The man Daniel was considered a prophet in NT times, as, for example, when Matthew 24:15 refers to Daniel 11:31; 12:11 with the phrase “spoken of by the prophet Daniel.” One way or another, the book is therefore prophetic, regardless of its canonical location. In any case, one could not draw conclusions about either the state of the canon or the date of the book of Daniel from this angle because of the open-endedness of the various subsections of the canon in the relevant time period.

The other main topic of interest in canonically oriented studies in recent years has been the development of attention to the Book of the Twelve. The notion that such a singular “book” is appropriately taken as the corresponding unit to the book of Isaiah or Ezekiel, which are of comparable length to the Book of the Twelve and are similarly anthological in their own ways, has suggested to some that individual units of the book (the so-called Minor Prophets) should rightly be interpreted within their context in the finished collection (among many such voices, see the essays collected in Nogalski and Sweeney; Redditt and Scharf). However, specific proposals for interpretive significance beyond this have proved more elusive. One suggestion has been the phenomenon of “catchword linkage,” whereby a noteworthy word or phrase at the end of one prophet is taken up at the beginning of the next (such as “Yahweh roars from Zion” [Joel 3:16; Amos 1:2]), perhaps to draw attention to some broader thematic link. Another concerns the shape of the plot of the Book of the Twelve, which P. House has argued follows the arc of an Aristotelian “comic plot” that moves through the stages of sin, then down toward punishment, and then onward and upward toward redemption, with the resolution occurring in the postexilic sections of the overall book (House, 124). One of the problems in making specific claims in this area is the variation in orderings of the component texts within the Book of the Twelve in different canonical collections. Even so, the general point remains concerning the possibility of considering on a case-by-case basis what counts as the most helpful context for reading any particular one of the Minor Prophets, and whether there might be large-scale coherence alongside disconnection between separate elements. This may in turn assist the interpreter in bringing similar questions to the reading of texts in the longer books (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel).

2. Modes of Reading the Prophetic Texts.

As with all significant texts, there are many dimensions to the hermeneutical functions of prophetic texts. This section considers some of the range of functions of the prophetic texts as they were originally received in Israel, while the next expands the focus to ways in which the texts function hermeneutically for readers today. An illuminating taxonomy of considerations relating to how the texts might have been received by NT times is offered in J. Barton’s Oracles of God, the subtitle of which precisely delineates the matter at hand: Perceptions of Ancient Prophecy in Israel after the Exile. Barton proposes that there were four different ways in which such texts might have been read in NT times, which he helpfully describes as four “modes of reading” (Barton 1986, 151-53). We will in fact consider the third by way of contrasting it with the second and thus take in turn three different modes here: the ethical, the eschatological and the theological-mystical.

2.1. Halakah. Prophecy could be read as *ethical instruction (Barton 1986, 154-78). The claim is not that all prophecy is in some sense ethical, but that in some instances the prophets were understood as presenting halakah—directions on how life is to be lived before God.

Barton cites verses such as Daniel 9:10 (or 2 Macc 2:1-4) as instances of prophetic words being taken as halakah and finds this tradition extended into the NT, though only intermittently, in cases such as John 4:19, or more consistently in the later epistles (2 Tim 3:16-17 being a notable instance, as is the citation of OT prophets as moral examples in Heb 11). He further suggests that one of the reasons why prophetic texts become standards of moral appeal is in fact because they have been successful in their prediction. Since that predictive function is no longer in operation, the texts become cherished for their witness to a way of living that derives some of its moral force from the predictive capacity of the prophet.

2.2. Eschatology. A second mode of reading the Prophetic Books focuses on their eschatological dimensions: many “regarded the contemporary relevance of prophecy (on which all agreed) as consisting in their [the prophets’] foreknowledge of the present times” (Barton 1986, 179). In many ways, this captures the popular understanding of prophecy, at least in its typically modern “predictive” sense, although one senses that the ethical edge (see 2.1 above) has also begun to capture the popular imagination in the description of people such as Martin Luther King Jr. as prophetic. It is clear that at least some of the time the prophets were predicting what was to come. This understanding of prophecy is captured well in the extended hermeneutical reflection of 1 Peter 1:10-12, which J. Green has described as “the ‘hermeneutical key’ or, better, a theological hermeneutic of Scripture . . . a theological pattern by which to order the prophetic witness” (J. Green, 251). Two points may be made with respect to different aspects and implications of this thesis.

2.2.1. Ethics and/or Eschatology? It is sometimes said that the ethical thrust of prophetic texts is to be contrasted with the eschatological emphasis, as if they were two disjointed forms of interpretation or were readings of two fundamentally different types of text. It certainly is fair to say that by the time of the NT it is the predictive sense of OT texts that is to the fore in the appeal made to them. Thus, Amos, for example, so often cited today in broader ethical discussion, has comparatively little predictive material and is directly cited in the NT in just two instances: Amos 5:25-27 taken up in the historical review in Acts 7 (Acts 7:42-43, citing the LXX), and the celebrated case of Amos 9:11-12 informing the council of Jerusalem's decision regarding the requirements of torah obedience for Gentiles (Acts 15:16-17, again working from the LXX). The former instance is a text witnessing to Israel's *wilderness traditions, while the latter is only predictive of the outpouring of the Spirit on Gentiles at something of an interpretive stretch. Of Amos's ethical vision there is no direct citation in the NT, which perhaps should surprise twenty-first-century interpreters of Scripture more than it seems to. Isaiah, on the other hand, is repeatedly cited, particularly understood as a text speaking about what had now come to pass in Christ (see Prophets in the New Testament).

Nevertheless, the eschatological horizons of the prophet would have been at least in part ethical in nature. If a prophet describes the way a society must be in order to embody justice and righteousness and addresses such words to a society conspicuously lacking in these qualities, then there is a sense in which such a fundamentally ethical pronouncement looks to the future for its "fulfilment." It may be that this mixture of the ethical and the eschatological is a key aspect of what is in view in Matthew's having Jesus say that he has come not to abolish but rather to fulfill "the law and the prophets" (which equally may be a way of signaling all of Scripture, though the point would remain the same). Occasions when the prophets lift their eyes to the genuinely far horizon are often signaled in the text: "then afterward" begins the vision of Joel 2:28-32, quoted by Peter at Pentecost (see Acts 2:14-21). The more normal mode of prophetic discourse seems to presuppose that one should not press too hard the distinction between looking ahead and seeking change in the present; rather, one should think of these perspectives as two sides of the same coin.

2.2.2. Apocalyptic. A particular aspect of the above line of argument concerns the hermeneutical significance or otherwise of classifying some prophetic texts as *apocalyptic" (from Gk apokalypsis, "revelation"). Although clearly there are apocalypses in the straightforward sense of texts that are revealing something, it has been widely debated as to whether there is a meaningful genre category "apocalyptic." In a strikingly influential thesis, P. Hanson argued that apocalyptic represented a kind of

"collapse of prophecy" whereby disillusioned reformers of society withdrew from active engagement with the world and retreated to a safe distance from which they could predict the end of all things and the removal, in one way or another, of the present evil age. Part of the supporting argument for this involved postulating a split in the social world that produced such postexilic texts as Third Isaiah, where a "hierocratic" party of (Zadokite) priests who had returned from exile were in conflict with "visionaries" (including, in Hanson's view, the prophet known as Second Isaiah and his followers) who had imagined a different life restored back to the land. Weary of the conflict, the apocalyptic voice arose out of the desire to see a discontinuous fresh start, on the other side of sweeping judgment. However, a range of factors has led to the demise of this thesis. First, the lack of supporting evidence for the social setting that it imagines suggests that it is at best only one possible reading of the texts rather than a compelling historical account. Second, the apocalyptic language sometimes adduced to support such a case should better be interpreted as a different style of prophetic language but with the same goals of seeking change and transformation within the present order. As one study of Daniel puts it, "An apocalypse is intended to interpret present earthly circumstances in the light of the supernatural world and the future, and to influence both the understanding and the behavior of the audience by means of divine authority" (Smith-Christopher, NIB 7:22).

In short, the debate about genre focuses on how far one should define the terms apocalyptic or apocalypse in terms of form or content, and clearly it will continue. A helpful summary is offered by L. DiTommaso: "Despite several problems, including a tendency to mold to its contents, the label 'apocalyptic literature' remains a common and useful if general term, although it should be restricted to instances where precise definitions are unneeded or inappropriate" (DiTommaso, 241).

In terms of hermeneutical significance, one may conclude that apocalyptic is also a form of ethically engaged prophecy, indeed the very strand characterized as "eschatological," but not thereby prejudged with respect to the temporal horizons of its content. Nevertheless, this discussion opens up with greater clarity the notion of a prophetic tradition that specifically allows for divine providence in broad terms but without the attendant expectation of Yahweh's imminent disruptive activity. The focus here would be more on divine providence. This is Barton's third "mode of reading" the prophets (Barton 1986, 214-34), although it may be noted that his examples of this mode are generally drawn from outside the OT canon.

2.3. Theological Reflection and Mysticism. A final strand within the prophetic texts as we have them is what Barton describes as the view of the prophet as "someone with special insights into theological truths" (Barton 1986, 235). This has two main elements within it. On the one hand, the prophet is one who sees how God is at work in human affairs, for which the label "theologian" might be appropriate. The record of God's dealings with Israel becomes the springboard for prophetic reflection upon the nature of God; Jeremiah 14:17-22 might be an example (and the logic of the prayer of Daniel 9 points the same way). On the other hand, the prophet is one who, whether because of particular experiences or through reflection on what has been observed, may come to speak of the nature of God in himself. Here a passage such as Ezekiel 1 is a particularly striking example, and it gave rise to a whole mystical tradition (merkabah [chariot] mysticism) that would go on to play a considerable role in subsequent theological and spiritual reflection. At the root of these phenomena is the simple point that the prophet is qualified to speak on behalf of God and therefore is one to whom others might look as they seek to understand God's ways in the world (and in himself).

3. Hermeneutical Approaches to the Reading of Prophetic Texts Today.

It is one thing to seek a description of the hermeneutical functions of prophetic texts as they were received in ancient (specifically, NT) times. The task before today's reader of these texts, however, opens up a whole range of hermeneutical considerations that rapidly multiply beyond the confines of their own intended functions. Hermeneutics is particularly concerned to describe and evaluate these complex transactions between texts and readers, and there are many ways of approaching this subject. We will consider a small sample of such approaches, all of which offer specific insights into what is sometimes too broadly described as "reader-response criticism." At the most general level, reader-oriented approaches range across a whole spectrum from concerns that offer particular insight into the dynamics of the text when seen from certain points of view, through to readings that rest content with allowing the reader to remake the text in their own image without regard to how much justice is done to the text. For an example of the latter, one might cite the approach to Isaiah offered in The Queer Bible Commentary: "Christians have plucked [Isa 7,14-16] from any reference to Ahaz, curds, honey or the king of Aram and Israel, and applied it wholesale as a predictive-prophecy-come-true about Jesus of Nazareth. Why should we as queers not feel a similar freedom to pluck from these texts (as well as any attendant scholarship) those nuggets which may prove useful to us?" (Koch, 376). Here, however, we will focus on some approaches that do not equate embracing the reader in the hermeneutical discussion with abandoning all appeals to criteria or appropriateness to the text.

3.1. Texts as Performative Actions. We noted that prophetic texts operate across a range of functions in terms of their relationship to the world in which they are heard or read (see 2 above). The simplest way to describe the multi-functionality of such texts is in the language of "performative utterances." Prophetic texts describe some aspects of reality but also serve to bring about other aspects. Prophetic oracles are thus prime candidates for the category of "speech acts" as developed by J. Austin and J. Searle (see Briggs). In one particularly illuminating analysis of "What did the prophets think they were doing?" W. Houston uses the conceptuality of speech-act theory to explore the ways in which the prophetic act of denunciation or judgment can be seen as separable from the actual responses elicited by the prophet. In speech-act terminology, the former is an illocutionary act, taking place in the pronouncing of the words, while the latter is perlocutionary, contingent upon the real-world vagaries of human response to the oracle. "As long as the prophets' hearers understood that they were warning them, calling for repentance or whatever the particular speech act might be, and understood the content of the warning or whatever it might be, then the prophets had done what they set out to do, even if they had not achieved the effect they had hoped for" (Houston 1993, 177).

This perspective is also the most helpful way of making use of the traditional form-critical study of types of prophetic oracle, of which a standard account is offered by C. Westermann (1991a; 1991b), and which has been helpfully adapted to the context of assessing written prophetic texts by more recent form-critical studies (see Form Criticism). Thus D. Petersen suggests that "one may discern at least five basic forms of prophetic literature: divinatory chronicle, vision report, prophetic speech, legend, and prophetic historiography" (Petersen 2003, 274). Within Petersen's category of "prophetic speech" we find the more familiar range of forms of prophetic speech, corresponding more to the concerns of Westermann's account. A typical sample list includes judgment oracle (Jer 6:16-21); woe oracle (Is 10:1-4); lawsuit (Mic 1:2-7); lament (Jer 8:18—9:3); hymn (Hab 3:2-15); song (Is 5:1-2); allegory (Ezek 17:2-10); acrostic (Nah 1:2-8) (Petersen 2002, 29).

Such analyses examine how these different types of prophetic text deploy various kinds of social convention to produce certain archetypal kinds of effect. This classificatory project is, arguably, not always hermeneutically enlightening, since identifying the form in view is dependent upon judging the nature of the text under consideration in the first place, making it difficult in turn to draw conclusions about the text from its form-critical classification. Generally, it is in analyzing those oracles that do not fit comfortably into the standard classifications that form-critical insight is most helpful. (This is a special case of a general point about genre classifications: they tend to be hermeneutically illuminating mainly in cases where the standard conventions break down.) Thus, for example, one might note the way in which Amos "takes up his lament" in Amos 5:1, leading the reader to anticipate the identification of some departed person or grouping as the cause of the lament, only for the prophet to identify the "house of Israel" as the one to be reckoned "dead"—a shock to the house of Israel no doubt, and a shock that is part of the point of Amos 5:1. However, even this relatively textbook case of the benefits of form-critical classification relies on understanding the spoken word in its historical context, since as a literary creation the book of Amos is apparently intended for a southern readership who are to learn from Yahweh's ways with the northern kingdom that led up to the northern exile in 722/1 bc.

One major implication of a speech-act theory perspective on prophetic texts, however, is that the type (or form) of oracle deployed is determined by the illocution performed rather than by the perlocutionary success of otherwise of the oracle. It is the total communicative act of the prophet (and the text) that should occupy the interpreter, holding together the prophetic intention and the effect of the prophetic words in a range of possible relationships. This way of thinking allows us to make sense of the well-known conundrum of the prophet *Jonah, who precisely because he is successful turns out to be wrong: Nineveh is not overthrown, because the Ninevites heed the implicit warning in his oracle of doom (cf. Jon 3:4, 10, and the intervening narrative). Literary critic T. Eagleton enjoyed the irony thus: Jonah's words produce "a state of affairs in which the state of affairs they describe won't be the case" (Eagleton 1990: 233). As Houston points out, Jonah's illocution is successful, and the range of potential perlocutions is what is at stake in the next step of the narrative (Houston 1991).

The most thorough application of speech-act theory to explore the performative nature of prophetic OT texts is J. Adams's analysis of Isaiah. Adams argues that the central message of Isaiah 40—55 "is a call to return or turn to Yahweh . . . for the addressee to forsake sin, acknowledge and confess Yahweh as God alone, and embrace the role of his servant" (Adams, 91). Adams takes seriously the multidimensional performative force of the texts and avoids restricting them to flat referential puzzles in which the interpretive key is to identify the speaker, or the servant, or the historical conditions behind the text. This framework is subtle enough to account for the fulfillment of these passages in Jesus as well as their ongoing availability for self-involvement to the attentive reader today. Thus, "by participating in the prophetic function of Isa 40-55 . . . confessors return to Yahweh, forsake sin, profess him alone, and embrace the role of his servant" (Adams, 210). Those who read the text participate in its illocutionary functions and can be bound into the community envisaged by the text. There is scope for further work along these lines with other prophetic texts.

3.2. Texts as Imaginative Construals. Although prophetic texts are only at most loosely historiographical, they do often witness to what has happened in Israel and beyond. But rather than describe them as “historical” or “witnessing” texts, it seems more appropriate to note that when their attention is turned toward such matters, it is usually in a way that casts the events in new light or offers striking (and generally Yahwistic) perspectives. The reader of the prophets is offered not so much independent access to the social realities of life in ancient Israel as a rhetorically constructed vision of what has come to pass or is happening in the wider sociopolitical world. The most helpful rubric for considering this aspect of the texts’ function has been provided by the fresh and fruitful approach to reading prophetic texts offered by W. Brueggemann in a variety of works dating back to his 1978 book The Prophetic Imagination. In this and many other writings Brueggemann has mapped out a rich set of reading practices that navigate between acknowledging the rhetorical constructs of the texts and the critical difficulties of reconstructing the ancient history behind them. In a summary treatment he observes that imaginative remembering “is the clue to valuing the Bible as a trustworthy voice of faith while still taking seriously our best critical learning” (Brueggemann 2003, 8).

Brueggemann defines imagination as “the human capacity to picture, portray, receive, and practice the world in ways other than it appears to be at first glance when seen through a dominant, habitual, unexamined lens” (Brueggemann 1993, 13). As a mode of human knowing, it thus particularly resonates with those who read in our present situation, which may be loosely defined as “postmodern” without thereby being overcommitted to any particular philosophical articulations of the postmodern. This aspect of the reader’s situation then allows fresh perception of the imaginative dimension of the prophets’ works themselves. In a series of reflections on a hermeneutic that can itself be characterized as prophetic and imaginative, Brueggemann suggests that “the task of prophetic ministry is to nurture, nourish, and evoke a consciousness and perception alternative to the consciousness and perception of the dominant culture around us” (Brueggemann 1978, 13). In this initial formulation of an imaginative hermeneutic, he perhaps overemphasizes a contrast between two traditions found in the OT and possibly exaggerates the “royal tradition” as a foil to his substantive task of describing what a prophetic imagination looks like; nevertheless, his characterization makes significant points about how one’s practices of reading might unlock liberating dimensions in the prophetic texts. Thus, the royal consciousness “leads people to numbness, especially to numbness about death,” whereas prophetic imagination seeks “to bring people to engage their experiences of suffering to death” (Brueggemann 1978, 46). Similarly, the former “leads people to despair about the power to new life,” while the latter seeks “to bring people to engage the promise of newness that is at work in our history with God” (Brueggemann 1978, 62-63). In a subsequent study he examines these themes in the three Major Prophets and makes an explicit hermeneutical move of urging a “dynamic equivalence” between the imaginative visions of these prophets and the readings of their texts required by those “who find themselves in an alienated cultural situation,” for whom these texts are “a resource for hopeful imagination today” (Brueggemann 1986, 132).

Despite the enormous impact of Brueggemann’s approach to the prophetic texts in terms of his showing how they might be released to speak freshly to today’s world, there has been conspicuously little scholarly engagement with his notion of “prophetic imagination” (though see de Hulster 2010). Arguably, Brueggemann has performed the service of articulating a mode of approaching the text that is no longer so unusual in terms of interpreters more broadly operating within the loosely defined postmodern context noted above. Nevertheless, relatively rare discussions of “imagination and responsible reading” (Hart) or “the faithful imagination” as it operates within Christian approaches to Scripture in the postmodern world (G. Green, 187-206) are still valuable reflections on what is at stake in appealing to the imaginative construal both in and of the OT’s prophetic texts, and in moving helpfully to the present interpretive horizon. There remains scope, however, for a careful integration of Brueggemann’s concerns with more explicitly christological emphases in interpretation, which might probe what is at stake in seeing Israel’s imaginative hopes taken up in some sense in the person of Christ.

3.3. Texts That Invite Ideological and Theological Advocacy. Brueggemann's work highlights one of the most striking hermeneutical developments in biblical studies in recent decades: the turn away from supposedly value-free or neutral scholarship and the embrace of a "de-centered" set of practices that explicitly engage with questions of the location of the reader and the ideological and theological (as well as cultural and other) perspectives that are bound up in such reading. A key moment along this trajectory was E. Schüssler Fiorenza's influential Society of Biblical Literature presidential address in 1988, in which she argued that all biblical scholarship represents an advocacy position of some kind. Much recent scholarship on the Prophetic Books embodies just such a conviction, whether undertaken from a vantage point of ideological suspicion or from a more theological perspective seeking to appropriate in some manner the claims of the text for today's reader.

Arguably, ideological/advocacy reading is one of the most prominent academic approaches to biblical texts today. It is given particularly sharp and eloquent expression in some of the essays of D. Clines, whose book Interested Parties (subtitled The Ideology of Writers and Readers of the Hebrew Bible) seeks "to uncover the ideologies that lie beneath the surface . . . especially ways in which [interpreters] either uncritically adopt the ideology of the text they are commenting on or impose the values of their own ideology upon the biblical text" (Clines, 18). Clines demonstrates, for example, how interpreters of Amos persistently elide any difference between their own hermeneutical framework and that assumed by the prophet in the text, with the result that supposedly critical interpretations are little more than contemporary paraphrases of Amos's own agenda (Clines, 76-93). On the one hand, it may be a testimony to the persuasive power of the prophetic texts that it does not seem to occur to most commentators that evaluative questions might persist after the task of explicating the prophetic message has been undertaken: Is Amos right? Does Isaiah have a point? On the other hand, such a hermeneutical step immediately requires the articulation of an alternative evaluative scheme from which to make any further judgments. Ideological critique of the OT text, therefore, typically devolves fairly quickly on to ethics and broader (often postmodern) theory (for a good example of which, see Collins, 131-61) or else on to theological attempts to articulate what is at stake in such reading.

Theological interpretation has been a major emphasis in biblical hermeneutics in the early twenty-first century. It too can be subject to the critique offered by Clines, that it reduces to pious paraphrase or fails to probe the theological conceptuality at stake in the texts. Nevertheless, when undertaken in full awareness of such hermeneutical issues, theological interpretation of the prophetic texts offers the chance for Jewish and for Christian readers to allow these texts to play their part in witnessing to the demands of life before the God of these texts. Although certain key texts (notably Is 53) have markedly different receptions in Jewish and Christian traditions, there is much common ground between these theological perspectives. Such an awareness mitigates against some Jewish traditions that overly subsume readings of the prophets to the task of interpreting the Torah, or some Christian (notably Protestant) traditions that highlight those passages that seem to critique ritual or cultic worship (e.g., Is 1:10-20; Amos 5:21-25) as if to suggest that such matters could be downgraded in an overall understanding of the prophetic message (see Brettler, 458). Such an unnuanced "Protestant" perspective has tended to say more about the worldview of those modern interpreters who disliked priestly and legal traditions than about the views at work in the prophetic texts, which assume an overall orientation that encompasses both ritual worship and wider horizons of justice.

Studies of *justice (mīšpat) and its concomitant righteousness (šēdāqā) in the prophets are one example of concerns that may bring a strong ethical edge into fruitful dialogue with wider theological perspectives about the God of Israel. This allows an ongoing task of theological articulation of the claims made both upon and on behalf of those who stand in the faith traditions that develop beyond the prophetic corpus. Such studies also indicate that one should not distinguish too sharply between ideological and theological approaches on hermeneutical grounds: they can involve the same patient weighing of interpretive frameworks and their moral and ethical commitments, even while disagreeing on the weight attached to more specifically theological claims in the text (a good example is Houston 2008, 52-98, 161-69 especially, in a study that bears the subtitle Ideologies and Theologies of Social Justice in the Old Testament).

3.4. Texts That Summon the Reader. A final hermeneutical approach that deserves brief mention is the appeal to the prophetic texts made in the work of one of the great hermeneuts of the twentieth century, P. Ricoeur (1913-2005). Although much of Ricoeur's hermeneutical work was kept separate from his theological convictions, he did occasionally address matters of biblical interpretation, including in his 1986 Gifford Lectures, published as Oneself as Another (1992), although its two biblical-theological studies were published separately from the main work (Ricoeur 1995; 1997). The first of these concerned "The Summoned Subject in the School of the Narratives of the Prophetic Vocation." In the second, a broader work primarily occupied with the question of how one should conceive of the self as a morally responsible and well-defined agent, he urged that Scripture plays the fundamental hermeneutical role of helping to constitute the self by holding it in dialogue before a wide range of biblical witnesses to the God who lies behind it and who gives it its imaginative and typological unity. This leads him to focus on the OT's prophetic call narratives because they are prime examples of the OT's "dialogic structure that confronts the words and acts of God with the response human beings give to them" (Ricoeur 1995, 263). The result is a "sent, mandated, commanded subject" (or self) who, through the call of God that comes via the conscience, models profoundly the nature of selfhood to which the reader of Scripture is called. To use one of Ricoeur's terms, the engaged reader is "refigured" through the hermeneutical dynamic of the text, and the reader's self is thereby reconstituted.

Ricoeur's work generally, and notably this aspect of it, requires some transposition to meet the demands of theological reflection on the hermeneutical frameworks that he brings to bear (see Stiver, 175-78, 234-38). However, this is a striking example where he effectively insists that prophetic call narratives perform in particular the task that in general is Scripture's function to perform: to help form readers who are invited and willing to submit themselves to the requirements of the God of the text. In short, readers are summoned by the prophetic text, and in the process they are transformed.

4. Discerning the Prophetic Word Then and Now.

We have considered the hermeneutical issues of how one approaches the texts, the modes of reading to which the texts themselves were subject in their own contexts, and then some hermeneutical dimensions of the question of how one might navigate between the texts and today's readers. In concluding, it is worth focusing on one particular issue that is central to the appropriate handling of prophecy: discernment. This question arises on a number of levels, but we will consider briefly only two "poles" of the issue: how the prophetic texts themselves speak to the question of criteria for discernment, and how one might deploy such prophetic texts discerningly today. In particular, a pressing hermeneutical question is how (or whether) one can relate the OT prophetic texts to an issue such as the contemporary environmental crisis, which is framed at least primarily in the terms of current debate rather than as a matter arising out of exegesis of the texts in the first instance. The subtitles of the two sections that follow are drawn from monographs that offer suggestive ways forward in the question of how to draw appropriately on the OT texts today.

4.1. Prophecy and Discernment. R. W. L. Moberly's Prophecy and Discernment is in part a response to earlier studies of "hermeneutics in true and false prophecy," such as J. Sanders's influential study under that title, which effectively locate the question of discernment in the need for time to pass in order that events may judge whether the prophetic word is proved true or not. Moberly's alternative proposal is that the prophet, who is "in essence one who speaks for God," must be one who has stood in the divine presence (Moberly 2006, 4, 9). However, this does not remove the basis on which one might speak for God to some unexaminable "spiritual realm" beyond the canons of critical inquiry. Whatever psychological or emotive aspects of prophetic ministry might be in place, there remains, insists Moberly, something that can be discussed and probed: "It is the content of the encounter with the divine that is determinative of its validity" (Moberly 2006, 10). The apparently "inaccessible" is rendered "accessible" by both the character of the prophet and the nature of the message, and "the visible gives access to the invisible; the moral gives critical purchase on the spiritual" (Moberly 2006, 225).

The major case study by which this thesis is established concerns Jeremiah and what Jeremiah models with regard to the core task of speaking for God. On the one hand, those whom the book of Jeremiah designates as false prophets are false because they do not speak out of their experience of the presence of God. With respect in particular to Jeremiah 23, "The absence of these prophets from YHWH's council is shown by their failure to proclaim a message whose purpose was to turn [shūv] people from evil into ways that would be more in keeping with YHWH's will and character" (Moberly 2006, 75). On the other hand, Jeremiah himself offers the example of how prophecy should work: "The all-important claim to be from God—to have stood in the divine council, to be sent, to speak YHWH's word(s)—is to speak of a divine realm that is not vacuous, for the reason that it is the prophet's lifestyle and message, whose moral character are open to scrutiny in the present, which give content to the claim about God. The 'spiritual' nature of the prophetic message, whether or not it is from God, is determined by its 'moral' content and accompaniment" (Moberly 2006, 81 [italics added]).

Such an approach integrates an ethical agenda with the reading of Scripture without reducing the tasks of such reading to any form of moralism. Moberly's proposal indicates that Jeremiah 28, where Hananiah predicts release from the yoke of Babylon within two years, is about prophetic conflict, but not substantively about criteria for resolving questions of discernment, which are rather in view in Jeremiah 23. A fundamental aspect of this thesis is that right discernment of the prophetic voice cannot sidestep broader questions having to do with the standing of the prophet morally and ethically before God. The prophetic texts, therefore, should not be seen as either reflecting or inviting a process whereby one might claim immediate access to the divine voice without needing to engage in careful weighing of how the divine word can be understood in dialogue with many other issues. On a hermeneutical level, this in turn suggests that those who read the OT prophetic texts must themselves engage with the same demandingly wide range of moral and ethical matters in rightly discerning how to handle the texts for their voice today.

4.2. Biblical Prophets and Contemporary Environmental Ethics. One striking example of such a need for discernment is the way in which the relevance or otherwise of OT prophetic texts to matters such as today's environmental concerns has been understood at different times. Readers inclined to feel the moral force of such matters will read the texts alert to their address of such issues, whereas it is relatively easy to demonstrate that many exegetes have not been inclined to ask such questions in their reading of the texts. A constructive proposal along these lines is put forward by H. Marlow, who uses the biblical prophets as a lens for exploring various aspects of the current environmental crisis. She is able to demonstrate that a good deal of the reception of prophetic texts in the Christian tradition has been largely inattentive to the significance of broader ecological concerns, and she sets out to recover material in the text that can "demonstrate an ethic which values all people and the whole of creation" (Marlow, 277).

A hermeneutically sophisticated project along comparable lines is E. Davis's study Scripture, Culture, and Agriculture, which engages intensely with both the OT and contemporary agrarian writing, notably that of W. Berry. In her chapter on the prophets Davis draws suggestive and compelling parallels between the ways in which both the OT prophets and the new agrarians trace the links between treatment of the land and wider questions of economy, greed and trust. Most telling: "Our relationship to the soil, demonstrated primarily in our practices of food production and consumption, is fundamental to every other aspect of human life" (Davis, 121). Davis traces how various prophetic texts, notably the eighth-century BC prophets, offer sharp poetic images exploring these links. Rather like the concluding oracles of the book of Amos, Davis concludes that on the topic of the future of our planet, "the Bible as a whole tends toward a tenacious but severely chastened hope" (Davis, 180).

Such approaches exemplify how today's readers might appeal responsibly to the prophetic texts in the context of contemporary issues where the voice of the God of Israel might still be discerned today.

See also: CANONICAL CRITICISM; CONVERSATION ANALYSIS; DANIEL: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION; EDITORIAL/REDACTION CRITICISM; ETHICS; EZEKIEL: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION; FEMINIST INTERPRETATION; FORM CRITICISM; INTERTEXTUALITY AND INNERBIBLICAL INTERPRETATION; ISAIAH: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION; JEREMIAH: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION; PERFORMANCE CRITICISM; PROPHECY AND ESCHATOLOGY IN CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY; PROPHETS IN THE NEW TESTAMENT; RHETORICAL CRITICISM; TWELVE, BOOK OF THE: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. W. Adams, The Performative Nature and Function of Isaiah 40-55 (LHBOTS 448; New York: T & T Clark, 2006); C. D. Allert, A High View of Scripture? The Authority of the Bible and the Formation of the New Testament Canon (Evangelical Ressourcement; Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2007); J. Barton, "Authorship, OT," NIDB 1:354-55; idem, "'The Law and the Prophets': Who Are the Prophets?" OtSt 23 (1984) 1-18; idem, Oracles of God: Perceptions of Ancient Prophecy in Israel after the Exile (London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1986); J. Blenkinsopp, Opening the Sealed Book: Interpretations of the Book of Isaiah in Late Antiquity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2006); M. Z. Brettler, "Nevi'im: Introduction," in The Jewish Study Bible, ed. A. Berlin and M. Brettler (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004) 451-61; R. S. Briggs, Words in Action: Speech Act Theory and Biblical Interpretation; Toward a Hermeneutic of Self-involvement (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 2001); W. Brueggemann, The Prophetic Imagination (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978); idem, Hopeful Imagination: Prophetic Voices in Exile (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); idem, Texts under Negotiation: The Bible and Postmodern Imagination (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); idem, An Introduction to the Old Testament: The Canon and Christian Imagination (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 2003); R. P. Carroll, Jeremiah (OTL; London: SCM, 1986); S. B. Chapman, The Law and the Prophets: A Study in Old Testament Canon Formation (FAT 27; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2000); B. S. Childs, Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture (London: SCM, 1979); idem, Isaiah (OTL; Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 2001); D. J. A. Clines, Interested Parties: The Ideology of Writers and Readers of the Hebrew Bible

(JSOTSup 205; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995); J. J. Collins, The Bible after Babel: Historical Criticism in a Postmodern Age (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2005); E. W. Conrad, Reading Isaiah (OBT; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); idem, Reading the Latter Prophets: Toward a New Canonical Criticism (JSOTSup 376; London: T & T Clark International, 2003); E. F. Davis, Scripture, Culture, and Agriculture: An Agrarian Reading of the Bible (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2009); I. J. de Hulster, "Imagination: A Hermeneutical Tool for the Study of the Hebrew Bible," BibInt 18 (2010) 114-36; L. DiTommaso, "Apocalypses and Apocalypticism in Antiquity (Part 1)," CBR 5.2 (2007) 235-86; W. Doan and T. Giles, Prophets, Performance, and Power: Performance Criticism of the Hebrew Bible (New York: T & T Clark, 2005); T. Eagleton, "J. L. Austin and the Book of Jonah," in The Book and the Text: The Bible and Literary Theory, ed. R. Schwartz (Oxford: Blackwell, 1990) 231-36; M. H. Floyd, "'Write the Revelation!'" (Hab 2:2): Re-imagining the Cultural History of Prophecy," in Writings and Speech in Israelite and Ancient Near Eastern Prophecy, ed. E. Ben Zvi and M. Floyd (SBLSymS 10; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2000) 103-43; K. G. Friebel, Jeremiah's and Ezekiel's Sign-Acts: Rhetorical Non-verbal Communication (JSOTSup 283; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1999); G. Green, Theology, Hermeneutics, and Imagination: The Crisis of Interpretation at the End of Modernity (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000); J. B. Green, 1 Peter (THNTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2007); P. D. Hanson, The Dawn of Apocalyptic: The Historical and Sociological Roots of Jewish Apocalyptic Eschatology (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1975); T. Hart, "Imagination and Responsible Reading," in Renewing Biblical Interpretation, ed. C. Bartholomew, C. Greene and K. Möller (SHS1; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2000) 307-34; P. R. House, The Unity of the Twelve (JSOTSup 90; Sheffield: Almond, 1990); W. Houston, "What Did the Prophets Think They Were Doing? Speech Acts and Prophetic Discourse in the Old Testament," BibInt 1 (1993) 167-88; idem, Contending for Justice: Ideologies and Theologies of Social Justice in the Old Testament (rev. ed.; JSOTSup 428; London: T & T Clark, 2008); T. Koch, "Isaiah," in The Queer Bible Commentary, ed. D. Guest et al. (London: SCM, 2006) 371-85; J. R. Lundbom, "Baruch, Seraiah and Expanded Colophons in the Book of Jeremiah," JSOT 36 (1986) 89-114; idem, Jeremiah 21-36 (AB 21B; New York: Doubleday, 2004); H. Marlow, Biblical Prophets and Contemporary Environmental Ethics: Re-Reading Amos, Hosea, and First Isaiah (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2009); R. W. L. Moberly, "Holy, Holy, Holy': Isaiah's Vision of God," in Holiness: Past and Present, ed. S. C. Barton (London: T & T Clark, 2003) 122-40; idem, Prophecy and Discernment (CSCD 14; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2006); J. D. Nogalski and M. A. Sweeney, eds., Reading and Hearing the Book of the Twelve (SBLSymS 15; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2000); D. L. Petersen, The Prophetic Literature: An Introduction (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 2002); idem, "The Basic Forms of Prophetic Literature," in The Changing Face of Form Criticism for the Twenty-First Century, ed. M. A. Sweeney and E. Ben Zvi (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003) 269-75; P. L. Redditt and A. Schart, eds., Thematic Threads in the Book of the Twelve (BZAW 325; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2003); P. Ricoeur, One-self as Another, trans. K. Blamey (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1992); idem, "The Summoned Subject in the School of the Narratives of the Prophetic Vocation," in Figuring the Sacred: Religion, Narrative, and Imagination, trans. D. Pellauer, ed. M. I. Wallace (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995) 262-75; idem, "The Self in the Mirror of the Scriptures," in The Whole and Divided Self, ed. D. E. Aune and J. McCarthy (New York: Crossroad, 1997) 201-20; J. A. Sanders, "Hermeneutics in True and False Prophecy," in Canon and Authority: Essays in Old Testament Religion and Authority, ed. G. W. Coats and B. O. Long (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977) 21-41; E. Schüssler Fiorenza, "The Ethics of Biblical Interpretation: Decentering Biblical Scholarship," JBL 107 (1988) 3-17; C. R. Seitz, Prophecy and Hermeneutics: Towards a New Introduction to the Prophets (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2007); idem, The Goodly Fellowship of the Prophets. The Achievement of Association in Canon Formation (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2009); D. L. Smith-Christopher, "The Book of Daniel," NIB 7:17-194; idem, A Biblical Theology of Exile (OBT; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2002); D. Stacey, Prophetic Drama in the Old Testament (London: Epworth, 1990); D. R. Stiver, Theology after Ricoeur: New Directions in Hermeneutical Theology (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 2001); A. L. H. M. van Wieringen, The Implied Reader in Isaiah 6-12 (BIS 34; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1998); C. Westermann, Basic Forms of Prophetic Speech, trans. H. White (Philadelphia: Westminster/John Knox, 1991a); idem, Prophetic Oracles of Salvation in the Old Testament, trans. K. Crim (Philadelphia: Westminster/John Knox, 1991b); H. G. M. Williamson, The Book Called Isaiah: Deutero-Isaiah's Role in Composition and Redaction (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1994).

R. S. Briggs

HIGH AND LIFTED UP. See ISAIAH: BOOK OF.

HOLY ONE OF ISRAEL. See ISAIAH: BOOK OF.

HOLY SPIRIT. See SPIRIT OF YAHWEH.

HONOR AND SHAME

Honor and shame are important concepts in the world of ancient Israel, as is attested by their frequent mention in OT literature. Honor is an appreciation of one's own value and worth that is publicly acknowledged by others, often with the help of symbolic actions or rituals. Shame is a low estimation of oneself caused by failure to meet certain agreed social standards and by an accompanying attitude of contempt and derision. Both are very much public phenomena dependent on one's interaction with other people and the way they observe and judge a person's qualities and behavior.

1. The Vocabulary of Honor and Shame
2. Shame and Failure
3. Honor and Shame in Judgment and Salvation
4. Honor and Shame in Divine-Human Relationships
5. The Objective and Subjective Aspects of Shame
6. The Honor of God

1. The Vocabulary of Honor and Shame.

Biblical Hebrew has a rich vocabulary related to the concept of shame: bwš, usually rendered "to be ashamed" (būšā, bōšet, "shame"), although recently Y. Avrahami has argued that its basic meaning is "to be disappointed"; klm, "to be humiliated, to be put to shame" (kēlimmā, kēlimmūt, "insult, humiliation"); hpr, "to be ashamed"; qlh, "to be contemptible" (perhaps a by-form of qll, "to be light, small, insignificant"; qālôn, "shame"; qīqālôn, "disgrace"); špl, "to be low, to humiliate" (šāpāl, "low, humble, of little value”; šēpel, “lowliness, humiliation”); hrp, “to taunt” (herpâ, “disgrace”); bwz, “to show contempt” (bûz, bûzâ, “contempt”); bzh, “to despise, be despised” (bizzâyôn, “contempt”); n’s, “to spurn, treat disrespectfully” (nē’āsâ, “humiliation”); zll, “to despise.” The most important Hebrew root connected with the idea of honor is kbd. The verb means “to be heavy, be weighty” and hence “to honor, to be honored,” and the noun (kābôd) denotes “honor, reputation, glory, splendor.” Other words related to this concept are hādār, “splendor, dignity”; hōd, “power, majesty”; gā’ôn, “eminence, pride”; gē’ūt, “illustriousness”; šēm, “name, reputation”; tip’eret, “beauty, splendor, glory, fame”; šēbî, “beauty, splendor”; yēqār, “preciousness, honor”; tehilla, “glory, praise.”

2. Shame and Failure.

Failure is one of the basic reasons why people experience shame. In a military or judicial contest, to lose means to be ashamed, while to win is equivalent to shaming one’s opponent (Mic 7:10; Zech 10:5). It is against such a background that Jeremiah’s prayers that his persecutors be shamed must be understood (Jer 17:18; 20:11). In these verses to be put to shame is placed in parallel with disaster, *destruction, dismay, stumbling, not prevailing and not succeeding. The disgrace (bwš, hpr) of the seers in Micah 3:7 stems from their inability to elicit an answer from God—that is, their failure to perform their function as seers. In Jeremiah 8:9 the wise are put to shame (bwš) through the failure of their wisdom, which is unable to achieve security for the nation.

A nation experiences shame as a result of defeat in battle, loss of territory or the capture of its capital. The defeats of Israel (Jer 2:36), Egypt (Jer 46:11-12), Moab (Jer 48:1, 20, 39), Damascus (Jer 49:23), Tyre (Is 23:9) and *Babylon (Jer 51:47) are described with the help of shame terminology. J. Stiebert interprets a number of these references as reflecting an anti-foreign ideology of the postexilic period that somehow sees shame connected to foreignness (Stiebert 2002, 125), but there is no basis in the texts for such a conclusion. The shame of the foreign *nations, like Israel’s shame, stems from the mere fact that they have failed in battle and have shown themselves to be weak and inadequate. Natural disasters such as crop failure (Joel 1:11-12, contrast with Joel 2:23-27)

(see Simkins, 46) and drought (Jer 14:1-4) also bring shame. The reason for disgrace in this instance is probably the notion that famine is indicative of God’s abandonment of his people (for a connection between abandonment and shame, see Is 54:4-7).

3. Honor and Shame in Judgment and Salvation.

Shame and judgment are tightly interconnected in prophetic literature. In Micah 2:6 “humiliation” (kēlimmôt) is even used as a shorthand reference to the doom preached by the prophet (Wagner, 191, 195). Most prominent is the association of God’s judgment with the shame of military defeat. In such contexts shame is used in parallel with mourning, destruction, ruin and death (Jer 9:19; 15:9; 23:40; 50:12; Ezek 7:18; Obad 10). The sneer and derision of the nations are an important element of the descriptions of such military misfortunes (Jer 46:12; 48:39; 51:51; Ezek 34:29; 36:6; Zeph 2:8) as well as of the shame experienced during the time of famine and drought (Joel 2:17) (on this, see also Simkins, 48, 51, and the criticisms of Stiebert 2002, 78-79). The fact that in social life shame functions as a sanction of unacceptable social behavior (Bechtel, 50-52, 76) also facilitates the association of Israel’s shame and punishment (see the comparison with a thief in Jer 2:26).

Judgment and shame in the OT are confined predominantly to this world. Only rarely is the question of shame beyond the grave touched upon. Honor in *death was traditionally connected to the high social status of the deceased, the manner of their death and a proper burial, while lack of burial or dishonorable death brought disgrace (Is 14:18-19; Jer 22:18-19). There also may have been beliefs in the existence of places of honor and shame in the underworld (Eichrodt, 437-38). Ezekiel 32:17-31 plays on such notions to depict polemically the ultimate disgrace of Egypt in Sheol and its confinement there to spheres of uncleanness (Strong, 489-97). In Daniel 12:2 we find a radical development and transformation of such ideas. There the “shame [hārāpôt] and everlasting contempt” of those resurrected for punishment is contrasted with the “everlasting life” of the righteous and the wise (cf. Is 66:24) (see Afterlife).

As judgment brings disgrace, salvation leads to the removal of shame. It involves the transition from shame to joy (Is 61:7; 65:13) and entails restoration of the honor (kbd) of the exiles in both the sight of God and the sight of other nations (Is 43:4; Jer 30:19; Zeph 3:19). Restoration promises often include the assurance that “you shall not (again) be put to shame [bwš]” (Is 45:17; 49:23; 54:4; Zeph 3:11). In such places the glory (kābôd, tip’eret) of *Zion is in parallel to its vindication and deliverance and results from the end of its abandonment and the renewal of its relationship with the Lord (Is 62:1-4). Recently, J. T. Strong has suggested that the message of Ezekiel’s vision of the valley of the dry bones (Ezek 37:1-14) is that through recreating Israel anew the Lord not only resurrects the nation to a new life after defeat and judgment, but also restores their honor reversing the shame of the exile, depicted in the vision as dishonorable death (Strong, 497-504).

4. Honor and Shame in Divine-Human Relationships.

4.1. Sin. In prophetic literature honor is connected to *sin in quite a surprising way. On a certain level, honor is tied to having a good reputation and is recognized as the basis of one’s social position (Simkins, 49; Lemos, 228). Those of prestige, influence and wealth are called “honored men” (Is 3:5; 5:13; 23:8; Nah 3:10). However, human honor is not generally perceived in a positive light. It is seen as an expression of arrogance and independence that defies the Lord and attracts his judgment (Stiebert 2002, 88-89). The honor of Assyria’s military success is depicted as an empty boast (Is 10:12-15) that eventually leads to humiliation and destruction (Is 10:16-18; see also Is 13:19; 16:14; 17:1-4; 21:16; Jer 48:18; Ezek 31:18; Dan 4:37). Similar is the fate of Ephraim, whose wreath and glorious beauty (šēbi tip’artô), symbols of his wealth, position and honor, are cast down by the Lord (Is 28:1-5). Shebna, who attempts to gain honor for himself by his splendid grave and chariots, is humiliated and rejected as “shame [qālôn] to his master’s house,” possibly because his search for honor is seen as an expression of arrogance (Is 22:15-18). Two other sins are also closely connected with the concept of shame: reliance on human strength (Is 30:1-5) and trust in other gods (Is 42:17; 44:9, 11; 45:16; Jer 10:14; 17:13; 51:17). Both of these constitute an implicit refusal to rely on the Lord’s power that leads ultimately to disappointment and failure. The Isaiah tradition makes the connection between these plain by describing both Egypt and idols with the same phrase, “no profit,” which underlines their ineffectiveness.

4.2. Repentance. While in judgment Israel is objectively shamed by Yahweh, internalizing this shame can lead to realization of the inherent shamefulness of sin and thus can bring about repentance. In Jeremiah 31:18-19 a feeling of shame (bwš, klm) at the sins of the past accompanies Ephraim’s return to the Lord and is contrasted with the earlier rebuke that Judah “refused to be ashamed [klm]” (Jer 3:3)—that is, refused to repent of its apostasy. In Ezekiel the Israelites are called in the light of God’s mercy and grace to be ashamed (bwš, klm) of what they had done (Ezek 36:31-32). According to Ezekiel, however, such an experience of shame (bwš) and humiliation (kēlimmâ) ultimately will not be the prerequisite but the result of divine forgiveness and deliverance (Ezek 16:63; 39:26 [contrast BHS: “they will forget their shame”]). This shame probably is to be regarded as a constitutive element of true repentance stemming from the nation’s realization of its own inadequacy and moral responsibility (Wagner, 192; contrast Odell and see the discussion in Stiebert 2002, 155-60). J. E. Lapsley has argued that in those passages the “gift of shame” is to be seen as a salvific act of God, part of reconstituting Israel’s new moral identity based on true knowledge of God and of self (Lapsley, 142-57).

4.3. Mutual Honor. While shame signals the disruption of divine-human relationship, expression of honor is the normal way in which this relationship functions. Israel is called to honor (kbd) the Lord in the cult (Is 43:23; Hag 1:8; Mal 1:6) and to honor the Lord alone. To honor other gods is a grave and destructive sin (Dan 5:23). But these outer forms of expression, important as they are, are insufficient. They must reflect an appropriate inner attitude; otherwise, they are merely “honoring [kbd] with the lips” and become empty and meaningless (Is 29:13). Honor has, therefore, both an objective and a subjective aspect. Objectively, it is expressed in symbolic actions that proclaim publicly human appreciation of divine glory; subjectively, it has to do with an attitude of submission and adoration.

Honor is not conferred only by people of inferior social standing to a superior. A suzerain may honor his vassals (Olyan, 204-8) as a king may honor a faithful servant (Dan 2:6). In the same way, the Lord honors his people by giving them joy, prosperity and dominion over their oppressors (Is 60:9-16). The Isaianic *Servant of the Lord, who is humiliated by others, is honored (kbd) in the sight of the Lord (Is 49:5), and this honor is what ultimately matters (Is 50:7). In the Prophetic Books the only way for humans to receive honor is by it being granted to them by the Lord, not by earning it through their own efforts.

5. The Objective and Subjective Aspects of Shame.

There is debate as to what extent the concept of shame, which has more to do with the outer pressure from society, must be distinguished from or identified with that of guilt, which is related more to the inner pressure of an individual's conscience (Bechtel, 48-55; Stiebert 2000, 256-59). There is also disagreement whether shame is to be understood solely objectively, as a loss of status (Odell, 103), or if it includes also a subjective aspect, with feelings of unworthiness and personal shortcoming (Stiebert 2002, 93-94; Lapsley, 133-37).

Shame is clearly distinguished from guilt by the fact that it is inexorably linked to what others think of oneself. Therefore, someone may experience shame without having committed any morally objectionable acts simply because others find that person's actions unacceptable. Jeremiah, for example, complains that he has come forth from his mother's womb only to experience toil and shame (Jer 20:18 [bōšet])—that is, the derision of his compatriots because of his prophetic message (Jer 20:7, 10). Like Jeremiah, the Suffering Servant in Isaiah is publicly insulted and humiliated (klm), yet, in contrast, he claims that he will not be humiliated and put to shame (klm, bwš) because it is the Lord who helps him and vindicates him (Is 50:6-7). It is clear that on this occasion shame is related not to what others think of the Suffering Servant but rather to what the Lord thinks and does for him (contra Wagner, who interprets klm in Is 50:7 as referring to "existential destruction" [Wagner, 195]). Assurance of the Lord's coming vindication triumphs over present disgrace. This line of development reaches a climax in Isaiah 53:2-4, where public humiliation becomes in fact not something negative and repulsive but rather is endowed with new meaning and redemptive significance. Here we see the same pattern as in Isaiah 50:6-7: the apparent initial disgrace of the servant culminates in his ultimate exaltation (Is 52:13).

Shame, therefore, involves more than the fear of losing face. It is related to what one perceives to be right and wrong in the light of one's own conscience and sometimes regardless of public opinion. For this reason, Jeremiah can reproach his contemporaries that "they acted shamefully [bwš]" . . . but were not ashamed [bwš]" and even "did not know how to feel humiliation [klm]" (Jer 6:15; 8:12). In this situation their behavior seems to have not received social reprimand, yet Jeremiah thinks that they still should experience shame because their actions are intrinsically shameful. Similar thinking probably underlines the complaint in Zephaniah 3:5 that the "unjust knows no shame [bōšet]" as well as the designation of Judah as a "shameless nation" in Zephaniah 2:1 (the meaning of the text is disputed). In the light of these verses, Stiebert's analysis that shame involves fundamentally a negative self-judgment in the light of an ideal that the individual holds in common with the community (Stiebert 2000, 256) seems to be correct. Due to its objective and subjective aspects, the concept of shame helps us to gain a fresh appreciation of the inherent connection between the sin of Israel and the judgment resulting from that sin. The clearest way this is achieved in the prophets is through the use of the sexual metaphor to describe both Israel's shameful behavior and the shame of Israel's punishment. Such imagery is particularly strong in Hosea, Jeremiah and Ezekiel, who portray Israel (and Judah) as an adulterous woman unfaithful to her divine husband. The metaphor of fornication and adultery is most commonly used to condemn worship of other gods and to convey the notion that idolatry is as shameful as is indecent sexual conduct (Hos 1:2; 2:2-5; 3:1; Jer 2:20-28; Ezek 16:15-25). Judgment is portrayed with the help of the image of shaming a woman by exposing her nakedness. Northern Israel (Hos 2:2, 10), Judah (Jer 13:26) and Jerusalem (Ezek 16:37), as well as Assyria (Nah 3:5) and Babylon (Is 47:3), are to suffer such fate. A number of these passages, with their vivid and shocking imagery, often are perceived as problematic by modern readers and as degrading to women (Shields, 7, 13). However, we must not lose sight of the fact that their primary aim is not to comment or give guidance on gender relations but rather to interpret aspects of Israel's relationship with God by utilizing existing cultural preconceptions about what is appropriate and inappropriate in male and female behavior. It is noteworthy that through the use of the marriage metaphor the predominantly male audience of the prophets is called to experience in relation to Yahweh a type of shame that on a purely social level is appropriate only for females.

The use of the sexual metaphor is one of the points where insights gained from anthropology might potentially be fruitful in advancing our understanding of the text. It has been pointed out that in Mediterranean societies honor and shame are closely linked with sexual relations and gender roles. A married woman who has intercourse with another man destroys the honor of her husband (Delaney, 40, 42; Giovannini, 68; see also Stone, 44, 69-126, 142-44). If the story of Hosea 1—3 is read through such a cultural lens, an important aspect of its message would be brought to light. The behavior of Gomer brings disgrace upon Hosea as Israel's *idolatry brings disgrace upon her divine husband, Yahweh. In a striking countercultural move, the prophet (and God) places his love for his wayward wife above his own honor and is determined to restore her to himself even at the expense of his own humiliation. Attractive as this reading is, it is surprising that in Hosea 1—3 there is no mention whatsoever of the theme of the husband's disgrace and honor. The focus is solely on the shamefulfulness and the shame experienced by Gomer/Israel.

6. The Honor of God.

The only one who has a proper and undeniable claim to honor in the prophetic literature is the Lord himself. His honor results from his holiness, creation power, dominion over the world and historic acts of judgment and *salvation (Is 6:3; 43:7; Ezek 28:22; 36:21-23; Dan 4:34), and this stands in sharp contrast to human transience and arrogance (Is 2:10-22; 40:5-8). Even the sun and the moon, here representing either the created order or, more likely, astral deities worshiped throughout the ancient world, are ashamed (hpr, bwš) before the manifestation of the Lord's glory (kābōd) (Is 24:23).

This raises the question of whether the Lord can be in any way dishonored or put to shame (see the survey of discussion in Stiebert 2002, 96-98). The motif of God acting out of concern to preserve his honor is encountered in a variety of OT texts (Glat-Gilad). Historically, it is connected to the belief that the fortunes of a given nation reflect on the reputation of its god (see the shame of Bel and Merodach in Jer 50:2, and compare Jer 48:13). So the Babylonian exile causes God's name to be despised (n's) and profaned (hll) among the nations (Is 52:5; Ezek 36:19-21) because he is perceived to be weak and ineffective in protecting his people. It is because of concern for his name (šēm) that God refrains from total extermination of Israel after the exodus from Egypt (Ezek 20:9, 14, 22) and during the exile (Is 48:11), and it is to protect his honor that he brings back his people to their land (Ezek 36:21-23).

Unlike Israel, Yahweh cannot experience shame because of doing something shameful in and of itself or because of failing to achieve his purposes. Yet the OT seems to suggest that he can be disgraced in the eyes of the world because he has allowed himself to be so intimately associated with one nation that their humiliation may become his. By entering into a special relationship with Israel, God makes himself vulnerable and opens himself to the effects of the sins and failures of his people. This is not presented as insignificant to God: he guards his honor zealously, yet his honor is not so important as to make him disassociate from Israel completely.

The question still remains as to why it would matter to an almighty God what his reputation among the gentile nations is (Glat-Gilad, 63-64). Within a canonical context, Yahweh's concern for his name prepares the way for the missiological stance of the NT. The Lord's acts of judgment and salvation, which reflect on his reputation, serve to make his name (šēm) known among the nations (Ezek 28:22-23; 38:23). Thus, Yahweh's concern for his honor has a revelatory dimension to it. What the nations think of Israel's God matters because he wants to be known beyond the borders of Canaan. He is not content to remain only Israel's God; he intends to be honored throughout the whole world, which he has created.

See also DEATH; EXILE; SIN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Y. Avrahami, "שָׁמָּה in the Psalms—Shame or Disappointment?" JSOT 34 (2010) 295-313; L. M. Bechtel, "Shame as a Sanction of Social Control in Biblical Israel: Judicial, Political, and Social Shaming,” JSOT 49 (1991) 47-76; C. Delaney, “Seeds of Honor, Fields of Shame,” in Honor and Shame and the Unity of the Mediterranean, ed. D. D. Gilmore (Washington, DC: American Anthropological Association, 1987) 35-48; W. Eichrodt, Ezekiel (OTL; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1970); M. J. Giovannini, “Female Chastity Codes in the Circum-Mediterranean: Comparative Perspectives,” in Honor and Shame and the Unity of the Mediterranean, ed. D. D. Gilmore (Washington, DC: American Anthropological Association, 1987) 61-74; D. A. Glatt-Gilad, “Yahweh’s Honor at Stake: A Divine Conundrum,” JSOT 98 (2002) 63-74; S. Kirkpatrick, Competing for Honor: A Social-Scientific Reading of Daniel 1-6 (BIS 74; Leiden: Brill, 2005); T. S. Laniak, Shame and Honor in the Book of Esther (SBLDS 165; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1998); J. E. Lapsley, Can These Bones Live? The Problem of the Moral Self in the Book of Ezekiel (BZAW 301; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2000); T. M. Lemos, “Shame and Mutilation of Enemies in the Hebrew Bible,” JBL 125 (2006) 225-41; M. S. Odell, “The Inversion of Shame and Forgiveness in Ezekiel 16:59-63,” JSOT 56 (1992) 101-12; S. M. Olyan, “Honor, Shame and Covenant Relations in Ancient Israel and its Environment,” JBL 115 (1996) 201-18; H. Seebass, “בִּזְיוֹן,” TDOT 2:50-60; M. E. Shields, “Multiple Exposures: Body Rhetoric and Gender Characterization in Ezekiel 16,” JFSR 14 (1998) 5-18; R. A. Simkins, “Return to Yahweh’: Honor and Shame in Joel,” Semeia 68 (1996) 41-54; J. Stiebert, “Shame and Prophecy: Approaches Past and Present,” BibInt 8 (2000) 255-75; idem, The Construction of Shame in the Hebrew Bible: The Prophetic Contribution (JSOTSup 346; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 2002); K. Stone, Sex, Honor and Power in the Deuteronomistic History (JSOTSup 234; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1996); J. T. Strong, “Egypt’s Shameful Death and the House of Israel’s Exodus from Sheol (Ezekiel 32.17-32 and 37.1-14),” JSOT 34 (2010) 475-504; S. Wagner, “בִּזְיוֹן,” TDOT 7:185-96. T. S. Hadjiev

HOSEA, BOOK OF

The Book of Hosea is the first, and longest, in the series of what used to be called the Minor Prophets, now more often called the Book of the Twelve. Like the book of Amos, it is set in the northern kingdom of Israel, but unlike Amos, the prophet Hosea was himself a northerner, and his prophecy is set shortly before the fall of that kingdom in 722 BC. Hosea is, in this respect, unique among the prophetic books. Its prominence among the Twelve makes it important in modern readings of the Twelve as a book. Its influence extends further than this, however, and its affinities with Deuteronomy and Jeremiah in particular are often noted. It is also significant for its powerful, imaginative use of language, especially in its portrayal of God.

1. Authorship, Date, Setting
2. Composition
3. Historical and Religious Background
4. Metaphor and Sexual Imagery in Hosea
5. Hosea’s Theology in Canonical Context

1. Authorship, Date, Setting.

The prophet Hosea worked in the northern kingdom of Israel in the decades leading up to its fall at the hands of the Assyrians in 722 BC (see Israelite History). He was, therefore, one of the earliest prophets whose name is attached to an OT book, a little later than Amos and roughly contemporary with Isaiah of Jerusalem, and the only one (apart from Jonah) who came from the north. The mention of King Jeroboam II (ca. 786-746 BC) in the superscription (Hos 1:1) suggests that Hosea began preaching before that king’s death, and the pronouncement in Hosea 1:4 of the end of the house of Jehu presupposes a setting before the death of King Zechariah, son of Jeroboam, in 745 BC, the last reigning member of that dynasty (2 Kings 15:8-12). Many of the individual sayings in the book are difficult to assign confidently to a date, as we will see below. Some of them, however, indicate a period of prosperity such as Israel enjoyed in Jeroboam’s reign (e.g., Hos 2:8). The date of Jeroboam’s death is disputed (753 BC, according to Stuart, 9), and so Hosea may have begun his work as early as the 750s. F. Andersen and D. Freedman think that the bulk of Hosea’s work was complete by about 735 BC, since the events of the Syro-Ephraimite war (735-733 BC) are not in evidence in the book, nor indeed the fall of the northern kingdom (722 BC) (Andersen and Freedman, 37). There are sayings that are naturally taken to point to the end of the kingdom (e.g., Hos 1:4-5; 8:5-10; 11:5-7; 13:16), and some of these look beyond that end to a restoration (Hos 11:10-11; 14:4-7), but it does not follow that Hosea lived to see it. The superscription tells that his work lasted into the reign of King Hezekiah of Judah, but since estimates of that king's accession year vary (from 727 to 715 BC), it is not certain that this implies that the prophet lived and worked up to and beyond the fall of the kingdom. It should also be noted that some commentators do not take the superscription as supplying historical evidence of this sort, but rather see it as an editorial perception of the relation of the prophet's work to the kingdom of Judah.

It is striking, indeed, that while Hosea lived and worked in the north, the superscription (Hos 1:1) names four kings of Judah and only Jeroboam among the northern kings of the same period, omitting the six last of the latter (2 Kings 15:8—17:6). Hosea certainly was interested in the kings and other rulers of Israel (e.g., Hos 5:10; 8:4; 10:3), and one passage appears to have in mind one of the royal assassinations that marked the last decades of the northern kingdom (Hos 7:3-7 [for various commentators' suggestions as to which king, see Ben Zvi 2005, 158]). Their omission suggests that the superscription reflects a time after Hosea, and the fall of the north, when the book took on significance for Judah, where, of course, it was received and preserved. Features such as these raise the question of the book's composition, to which we now turn.

2. Composition.

As with all the Prophetic Books, the book that bears Hosea's name is not identical with the words of the prophet. Both the superscription (Hos 1:1) and the third-person narrative in the remainder of Hosea 1 are presumably from the hand of someone other than Hosea. Hosea 3, in contrast, records a message from Yahweh to Hosea in his own voice. These obvious points pose the question of the process from Hosea's words to the form of the book that we possess. One factor to be observed in this connection is the several allusions to Judah (Hos 1:7; 4:15; 5:5; 8:14; 12:2) (Davies, 104-5), each making some comparison between Israel and Judah. These may simply put the two kingdoms on a par, as both deserving judgment (Hos 5:5; 8:14), or make the fate of Israel a warning to Judah (Hos 4:15), or in one case contrast the destiny of the two, indicating mercy for Judah but not for Israel (Hos 1:7). Given that the kingdom of Judah outlived Israel by more than a century, many think that the words of Hosea underwent some expansion in the southern kingdom in order to make them relevant to that kingdom. Hosea's words of judgment on the north, as well as his words of salvation, might prove relevant to Judah too. A special case is Hosea 12:2, where the name "Judah" may even have been substituted for an original "Israel," which seems to be more suitable in the context because the verse introduces a passage about the patriarch Jacob (Davies, 104-5). The sole allusion to King David in the book (Hos 3:5) has also been regarded as a Judean addition because it was in Judah that the succession to David had been maintained since the time of Solomon's son Rehoboam. The words "and to David their king" could be an interpretation of "return to Yahweh" as implying renewed loyalty to the house of David in Jerusalem.

A second factor in assessing the relationship between author and book is the shaping of the book itself. The first block, Hosea 1—3, is unified by the theme of adultery or prostitution. Each of the three chapters is independent and deals with the topic in its own way. In Hosea 1 a narrator tells how Hosea is commanded by Yahweh to marry Gomer, "a woman of harlotries," as a sign of the unfaithfulness of Israel to Yahweh. In Hosea 2 Yahweh employs the metaphor of husband and wife to exhort Israel to turn back from her "lovers," with their false promises, and recognize him alone as the true giver of the gifts of life. And in Hosea 3, a short chapter, Hosea narrates in his own voice a different account of a command from Yahweh to marry an adulterous woman (on the identity of this woman, see 4 below). Although these three units are different in style and specific substance, they share the use of sexual figures of speech to convey their messages, and also a concept of Yahweh's action toward Israel, in which a time of judgment gives way to one of *salvation. This same movement thus characterizes Hosea 1—3 as a whole.

With Hosea 4 comes a change of style, and henceforth we hear a long series of prophetic oracles (Hos 4—14). The theme of Israel's adultery recedes, and the individual units are no longer so clearly demarcated as in Hosea 1—3. However, there are signs of careful composition in this section too. The most striking illustration of this is that although the dominant tone of the prophecies is judgment, there are two places where the message of salvation breaks through strongly: Hosea 11:8-11; 14:4-8. Since these are placed late in the collection, the latter being virtually the book's final word, it seems that this section too has been shaped in order to articulate a movement of thought similar to that in Hosea 1-3, with judgment leading in the end to salvation.

Because of the double climactic expression of Yahweh's intention to save, some scholars think of two subsections in the collection of oracles, Hosea 4-11; 12-14, with each of these building to a climax in a word of salvation (Wolff, xxix-xxxii; Jeremias 1983, 18-19). Others, however, take Hosea 4-14 as a single block (Andersen and Freedman, 52-53; Mays, 15-16; Eidevall, 9). M. Sweeney also adopts a twofold division of the book, but he defines the sections as Hosea 1:2-11; 2:1-14:8, corresponding to the words of the narrator and those of Hosea (Sweeney, 12-13). In all cases, of course, the larger blocks break down into a series of smaller units (Ben Zvi 2005, 96); and conversely, the larger blocks are interrelated.

The corollary of observations about a careful structure in the book is that the sayings of Hosea have been subject to theological shaping in its production. H. Wolff thought that Hosea himself was responsible not only for much of the content of the book but also for some of its shaping (Hos 2:2-3:5; 12-14) (Wolff, xxix, xxx-xxxi), while a group of his immediate disciples took this further. The references to Judah testify to at least two Judean expansions, the first adopting Hosea's vision of future restoration (Hos 1:7), while a later level used the downfall of the north as a warning (Hos 4:15; 5:5c; 8:14) (Wolff, xxxi-xxxii). These expansions belong within the Deuteronomic-Deuteronomistic movement spanning two centuries after Hosea's time (Wolff, xxxi). J. Jeremias, following Wolff, argued that the sayings in Hosea 4-14 were carefully composed so as to articulate Hosea's enduring theological message (Jeremias 1983). For example, between Hosea 4:16; 7:13; 13:14 a sequence is created in which Yahweh is seen to reflect on Israel's stubbornness and his own purpose to "redeem" (pdh), building to a climax in Hosea 13:14 (Jeremias 1996, 63). For this reason, the expansions in Judah were simply a logical extension of a process that began in Hosea's time (Jeremias 1996, 66).

For both scholars (and others, such as Davies, 30-32), the message of grace at the heart of the book (as in Hos 11:8-11; 14:4-8) could confidently be attributed to Hosea himself (Wolff, xxx; Jeremias 1983, 20).

Andersen and Freedman differ from Wolff in finding that the message about Judah is embedded in Hosea's prophecy from the start. Hosea is in this sense like Amos, himself from Judah, who addressed his prophecies to the north but could speak about Judah too (Andersen and Freedman, 191-92). There is nothing intrinsically unlikely about this, since Hosea had a strong sense of Israel's history and might well have understood that both kingdoms were heirs to it (Andersen and Freedman, 192). Equally, the reference to King David could be from Hosea just as probably as from later Judean redactors. Andersen and Freedman point out, justifiably, "We hardly know enough of Hosea's political thinking to rule out the restoration of the Davidic kingdom as an eschatological expectation" (Andersen and Freedman, 307).

Since much of the discourse of the book is by its nature capable of being dated to a variety of periods, some scholars by contrast focus not on the question of the authenticity of the prophet's words, but on the book as a product of the kingdom of Judah or later. E. Ben Zvi believes that the book originated after the exile in Persian Yehud. Geographical allusions to places in the north, for example, do not necessarily indicate a setting in the northern kingdom but rather belong to "constructions of the past," which do not require historical accuracy but merely have to comport with what is generally known and accepted (Ben Zvi 2005, 14, 18-19). This could explain the omission of several northern kings in the superscription, for example. Ben Zvi also thinks that the *exile pervades Hosea as a theme, that it functions as a purification process, and that *Israel's ideal future lies beyond such an experience (Ben Zvi 2005, 14-15). This involves reading certain texts as referring to the exile even though they do not do so explicitly (such as the return to the wilderness in Hos 2:14-15). The people of Yehud are now in that situation. Hosea was produced for the benefit of the literate elite in Yehud, both to educate and empower it as the proponents of the type of Israelite identity expressed by the book (Ben Zvi 2005, 19). The memory of Yahweh's punishment "is relived as social memory” and functions to edify and warn; it even operates (paradoxically) to assure Yehud that God will never abandon them (Ben Zvi 2005, 97-98). Ben Zvi concurs with the more conservative interpreters of Hosea that a strong theology of grace stands at the center of the book, but his perspective on the book’s setting and purpose puts it in a rather different light (see also Trotter, 51-89).

The two types of approach to the book reviewed above address the distance between the setting of Hosea’s life and work and the reception of the book in Judah and after the exile. There is an intrinsic difficulty in tracing with any exactness the trajectory from Hosea’s words to the written page. Indeed, Jeremiah thought that even the earliest composition of the prophet’s sayings no longer had the original specific situation in view (Jeremiah 1996, 65-66). It remains probable that the book preserves a record of the prophet’s life and ministry. However, it must be acknowledged that its language is such as to preclude an explanation of it in terms of one particular historical location (on language, see further 4 below).

3. Historical and Religious Background.

3.1. Political Change. Against the background of the looming threat from Assyria, Hosea’s Israel faced economic, political and religious issues. After King Jeroboam II, Israel’s fortunes changed, chiefly because of the campaign by the Assyrian king Tiglath-Pileser III, or Pul, (745-728 BC), to assert Assyrian power throughout the region. Israel almost immediately became a vassal state (2 Kings 15:19-20), and around 733 BC Tiglath-Pileser annexed key cities and areas in Galilee and carried sections of the population into exile (2 Kings 15:29). This is the time of the Syro-Ephraimite war (2 Kings 16:5-9; Is 7:1-17), an abortive attempt by Israel and Syria to fight off the Assyrian advance. After this, Israel’s last king, Hoshea, was a mere puppet ruling over a greatly reduced territory. The fall of the north in 722 BC, therefore, was the culmination of a sequence of events spanning two decades.

The period in Israel was also one of internal strains, symptomized by the series of short reigns and palace coups (described in 2 Kings 15:8-26). This restlessness may have arisen from royal misrule in itself, to which both Amos and Hosea testify. But it also could be related to Assyrian pressure, as it appears to emanate from areas such as Gilead, where the Assyrian presence was first acutely felt (see, e.g., 2 Kings 15:25) (Cogan and Tadmor, 178).

The peace and prosperity of Jeroboam’s time thus came to an end in political upheaval. These conditions probably explain Hosea’s opposition to forming alliances with great powers (Hos 5:13; 7:11), his adverse comments on kings in general (Hos 5:10; 8:4-5; 10:1-7) and perhaps sayings such as the allusion to Gilead in Hosea 6:8. The disaster that he predicted for the kingdom was unfolding before his eyes.

3.2. Religious Issues. The political chaos had a counterpart in religious conditions. It is clear that Hosea places the *worship of Yahweh in opposition to that of Baal (as in Hos 2), and that Israel’s fate is bound up with proper worship. That worship and the affairs of state were closely connected is evident from the policy of the Judean king Ahaz, who adopted Assyrian forms of worship in his bid to secure Assyrian backing for his rule (2 Kings 16:10-16).

But what kinds of alternatives are represented by Yahweh and Baal? Several factors have to be considered. First, it is not immediately obvious what the term ba’al refers to. It occurs seven times in the book (Hos 2:8, 13, 16, 17; 9:10; 11:2; 13:1). Of these, three are in the plural (Hos 2:13, 17; 11:2), and two refer in the singular to the god Baal (Hos 2:8; 13:1). A further singular occurrence is in Hosea 2:16, where we read “my ba’al” as an appellation of Yahweh that must no longer be used (but rather ’išī, “my husband”). In Hosea 9:10 the episode at Baal-Peor is recalled, where a god Baal apparently was localized to that place (see Num 25:3-5). The same verse has a further reference to the god Baal in the term “shame” (bōšet) (cf. NRSV, “a thing of shame,” and this substitution of “shame” for Baal elsewhere, as in the name “Ishbosheth” for Ishbaal the son of King Saul [2 Sam. 2:12; 1 Chron. 8:33]).

These usages do not add up to a systematic portrait of the god Baal. The term ba’al in itself can be a proper name, as in the god Baal known at Ugarit as a major deity. This may be the best way to understand Baal in Elijah’s contest with the Phoenician “prophets of Baal” in 1 Kings 18. But ba’al can also be a generic appellative, “lord” or “master,” hence, for example, the ba’al of Peor. In Hosea it is possible that a major deity called “Baal” coexists with numerous localized deities bearing that name. The attribution of “my ba‘al” to Yahweh in Hosea 2:16 may go back to a belief that Yahweh was one ba‘al among others.

Equally, the significance of a polemic against Baal could have changed with time. Jeremiah thinks that the idea of the worship of Baal in the eighth century BC had become a kind of “abstraction”; the point of Hosea’s use of it may be to indict the worship of Yahweh as in some way degraded (Jeremiah 1996, 88-89, 102). The question takes us into the theology of the book, to which we will return below. It also requires some attention to Hosea’s rich figurative language because language and theology are inextricably related here, and sexual metaphors in particular play a key role in depicting both Israel’s sin and Yahweh’s judgment, love and faithfulness. We turn next, therefore, to Hosea’s language.

4. Metaphor and Sexual Imagery in Hosea.

Hosea’s metaphors and similes come thick and fast in some passages (on metaphor in Hosea, see Eidevall; Seifert; Morris; Moughtin-Mumby, 51-61; cf. Macintosh, lxiii). In Hosea 5:12-14 Yahweh declares, “I am like a moth [or ‘maggots’] to Ephraim, and rottenness to the house of Judah” (Hos 5:12). Israel’s problem is a sickness, or wound, that requires healing (Hos 5:13). And Yahweh is like a savage lion, tearing and carrying off its prey (Hos 5:14; 13:7). Yahweh can come like the showers and early rains (Hos 6:3). He is like dew (Hos 14:5), and both he and Israel are trees (Hos 14:5-8). Israel is depicted (metaphorically) as adulterers, who are then further compared to a “heated oven,” in an extended simile in which the heat of the oven also expresses anger and sedition (Hos 7:4-7). Ephraim is a cake, in an image that includes the elements of both mixing and turning from the baking process to suggest different kinds of weakness (Hos 7:8-9), and also like a dove, “silly and without sense” (Hos 7:11). The devastation of Israel can be conveyed as an undoing of creation, and the land itself can be said to “mourn” (Hos 4:3). Further examples include Hosea 8:7-10; 9:10, 13, 16; 10:1, 11, 12; 12:7. In some of these cases the metaphor seems to take over and develop the idea (as with the “oven” in Hos 7:4-7). In other cases the metaphor may recur in a new way, along with the theological movement of the book. Yahweh the tearing lion is also the lion who roars at the return of his people to their home from places of judgment (Hos 11:10). And Israel, formerly cast as a dove in its senseless pursuit of impotent sources of aid, now returns from such places “like birds” and “like doves” (Hos 11:11). Most strikingly, Yahweh, who Israel is commanded in Hosea 2:16 no longer to call “my ba‘al,” but rather “my husband” (‘išī), is “not a man” (lō’ ‘iš) in Hosea 11:9.

Not only do metaphor and simile abound, but so also does wordplay, though usually it is lost in translation. The name “Jezreel” (“God sows”) is a play on “Israel,” and in Hosea 1:4 this allows Israel to be characterized by bloodshed in an allusion to the actions of Jehu against the house of Ahab (2 Kings 10). Yet Jezreel in its connotation of “sowing” can recur in a picture of people and land restored (Hos 2:21-22). The name “Ephraim” suggests fruitfulness (pēri), which is exploited for wordplay in Hosea 13:15 (“flourish,” yapri) and Hosea 14:8 (where the MT has “your fruitfulness” [so the NIV]). The form “I will heal” (‘erpa) in Hosea 14:4 also suggests the same name. The verb šûb (“to turn, return”), a key term in Hosea’s theology, as we will see, is the subject of a number of wordplays, not least in Hosea 14. G. Morris has identified “at least seventy” puns (collected in Morris, 148-51; cf. Macintosh, lxiv). Both metaphor and wordplay tend toward an expressive or suggestive kind of meaning and can produce ambiguity. Morris gives Hosea 10:1 as an example of this because the word bôqeq can mean either “fruitful” or “empty” (so the KJV), and also because yěšawweh (“yields, brings forth”) resembles šāwē’ (“vanity”), which occurs in Hosea 10:4 (Morris, 91-92).

These general observations about language in Hosea should inform an understanding of the most prominent and well-known set of metaphors in the book: the depiction of Yahweh’s relationship with Israel in sexual or marital terms (see Marriage and Divorce). We saw above that Hosea 1—3 affords distinct reflections on that relationship by using language drawn from the sexual sphere. The connection between Hosea’s marital and sexual relationships in Hosea 1; 3 and Yahweh’s love for Israel is developed in Hosea 2. In Hosea 2:2 Yahweh’s repudiation of Israel as his “wife” (“She is not my wife, and I am not her husband”) amounts to an affirmation that such a relationship previously existed between them, in line with the renunciations of Hosea 1:6-9 (“not my people,” “not pitied”). Hosea 2 develops Yahweh’s jealousy toward Israel because of her “lovers” and moves through to a marital reconciliation (Hos 2:19-20). The correspondence between Hosea’s love life and Yahweh’s is made explicit in Hosea 3:1.

The way in which the sexual metaphor works is slightly elusive, however. Yahweh’s initial instruction to Hosea is to “take for yourself a wife of harlotries” (ʿēšet zēnūnīm [Hos 1:2]). This expression leaves open the question as to Gomer’s actual offense. Is she a prostitute, as the root znh apparently implies, or an adulteress? The two types of offense are paired in Hosea 2:2, and the woman in Hosea 3:1 is accused of adultery. And again, has she already acquired this reputation when Hosea is told to marry her, or does she become promiscuous or unfaithful thereafter? These questions are complicated because of the well-known problem of relating Hosea 1 and Hosea 3. The woman in Hosea 3 is not identified as Gomer. Yahweh says to Hosea, “Go again, love a woman . . .” (Hos 3:1). The only sign that the text in Hosea 3:1 presupposes the narrative in Hosea 1 is the word “again,” which need imply only that Hosea has been given a similar command in the past (the word “again” [Heb ʾôd] could alternatively be taken with “Yahweh said” [so the NRSV], but the point is hardly affected). Here, indeed, he is not told to “marry” the woman, but rather to “love” her. This is, of course, consistent with his being already married to her, and one can therefore suppose that the woman in Hosea 3 is indeed Gomer, and that she has left Hosea for another man, so committing “adultery,” as in Hosea 3:1. Hosea is thus commanded to take back his wife in spite of her unfaithfulness to him. This scenario is presupposed by the NIV translation of Hosea 3:1: “Go, show your love to your wife again, though she is loved by another and is an adulteress,” but the relationship between the two incidents is deliberately left open by the ESV, as in the Hebrew: “Go again, love a woman who is loved by another man and is an adulteress.”

For reasons such as these, it probably is misguided to try to compose a narrative of the marital lives of Hosea and Gomer from the data in the book. Formally, the instructions to Hosea may be taken to entail prophetic symbolic actions, and this can mitigate the need to construct a biographical account (see Sign Acts). However, as R. Abma rightly points out, there are obvious difficulties with disengaging the actions from Hosea’s real life and relationships, since if the women are different, it would be an odd way to represent Yahweh’s faithful love. In Abma’s proposed solution to this dilemma the two passages can refer to the same woman as long as “Hosea 1 and 3 are not read as accounts of successive events but as parallel accounts with different accents” (Abma, 211n216). In this way, the separate incidents contribute to a powerful accusation of apostasy, in which the figurative uses of adultery and harlotry flow into each other in a sequence of images based on the underlying notion of sexual misbehavior. This conclusion is supported further by the ideas that the land has committed harlotry, and that Hosea is to take not only a “woman of harlotries” but also “children of harlotries” (Hos 1:2) (the NIV is strictly more accurate than the ESV and the NRSV in omitting the verb “have” in the latter case). Are these the same as the children whom Hosea and Gomer now have together? What makes them “children of harlotries?” The impression again is that the sexual language is applied to its purpose in a way that overflows the boundaries of the love lives of Hosea and Gomer.

In what way do the sexual metaphors relate to the sins of Israel? Not only in Hosea 1—3, but also in Hosea 4:10-14, 18; 5:3-4; 6:10; 8:9; 9:1, the topic of “harlotry” (zānā, zēnūnīm) recurs, supported by terms for “adultery” (nāʾap [Hos 4:13]), “cult prostitutes” (qēdēšōt [Hos 4:14]) and “lovers” (ʾahābīm [Hos 8:9]). This “harlotry” is closely associated with acts of worship, such as “enquiring of a thing of wood” (Hos 4:12) and sacrifice in groves of trees (Hos 4:13). Does this particular language and imagery tell us something about the nature of Israel’s offense?

One common answer is to suppose that the prophet was criticizing a kind of religion in which sexual practices at sanctuaries played an important part (e.g., Wolff, 85-86; Mays, 8-12). Andersen and Freedman state it thus: “The language of [4:14b] makes it clear that promiscuity and sacrifice were part of a full-scale cult” (Andersen and Freedman, 370). The religion of Baal is thus conceived as a “fertility religion” or “fertility cult,” and Baal essentially as a god who guarantees agricultural fertility. This is taken to be entailed in a Baal mythology in which the potency of the god to fertilize the earth is inseparable from his sexual potency, the earth being portrayed as a mother goddess. Such activity of the gods is then mimicked in the cult by the sympathetic magic of sexual intercourse (Wolff, 15; Andersen and Freedman, 157-58; Mays, 8-9; Jeremias 1983, 27-28). Since Israel's unfaithfulness is depicted as sexual infidelity, and Baal religion is at the same time seen to be marked by transgressive sex, the nature of Hosea's rhetorical strategy can be expressed thus: "Here metaphor and reality are almost synonymous" (Mays, 25). One result of this approach to the language is the need to make claims about the lives of the protagonists to fit it. When Gomer is subjected to such speculation, she can be characterized as doubly sinful, not only an unfaithful wife but also as a participant in the sexual rituals of the Baal cult, and thus a cult prostitute (Andersen and Freedman, 166; Mays, 26).

For many modern interpreters, this view presses the texts too hard for a kind of information that they cannot yield. One problem is that the theory that the Baal cult is a fertility religion, in the sense supposed, has been called into question because of lack of evidence and on the grounds that the supposed supporting mythology of a sexualized earth is no longer accepted as the best interpretation of the known Canaanite Baal texts (Keefe, 73-75; cf. Moughtin-Mumby, 9; Abma, 137-39). In addition, Yahweh is actually like Baal in the sense that he exercises power over the natural order. Indeed, it is part of Hosea's case that Yahweh does what the people mistakenly suppose Baal can do (Hos 2:8-9).

*Feminist readers are concerned to challenge what they see as the equation of the female with sinfulness or passivity and to show that the feminine imagery in the book cannot be reduced to a cipher for sin and unfaithfulness. S. Moughtin-Mumby opposes a "substitutionary" view of the marriage metaphor as unduly limiting the scope and suggestive power of the sexual imagery (Moughtin-Mumby, 6). A. Keefe, expressing a similar concern, focuses on Hosea 1-2 to the exclusion of Hosea 3 because she thinks that these chapters illustrate better the suggestive power of the language.

Feminist response is varied, however. In one version, feminist scholars accept the analysis in which the sexual imagery has its background in fertility religion, and thus the dualism in which the male equates with a transcendent type of religion, and the female with a type that affirms the bodily and material aspects of life. Women in goddess worship asserted their autonomy and secured the goods of life for children and family (Keefe, 62-64, citing van Dijk-Hemmes and Setel). This, however, is subject to the weakness of the postulate of the fertility cult. In another version, the female characterization of Israel in Hosea aims to undermine received symbols of identity, where woman is "other" to an Israel identified by men as male, and so is intended to induce shame (Keefe, 154, citing Leith). This faces the difficulty that restored Israel continues to be characterized as female, as in Hosea 2:16-20 (Keefe, 155). Y. Sherwood, however, also finds deconstructive force in the text in its identification of male Israel with a promiscuous woman (Sherwood, 313). She pursues a robust ideological "inversion of critical tradition" and an intention to "retrieve the female character from her 'virtual' and reflective role" (Sherwood, 255). For Keefe, this goes too far. She rejects the older feminist dilemma between "text-affirming" and "text-negating" approaches, acknowledges the liberating force of the text of Hosea in its reception history, and calls for a greater understanding of the social determinants of the text before applying a rigorously resistant reading (Keefe, 142-46).

5. Hosea's Theology in Canonical Context.

Hosea occupies a significant place in the OT canon, standing at the head of the Book of the Twelve in both the MT and the LXX (see Sweeney) (see Twelve, Book of the). The significance of this depends somewhat on how far one regards the Book of the Twelve as having thematic coherence. However, Hosea suitably occupies its prominent position because of the intense treatment that it gives to certain theological topics. It has, as we have seen, both a strong sense of Yahweh's history with Israel and a wide historical scope. With its reach back to Israel's beginnings and its capacity to be reappropriated in the later periods of Israel's history, it evinces a kind of theology of history. Its trajectory therefore corresponds to that of the Twelve, which stretches from Hosea's own northern Israelite perspective on the history of all Israel through to the situation of Persian Ye-hud as reflected overtly in Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi. This historical vision in Hosea is accompanied by a theological one, with its movement through sin and judgment to repentance and restoration. Theologically too, therefore, Hosea is a suitable entrée to the Twelve.

By the same tokens, however, Hosea's canonical affinities are not confined to the Twelve. The theological sequencing of *covenant making and covenant breach, followed by divine judgment, covenant renewal and restoration can be found in almost all the major literary blocks of the OT, with its pervasive paradigms of exodus, Sinai, land, loss of land, repossession of land. This pattern is mapped on to a story of the relationship between Yahweh and Israel, which begins in covenant breach (Ex 32; Jer 2) and strains forward toward renewed and better-grounded covenantal relationship, expressed in, for example, Jeremiah's concept of new covenant (Jer 31:31-34). The story takes place among and in view of the nations, which also undergo the judgment of Yahweh and, in some places, receive the hope of participating in promises made to Israel.

Hosea is noted especially for linguistic and theological affinities with Deuteronomy (Weinfeld, 366-70), which have led to a perception that Hosea exhibits theological tendencies that came to fuller definition in Deuteronomy. Central to the comparison are the ideas of the love of Yahweh for Israel (albeit developed in different language in the two books), the gift of land, the controversy with other gods, and the conditionality of covenant. Some of these affinities will be noted in what follows. It should be remembered, however, that Hosea remains distinctive in its theological expression. It does not feature a strong statement of the inclusion of the nations, for example. On the other hand, it is unsurpassed in its portrayal of the suffering love of Yahweh for his people.

5.1. Israel's Sin. The crisis that the book of Hosea addresses is predicated on the mutual relationship between Yahweh and Israel. The supreme good is the "knowledge of God" (Hos 4:1), which goes beyond the discharge of any religious duty (Hos 6:6). The absence of this in Israel is equated in Hosea 5:4 with "the spirit of harlotry" (there it is called "the knowledge of Yahweh"). It means fundamental failure, and their offense is expressed correspondingly in highly personal and emotive terms. Yahweh complains that Israel "went after her lovers and forgot me" (Hos 2:13 [cf. Hos 13:6]). The concept of Yahweh as betrayed husband is expressed with the emotional intensity of suffering, unrequited love. The motif of "forgetting" Yahweh recalls Deuteronomy 8, but in Hosea it has the added force of betrayal with other "lovers." A key relational term for Hosea is "faithful love" (hesed), which should mark relationships both within Israelite society and between the people and Yahweh. In Hosea 4:1-2 this quality is juxtaposed with "knowledge of God" but also is allied with the obligations of citizens to each other, in terms reminiscent of the Decalogue. In Hosea 6:4-6 this "faithful love" in Israel is as fleeting as the morning cloud or dew. Israel is characterized by its opposite, treachery (Hos 6:7). They habitually fail to "seek" or "return to" Yahweh (Hos 7:10), instead fleeing senselessly to any other source of help (Hos 7:11-16). There are certain echoes of the OT traditions of law, covenant and commandment, especially in Hos 8:1 (cf. Hos 6:7), but these are firmly in the context of the "first commandment," to have no other gods besides Yahweh (Ex 20:3). They may profess their allegiance to him, but their protestations of loyalty cannot mask their deep infidelity (Hos 6:7; 8:2-3). The call to *repent in Hosea 6:1-3 apparently bears no fruit, given the sequel in Hosea 6:4-6 (see Boda, 299-300). It is no accident that Hosea twice castigates the "calf" of Samaria or Beth-aven (Hos 8:5-6; 10:5-6) and thus the memory of the golden calf worshiped by Israel in the very moment of its constitution as Yahweh's people by covenant at Sinai (Ex 32), and the calf set up by King Jeroboam 1 of Israel in opposition to the worship in Solomon's temple in Jerusalem. Even the forms of Yahweh's speech reveal an anguished heart, pondering how to deal with his wayward people, showing a powerful impulse to compassion yet frustrated by their fickleness (Hos 6:4; 6:11b—7:1).

The relationship between Yahweh and Israel, with its mutual obligations, is thus the framework for Hosea's whole message. This explains both the language of intimacy used to characterize Israel's offense and the portrayal of the offense as the worship of Baal, or "the ba'alim." There is indeed a strictly religious side to their *sin, since Hosea strongly criticizes them for their vigorous sacrificing on many altars (Hos 4:13; 8:11-13; 10:1-2) and names places of false worship. This intensity of worship is highly ironic in Hosea's view, since it is precisely not what it hopes to be, "knowledge of God." Israel's sin is compounded by self-deception, and their religious practice perpetuates this in a vicious circle, such that they are deprived of "understanding" (Hos 4:10-11) and swept along by "a spirit of harlotry" (4:12). Here is an important function of the "harlotry" trope. The language and imagery drawn from the sphere of intimate personal relationships have the power to suggest the human capacity for a complete loss of bearings in the life of mind and spirit. This is the point of connection between the religious aspect of Hosea's critique and the wicked practices in which Israel engages. True "knowledge of God" would result in right practice in the various spheres of life. The closing comment of the book (Hos 14:9), probably from the hand of its final redactor, picks up acutely this important dimension of its thought.

However, it is clear that the content of Israel's sin is not confined to their life of worship and religion (for a review of the vocabulary and imagery of sin in Hosea, see Boda, 297). Israel's failure is comprehensive; they have broken their covenant with Yahweh and rebelled against his "law" (tôrâ). The paralleling of these two concepts echoes the theological structure of the Sinai covenant in the pentateuchal accounts, where laws given by Yahweh become the substance of the covenantal obligations placed upon Israel (Ex 20-23; Deut 5-26). Hosea's use of the term tôrâ is variously understood as referring to a body of law, perhaps the Mosaic *law itself (Stuart, 131), or in contrast a more general "instruction" of Yahweh given through the priests to the people (Sweeney, 86). The point is hard to decide on the basis of Hosea itself. Suffice it to say that Hosea has an understanding of Israel's commitment to Yahweh having objective expression in obligations that were mutually understood. This kind of obligation was inseparable, however, from "knowledge" (Hos 4:6), which in Hosea must be understood as "knowledge of God" (Hos 4:1). Israel's commitment to "law" was part of its close relationship with Yahweh.

The content of this "law" may be presumed to have covered a range of spheres of Israel's life. It is adumbrated in Hosea 4:2, with its echoes of the Decalogue, but there is no concern here to unfold the implications of the Decalogue in detailed elaboration of tôrâ (unlike Deut 12–26, though that elaboration is no more "legalistic" than Hosea, since Deuteronomy also looks beneath external observance to "the heart" [Deut 6:5]). Rather, the individual commandments (against false swearing, lying, killing, stealing, adultery) are prefaced by the qualities of character that the prophet seeks: truthfulness ('emet), faithful love, or "mercy" (hesed) and "knowledge of God." He looks for what Jesus later would call "the weightier matters of the law" (Mt 23:23): "mercy" (hesed) rather than *sacrifice (Hos 6:6; cf. Mt 9:13) and "righteousness" (šedāqâ), paired again with "mercy" (Hos 10:12). Hosea assumes that Israel is capable not only of knowing Yahweh's "laws," but also of understanding and assimilating them in a way that gives direction to all of life. The quality of "righteousness" meant a profound commitment to right dealing, honest relationships and the good of the society as a whole. Israel should know that their salvation could not lie in forging alliances with foreign powers, trying to pick the winner in the ever-changing political conflicts of the region. Priests, prophets and kings are guilty of self-trust (Hos 10:14) and misrule (Hos 4:4-5; 5:1, 10; 8:4; 10:3). The people as a whole are characterized as tending repeatedly to apostasy (Hos 11:2), expressed as a turning away from Yahweh, a failure to turn back to him and seek him, a turning instead to another source (Hos 7:16 has a difficult phrase, lō' 'āl, which may be a corruption of a text meaning "to Baal," or alternatively, "not to the Most High"). This "turning" (šūb) is a key term in the portrayal of Israel's moral character, expressing a dynamic that drives them away from Yahweh as well as the moral force required for an effective return to him.

5.2. Yahweh's Response in Judgment. This diagnosis of Israel's ills, depicted in exactly these terms (Hos 5:13; 7:1; 11:3; 14:4), goes a long way to explaining the dominant relational metaphors used in the book. Israel is rebellious at heart and has perverted a relationship that should have been grounded in love. The effects of this rebellion are profound, disrupting the close synthesis of Yahweh, people and land that Yahweh himself had put together. The judgment of Yahweh appears first as the frustration of Israel's every effort to secure their own life. As Yahweh gave the grain, wine and oil, so he will take it back (Hos 2:8-9). The land that “whored away from Yahweh” (Hos 1:2) now “mourns” (Hos 4:3), signifying drought, in a personification that expresses its failure to be the resource for life that Yahweh had intended for it. If Israel hoped for prosperity and fertility through the objects of its misplaced trust, these hopes are catastrophically dashed in images of barrenness and death (Hos 4:10; 8:7-10; 9:16-17; 10:13-15).

Undergirding Yahweh’s judgment is a rendering of Israel’s history with him, a particular characteristic of Hosea’s prophecy. Its engagement with history forces itself immediately on the reader with its unexpected take on Jehu, who is remembered elsewhere for his extirpation of the house of Baal at Yahweh’s command (2 Kings 10), a century before Hosea. Now the “house of Jehu” stands guilty of bloodshed. No doubt the tyrannies of Jeroboam and his successors, of the “house of Jehu,” are primarily in view. Yet the startling invocation of the celebrated scourge of Baal, in a prophecy that targets apostasy to Baal particularly, adds to the force of the accusation.

The controversy with Baal in Hosea 2 depends on the premise that Yahweh gave Israel the *land and its bounty in the first place. Hosea knows the pentateuchal traditions of patriarchs (Hos 12:2-6), *exodus from Egypt (Hos 11:1; 13:4) and the *wilderness period (Hos 13:5), together with a theology of gift and abundance in the land. He thus evokes allusively a whole understanding of history. In the vivid picture of the patriarch Jacob, who “strove with God” and had a relationship with him, who stands to be punished for his sin yet has a chance to “return” (Hos 12:2-6), the destiny of Israel is also portrayed. The story of the exodus lies close to the surface. The images of plenty in Hosea 2:8 recall descriptions of the rich land as in Exodus 3:8, 17; Numbers 13:27; Deuteronomy 8:7-10; 11:9-12. In the pentateuchal story the promise of land comes with warnings about the dangers of abandoning Yahweh (e.g., Deut 8). In some places the danger is expressed as the worship of Baal, which can be couched in the language of “harlotry” (Ex 34:15-16 [in view of the discussion above, it is noteworthy that Israel’s “sons and daughters” play the harlot here]). Hosea 2 exhibits a contention about the source of Israel’s prosperity in the land. Yahweh declares that it was he who gave “the grain, the wine and the oil” (Hos 2:8), adopting terms familiar from Deuteronomy (Deut 7:13), in a symbolic evocation of the land’s full sustaining power, while Israel claims to find it in her “lovers” (Hos 2:5). When Yahweh complains that “they did not know” that he was the giver, this “not knowing” is the morally culpable sort that Hosea calls “no knowledge of God” (Hos 4:1) or “forgetting Yahweh” (Hos 2:13; 4:6; 8:13; 14:6).

Yahweh’s judgment, therefore, puts this history into reverse. The retraction of the gifts (Hos 2:9) is evident in the images of drought that we have observed, as well as in starker images of destruction (Hos 10:14-15; 13:16). But beyond that, Israel will be deprived for a time of the land itself and also the *divine presence that went with it (Hos 5:15, cf. 3:4). There is deep irony in this forced removal of the very things that they had labored to keep. Similarly, as Israel delighted to make many altars, so their altars will be removed, root and branch; as their love (hesed) was as fleeting as a morning cloud or the early dew (Hos 6:4), so will they themselves become (Hos 13:3) (Morris, 59-60).

This radical separation of Israel from its land could be taken to correspond to *exile. In Hosea’s terms it is expressed as a return to the “wilderness,” which once lay between exodus and land (Hos 2:15), or indeed back to “Egypt” itself (Hos 8:13), in powerful images of reversal of the history of salvation. The “return to Egypt” is not meant literally; it is both a picture of the violent removal of Israel from its land and a condemnation of Israel’s abortive attempt to seek political assistance from Egypt in the diplomatic posturing that led up to the overwhelming of the region by Assyria. In the paralleling of Egypt and Assyria (Hos 6:11; 9:3; 11:5) the figure of Egypt is used not only to characterize Assyria as captor and enslaver, but also to recall that “return to Egypt” (as a resource and means of life) is a forbidden route for the people that once was taken from slavery there into the freedom of service to Yahweh (Deut 17:16). In this sense, Egypt may indeed literally be Egypt, but it could stand for any nation to which Israel looked for aid in a way that compromised its allegiance to Yahweh.

This analysis expresses forcefully not only a knowledge of the history but also a theology of it. Yahweh is the one who could oversee events so as to free Israel from its subjection to a great power, but by the same token he can bring a new power to oppress them again. Egypt and Assyria are, in a sense, the same thing, powers that have their own sustaining rationale in the world, opposed to Yahweh and his project in Israel, yet ultimately under his sway and liable to be recruited to his purposes. For this reason, Babylon and Persia in their turn could take the place of Assyria, without having to be named, and thus the message of Hosea in the eighth century BC could speak again to the kingdom of Judah in the seventh century or to the people of Yehud in the sixth century and beyond. Yahweh's judgment upon Israel is an action on the stage of world history, since his purpose for Israel is ultimately a purpose for the whole world, and it is capable of reenactment in ever new forms.

5.3. Yahweh Returns to Israel in Compassion.

The compendious view of history in Hosea extends to his restoration of his people. In Hosea 2:15 the Valley of Achor refers to a border town in the territory of Judah (see Josh 15:7), memorialized in the narrative of Achan, who "troubled" Israel by infringing the hērem—that is, by stealing the booty devoted to Yahweh and meant to be destroyed—the name "Achor" being a play on the verb ʾākar, meaning "to trouble" (Josh 7:24-26). The place of trouble now becomes a "door of hope." This typifies a movement within Hosea in which Yahweh's impulse to judge gives way to his will to save. The pattern is contained in each of the chapters of Hosea 1—3. "Jezreel" changes from a synonym for judgment to one of glorious restoration (Hos 1:5, 11); the names of the three children have their significance reversed, so that Israel is restored to its status as Yahweh's covenant people (Hos 2:21-23); and they will return to Yahweh after a period of disciplinary deprivation (Hos 3). The inclusion of "David their king" in this picture (Hos 3:5) is unique in Hosea and bespeaks a concept of history in which the kingdom of neither Israel nor Judah can fully encompass what it means to be "Israel." The memory of David as a model of faithful kingship under Yahweh belongs to Hosea's vision of the restoration of the covenant people.

Land is closely related to people in the evocation of Yahweh's relationship with Israel, and Yahweh's decision to give the land its richness is the indispensable condition for it to realize its potency. In the portrayal of Israel's sin, the land itself was said to have "whored" away from Yahweh (Hos 1:2), and the land "mourned" as a result (Hos 4:3). The vision of Hosea takes in God, people and land in a synthesis reminiscent of the order of *creation. There is a deep connection between right worship, right acting and the capacity of the land to yield its richness. That this is not a connection that can be compelled by religious manipulation is at the heart of Hosea's caustic criticism of excessive sacrificing. Rather, it is a connection that Yahweh seeks to accomplish in his covenantal relationship with Israel. Therefore, just as the withering of the land is inextricably linked with the sin and punishment of the people, so a "covenant" with the land is part of their restoration (Hos 2:18-23). The set of metaphors with which the book closes vividly depicts Yahweh's relationship with Israel in terms of a flourishing, fruitful land (Hos 14:5-8), with a hint of the untroubled fellowship of Eden.

At the heart of the powerful reversal that lies deep in Hosea's structure is a "turning" that goes on in Yahweh himself. The inner life of Yahweh is inseparable from the story. In keeping with the pervasive relational metaphors in the book, Yahweh yearns for his people. If Israel is punished by separation from what it loves, the separation has also to be endured by Yahweh. It is a kind of love story, which can be read in Hosea 5:15—7:1. Yahweh will "go and return" to his place to wait for Israel to come back to him (Hos 5:15). Israel then declares an intention to do so, in precisely corresponding terms ("Let us go and return to Yahweh" [Hos 6:1]). Yet this utterance of both confession and trust does not lead to Yahweh's acknowledgment of their return. Rather, he expresses his frustration with them in emotive self-address: "What shall I do with you, O Ephraim? What shall I do with you, O Judah?" (Hos 6:4). And he protests about the weakness of their hesed, their love or loyalty, the special quality of committed relationship. They can profess their loyalty all they like, but he knows from experience that they cannot sustain it. In Hosea 6:11b—7:1 Yahweh's strong desire to "restore the fortunes" of his people and "heal" them looks like a repeated movement toward them, always met by their obduracy. The story of Yahweh's love seems doomed to disappointment.

But this dynamic of despair is relieved by the remarkable double dénouement in Hosea 11; 14. Hosea 11:1-7 recalls the early stages of Yahweh's troubled relationship with Israel by casting them in the exodus from Egypt as Yahweh's beloved child, who then persists in turning from him to other gods. The discourse of Yahweh begins to move along a by now well-rehearsed path: Israel will "return to the land of Egypt" as a punishment (Hos 11:5), their prayers unheard (Hos 11:7) as in Hosea 6:1-6. But suddenly Yahweh speaks in a quite new way (Hos 11:8-9). It is a tone of passionate love that we have met before (Hos 6:11b—7:1), yet only in frustration. Now we have the most moving expression of Yahweh's own agonized dilemma, his "fierce anger" overwhelmed by his "compassion." The language is strongly emotive, beginning not with statements of intent but rather with four rhetorical questions in which Yahweh pictures to himself the impossibility of his finally destroying the child he has cared for since infancy. His heart is "overturned" within him, the moment in which the pervasive theme of "turning" is expressed in the person of Yahweh. He moves to declaration of intent: "I will not act according to my fierce anger; I will not again destroy Ephraim"—literally, "turn to destroy" (Eidevall, 179). This is a turning of a different sort. And the unexpectedness of it is crowned by the reason finally given: his deity and his holiness. "For I am God and not a man, the Holy One in your midst, and I will not come in anger" (Hos 11:9). The logic of the prophecy here seems to be turned on its head. Should not the "Holy One" come in wrath against sin? Yet here the measure of God's deity and holiness is precisely that he acts instead in compassion. This remarkable turning continues in Hosea 11:10-11. Yahweh, who like a lion had once "torn" Ephraim (5:14), now utters a lion's roar to bring his children back (Moughtin-Mumby, 56); the "dove" that had gone senselessly to Egypt and Assyria (Hos 7:11) now flies back from those places, God's people returned at last to their homes.

Hosea 12—14 repeats the familiar trajectory. Here Israel is exhorted to "return," and they speak words of fresh commitment to Yahweh. These now find acceptance with him because he declares his renewed resolve to heal and love them, in a play on the word meaning "return" ("I will heal their turnings [mēšûbâ], for my anger has turned [šûb] away from them" [Hos 14:4]). So they do "return to live" (Hos 14:7 [some translations obscure this with "live again"]), the last act attributed to Israel in the book. In this chapter all the sin and anger are transformed in what G. Eidevall (referring to Hos 14:5-8) calls "a final magnificent reversal of all reversals" envisaging "not only a return from exile, but a return to the ideal beginning—to paradise" (Eidevall, 242). This judgment rests on the dense metaphorical language, drawn from the natural world, especially trees—even Yahweh is like an "evergreen cypress" (Hos 14:8). Trees once had been a scene of *idolatry, and they even could be objects of false worship (Hos 4:12-13). The language itself thus participates in the redemption of all things (Moughtin-Mumby, 58; Morris, 126). In its double climax in pictures of reversal, Hosea offers some of the OT's most penetrating and memorable testimonies to the faithfulness and love of God.

See also FEMINIST INTERPRETATION; MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE; TWELVE, BOOK OF THE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Commentaries: F. I. Andersen and D. N. Freedman, Hosea: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (AB 24; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1980); J. Jeremias, Der Prophet Hosea (ATD 24/1; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1983); F. Landy, Hosea (RNBC; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1995); A. A. Macintosh, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Hosea (ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1997); J. L. Mays, Hosea (OTL; London: SCM, 1969); D. Stuart, Hosea—Jonah (WBC 31; Waco, TX: Word, 1987); M. Sweeney, "Hosea," in The Twelve Prophets, 1: Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, ed. D. W. Cotter (Berit Olam; Collegeville, MN: Liturgical, 2000) 1-144; H. W. Wolff, Hosea: A Commentary on the Book of Hosea, trans. G. Stanstell, ed. P. D. Hanson (Hermeneia; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974). Studies: R. Abma, Bonds of Love: Methodic Studies of Prophetic Texts with Marriage Imagery (Isaiah 50:1-3 and 54:1-10, Hosea 1-3, and Jeremiah 2-3) (SSN 40; Assen: Van Gorcum, 1999); E. Ben Zvi, "Observations on the Marital Metaphor of YHWH and Israel in Its Ancient Israelite Context: General Considerations and Particular Images in Hosea 1:2," JSOT 28 (2004) 363-84; idem, Hosea (FOTL 21A/1; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2005); M. Boda, A Severe Mercy: Sin and Its Remedy in the Old Testament (Siphut 1; Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2009); R. S. Chalmers, The Struggle of Yahweh and El for Hosea's Israel (HBM 11; Sheffield: Sheffield Phoenix, 2008); M. Cogan and H. Tadmor, II Kings: A New

- Translation with Introduction and Commentary* (AB 11; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1988); G. I. Davies, Hosea (OTG; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1993); E. F. Davis, Scripture, Culture and Agriculture: An Agrarian Reading of the Bible (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2009); G. Eidevall, Grapes in the Desert: Metaphors, Models and Themes in Hosea 4-14 (ConBOT 43; Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell, 1996); P. Fiddes, "The Cross of Hosea Revisited: the Meaning of Suffering in the Book of Hosea," RevExp 90 (1993) 175-91; S.-H. Hong, The Metaphor of Illness and Healing in Hosea and Its Significance in the Socio-Economic Context of Eighth-Century Israel and Judah (SBL 95; New York: Peter Lang, 2006); J. Jeremias, Hosea und Amos: Studien zu den Anfängen des Dodekapropheten (FAT 13; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1996); J. P. Kakkanattu, God's Enduring Love in the Book of Hosea: A Synchronic and Diachronic Analysis of Hosea 11,1-11 (FAT 2/14; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2006); A. Keefe, Woman's Body and the Social Body in Hosea (JSOTSup 338; London: Sheffield Academic, 2001); F. Landy, Beauty and the Enigma: And Other Essays on the Hebrew Bible (JSOTSup 312; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 2001); M. J. W. Leith, "Verse and Reverse: The Transformation of the Woman, Israel, in Hosea 1-3," in Gender and Difference in Ancient Israel, ed. P. L. Day (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989) 95-108; H. Marlow, Biblical Prophets and Contemporary Environmental Ethics: Re-Reading Amos, Hosea and First Isaiah (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2009); G. Morris, Prophecy, Poetry and Hosea (JSOTSup 219; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1996); S. Moughtin-Mumby, Sexual and Marital Metaphors in Hosea, Jeremiah, Isaiah, Ezekiel (OTM; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2008); B. Seifert, Metaphorisches Reden von Gott im Hoseabuch (FRLANT 166; Göttingen, Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1996); T. D. Setel, "Prophets and Pornography: Female Sexual Imagery in Hosea," in Feminist Interpretation of the Bible, ed. L. Russell (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1985) 86-95; Y. Sherwood, The Prostitute and the Prophet: Hosea's Marriage in Literary-Theoretical Perspective (JSOTSup 212; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1996); J. M. Trotter, Reading Hosea in Achaemenid Yehud (JSOTSup 328; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 2001); F. van Dijk-Hemmes, "The Imagination of Power and the Power of Imagination: An Intertextual Analysis of Two Biblical Love Songs, the Song of Songs and Hosea 2," JSOT 44 (1989) 75-88; R. Vielhauer, Das Werden des Buches Hosea (BZAW 349; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2007); M. Weinfeld, Deuteronomy and the Deuteronomistic School (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1972); G. A. Yee, Composition and Tradition in the Book of Hosea: A Redaction Critical Investigation (SBLDS 102; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1987).

J. G. McConville

I

IDOLS, IDOLATRY, GODS

The medieval rabbi Rashi quotes the Sifre, “As long as idolatry (exists) in the world, (God’s) fierce anger (will exist) in the world” (cf. Deut 13:17). The prophets give voice to this jealous exclusivity: loyalty to Yahweh is incompatible with honoring other gods or divine images. Idolatry is the fundamental crime against Yahweh, a rejection not of some aspect of his ways for Israel but of his very place at the center of Israel’s life (see God). The passionate prophetic struggle against idolatry is, although not present in every book, pervasive and shares significant features across the prophets, although the various books exhibit differing emphases.

*Worship of images and worship of other gods than Yahweh are conceptually distinct activities, and clarity in distinguishing them can be helpful (Greenspahn; Barton). However, the prophets generally connect both types of worship with turning away from Yahweh, and so in this article “idolatry” is used to refer to the overarching offense. It is worth noting that there are no clear examples of prophetic concern about worshipping images of Yahweh.

1. Idolatry in Israel’s History
2. Basic Features of Idolatry in the Prophets
3. Vocabulary
4. Idolatry in Particular Prophetic Books

1. Idolatry in Israel’s History.

It is helpful to begin with the canonical and historical settings of the prophetic texts. Canonically, Israel’s religion in the OT follows a rough trajectory from unified focus on Yahweh alone under Moses in the exodus to continual struggles against idolatry and accompanying moral failures that begin in the wilderness and continue to the destructions of the northern and southern kingdoms. In the primary history, the most prominent idolatrous offenses include the golden calf at Sinai (Ex 32–34; Deut 9–10), the Baal of Peor (Num 25), the cyclic pattern outlined in Judges 2:11–23 and demonstrated throughout the book, Solomon turning to other gods (1 Kings 11), Jeroboam’s golden calves (1 Kings 12:25–33) and the institution of Baal worship by Ahab and Jezebel in the northern kingdom (1 Kings 16:29–34), and Manasseh’s idolatry in the southern kingdom (2 Kings 21:1–18). Focal points of struggle against idolatry in this history include Deuteronomy’s programmatic focus on Yahweh alone (e.g., Deut 6:4–9), Joshua’s covenant renewal (Josh 23–24), Elijah’s confrontation with the prophets of Baal (1 Kings 18), and the reforms of Jehu and Josiah (2 Kings 10; 23). The postexilic restoration is portrayed as a time largely concerned with other issues than idolatry.

The canonical texts do not describe Israelite religion in neutral terms; they advocate particular beliefs and practices as normative for Israel. Historians, on the other hand, critically reconstruct the breadth of Israelite beliefs and practices based on both the biblical texts and a wide variety of other material, textual and iconographic evidence. That Israel’s real-life religions were extremely varied and often failed to meet the biblical norms of orthodoxy should be unsurprising. Among historians there is a broad consensus on the major features of the history of Israel’s religion (see, e.g., Hess, 347–51). Pre-Israelite Levantine religion revolved around deities such as El and Baal, who bore significant similarities to Yahweh. These gods were worshiped through institutions of temples, sacrifices and feasts not wholly unlike later Israelite practices. There are no undisputed extrabiblical texts mentioning Yahweh during Israel's premonarchic period. But from the period of the rise of the kingdoms of Israel and Judah, while strong connections continue between Israelite religion and its West Semitic background, Yahwistic religion emerges as a distinct and historically observable entity. This religion held distinctive traditions such as Yahweh's acts in the exodus, giving of the law, and taking of the land. Toward the end of the monarchic period there was a growing emphasis on Yahweh's striking intolerance of Israel's worship of other deities and use of images. The various forms of monotheism, from programmatically demanding the worship of Yahweh alone to denying the existence of other gods, likely gained prominence only in the latter period of the monarchy and the exile, respectively (Gnuse).

It is difficult to reconstruct the religious practices and ideas that came under attack by the prophets and the Prophetic Books. Scholarly positions can change quite drastically. One important example concerns fertility cults (Ackerman, NIDB 2:450-51). As is indicated by polemical biblical and classical texts, such ancient Near Eastern cults were long understood to be filled with sexual excess. But biblical polemics that accuse Israelites of "playing the whore" on "every high hill and under every green tree" (e.g., Jer 2:20; 3:6) should likely not be read literally to reconstruct religious practices that included sacral sexual intercourse. There is no convincing historical evidence of such. Rather, these powerful metaphors express prophetic outrage at Israelite idolatry. Beyond sexual issues, scholars have long made creative connections between the mythological dying and rising of Baal in the Baal Cycle and seasonal fertility rites. Such methods for reconstructing religious belief and practice are now questioned (Smith). In contrast to these straining reconstructions, Jeremiah 44 presents a markedly less sensational vignette of a fertility cult where worshipers of the Queen of Heaven describe their practices and its expected results: burning incense and pouring libations in order to assure adequate harvests and protection from military defeat (Jer 44:17-19).

Although the fiery prophetic critiques can be read on their own terms, contextually sensitive readers should seek to comprehend the thoughts of those practicing the criticized religions. One recent advance has been in understanding the manufacture of cult images and the rituals by which the images became embodiments of the divine. These were carefully shaped religious acts that distanced the human maker from the worshiped images (Dick). Such rituals likely lay behind Isaiah's parody of image manufacture (e.g., Is 44:9-20), which should be read as high satire rather than a portrayal with which practitioners would have agreed. Similarly, readers of the prophets should always be vigilant to the use of creative literary forms. Recent studies of Hosea 1-3, for example, suggest that the prophet may have been criticizing not a currently thriving Baal cult but oppressive socioeconomic or political policies (Kelle, 202-8).

2. Basic Features of Idolatry in the Prophets.

Although some of the Prophetic Books emphasize certain aspects of idolatry, there is much in common across them. As a starting point, it is important to note that idolatrous worship often resembled acceptable worship of Yahweh except that the object of worship was an image or other god. Common elements included such things as sacred places, bowing down and offering incense and sacrifices.

In the prophetic analyses, idolatrous worship does not usually stand alone, but rather is connected to a wide variety of moral failures, including such things as oppression of the helpless, murder and adultery (e.g., Jer 7:6, 9; Ezek 22:2-12). Most abominable to the prophets are the claims that idolatry is connected with child sacrifice (Is 57:5; Jer 7:31; 19:5; 32:35; Ezek 16:20-21; 20:31; 23:39) (Stavropoulou).

Idolatry is also not just a personal matter; it has social and political associations. For purposes of national prosperity and security, idolatry is juxtaposed with trusting material strength, such as wealth, military power and foreign alliances, which replace trust in Yahweh (Is 2:6-9, 12-22; Jer 2:9-19; Ezek 16:23-29; 23:7, 30).

In terms of metaphor, Israel's idolatry is often described as sexual promiscuity, adultery and unbridled lust that offends the "marriage" with Yahweh. Within the metaphor, the jealous "husband" pours out humiliation and violence upon his disloyal "wife" (Jer 13:26-27; Ezek 16; Hos 2).

Yahweh is deeply provoked by Israel's idolatry. He alone has been their God and savior, rescuing them from Egypt, caring for them in the wilderness, and bringing them into the good land. Despite this, Israel has forgotten Yahweh and his care and has instead turned to other gods. The prophets nowhere condemn idolatry by invoking laws forbidding it (e.g., Deut 5:6-10); rather, they present idolatry as an obvious and nonsensical personal offense against Israel's beneficent God.

The structure of the prophetic description of Yahweh's response to idolatry comes in three phases. First, Yahweh threatens to destroy the nation as punishment for its idolatry. Second, after the destruction has been realized against the northern and southern kingdoms, it is explained to be a result of their idolatry. In both of these phases, the powerless other gods cannot deflect Yahweh's will; the prophets mock the very idea of calling for help from wood and stone (e.g., Jer 10). In the third phase, Yahweh reestablishes Israel with a vision for a relationship marked by faithfulness and no more idolatry (Is 2:17-18; 30:22; 31:7; Ezek 11:18-20; 36:25; 37:23; Hos 2:14-23).

3. Vocabulary.

The overarching term, characteristic of Deuteronomy, for gods other than Yahweh is simply "other gods" ('ēlōhīm 'āḥērīm). Among the prophets, this phrase occurs almost exclusively in Jeremiah (18x), but also once in Hosea (Hos 3:1). Jeremiah also uses the phrase "foreign/strange gods" ('ēlōhē nēkār) once (Jer 5:19). Generic reference to gods other than Yahweh is made with phrases such as "their gods," "the gods of the nations," "the gods of [place name]" and "the gods of the earth."

Gods are also cited by name, though there are two special cases of an ambiguity between a name and a generic (Halpern, 61-78). First, the term ba'al sometimes refers to the personal name of a particular deity, but also it can be a title through its root meaning of "lord" or "husband," as indicated by the definite article: "the baal." It also often appears in the plural: "the baals." This title seems to have also been associated with Yahweh, as Hosea hails the day when Yahweh will no longer be called "my Baal" (Hos 2:16). The second unusual case is 'āšērā, which can refer either to a sacred object (a pole or tree: "an asherah" or "the asherah") or to a goddess ("Asherah") who was the consort of the high father god El in the Ugaritic myths (Hadley). Noteworthy are the ninth- or eighth-century BC inscriptions found in Kuntillat 'Ajrud and Khirbet el-Qom that refer to Yahweh and "his asherah/Asherah," the interpretation of which is contested. All four references in the prophetic literature can be interpreted as sacred objects rather than the name of the goddess (Is 17:8; 27:9; Jer 17:2; Mic 5:14).

Clearer cases of proper names for gods in the prophets appear predominantly in later prophetic writings and include "Chemosh" (Jer 48:7, 13, 46), "Tammuz" (Ezek 8:14), "Amon" (Jer 46:25; Nahum 3:8), "Apis" (Jer 46:15), "Bel" ("Lord" = Marduk/Merodach [Is 46:1; Jer 50:2; 51:44]), "Meni" and "Gad" (Is 65:11), "Marduk/Merodach" (Jer 50:2), "Milcom" (Jer 49:1, 3; Zeph 1:5), "Molech" (Is 57:9 [debated]; Jer 32:35) and "Nebo" (Is 46:1). The "Queen of Heaven" (Jer 7:18; 44:17, 18, 19, 25) likely refers to a syncretism of West Semitic Astarte and Mesopotamian Ishtar (Ackerman, NIDB 4:703).

The terminology for idols is widely varied and can be divided into two types: terms referring to the physical objects or their manufacture and derivative terms of ridicule. Of the first sort, the terms pesel and pāsīl relate to the verb for "carving" and refer to idols hewn from stone, clay, wood or metal. Similarly, šelem likely relates to a verb for "cutting," 'ōseb and 'āsāb to "shaping" or "fashioning," and nesek, nāsik and massekā to "pouring" for idols made from molten metal. Debatable is 'ešā (Hos 10:6; cf. Hos 4:12), possibly related to the word for "wood" to refer to a wooden idol.

Terms of the second type ridicule idols by naming them through demeaned objects. The term gillūlim likely refers to balls of dung and is always used contemptuously (39x in Ezekiel; 1x in Jeremiah). Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Hosea, Nahum and Zechariah use the term šiqqūš to refer to idols as "detested things." Indicating insufficiency and worthlessness is the term 'ēlīl (10x in Is 1—39; 1x in Ezekiel; 1x in Habakkuk). The terms hebel and šāwē' mean, respectively, "ephemeral vanity" and "emptiness" (Jon 2:8; and a few times in Jeremiah). Finally, šeqer means "falsehood" (Is 44:20). Such derogatory terms are also used adjectivally in many other places to express contempt for idols.

Less common and less clear terms for idols include tērāpīm (Ezek 21:21; Hos 3:4; Zech

10:2), sometimes simply transliterated as “teraphim” or translated as “household gods” or “idols,” and sēmel (Ezek 8:3, 5), a term of unknown origin, found in Phoenician inscriptions and referring to a statue or idol. The term šîr seems to refer once to idols (Is 45:16) but may reflect a textual or interpretational error.

4. Idolatry in Particular Prophetic Books.

Although prophetic treatment of idolatry overlaps substantially, emphases of particular books are worth noting (see Wolff).

The book of Jeremiah describes an existential struggle for Judah’s loyalty to Yahweh against the lure of other gods, with dire consequences of destruction hanging in the balance. Although the people seem to find the deities exchangeable, the prophet obviously sees them as incomparable: “My people have committed two evils: they have forsaken me, the fountain of living water, and dug out cisterns for themselves, cracked cisterns that can hold no water” (Jer 2:13 NRSV [cf. Jer 2:11]). Although the people cry out to Yahweh for help, he will not listen to their tainted voices, and their cries to other gods are useless (Jer 11:11-12). They think that the Queen of Heaven will provide for them, but such ideas only lead Yahweh, the only true God, to destroy them (Jer 44:15-30). The thrust is that the people wrongly think that Yahweh and the other gods are comparable and exchangeable. Although conflict over false prophecy is prominent in Jeremiah, this issue predominantly concerns conflicting claims to Yahweh’s words, not the words of other gods (e.g. Jer 28).

Ezekiel’s terminology is unusual in that the book never honors gods other than Yahweh with the label ’ēlōhîm (“gods”), preferring the derogatory gillûlîm (“dung balls”) to emphasize their disgusting impurity. This term is rarely used by other prophets and may represent Ezekiel’s own creativity or something derived from his priestly tradition (Wolff, 407). This theme of impurity is prominent in his vision of increasingly abominable idolatry in the temple itself (Ezek 8) and Yahweh’s threat to desecrate Judah’s idolatrous altars and places of worship with corpses (Ezek 6). Ezekiel 20 describes Israel’s history from Egypt to exile as filled with defiling idolatry.

Isaiah 1—39 is not focused on idolatry in particular, often subordinating it to dependence upon wealth and military power (Is 2:6-9, 12-18). This material prefers the term ’ēlîlîm for idols, likely meaning “weaklings” in contrast to their purported and desired strength. This political conflict with other gods is dramatized in the narrative of Hezekiah’s standoff with the Assyrians (Is 36—37 // 2 Kings 18—19). Isaiah 40—55 takes a different tack with a message of hope and power that stood in contrast to the experience of defeat and *exile: Yahweh is the unique divine power and alone announces what will happen and brings it to pass, as exemplified in the predicted exile and return (Is 41:21-29; 43:8-15; 44:6-8; 45:20-25). Yahweh is no mere national deity; he wields universal power, as demonstrated through creation (Is 40:12-26). These chapters are the high point of the prophetic exaltation of Yahweh and the complementary denial of the reality of other gods. The idol makers, idol worshipers and their idols are worthy only of ridicule, the idols being lifeless, silent and powerless (Is 40:19-20; 41:5-7; 44:9-20; 46:5-7; cf. Jer 10:2-10) (MacDonald, 29-31), something that the nations will eventually realize, causing them to turn to Yahweh (e.g. Is 45:22-24). In Isaiah 56—66 there is renewed condemnation of actual idolatrous practices (Is 57:3-13; 65:2-5, 11; 66:3, 17).

In the Book of the Twelve, Hosea reflects the oldest use of *marriage metaphors for Israel’s relationship to Yahweh and sexual metaphors of adultery and prostitution for idolatry (Hos 2; 4:10-18; 5:3-7; 6:10; 7:4; 9:1). Related metaphors are used by Jeremiah, Isaiah and Ezekiel (Moughtin-Mumby). In the book of Jonah, the non-Israelite sailors and Ninevites respond to Jonah’s God in light of his mighty acts on the sea and threats against the city (Jon 1:16; 3:5-9). Micah presents a striking contrast between each nation walking in the name of its own god and all nations seeking Yahweh (Mic 4:2, 5). Condemnation of idolatry sometimes extends to other nations, as in Nahum’s threat against Nineveh’s gods and idols (Nahum 1:14; see also Jer 48:35 against Moab, and Ezek 30:13 against Egypt). Habakkuk sees Babylon trusting its strength as a god (Hab 1:11), though their idols are worthless and lifeless compared to Yahweh (Hab 2:18-20). Zephaniah, set within the era of Josiah’s reform, expresses Yahweh’s intent to remove Baal, Milcom and their worshipers (Zeph 1:4-6) and looks forward to all nations bowing to Yahweh (Zeph 2:11). The explicitly postexilic prophets focus less on other gods than lack of regard for Yahweh and his temple (Hag 1:4, 9; Zech 7:5-6; Mal 3:14), though Malachi warns of other gods encroaching through marriage (Mal 2:11; cf. Ezra 9—10). Idolatry does appear briefly in Zechariah, but it is largely envisioned as disappearing from the land, with Yahweh becoming the only God over the whole earth (Zech 5:5-11; 10:2; 13:2; 14:9).

In Daniel, the struggle is not primarily against idols and other gods but rather against the god-like Babylonian and Persian kings. The kings several times assert themselves as autonomous powers or even gods (Dan 3:1-7; 4:30; 5:20-28; 6:1-9; cf. Is 14:13-14; Ezek 28:2), but they are repeatedly compelled to acknowledge Israel's God (Dan 2:47; 3:26, 28; 4:1-3, 34-37; 5:29; 6:16-27). In the vision of Daniel 11 a king asserts himself above every god, but the book ends with a promise of deliverance from the arrogant king (Dan 11:36-39; 12:1). In all of the prophets, no power can be compared with Yahweh.

See also GOD; LITURGY AND CULT; WORSHIP.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. S. Ackerman, "Fertility Cult," NIDB 2:450-51; idem, "Queen of Heaven," NIDB 4:703; J. Barton, "'The Work of Human Hands' (Ps 115:4): Idolatry in the Old Testament," ExAud 15 (1999) 63-72; M. B. Dick, "Prophetic Parodies of Making the Cult Image," in Born in Heaven, Made on Earth: The Making of the Cult Image in the Ancient Near East, ed. M. B. Dick (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1999) 1-53; R. Gnuse, "The Emergence of Monotheism in Ancient Israel: A Survey of Recent Scholarship," Religion 29 (1999) 315-36; F. E. Greenspahn, "Syncretism and Idolatry in the Bible," VT 54 (2004) 480-94; J. M. Hadley, The Cult of Asherah in Ancient Israel and Judah: Evidence for a Hebrew Goddess (UCOP 57; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000); B. Halpern, "The Baal (and the Asherah) in Seventh-Century Judah: Yhwh's Retainers Retired," in From Gods to God: The Dynamics of Iron Age Cosmologies (FAT 63; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2009) 57-97; R. S. Hess, Israelite Religions: An Archaeological and Biblical Survey (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2007); B. E. Kelle, "Hosea 1-3 in Twentieth-Century Scholarship," CurBS 7 (2009) 179-216; N. MacDonald, "Aniconism in the Old Testament," in The God of Israel: Studies of an Inimitable Deity, ed. R. P. Gordon (UCOP 64; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2007) 20-34; J. Milgrom, "The Nature and Extent of Idolatry in Eighth-Seventh Century Judah," HUCA 69 (1998) 1-13; S. Moughtin-Mumby, Sexual and Marital Metaphors in Hosea, Jeremiah, Isaiah, and Ezekiel (OTM; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2008); C. North, "The Essence of Idolatry," in Von Ugarit nach Qumran: Beiträge zur alttestamentlichen und altorientalischen Forschung, ed. J. Hempel and L. Rost (BZAW 77; Berlin: Töpelmann, 1958) 151-60; R. H. Pfeiffer, "The Polemic against Idolatry in the Old Testament," JBL 43 (1924) 229-40; M. S. Smith, "Interpreting the Baal Cycle," UF 18 (1986) 313-39; F. Stavrakopoulou, King Manasseh and Child Sacrifice: Biblical Distortions of Historical Realities (BZAW 338; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2004); S. Weeks, "Man-Made Gods? Idolatry in the Old Testament," in Idolatry: False Worship in the Bible, Early Judaism and Christianity, ed. S. C. Barton (London: T & T Clark, 2007) 7-21; H. W. Wolff, "Jahwe und die Götter in der alttestamentlichen Prophetie," EvT 29 (1969) 397-416.

R. Barrett

IMMANUEL PROPHECY. See ISAIAH: BOOK OF; WOMEN AND FEMALE IMAGERY.

INNERBIBLICAL INTERPRETATION. See INTERTEXTUALITY AND INNERBIBLICAL INTERPRETATION.

INTERCESSION. See PRAYER.

INTERPRETATION. See HERMENEUTICS.

INTERTEXTUALITY AND INNERBIBLICAL INTERPRETATION

The term intertextuality refers to the ways in which the meaning of a text is shaped by its relationships with other texts. Debate continues as to whether intertextuality ought properly to address diachronic questions of historical priority and dependencies between texts, or whether it is a purely synchronic technique focused on texts (in toto) and/or readers. However, this debate between "synchronic" and "diachronic" factions fails to recognize that both are valid concerns of intertextuality. A text engages in a dialogue with other texts at the time it was written, and that same text continues to contribute to a dialogue with other texts, especially in the case of a biblical text because its meaning is shaped by the wider canon of Scripture.

Both as classically defined and presently practiced (especially in the field of biblical studies), intertextuality is an umbrella term that encompasses both innerbiblical interpretation and synchronic intertextuality.

1. Defining Intertextuality
2. Types of Intertextuality
3. Issues of Intertextuality in the Prophets
4. Conclusion

1. Defining Intertextuality.

The term intertextuality was coined by J. Kristeva in 1969 to refer to the study of the semiotic matrix within which a text's acts of signification occur. Kristeva argued that "any text is constructed of a mosaic of quotations; any text is the absorption and transformation of another" (Kristeva, 66). Kristeva's poststructuralist approach (building upon the work of postformalist M. Bakhtin, and further developed by R. Barthes) specifically refrains from asking questions about historical priority, authorial intent and influence. However, in an ironic twist of history, Kristeva's term has undergone its own intertextual transformation and has come to mean something wider than her original conception. This transformation has arisen out of the three key observations about texts that intertextuality is based upon. First, all texts are created from a "mosaic" of other texts. No text is a completely unique creation, autonomous in relation to every other text. Second, every text asserts its meaning in relation to other texts. In the terminology of Bakhtin, meaning arises out of a "dialogue" between texts. Third, meaning does not reside with a bare text alone; the reader has an irreducible role to play in the production of meaning.

However, each of these three observations entails a spectrum of possibilities. Every text may well be made up of other texts, but the nature of the reuse may span everything from the mere repetition of a phrase drawn from the general web of meaning to an explicit citation. Likewise, all texts assert their meaning in dialogue with other texts, but this might be a friendly dialogue that supports and affirms or an unfriendly dialogue that seeks to overthrow another text. Similarly, the reader's role can span everything from decoding a meaning encoded by a text's original author to creating a meaning that could not have been in the contemplation of the original author. These spectra are represented in figure 1.

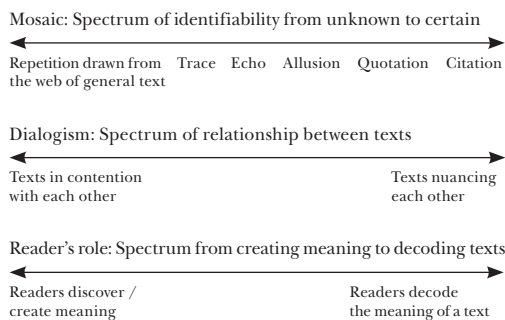

Figure 1: Three Spectra

These three spectra of possibilities mean that there cannot be a single intertextual approach. Kristeva's poststructuralist semiotic intertextuality is one, but only one, among a diversity of intertextualities. To understand this diversity, it is important to consider the range of options on each of these three spectra.

1.1. Text Creation: Texts Are a Mosaic of Quotations. R. Barthes develops Kristeva's insight that texts are a mosaic of quotations: "Any text is a new tissue of past citations. Bits of code, formulae, rhythmic models, fragments of social languages, etc., pass into the text and are redistributed within it, for there is always language before and around the text. Intertextuality, the condition of any text whatsoever, cannot, of course, be reduced to a problem of sources or influences; the intertext is a general field of anonymous formulae whose origin can scarcely ever be located; of unconscious or automatic quotations, given without quotation marks" (Barthes 1981, 39).

Although intertextuality cannot be "reduced to a problem of sources or influences," it must, as a matter of logic, include these sources and influences where they can be identified. Barthes is more interested in the "general field of anonymous formulae whose origin can scarcely ever be located" because of the implications this has for poststructuralist semiotics. However, this does not nullify the analysis of those parts of the "textual mosaic" where intertexts can be identified, albeit with greater or lesser degrees of specificity. The mosaic spectrum diagram in Figure 1 provides descriptions for a range of identifiable connections between texts:

- A citation is an attributed quotation (i.e., acknowledging source).
- A quotation is an identifiable word-for-word repetition.
- An allusion is a partial reuse of a sequence of words or themes.
- An echo is similar to an allusion, but where less identifiable elements are reused.
- A trace (as defined by J. Derrida) is the indication of an absence that defines a presence. Any signifier contains “traces” of other signifiers that shape its meaning.

Where a text has become part of the fabric of the web of the “general text” and/or communicative codes of a culture, there may no direct, identifiable connection with subsequent texts, notwithstanding their apparent reuse of key words or themes from that text. The spectrum above is shown with unmarked boundaries between the terms because in practice the categories blend into each other, and different scholars use different metrics for assessing and categorizing.

1.2. Text Meaning: Meaning Comes from Dialogue between Texts. M. Bakhtin described the complex relationship between texts as “dialogism.” However, defining what he meant by this is no mean feat, since Bakhtin used the concept of dialogic in multiple senses. For our purposes, we should distinguish between the following:

(1) Dialogical language. All language is dialogical, in that it cannot help but assert its meaning in dialogue with a complex web of utterances which already exist.

(2) Dialogical discourse. Some discourses are dialogical, in that they require the interaction of multiple voices (i.e., polyphony) to produce meaning.

(3) Dialogical truth. Some truths are dialogical in nature. In contrast to “monological” truths, which can be reduced to a series of propositions utterable by anyone without affecting their truth value, a dialogical truth is one that cannot be stated as a single proposition or by a single voice. Instead, a dialogical truth can emerge only via the interaction of several unmerged voices (i.e., multivalency).

It should be clear from this analysis that while all texts will be dialogical in the first sense, only a subset of texts will be dialogical in the second sense, and only some truths will be dialogical in the third sense. The appropriate category (or categories) will vary, depending on the text under consideration. One cannot necessarily assume that a dialogical text entails polyphony or multivalency in every case, notwithstanding the popularity of these buzzwords in our postmodern milieu.

The meaning of a text is established in dialogue with other texts (see Dialogism in Figure 1). The greater the degree of contention with the existing “voices” in the intertextual web, the greater the potential for multivalency, as multiple meanings compete.

1.3. Hermeneutics: A Reader’s Role in the Production of Meaning. An intertextual approach recognizes that a reader has an irreducible role to play in the production of meaning because the recognition and evaluation of connections between texts is a process that occurs in the mind of the reader.

Literary theorists have different explanations of the process by which readers are involved in the production of meaning. Writing from the perspective of semantic theory, U. Eco describes how “open texts” with “productive codes” are “decoded” by readers (Eco 1984; 1989). A different description of a similar process can be seen in M. Riffaterre’s concept of an “ungrammaticality”—a word or phrase that, because of its awkwardness in the present context, points to another text that provides the key to its decoding and thus aids readers in the production of meaning: “The dual sign works like a pun. We will see that the pun in poetic discourse grows out of textual ‘roots.’ It is first apprehended as a mere ungrammaticality, until the discovery is made that there is another text in which the word is grammatical; the moment the other text is identified, the dual sign becomes significant purely because of its shape, which alone alludes to that other code” (Riffaterre, 82).

From a different perspective again is W. Iser’s description of “indeterminacy” arising from “gapped texts”: “The indeterminate sections or gaps of literary texts are in no way to be regarded as a defect; on the contrary, they are a basic element for the aesthetic response. . . . The reader fills in the remaining gaps. He removes them by a free play of meaning-projection, and thus by himself repairs the unformulated connections between the particular views" (Iser, 12); "The indeterminate elements of literary prose—perhaps even of all literature—represent the most important link between text and reader. It is the switch that activates the reader in using his own ideas in order to fulfil the intention of the text. . . . The meaning is conditioned by the text itself, but only in a form that allows the reader himself to bring it out" (Iser, 43).

Although there are significant differences in the approaches of Eco, Riffaterre and Iser, a common feature is that each recognizes the role of a reader in the production of meaning. What is significant to note, however, is that granting this role to the reader does not necessarily entail the conclusion that readers "create" meaning. Eco speaks of readers "decoding" a meaning in the text, and Iser speaks of a meaning "conditioned by the text" that is brought out by a reader. That is, both reader and text have an irreducible role to play in the production of meaning for "open" or "gapped" texts.

The extent of the reader's role in the production of meaning will depend on the reader's goal. If the reader's aim is to decode the meaning of a text that its author encoded for his original audience, then this leads to a diachronic approach to the text. If the aim of the reader is to discover what the text might now mean through its continuing dialogue with other texts, then this leads to a synchronic approach.

1.4. Intertextuality as Both Synchronic and Diachronic. The foregoing analysis of these three observations underpinning intertextuality indicates that it has both synchronic and diachronic dimensions. Some scholars have denied the legitimacy of this kind of approach, arguing that it is invalid to seek a point of intersection between synchronic "intertextuality" and diachronic "innerbiblical interpretation" (Eslinger). B. Sommer argues for a complete dichotomy between "innerbiblical allusion" and "intertextuality." According to Sommer, the former is diachronic in character, "asking how one composition evokes its antecedents, how one author is affected by another, and what sources a text utilizes," whereas the approach of the latter is synchronic in nature, focusing "not on the author of a text but either on the text itself (as part of a larger system) or on the reader

. . . interpret[ing] signs in the text by associating them with related signs in the reader's own mind" (Sommer 1998, 7). Sommer's categorization relies on the analysis by J. Clayton and E. Rothstein, who argue for "intertextuality" as originally framed by Kristeva and Barthes.

The problem with this approach is that it fails to recognize that the term intertextuality has undergone its own intertextual transformation. As P. Tull demonstrates, intertextual examinations of the Hebrew Scriptures are much broader than Sommer's two-category dichotomy allows. Many (perhaps most) biblical scholars who view their approach as "intertextual" are not post-structuralists or reader-response critics.

Instead, we must allow that intertextuality has a breadth of meaning, arising from its three key conceptual underpinnings outlined above. Intertextuality can validly encompass a hermeneutical approach that views author, text and reader as important to the interpretive process, and in which both diachronic concerns and synchronic concerns are important in coming to the meaning of a text.

2. Types of Intertextuality.

2.1. Innerbiblical Interpretation.

2.1.1. Innerbiblical Exegesis. In his landmark book Biblical Interpretation in Ancient Israel, M. Fishbane examines the phenomenon of innerbiblical exegesis, whereby a later biblical writer reuses, reinterprets or reapplies an earlier biblical text. Fishbane argues that the received text (the traditum) has been transmitted by human agents who have incorporated their own exegesis of it in the process of transmission (the traditio). Thus, the text as we now have it is a complex interweaving of traditio and traditum. Fishbane argues that innerbiblical exegesis arises from the interplay between two factors: a respect for an authoritative teaching and a concern to "preserve, render contemporary, or otherwise reinterpret these teachings or traditions in explicit ways for new times and circumstances" (Fishbane 1985, 8).

Fishbane detects innerbiblical exegesis on the basis of the following: (1) formal markers: technical formulae used by the scribes when they updated a text (e.g., the scribal gloss "that is, Bethel" in Gen 35:6); (2) parallel texts: a comparison of parallel texts within the MT, or between the MT and its principal versions (e.g., the changes between two law codes in Exodus and Deuteronomy, or parallel narratives in 1 Kings and 2 Chronicles); (3) text-critical analysis: evidence of redundancy, alteration or supplementation to the text, based on established historical critical judgments.

Employing postbiblical categories drawn from rabbinic exegesis, Fishbane arranges his analysis under four headings: (1) scribal exegesis examines the comments, clarifications and corrections added to the text in the process of scribal transmission; (2) legal exegesis examines the reinterpretation or extension or reapplication of preexisting legal texts; (3) aggadic exegesis examines the adaptation of the inherited traditum for the sake of new theological insights, attitudes and speculations, often drawing forth latent and unsuspected meanings from it; (4) mantological exegesis examines the reinterpretation of prophetic oracles. Fishbane argues that this occurs because a prophetic vision or oracle was not, or not conclusively, actualized and needed to be reinterpreted or reapplied. According to Fishbane, “the unexpected deferral of fulfillment . . . elicits reinterpretation of the traditum” (Fishbane 1996, 46).

Most of the examples of innerbiblical exegesis in the prophets that Fishbane discusses are either aggadic exegesis or mantological exegesis, though there are scattered examples of the other types. For example, Fishbane cites Jeremiah 17:21-22 as an example of the legal exegesis of the Mosaic Sabbath command (Fishbane 1989, 11).

Aggadic exegesis in the prophets can result in the following (all these examples are from Fishbane 1985, 292-426):

- interpretation and extension of a cultic regulation by “lemmatic deduction or inference” (e.g., the law of cultic contamination in Hag 2:11-14; cf. Lev 6:20);
- spiritualization of content (e.g., Jer 2:3 reapplies the law of sacred donations in Lev 22:14-16 to Israel as the consecrated object);
- nationalization of content (e.g., Jer 5:21-24 applies the law of the wayward son in Deut 21:18-21 to the nation of Israel);
- exegetical transformation and reappropriation (e.g., the reinterpretation of Gen 1:1-2:4 in Deutero-Isaiah);
- rhetorical inversion (e.g., Mal 1:6-2:9 ironically inverts the priestly blessing in Num 6:23-27);

- subversion of an older tradition by a new (e.g., Ezek 18:18-32; 33:12-20 supplants the idea of transgenerational punishment in Exod 34:6-7).

Mantological exegesis in the prophets can result in the following (all these examples are from Fishbane 1985, 461-521):

- Rhetorical reworking: the oracle against princes, judges, prophets and priests in Zephaniah 3:3-4 is reworked and embellished in Ezekiel 22:25-28.
- Revision: Ezekiel 29:17-20 revises an earlier word of judgment against Tyre in Ezekiel 26:7-14.
- Reapplication: “There are many striking reapplications of the prophetic words of Isaiah of Jerusalem in the later ‘Isaianic’ tradition. All bear on the presentiment that the words forecast by Isaiah of old are now near fulfillment, or are about to be reversed” (Fishbane 1985, 497).
- Reinterpretation: the “seventy years” of subjugation to Babylon in Jeremiah 25:9-12 is variously reinterpreted in 2 Chronicles 36:18-21; Zechariah 1:12; 7:1; Daniel 9:2.
- Mantic anthology: new prophecy created from a “prophetic patchwork” (Fishbane 1985, 493) of older prophecy. For example, Zechariah 1—6; 9—12; Daniel 7—12 are “mantological anthologies which are intended to be read together” (Fishbane 1985, 521).

Scholars since Fishbane have noted that the phenomena that he describes as innerbiblical exegesis go well beyond “exegesis” in the strict sense of the word. “Innerbiblical allusion” has been proposed as an alternate label (Eslinger), but this too is problematic (Sommer 1996b). A better encapsulating description of this type of intertextuality is “innerbiblical interpretation” (Weyde).

2.1.2. Innerbiblical Interpretation in the Prophets. Those who investigate innerbiblical interpretation use a variety of methodological approaches, but the common factor is that these approaches (like that of Fishbane) focus on the way that a later text has reused, reapplied, reinterpreted or otherwise transformed an earlier text or tradition. The following are some significant investigations of innerbiblical interpretation in the prophets.

J. Day gives a number of examples of the reuse in the prophets of the law, the creation and other primeval traditions, historical and legendary traditions, the psalms and other prophets (i.e., prophets quoting prophets).

A number of authors have investigated innerbiblical interpretation in Isaiah. Sommer examines innerbiblical allusion in Isaiah 40–66 (Sommer 1998). He finds allusions based on a large amount of shared vocabulary and word play between “earlier” texts and Isaiah 40–66. P. Willey follows an “intertextual” approach that asks many of the same questions about authorial intent, antecedent texts and the historical situation of the book of Isaiah that Sommer considers. J. Hibbard examines the intertextuality of Isaiah 24–27. He argues that these chapters form one of the latest literary layers in the book of Isaiah, and a key part of their literary strategy is the reuse and evocation of earlier texts from the Hebrew Bible.

Another rich field for research into innerbiblical interpretation has been the book of Zechariah. R. Mason examines “inner-biblical exegesis” in Zechariah 9–14, evaluating how these chapters reuse both Zechariah 1–8 and other prophets. K. Larkin evaluates and extends Fishbane’s thesis that Second Zechariah is a mantological anthology. R. Nurmela examines innerbiblical interpretation in Zechariah 1–8; 9–14. M. Stead examines the intertextuality of Zechariah 1–8 (Stead 2009).

Finally, B. Levinson supplies a very helpful bibliographic essay on innerbiblical interpretation.

2.2. Synchronic Intertextuality. Synchronic intertextuality arises from the dialogical nature of texts (see, under 1 above, the second spectrum). Not only does a text enter into a dialogue with the texts extant at the time it was written, but also it continues to contribute in a dialogue with other texts. This phenomenon can be approached in two distinct ways, as follows.

2.2.1. Canonical Intertextuality. In both the Christian interpretative tradition and in rabbinic exegesis, biblical texts have their meaning shaped by the wider context of the canons of the OT and the Hebrew Bible respectively.

The exegetical motto of the Reformers was scriptura scripturam interpretatur (“Scripture interprets Scripture”). According to the Westminster Confession, “The infallible rule of interpretation of Scripture is the Scripture itself; and therefore, when there is a question about the true and full sense of any Scripture (which is not manifold, but one), it must be searched and known by other places that speak more clearly.” By this principle, an “earlier” text might have its meaning clarified and shaped by a dialogue with “later” texts – that is, shaped by a canonical intertextuality.

Similarly, Fishbane describes the exegetical practices of rabbinic midrash as being grounded on two hermeneutical assumptions: (1) the fact that all interpretation takes place within the canon and presupposes the possibility that all of its texts may be compared or in some way correlated; (2) the assumption of the omnicoherence of Scripture in all its details (Fishbane 2000, 43). These two assumptions allow two texts mutually to inform the interpretation of one another, in ways not contemplated by their respective authors.

These hermeneutical assumptions of Christianity and Judaism lead to a canonical intertextuality, where it is possible to recognize a meaning in a text unknown or unclear to its original (human) author (cf. 1 Pet 1:10-12; 2 Pet 1:19). The objective basis of this canonical meaning is the presupposition that an ultimate author (God) has given shape to the *canon, and consequently that there is an overarching coherence and meaning to the Scriptures.

When it comes to applying this kind of intertextual approach to the prophets, there are several different permutations. One variation is the work of B. Childs on *canonical criticism, which seeks to understand the meaning of a text in the wider context of Christian Scripture. Another variation, on a smaller scale, is aspects of work done on the *Book of the Twelve. Recognizing the Book of the Twelve as a discrete literary unit leads to a form of canonical intertextuality (just with a smaller “canon”), in that the meaning of an individual book within that collection comes to be fuller and perhaps different as a result of its juxtaposition and dialogue within the canonical shape of the Twelve. J. Nogański takes this further, arguing that the shape and meaning of the Book of the Twelve arises from an intertextuality between the constituent parts constructed around quotations, allusions, catchwords, motifs and framing devices.

2.2.2. Reader-response Intertextuality. With canonical intertextuality, the locus of meaning is objectively contained within the canonical text (i.e., there is a meaning put there by its ultimate author for the modern reader to draw out). In contrast, Reader-response intertextuality argues that the reader is the final arbiter of meaning. Readers do not draw out the objective “original meaning(s)” of the canonical text; they subjectively create meaning by the juxtaposition of texts. According to K. Nielsen, in this type of intertextuality it is “the reader and the tradition of which he or she is part which single out the intertexts” (Nielsen, 18-19). Meaning is not objectively “in” the text (or “in” the canon), but instead arises in the mind of the modern reader.

An example of reader-response intertextuality is M. Love’s book The Evasive Text, an examination of Zechariah 1—8 that is “heavily influenced by theories of intertextuality, reader-response criticism and Bakhtin” and explicitly eschews diachronic questions of historical priority and dependence (see Love, 36, 38-39).

3. Issues of Intertextuality in the Prophets.

3.1. Methodology.

3.1.1. Establishing a Connection between Texts. For all forms of intertextuality, there needs to be a basis for establishing a connection between texts. This is true even in a reader-response approach, because it is necessary to explain why two particular texts should be brought into dialogue with each other.

One of the key methodological issues is whether the connection must be established on the basis of “verbal repetition” between the texts, or whether a connection might be established based only on shared “thematic threads” or “traditions.” Nurmela argues that the only objective evidence of textual reuse is to be found in “verbal repetition” of rare words or expressions (Nurmela, 27). A similar approach is taken by R. Schultz. In his contribution to a volume entitled Thematic Threads in the Book of the Twelve, Schultz argues (somewhat ironically, given the title of the book) that a method based on “thematic allusions” is too vague, and that “verbal parallels that offer a more extensive textual basis for positing an intentional interrelationship is a more viable approach” (Schultz, 28).

However, this strict methodological approach is in tension with the notion of intertextuality as defined above. Intertextuality recognizes the rich textual web created by the interconnections between multiple texts and expects that texts will transform and adapt other texts in the process of reuse. This “intertextual play” may result in the erasure of the exact verbal connections required by a method based on “verbal repetition.” An intertextual approach requires that we recognize a much broader range of textual interplay.

Some examples of approaches to establishing connections include the following:

- Mason examines “inner-biblical exegesis” in Zechariah 9—14, recognizing intertexts both on the basis of verbal and thematic connections.
- Willey argues for a connection between Isaiah 52:8-10 and Psalm 98:1-4, based on sequence of consecutive words (Willey, 120-25). This primary allusion provides the basis for establishing secondary echoes in the surrounding context.
- Sommer uses a methodology based on a substantial shared vocabulary (not necessarily consecutive) and repeated stylistic traits. (For an example of this approach applied to Jeremiah 31:7-9 and Isaiah 35:4-10, see Sommer 1996a, 170).
- Nielsen uses a method based on markers (in the sense defined by Riffaterre) that point to another text.
- G. Hepner argues for an intertextual method that recognizes verbal resonances such as Hebrew partial homonyms based on two or more shared consonants, anagrams, numerical resonances and other word play.
- Some scholars argue for an intertextual connection based on a shared rhetorical structure. For example, M. Floyd argues that “Zech. 9-11 recapitulates the distinctive rhetorical structure of Zech. 1-8” in order that it might offer an intertextual reinterpretation of the earlier passage (Floyd, 242).
- Stead argues for intertextual connections based on sustained allusions (i.e., the repeated references to another “background” passage that stretch across multiple passages in Zech 1—8) (Stead 2008).

These examples demonstrate that there is a wide variety of ways in which to establish a connection between texts.

3.1.2. Directionality. For diachronic intertextuality, there is a subsequent methodological step to be undertaken once a connection between two texts has been established. This next step is to seek to establish the “directionality” between the two texts. This is often a complex question because of the many uncertainties surrounding the dating of biblical texts.

J. Leonard proposes six questions to help determine the direction of allusions: (1) Does one text claim to draw on another? (2) Are there elements in the texts that help to fix their dates? (3) Is one text capable of producing the other? (4) Does one text assume the other? (5) Does one text show a general pattern of dependence on other texts? (6) Are there rhetorical patterns in the texts that suggest that one text has used the other in an exegetically significant way? (Leonard, 258).

3.2. Result: What Does Intertextuality Do to a Text?

3.2.1. (Re)Interpretation, Not Exegesis. Intertextuality in the prophets is most often not “exegesis” in the proper sense of that word, in that the reason for quoting earlier texts is not in order to give the meaning of that text in its original context.

Intertextuality transforms the meaning of an older text by the very fact of its reapplication and recontextualization in a new literary and historical context. There are myriad ways in which this transformation may take place, including but not limited to the categories identified above in Fishbane’s analysis: extension, spiritualization, nationalization, reappropriation, demythologizing, rhetorical inversion, subversion, rhetorical reworking, revision, reapplication, reinterpretation and reuse in a mantic anthology.

3.2.2. Radical Indeterminacy of Meaning?

T. Beal argues that intertextuality must lead to a radical indeterminacy of meaning. “Every text—as an intersection of other textual surfaces—suggests an indeterminate surplus of meaningful possibilities. Interpretation is always a production of meaning from that surplus (Beal, 31). Beal’s approach is based on the poststructural semiotics of Barthes, in which any text is a “tissue of quotations drawn from the innumerable centres of culture”

(Barthes 1977, 146). However, as Beal notes, the “innumerable centres of culture” cannot be analyzed, and so, as a matter of expediency, readers must limit the infinite possibilities of a text in order to arrive at an interpretation, and that they do so based on their own ideology. “Movement from the indeterminate ‘general text’ to particular practices of intertextual reading demands that one ask about the ideological limits, or ‘strategies of containment’, that make interpretation possible” (Beal, 28). In short, the intertextual nature of all texts leads to multiple interpretations of all texts, and readers choose their preferred interpretation on ideological grounds.

Stead tests the claim that intertextuality leads to a plurality of meaning by examining the intertexts of Zechariah 5:5-11 and comes to the opposite conclusion (Stead 2009, 188-218). Zechariah 5:5-11 is clearly a text formed through the “intersection of other textual surfaces” (to quote Beal), but far from creating an indeterminate surplus of meaning, the intersection of these other texts has the effect of narrowing down the interpretive possibilities. When Zechariah 5:5-11 is read in absolute isolation, these seven verses could bear a wide range of meanings, but when read against its intertexts, this passage has a more limited range of meanings. The intertextual nature of Zechariah 5:5-11 leads, not (as per Beal) to a radical indeterminacy of meaning, but rather to a more determinate meaning.

3.3. Intertextuality as a Genre of Prophetic Literature. Floyd argues that the Hebrew term maššā’ is a technical one that “means something like ‘prophetic reinterpretation of a previous revelation’” (Floyd, 238). It is debatable whether the term maššā’ functions as a genre label in this way (see Boda), but it does seem that there is a distinct form of prophecy that functions by way of prophetic reinterpretation of a previous revelation. Fishbane calls this a “mantic anthology.” A good example of this occurs in Zechariah 9–14.

However, this does not necessarily imply that there is “transformation from prophecy to exegesis during the second temple period” (Sommer 1996a, 47). Zechariah 9–14 is an intertextual reappropriation of previous revelation, but at the same time it is a genuine revelatory “new” word that (paradoxically) comes via a reiteration and reapplication of the written words of other prophets.

3.4. Relationship to Other Approaches.

K. Schmid has offered an insightful analysis of the relationship between innerbiblical interpretation (innerbiblische Schriftauslegung) and the tradition history, redaction history and reception history of a text.

4. Conclusion.

Intertextuality provides insights into the relationship between texts that are helpful for guiding readers into a deeper understanding of the prophets of the Hebrew Bible. Properly understood, intertextuality is an umbrella term that encompasses both synchronic and diachronic concerns, because the authors of the prophetic literature in the Bible engaged in a dialogue with other texts when writing, and their texts continue to dialogue with other texts in the wider canon of Scripture. Intertextuality alerts us to the transformations that occur in the reuse and recontextualization of a text in a new literary and historical context.

See also CANONICAL CRITICISM; EDITORIAL/ REDACTION CRITICISM; FORM CRITICISM; HERMENEUTICS; FORMATION OF THE PROPHETIC BOOKS; RHETORICAL CRITICISM; WRITING AND PROPHECY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Barthes, Image, Music, Text, trans. S. Heath (London: Fontana, 1977); idem, "Theory of the Text," in Untying the Text: A Post-Structuralist Reader, ed. R. Young (Boston: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1981) 31-47; T. K. Beal, "Ideology and Intertextuality: Surplus of Meaning and Controlling the Means of Production," in Reading between Texts: Intertextuality and the Hebrew Bible, ed. D. N. Fewell (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1992) 27-39; M. J. Boda, "Freeing the Burden of Prophecy: Mašša' and the Legitimacy of Prophecy in Zech 9-14," Bib 87 (2006): 338-57; J. Clayton and E. Rothstein, eds., Influence and Intertextuality in Literary History (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1991); J. Day, "Inner-Biblical Interpretation in the Prophets," in The Place Is Too Small for Us: The Israelite Prophets in Recent Scholarship, ed. R. P. Gordon (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1995) 230-46; U. Eco, Semiotics and the Philosophy of Language (London: Macmillan, 1984); idem, The Open Work, trans. A. Caccioppo (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1989); L. M. Eslinger, "Inner-Biblical Exegesis and Inner-Biblical

Allusion: The Question of Category," VT 42 (1992) 47-58; M. A. Fishbane, Biblical Interpretation in Ancient Israel (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1985); idem, The Garments of Torah: Essays in Biblical Hermeneutics (ISBL; Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1989); idem, "Inner-Biblical Exegesis," in Hebrew Bible, Old Testament: The History of Its Interpretation, ed. M. Sæbø (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1996) 33-48; idem, "Types of Biblical Intertextuality," in Congress Volume: Oslo 1988, ed. A. Lemaire and M. Sæbø (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2000) 39-44; M. H. Floyd, "Deutero-Zechariah and Types of Intertextuality," in Bringing Out the Treasure: Inner Biblical Allusion in Zechariah 9-14, ed. M. J. Boda and M. H. Floyd (JSOTSup 370; London: Sheffield Academic Press, 2003) 225-44; G. Hepner, "Verbal Resonance in the Bible and Intertextuality," JSOT 96 (2001) 3-27; J. T. Hibbard, Intertextuality in Isaiah 24-27: The Reuse and Evocation of Earlier Texts and Traditions (FAT 2/16; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2006); W. Iser, "Indeterminacy and the Reader's Response," in Aspects of Narrative: Selected Papers from the English Institute, ed. J. H. Miller (New York: Columbia University Press, 1971) 2-45; J. Kristeva, Desire in Language: A Semiotic Approach to Literature and Art (Oxford: Blackwell, 1980); K. J. A. Larkin, The Eschatology of Second Zechariah: A Study of the Formation of a Mantological Wisdom Anthology (CBET 6; Kampen: Kok Pharos, 1994); J. M. Leonard, "Identifying Inner-Biblical Allusions: Psalm 78 as a Test Case," JBL 127 (2008) 241-65; B. M. Levinson, "The Phenomenon of Rewriting within the Hebrew Bible: A Bibliographic Essay on 'Inner-Biblical Exegesis' in the History of Scholarship," in Legal Revision and Religious Renewal in Ancient Israel, ed. B. M. Levinson (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2008) 95-182; M. C. Love, The Evasive Text: Zechariah 1-8 and the Frustrated Reader (JSOTSup 296; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1999); R. A. Mason, "The Use of Earlier Biblical Material in Zechariah 9-14: A Study in Inner Biblical Exegesis," in Bringing Out the Treasure: Inner Biblical Allusion in Zechariah 9-14, ed. M. J. Boda and M. H. Floyd (JSOTSup 370; London: Sheffield Academic, 2003) 1-208; K. Nielsen, "Intertextuality and Hebrew Bible," in Congress Volume: Oslo 1988, ed. A. Lemaire and M. Sæbø (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2000) 17-31; J. D. Nogalski, "Intertextuality and the Twelve,” in Forming Prophetic Literature: Essays on Isaiah and the Twelve in Honor of John D. W. Watts, ed. J. W. Watts and P. R. House (JSOTSup 235; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1996) 102-24; R. Nurmela, Prophets in Dialogue: Inner-Biblical Allusions in Zechariah 1-8 and 9-14 (Åbo: Åbo Akademi University Press, 1996); M. Riffaterre, Semiotics of Poetry (Advances in Semiotics; Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1978); K. Schmid, “Innerbiblische Schriftauslegung: Aspekte der Forschungsgeschichte,” in Schriftauslegung in Der Schrift: Festschrift für Odil Hannes Steck zum seinem 65. Geburtstag, ed. R. G. Kratz, T. Kruger and K. Schmid (BZAW 300; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2000) 1-22; R. L. Schultz, “The Ties That Bind: Intertextuality, the Identification of Verbal Parallels, and Reading Strategies in the Book of the Twelve,” in Thematic Threads in the Book of the Twelve, ed. P. L. Redditt and A. Scharf (BZAW 325; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2003) 27-45; B. D. Sommer, “Allusions and Illusions: The Unity of the Book of Isaiah in Light of Deutero-Isaiah’s Use of the Prophetic Tradition,” in New Visions of Isaiah, ed. R. F. Melugin and M. A. Sweeney (JSOTSup 214; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1996a) 156-87; idem, “Exegesis, Allusion and Intertextuality in the Hebrew Bible: A Response to Lyle Eslinger,” VT 46 (1996b) 479-89; idem, A Prophet Reads Scripture: Allusion in Isaiah 40-66 (Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1998); M. R. Stead, “Sustained Allusion in Zechariah 1-2,” in Tradition in Transition: Haggai and Zechariah 1-8 in the Trajectory of Hebrew Theology, ed. M. J. Boda and M. H. Floyd (LHBOTS 475; New York: T & T Clark, 2008) 144-70; idem, The Intertextuality of Zechariah 1-8 (LHBOTS 506; New York: T & T Clark, 2009); P. K. Tull, “Intertextuality and the Hebrew Scriptures,” CurBS 8 (2000) 59-90; K. W. Weyde, “Inner-Biblical Interpretation: Methodological Reflections on the Relationship between Texts in the Hebrew Bible,” SEÅ 70 (2005) 287-300; P. T. Willey, Remember the Former Things: The Recollection of Previous Texts in Second Isaiah (SBLDS 161; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1997).

M. R. Stead

ISAIAH: BOOK OF

Isaiah was a prophet who ministered in Judah in the last third of the eighth century BC (approximately 735-700 BC). The book records his sayings from that period but also includes a lot of material that relates to later times. Some believe that the same prophet was responsible for authorship of the whole book, but most scholars think that it was written by several authors over a long period of time. Recent work has emphasized, however, that this does not prevent study of the book as a whole and discussion of its teaching as a unity of some sort. In the NT, Isaiah is the most frequently cited of all the Prophetic Books, and a number of passages, whether messianic or not, have featured prominently in Christian liturgy and teaching, as well as in wider cultural works of art, literature and music.

1. Structure and Content
2. Survey of Scholarship on Composition
3. The Text of the Book of Isaiah
4. Two Major Theological Themes
5. King and Messiah

1. Structure and Content.

The book of Isaiah is long and, at first sight, bewildering in its variety. The following is a somewhat rough and abbreviated outline that may help with initial orientation.

1.1. Introduction. Isaiah 1 serves as an introduction to the book, not in the sense that it includes a summary of the whole (note, e.g., that there is nothing here about kingship), but rather that it mirrors the shape of the book and so invites a responsive reading. The nation is criticized for its defection from following the Lord and threatened with even worse punishment; the survival of even a remnant is already a mark of God’s grace (Is 1:2-9; cf. Is 2—39). Despite severe disjuncture between religious practice and ethics, there is an offer of full *forgiveness still open to those who are willing to respond (Is 1:10-20; cf. Is 40—55). This response is anticipated at the individual level rather than at the full national level, and those who reject it will be judged severely (Is 1:21-31; cf. Is 56—66).

1.2. Programmatic Statement. Isaiah 2—12 seems to contain a wide variety of different types of material, but it encapsulates many of the major themes that will recur. Following another introductory heading (Is 2:1), it puts forward a *vision of how things will be one day, with Zion exalted and all the *nations streaming in and out in order to learn of God’s ways, the outcome of which will be world *peace (Is

2:2-4). However, “the house of Jacob” falls far short of the ideal required for the fulfilment of this vision (Is 2:5-6), and much of the remainder of the book is devoted to addressing this problem. Most of Isaiah 2—5 amplifies and condemns the nature of the people’s sin and failure, though Isaiah 4:2-6 keeps the vision alive with a glimpse of what *Zion could and will be.

Isaiah 6 marks something of a fresh start with Isaiah’s vision of the exaltation of the Lord as king and warrior, his highly ambiguous, though threatening, commission of Isaiah as his spokesperson, and a solemn warning of the judgment that will come before there is any hope of restoration. In a mixture of third- and first-person material, Isaiah 7—8 then shows the outworking of this commission in the specific context of the Syro-Ephraimite crisis (see Israelite History), while Isaiah 9:1-7 issues a reminder that God can reverse his punitive acts of judgment and use a Davidic descendant to initiate his rule of *justice, righteousness and peace. Isaiah 9:8—10:34 generally renews the threats of judgment on both the northern kingdom of Israel and the southern kingdom of Judah at the hands of the Assyrians, whereas Isaiah 11 again affirms the ideal of righteousness and peace that God will bring through his appointed king. Isaiah 12 rounds off this section with an anticipatory hymn of praise—a structural feature of Isaiah 40—55 as well, the language of Isaiah 12 being also familiar from there.

1.3. Oracles Concerning the Nations. Isaiah 13:1 has a heading that consciously balances that of Isaiah 2:1. Bearing the introductory vision in mind, Isaiah 13—23 is largely concerned with foreign nations, both those that were active in the region of Judah during Isaiah’s own lifetime and others that became prominent only later. There are two exceptions: one concerns Jerusalem (apparently) at the end of Isaiah’s ministry (Is 22), and the other is a short prose account of his actions during the revolt of Ashdod that helps to bind the two previous chapters (Cush and Egypt) together. While this material keeps the international dimension of the prophecy in mind in relation to Isaiah’s own time, Isaiah 24—27 (often called the “Isaiah Apocalypse”) transposes these concerns on to a more timeless and universal scale (see Sweeney 1988). As with the original vision, the shape of the book thus encourages reflection on the truths propounded beyond the narrow historical context of Isaiah’s own lifetime.

1.4. Headlong to Disaster. About twenty years after the fall of the northern kingdom of Israel (see Is 28:1-6), most of Isaiah 28—39 charts the course of Judah’s history through to an almost equally serious catastrophe in the outcome of the revolt of King Hezekiah against the Assyrians and Sennacherib’s punitive invasion in 701 BC. Scathing condemnations of Judah’s policies at this time are included, though there are also smaller passages interspersed that remind the reader that this is not God’s last word. Isaiah 36—39 then recounts the course of Sennacherib’s invasion in a manner closely parallel with 2 Kings 18—20. Although the outcome is a miraculous deliverance for Jerusalem, the last word is not hopeful, in that the story of the Babylonian envoys points forward to eventual *exile there (Is 39:6-7), so setting the scene for the following major section of the book. Before these narratives, Isaiah 34 again universalizes the word of judgment (it is not confined to Judah, therefore), while Isaiah 35 contrasts sharply by sketching the joy and praise that will be offered when God restores his people; the talk of the ransomed of the Lord returning and coming to Zion again strongly anticipates the next major section of the book, so that the chapter functions in a manner similar to Isaiah 12.

1.5. “Comfort My People!” Isaiah 40—55 breathes a significantly different atmosphere from the bulk of what has preceded. Although, as we have seen, there are some small anticipations, now the message is this: forget the former things, and look to the new thing that God is doing. Cyrus, the coming Persian king who is named as God’s messiah (Is 44:28; 45:1), is coming to take over oppressive Babylon (Is 41:2-4; 43:14-15; 45:1-7; 46—47) and to set in motion the ingathering of the dispersed people of Israel from there as well as from all four corners of the earth. The prophet’s message throughout Isaiah 40—48, therefore, is meant to encourage the people to respond in faith in place of their current despair (e.g., Is 40:27). They may believe God’s promise because of his power shown as creator, his superiority to the idols of the peoples (as seen in a series of courtroom-like trials), and because he controls the destiny of the nations.

Although the audience in Isaiah 49—55 seems to be largely the same, the tone of the writing is significantly different. The style is more intimate, with the people addressed now more as Zion, though the reassuring note and the expectation of joy remain.

This transition in style is mirrored in the transition in the role of the famous servant figure (for a messianic reading, see 5 below). In Isaiah 42:1-4 the servant was clearly Israel in some shape or form (see, e.g., the close similarities with Is 41:8-10), presented in royal guise as the one through whom God would bring justice to the nations. In Isaiah 49:1-6 this remains the final goal (see Is 49:1, 6), but the path to its realization has become more complex. The servant remains Israel (Is 49:3), but he now has first to restore the tribes of Jacob as a prior step in his mission. And what that will cost is spelled out in Isaiah 52:13—53:12, where the suffering is undertaken on behalf of “my people” (Is 53:8) but will astound and lead to a complete change of heart on the part of nations and kings (Is 52:13-15; 53:12; note how this may pick up on the witness of Is 40:5 and elsewhere).

1.6. The Reordering of a Godly Society. In many ways the last eleven chapters of the book (Is 56—66) are the most confusing. It may help to observe that Isaiah 60—62 is closest in thought to Isaiah 40—55, but now the standpoint seems to have switched back to the Jerusalem community. Prior to that there are passages apparently explaining why the promised deliverance has not turned out to be so glorious as had been hoped, and following it there is a long prayer of lament (Is 63:7—64:12) that complains again at the delay, to which the bulk of Isaiah 65—66 may be seen as the divine response. As part of these moves there is the start of a shift to a more individualized rhetoric. The community is divided between the righteous and the wicked, dependent upon repentance, so that the distinction between Israel and the nations begins to be transformed into a distinction between those of Israel and the nations who respond to God’s call vis-à-vis those of either group who do not. Thus, at the start of the section (Is 56:1-8) and at the end (Is 66:18-24) we find introductory and concluding passages that show a remarkable universality about the potential of God’s salvation, even though not all, by any means, avail themselves of it. In this way, the book concludes on a similar note to the end of the first, introductory chapter.

2. Survey of Scholarship on Composition.

The preceding outline of the book has revealed a remarkable diversity of topics discussed and of historical situations presupposed by the author or authors of the various parts. Conservative scholars believe that all of this can be accommodated under the banner of predictive prophecy; probably late in his life, when Isaiah realized that judgment was inevitable for the present dispensation, he was guided by God to foresee the eventual deliverance and restoration, including, for instance, the name of the Persian monarch Cyrus. It is often claimed that the NT references, which, it is thought, associate Isaiah with passages cited from the second half of the book, are conclusive in this argument. The majority of scholars, including many evangelicals, however, think that the evidence is better explained by the hypothesis that the book had more than one author. The hypotheses that have been advanced over the years differ considerably from one another, however, as the following highly selective and compressed survey will demonstrate.

2.1. Before 1892. Toward the end of the eighteenth century, earlier adumbrations by the medieval Jewish commentator Ibn Ezra (see Simon) were picked up by J. B. Koppe, J. C. Döderlein and, especially influentially, J. G. Eichhorn (see the survey in Vincent) to the effect that the second half of the book (from Is 40 on) was not written by Isaiah of Jerusalem in the eighth century BC but rather by an unknown prophet of the sixth century BC who directed his oracles toward the Judean exiles in Babylon. This view spread rapidly in the nineteenth century, so that although during those decades the most important work on Isaiah related to textual criticism and philology, the division of the book between two authors became something of a consensus position, attracting even the eventual agreement of the otherwise conservative F. Delitzsch in the fourth and final edition of his commentary.

2.2. Bernhard Duhm. In 1892 Duhm published the first edition of his commentary, which rapidly established itself as a classic. This is generally best known for two significant hypotheses, though a third is also of importance. First, Duhm argued for a third division of the book, following Isaiah 55, so that it now became common to speak of Proto-, Deutero- and Trito-Isaiah (Is 1—39; 40—55; 56—66). He demonstrated that just as Isaiah 40—55 presupposed a setting in the Babylonian exile, so Isaiah 56—66 presupposed a later situation back in the partially restored Jerusalem. Although Duhm himself did not hold this further opinion, it came to be widely believed that Deutero-Isaiah should be located in Babylon during the exile and Trito-Isaiah in Jerusalem at some time following the return from exile early in the Persian period.

Second, Duhm was the first to isolate as a separate composition the four so-called Servant Songs (see Servant of Yahweh) in the second half of the book (Is 42:1-4; 49:1-6; 50:4-9; 52:13—53:12). He maintained that the presentation of this servant was so at variance with the faithless servant of the surrounding chapters that they could not have been held together in the mind of a single author. He thought that they had a quite separate origin, and that they were copied into conveniently blank spaces or margins in the manuscript of the larger book. Their present context therefore was not significant. This proposal has had a major bearing on many interpretations of these cardinal passages ever since, for it was considered even by conservative evangelicals somehow to give warrant to expounding them in isolation from their present literary setting.

Third, Duhm did not accept that all of Isaiah 1—39 should be attributed to Isaiah of Jerusalem. Rather, he sought to press the evidence for different sections within these chapters as indicative of material of diverse origin, some of which (such as Is 24—27) certainly was very much later than Isaiah (and, indeed, later than some parts in the second half of the book as well). Because this third aspect of Duhm's commentary was not so startlingly original as the first two, it has not attracted the attention that they have. Nevertheless, it contributed strongly to the growing tide of opinion that the first half of the book was written by several authors, stretching over several hundreds of years.

2.3. The Decades Following Duhm. As the influence of Duhm's major conclusions spread, it became common during much of the twentieth century to treat the various parts of the book in more or less complete isolation from one another. Books of introduction to the Bible had separate chapters on Isaiah of Jerusalem and Deutero-Isaiah, for instance, and these could be separated from each other if the treatment was chronological. Similarly, many commentary series assigned the different parts of the book to different commentators, and monographic studies focused their attention exclusively on one section or another. Scholarly trends in regard to each section differed starkly from one another.

2.3.1. Isaiah 1—39. Opinions regarding the composition of this part of the book have diverged more widely than any other, so that any summary is bound to be inadequate. Only a few significant trends can be mentioned.

The general tendency in the decades following Duhm was to find ever more divisions within these chapters. While it was relatively uncontroversial to ascribe the Isaiah Apocalypse (Is 24—27) to a late (and sometimes very late) period, this trend was quickly followed with regard to a number of the other oracles against the nations (e.g., the oracle against Babylon in Is 13—14 could not be earlier than the neo-Babylonian period, coinciding with the exile). In addition, Isaiah 35 obviously belonged closely with Isaiah 40—55 (note that Is 35:10 is more or less identical with Is 51:11), and Isaiah 34 went along with it. Isaiah 33 was also often seen as non-Isaianic, so that the end of the prophet Isaiah's own composition was found somewhere in the course of Isaiah 32.

A similar stripping off of material also characterized much of the opening chapters of the book. As we have already seen, parts of Isaiah 1 are close to the final chapters of the book and generally were thought to have been written at the same time. Isaiah 4:2-6 was more or less universally ascribed to an author in a late postexilic time, where several of its images find their closest parallels. Oracles of unconditional hope tended also to be denied to Isaiah of Jerusalem on the understanding that his ministry was primarily "negative" (see Is 6:9-10); this applied especially to the "messianic" passages in Isaiah 9:1-6; 11:1-9, but equally, the end of Isaiah 11 and especially Isaiah 12 were related closely with the work of Deutero-Isaiah. The same sort of conclusion was also drawn with regard to some of the more hopeful material in Isaiah 28—32. A standard English commentary such as that of G. Gray (covering Is 1—27 only) gives a fair and balanced discussion of these issues. What was noticeably missing, however, was serious exegetical attention to much of the material that was considered “later” or “secondary.” There was an atmosphere in which early was considered best, or most important, so that little attention was given to how or why the larger work developed as it did. Moreover, virtually nobody writing during those decades considered how these chapters related to the second half of the book.

One significant and influential counter-theory, however, was that of K. Budde, who advanced the case that Isaiah 6:1–9:6 was entirely written by the prophet himself as what has come to be called the “Isaiah Memoir.” While most of the theory and certainly the designation were more or less universally adopted, it is astonishing to find that within this Budde included material that in other respects certainly should have been considered “later,” such as the last part of Isaiah 7, and equally that he lumped together the third-person narrative in Isaiah 7:1–17 and the first-person accounts in Isaiah 6 and Isaiah 8. This had serious consequences for the understanding of Isaiah 7 in particular that only recently have begun to be unraveled.

2.3.2. Isaiah 40–55. By complete contrast with the treatment of Isaiah 1–39, scholars varied very little in their conviction that Isaiah 40–55 should be ascribed to the work of a great prophet in the Babylonian exile. Exceptions were made only for the Servant Songs and some of the anti-idol polemical passages (e.g., Is 40:19–20; 41:6–7; 44:9–20). Progress in research on these chapters was concentrated more on the increasingly sophisticated application of *form criticism, a method that detected comparable literary shapes between various passages that enabled them to be classified as trial speeches, oracles of salvation, disputations and so on. This had positive benefits: the otherwise rolling lyrical poetry could be divided into intelligible passages, and a meaningful social setting could be found for each type in a manner that led to a deeper appreciation of the rhetoric and encouraging argument of the prophet. This whole trend reached its climax in the commentary by C. Westermann, who both summarized and advanced research in this particular regard. It will have been in connection with the interpretation of the Servant Songs that opinions remained most widely divided.

2.3.3. Isaiah 56–66. Despite Duhm’s breakthrough in connection with the last part of Isaiah, very few scholars after him found in these chapters the work of a single author. K. Elliger, as well as several Israeli scholars, with whom in this respect C. Torrey was in agreement, sought to uphold the authorial unity of the whole of Isaiah 40–66. The majority, however, considered that the diversity of material and viewpoint was indicative of the work of more than one writer working over an undefined period of time. If a majority viewpoint emerged, it will have been that again best represented in Westermann’s commentary (see too Smith), in which Isaiah 60–62 is regarded as the earliest part, closely in succession to the views of Deutero-Isaiah. A sense of disillusion set in, however, when these promises appeared not to be being fulfilled in their entirety (see Is 58 for a clear example), and so the surrounding chapters came to be added in order to make clear what the conditions were that needed to be met as a first step. The decidedly universalist material at the start and close of the section might have been the final level of addition.

2.4. The Most Recent Trends. The last thirty years or so have witnessed several significant developments on many of these topics; although from one perspective they seem to be moving in opposite directions, there is an element of coherence that might permit the development of a new consensus. The key, it appears, is the increasingly sophisticated application of redaction criticism to the book in all its parts and as a whole (see Editorial/Redaction Criticism).

2.4.1. Isaiah 1–39. As far as the first part of the book is concerned, a significant development was initiated by H. Barth, who in 1977 argued in detail that many of the passages that had been regarded simply as random additions could be understood together as a single redaction in the reign of Josiah, the time that saw the sudden decline and eventual demise of the Assyrian Empire. Barth’s proposal was adopted (with minor variations) by many leading commentators such as R. Clements, M. Sweeney and J. Vermeylen (who had reached many of the same conclusions independently). A similar, though less far-reaching, proposal was to find evidence for a redactional layer that related to the fall of Jerusalem to the Babylonians and the exile of many of the people (e.g., Clements 1980b). The significance of such proposals was to demonstrate that earlier work had overlooked historical levels of coherence within the book; that is, its literary growth was not random or haphazard, but rather at certain key points in the nation's history, leading religious thinkers returned to the valued work of their predecessors in order to find ways of continuing to apply their teaching to the changing circumstances.

Another way in which this same development was advanced concerned the prose narratives about Isaiah (Is 7:1-17; 20; 36—39). These are told in the third person and thus were unlikely to have been written by the prophet himself. Furthermore, they have a number of significant points of connection between them (see, e.g., Conrad, 38-40) indicating that they may have been derived from a single source; parts were also used, of course, in the composition of the books of Kings. While they include good historical memory, the question of the present positioning in the book is fertile ground for redaction criticism; for instance, Isaiah 7:1-17 applies the "hardening" saying of Isaiah 6:9-10 to the individual person of the king, whereas Isaiah 8 does so to the people as a whole; Isaiah 20 served to bind together the two previous chapters relating to Cush and Egypt, and Isaiah 36—39 draws out the consequences of all the preceding judgment oracles while at the same time pointing forward to the second part of the book. It remains a challenge to the interpreter, however, to hold together the generally positive presentation of Hezekiah in these chapters with the harsh criticism of what has to have been his own policies in some of the preceding chapters (Is 28—31).

2.4.2. Isaiah 40—55. In recent decades a strange division has opened up between German-speaking and English-speaking scholars with regard to the composition of these chapters. Whereas generally the latter have tended to continue to hold to the essential unity of authorship (although, following the lead of H. Barstad, there has been some debate about whether the author should be located in Babylon or Judah), the former have moved toward a much more complicated presentation. In many monographs, as well as now in some commentaries, the material is thought to have developed in multiple phases. An initial core may have gone through as many as five or six subsequent stages of expansion, the result being that it is not really meaningful to talk of Deutero-

Isaiah any more, at least if by that a single author is implied. The theories inevitably differ somewhat one from another, so that in earlier years it was difficult to know how to evaluate them. More recently, however, they have been brought together into a fine synthesis by R. Albertz, so that one can now begin at least to see the forest from the trees in this regard.

Two points may be made about this particular development, which many people find puzzling when first encountered. First, there is certainly a division of some sort within Isaiah 40—55 following Isaiah 48. After Isaiah 48 there are no more trial scenes or anti-idol polemic; there is no more reference to the fall of Babylon; there is no further reference or allusion to Cyrus; Zion is addressed in a far more extended manner than previously; finally, Isaiah 48:22 obviously marks the end of a section, as a comparison with Isaiah 57:21 makes clear, and Isaiah 49:1-6 (the second Servant Song) is itself a passage that speaks of transition. To the extent that these new theories make us sensitive to the differences between the parts of Deutero-Isaiah, they should be welcomed, even if we do not accept all of their conclusions.

Second, as we will see shortly, some of this detection of redactional layering is due to the consequence of reading these chapters not in isolation, as had been the previous tendency, but rather within the context of the book of Isaiah as a whole; the detection of some connections with earlier or later passages obliged some scholars to seek a redactional explanation, not least because they still held to the likelihood that the core of these chapters began its life independently of the remainder of the book.

2.4.3. Isaiah 56—66. Work on these chapters has apparently been less dramatic because it effectively continues the kinds of development just described. That is to say, on the one hand, there is greater openness to finding more layers within the text than was previously entertained, and on the other hand, there is an increasing tendency to associate this with the development of the book as a whole. Regardless of opinions about the origins of Isaiah 40—55, most scholars are agreed that Isaiah 56—66 was not written in isolation from what precedes. Thus, one's understanding of the growth of the earlier parts of the book is likely to affect how one envisages the process in these closing chapters as well.

2.4.4. The Book of Isaiah as a Whole. This survey of recent developments in scholarship with regard to the various parts of the book must be put in subservience, as it were, to the most dramatic change of opinion in recent decades: the rediscovery of the book's essential unity. For most scholars, this is not what might be identified as a unity of authorship; instead, it is an acknowledgment that the various parts of the book developed not in isolation from one another but rather as part of a dynamic, and to some extent integrated, process of growth. In this, multiple examples of apparent literary dependence of one passage upon another and of the use of clauses and phrases (such as "the Holy One of Israel") that are rare or nonexistent elsewhere in the OT have been major contributory factors.

I have offered a detailed survey of the origins of this development elsewhere, crediting the work of numerous scholars (Williamson 1994, 1-18). There remains an important distinction, however, between those who conceive the unity as being seen only in the relatively late welding together of originally separate compositions (so prominently O. Steck with his pupils and followers) and those, such as myself, who believe that the later parts of the book were written in the first place only in order to carry forward the earlier parts that were at those authors' disposal. Thus, I sought to demonstrate that Isaiah 40—55 was directly influenced by an earlier form of Isaiah 1—39, that its author envisaged himself as proclaiming the deliverance that Isaiah had so long anticipated (see especially Is 8:16-18; 30:8 for evidence that this was specifically written down with an eye to the future), and that he edited the first part of the work specifically so that the two parts could be read together as a pair in relation to the end of the Babylonian exile (see, e.g., the role and position of Is 12, and the positioning of the oracle against Babylon as first among the oracles against the nations). Most recently, J. Stromberg has taken this suggestion forward to find a similar sort of process at work in relation to Isaiah 56—66 and the remainder of the book.

2.5. Some Conclusions. The view is sometimes expressed that there is so much diversity of scholarly opinion that none of it can be of any solid worth. This is a mistake. On the one hand, biblical scholars do not disagree any more than do other people on other issues in all walks of life; what counts is not so much the answers that are proposed as the fact that all the scholars, in careful consideration of the material at hand, come up with related questions. On the other hand, there is a developing agreement with regard to Isaiah that a pathway through the book's undoubted complexities is probably best sought in terms of literary history insofar as that can be traced by the observance of how one passage may be dependent in some way upon another. Where does this lead us, and what are its consequences for the ultimately more important task of interpretation?

First, I do not find the idea of unity of authorship to be either plausible or necessary. Despite frequent claims to the contrary by conservative scholars, this conclusion has nothing to do with belief or not in the power of predictive prophecy; after all, there is still predictive prophecy included in all parts of the book even on the most radical of critical positions. The issue turns rather on three considerations. (1) The setting presupposed by different parts of the book varies considerably. Much of Isaiah 40—55, for instance, takes its standpoint with those who have suffered judgment in the past and should now be anticipating deliverance; what sense would that make in the eighth century BC? If a concept of divine inspiration lies behind the view that all of this material was written at that earlier date, it would mean that God did not speak in a way that was intelligible to its audience at the time of delivery, so that this flies in the face of Christian understandings of the word of God, seen ultimately in incarnation. (2) The messages of the different parts of the book are so diverse that they cannot be understood as other than accompanying historical change. If all of them were delivered and considered together in the eighth century BC, they would be contradictory; it is only as they are related to different periods that the underlying unity becomes meaningful. Thus, to deny the probability that the book grew over a considerable period of time is to empty it of a major hermeneutical key. (3) The NT references do not alter this conclusion, since the use in those contexts of "Isaiah" may be perfectly well understood as a reference to the book, not the author. The only passage where the prophet himself is involved in action rather than as speaker or author in the argument is at John 12:41 ("Isaiah said this because he saw his glory and spoke about him" [NRSV]), and there the citation from Isaiah 6 poses no difficulty.

Second, even though the results of redaction criticism as outlined above may differ between scholars, there are three major underlying gains for interpretation in the newer approaches adopted over the last twenty or thirty years. (1) It is unusual now to find material simply dismissed as "late" or "additional." Regardless of quite when or by whom a verse or passage was added, the first question nowadays is to ask after the rationale of this addition at just this point in the text. In other words, redaction criticism makes commentators and preachers more aware of the depth in the text and drives them to probe that creatively rather than to try to underplay its significance. (2) Redaction criticism has opened up in principle the legitimacy of interpreting one part of the book in the light of the whole. As will be illustrated below, many themes are treated in complementary ways in the different parts of the book, the variety being due to the differing historical circumstances. At any given time, expositors today may believe that it is necessary to stress one aspect or another—for instance, severe critique of hypocrisy, or the liberating message of sin forgiven and an open pathway into the future. However, the book will always bring balancing features into play that need also to be included—for instance, the changing impact of *repentance in humility in the first case, and the fact that there is no cheap *forgiveness in the second. (3) Because redaction criticism works primarily through the detection and evaluation of literary associations across many passages, it deflects the commentator's attention from too heavy a preoccupation with the precise historical dating of any saying (a quest that usually cannot be answered with any certainty because we lack so much of the necessary data) and focuses attention instead on an interpretation of the text that we have and with which we can deal more securely. After a brief look at the state of the text of Isaiah, we will move on to consider some of the major theological themes in the book in the light of these conclusions.

3. The Text of the Book of Isaiah.

The position with regard to the Hebrew *text of the book of Isaiah is not as complicated as in the case of many others, such as Jeremiah. Most versions of the printed Hebrew Bible, on which English and other translations are based, are a copy of a manuscript dating from 1008 or 1009 and now housed in the Russian National Library in Saint Petersburg.

Uniquely, a more-or-less complete copy of Isaiah has been preserved among the *Dead Sea Scrolls, dating from the first pre-Christian century (i.e., over a millennium earlier than anything that was previously available). In addition, substantial parts remain in another manuscript, also found in Cave 1 when the scrolls were first discovered in the late 1940s. For an edition of both scrolls, see Ulrich and Flint. In addition, fragments (often very small) of some eighteen further manuscripts of Isaiah (or at least parts of it) were found in Cave 4, and they too have now been published (Ulrich et al.).

The Cave 4 fragments and IQIsa^b are quite similar to the later traditional MT (although without the vocalization, of course). In the case of IQIsa^a, however, there are many more variants. The overwhelming majority of these are of a linguistic nature (e.g., there is evidence of influence from Aramaic) or due to variations in spelling. In a major study, E. Kutscher concluded that the scroll was textually inferior to the MT, and although he may have pressed his case too far, generally he was correct. It therefore is clear that all the new evidence confirms that there is only a single textual tradition with regard to the book of Isaiah, so that each attested variant should be evaluated on its merits, not according to some other wider textual hypothesis. Nonetheless, there are a few passages where these recently discovered older manuscripts probably preserve more ancient readings, and these are usually adopted in modern translations; in the RSV there are just under twenty such readings adopted (though most readers remain unaware of the fact, which indicates that they are not of major import).

Among the ancient translations that predate the medieval manuscript, the same broadly conservative conclusion is also mostly justified. The Greek rendering (the LXX), however, raises particular questions of its own, and these are important because the translation was undertaken even earlier than the time of the DSS. It often seems to be a relatively free rendering, and this sometimes can make it difficult to know whether it is a rendering of the Hebrew text as we know it or whether it attests some variant reading. This translation is the subject of much debate in its own right, there being a sharp difference of opinion over whether, for all its freedom, its renderings are to be accounted for as an attempt to translate the text alone or whether the translator has also introduced significant theological or sociological interpretations of his own (for a survey of opinions, see Troxel). Whichever of these two positions is correct, it is agreed that the LXX also generally attests the form of the Hebrew text as we know it, and that only occasionally may it be cited as evidence for superior readings.

While all these considerations mean that the text of Isaiah is a continuing subject of lively debate, their bearing on the general reader is strictly limited. We may be confident that the text of the book is relatively secure.

There remain a number of elements in the vocabulary of the book whose meaning is not precisely known (especially in the realms of technical botany, clothing and the like). Sometimes, discoveries of inscriptions or parallels in related languages shed light on these problems, but readers need to be aware of the tentative nature of many such proposals.

4. Two Major Theological Themes.

Even in a relatively lengthy dictionary article such as the present one, it is impossible to present a full survey of all the teaching of the book in each of its parts. In the following I will outline two of the major distinctive elements that straddle the book as a whole—one on the nature of God, the other on human response—in order to illustrate the importance of the recent rediscovery of the book's unity for responsible exegesis. (Other important themes could equally well have been chosen, such as *Zion [on which, see Maier] or the development and reversal of the "hardening" saying of Is 6:9-10 [on which, see Uhlig].) At the end, I will add a separate section on the messianic passages, for which the book is especially well known.

4.1. God.

4.1.1. God as "High and Lifted Up." Few would doubt that Isaiah's call or commissioning (it is not quite clear which it is) as recorded in Isaiah 6 was a foundational experience for the prophet, just as its recorded version in writing has become for the development of the book as a whole. Its vocabulary and themes are constantly cited or alluded to elsewhere, and of course its influence on later theology and liturgy is pervasive.

It starts with a vision of God in all his royal majesty (he is called "the king" in Is 6:5), and in Isaiah 6:1 the words "high and lifted up" appear. Grammatically, it is not quite clear whether these words apply directly here to God or whether they instead qualify the throne on which he is sitting. Either way, however, as we will see shortly, they came in the course of time to be understood as referring to God.

From this opening statement, a number of other characteristic phrases and words may be seen to take their natural place. The use of the "holiness" word group in relation to God is prominent (see further below). "Glory" is another favorite term in the book, and it takes its place alongside "holy" as early as Isaiah 6:3 in the praise of the seraphim in the Trisagion (the proclamation that begins "Holy, holy, holy"). From there the language ripples out in several different directions. Another characteristic title for God is "the LORD of hosts" (again, starting from Is 6:5), the "hosts" in this context almost certainly being the heavenly armies of the divine king. This too adds to the impression of all-powerful and completely dominating divine power.

Appreciation of this exalted majesty of God undoubtedly was a dominating consideration for Isaiah in his theological worldview. He has a strong sense of hierarchy and a consequent appreciation that it is important for each part of the created order to know its place. At the simplest level, therefore, anything else that claims a "high and lifted up" position is doomed to destruction because it manifests hubris in the face of the only truly exalted one, God himself. Thus, the several occurrences of these words with relation to trees, mountains, towers and the like in Isaiah 2:12-17 are sufficient to explain without further justification why the Lord of hosts has a day against them, "against all that is proud and lofty, against all that is lifted up and high."

The same principle then explains Isaiah's theology in relation to Assyria, for instance. As long as Assyria acts in judgment even against Judah, it is regarded as God's minister, as "the rod of my anger, the staff of my fury! Against a godless nation I send him" (Is 10:5-6). But as soon as the Assyrians exceed their God-given brief and start to act in arrogant independence (Is 10:7-14), their own fate is sealed (Is 10:15-19), for this again is a clear example of hubris. This pattern we find repeated elsewhere.

This theology translates downwards, we may also note in passing, into Isaiah's understanding of the proper ordering of society. There are aspects of this that some today might well find inappropriate or distasteful, though it should be remembered in partial mitigation that Isaiah has an equally strong sense that those higher up the ladder have correspondingly larger responsibilities to care for those lower down. Nevertheless, it is helpful to appreciate the theology on which some of these more challenging passages, such as Isaiah 3, are based.

If this brief characterization of God in the first part of the book is correct, then it is of more than passing interest to see how it is handled later on, not least because of the ways, as we have noted, one part of the book often is balanced in important ways by another. The most striking way into this is the use of the same vocabulary in reference to God (and where, indeed, "high and lifted up" has actually become a divine title) in Isaiah 57:15: "For thus says the high and lofty one who inhabits eternity, whose name is Holy: I dwell in the high and holy place, and also with those who are contrite and humble in spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite" (NRSV). The majesty of God as recapitulated from the first part of the book is here shown not to make him necessarily remote, as we might otherwise suppose. Rather, when God's majesty encounters people of a suitably contrasting disposition, he is said to dwell with them quite as much as in the high and holy place. The same sentiment exactly is echoed in Isaiah 66:1-2, which concludes, "But this is the one to whom I will look, to the humble and contrite in spirit, who trembles at my word" (NRSV).

This balancing between the parts of the book could be developed further in this regard, of course, but it serves as a reminder once again of the need to consider each individual part of the book in the light of the whole. On this occasion, there is just one further dimension that should be added here, for this same language recurs at the start of the fourth of the Servant Songs, at Isaiah 52:13: "See, my servant shall prosper; he shall be exalted and lifted up, and shall be very high" (NRSV). This is a remarkable statement of how the servant will share the status and designation that previously we had thought was reserved exclusively for God. It comes in the introduction to a passage of extended reflection on rejection and suffering and anticipates (as is not unusual in Hebrew narrative) the outcome of the sequence of events that is to follow (cf. Is 53:12, which brings us back to the same point as this opening). Of the many insights that this affords, let it suffice here to state the obvious: when God finds an attitude of acceptance of his will in the service of others, no matter what the cost, he is prepared against all expectation to share the highest honors with his servants.

4.1.2. "The Holy One of Israel." A comparable, though slightly more complex, pattern may be traced with regard to the distinctive divine title "the Holy One of Israel." This occurs twenty-five times in Isaiah, and there are a few similar related expressions in addition. This sometimes has mistakenly been cited as evidence of unity of authorship; however, its usage is more interesting than that (for the following, see Williamson 2001).

It is probable (in view of Ps 71:22; 78:41; 89:18) that this title was in infrequent use in the Jerusalem cult. Isaiah's experience of the thrice-holy God (Is 6:3) may have led him to make use of it, even though the title itself does not occur in that chapter. On normal critical grounds, some five occurrences may be ascribed to him, mostly from the later part of his ministry. In these cases, as Isaiah 6 might lead us to expect, God's holiness stands in contrast with Judah's faithlessness, so that the title is used in connection with coming judgment. In this, Isaiah will have been turning cultic expectations on their head: the God whom the psalms led the people to believe would fight on their behalf turns out, in his sovereignty, to be the one who is planning their judgment for sin.

In the second part of the book, however, the exact opposite situation obtains. The judgment now is pictured as past, and the prophet seeks to turn his people's attention forward to the creatively new work that God is about to do. As part of that, the familiar title, which has come to be seen as threatening, is turned again to announce that the free and sovereign Lord is able to work as vigorously and surprisingly in grace as he had in judgment; all thirteen examples of the usage there are uniform in this regard. This therefore opens the reader up to a new appreciation of the rich character of God, who is not bound by institution or routine but rather is free to respond to his people's situations in ways that constantly take them unawares and ultimately, so far as this book proclaims, in grace.

Finally, we should note that while some of these later positive uses are reflected in what most scholars regard as positive redactional passages in Isaiah 1—39, the title drops almost completely from use thereafter. There are only two occurrences in Isaiah 56—66, one of which (Is 60:9) is merely a citation of Isaiah 55:5, and the other of which (Is 60:14) may be an echo of Isaiah 12:6. It then does not occur at all in the later material such as Isaiah 24—27; 34—35. Careful attention to the literary contexts of the title's use thus opens up an illuminating theology in this particular regard.

4.2. Justice and Righteousness. In common with some other parts of the OT, as well as elsewhere in the ancient Near East, the first half of the book of Isaiah stresses the need for “justice and righteousness”* in various spheres of life. There are some dozen occurrences of this word pair. Such language is not in common use today, and thus it requires some explanation.

By observing uses in context, including topics with which these values are contrasted, we soon learn that this goes far beyond just the administration of the criminal legal system (though that is included). It speaks instead of the need for probity, including compassion, in all walks of social and political life; one scholar has even gone so far as to gloss it with the phrase “social justice.”* This may have taken very different forms in antiquity than it does today, but the general area is one of obviously continuing need at various levels of local, national and international life.

According to Isaiah's presentation, these qualities used to be characteristic of Zion in what he portrays as the golden era of Davidic rule, even though things have declined seriously since (Is 1:21-23). He concludes his parable of the vineyard by asserting that God still looks for these qualities in the present time, but instead he finds only their opposite: bloodshed and the cry of oppression (Is 5:7, with the clever use of word play). However, he is confident that they will once again characterize the restored

Zion of the future, as pictorially God as builder of the new city declares, “I will make justice the line, and righteousness the plummet” (Is 28:17 NRSV). Their importance is underlined still further by the fact that they should be the concern of the ideal king (Is 32:1) and indeed will be of the royal child whose birth is announced in Isaiah 9:6-7. Many other passages could be cited where these words either occur together or on their own to demonstrate how central a concern this was to Isaiah and how the perversion of justice and righteousness was a significant cause of the judgment that he anticipated.

When we turn to the next part of the book, however, we find a remarkable contrast. To be sure, there are some elements of continuity (e.g., in Is 42:1-4, though the words “justice” and “righteousness” do not appear in tandem at any point in Isaiah 40—55), but more commonly we find “righteousness” singled out and used in a very different way. It appears several times in parallel with the word for “salvation,”* so that whereas in Isaiah 1—39 it was something that persons in positions of responsibility had to do or perform, now it becomes part of the gracious deliverance and provision by God. There are those, indeed, who understandably would translate it as “victory” or “deliverance” in these chapters; examples include Isaiah 41:10; 45:8; 46:13; 51:5, 6, 8.

Finally, and remarkably, we find that these two apparently contrasting uses are brought into relationship in the twofold use of the word at the very start of the third section of the book, Isaiah 56:1: “Keep justice, and do righteousness, for soon my salvation will come, and my deliverance be revealed” (RSV) (see Rendtorff). Here the parallel form familiar from Isaiah 1—39 reappears in the first line as an urgent imperative, whereas in the following lines “righteousness” (the rendering of the RSV, which I have cited, is “deliverance”) is used in parallel with “salvation,” as in Isaiah 40—55, as indicative of God's imminent deliverance and as motivation to obey the command of the first line. This theologically rich intertwining of the two preceding sections of the book is then taken up and developed in various ways in the concluding chapters.

The foregoing remarks are only the sketchiest outline of a topic of central importance to the book. The striking balance introduced in Isaiah 56:1 needs constantly to be kept in mind, however. In some situations it may be necessary to focus on the practice of justice and righteousness and so to concentrate on one or more of the relevant passages in the first half of the book. It would be a mistake, however, to leave the matter there, for there is also a rich source of encouragement from reflection on God's correspondingly salvific righteousness. Conversely, the need may be for the dispirited to be comforted by the good news of God's deliverance as joyfully proclaimed in so much of the second part of the book, but here too it would be unbalanced so to concentrate on that without any indication that God looks for a response in gratitude in the treatment of others. The recovery of the sense of the book's unity thus brings balance to our understanding of its teaching with regard to human response.

5. King and Messiah.

Isaiah has several classical *messianic prophecies that feature regularly in most church lectionaries. They raise many exegetical problems, however, so that a few words of guidance here may be helpful. Included prominently among these passages (though there are a few others that are less well known) are Isaiah 7:14; 9:1-7; 11:1-9; 42:1-4; 49:1-6; 52:13—53:12; 61:1-4. (For the following, see more fully Williamson 1998.)

In terms of a traditional Christian reading of these passages, there are two main dangers. First, often they are applied so directly to Jesus that they are treated in willful disregard of their present immediate context in Isaiah. The bits that fit the NT tend to be pulled out with no attempt to relate them to other things that are equally prominent in the passage under consideration. Second, there is a tendency to stress so emphatically that Jesus has fulfilled these prophecies that they are emptied of any other content, including matters that should be prominent in our exegesis.

The first point to notice is that the emphasis falls more on the task that the figure is to perform than on the identity of the figure in question. In Isaiah 9:6-7, for instance, the whole drive of the prophecy is that the child has been given in order to establish and uphold the kingdom "with justice and with righteousness," so that this fits closely with the theme that we surveyed briefly in the preceding section. We can well imagine that such hopes would have attended the birth of any royal child in ancient Judah; surely, this new prospective king will improve the social circumstances of the kingdom over the present state of affairs. The focus in Isaiah 11 turns out, upon inspection, to be not so very different. It is also immediately in line with the proverbial saying of Isaiah 32:1: "A king should reign in the interests of righteousness, and princes rule for the furtherance of justice."

The case of the Immanuel prophecy in Isaiah 7:14 is different. So far as its immediate context is concerned, the child in question clearly is to be born in the immediate future, as the close link with the promise of deliverance from the threat of the invading Syro-Ephraimite coalition makes clear in the two following verses. Furthermore, there is no direct statement as to the identity of the child's mother. The three main views are (1) he is another child of the prophet, as with the children in Isaiah 7:8; 8:1-4 (see too Is 8:18); (2) he is in some way a member of the royal household, perhaps even a child of King Ahaz, as the several references to the Davidic house in Isaiah 7:1-17 might lead one to suppose; (3) he is no specific child, but generically just any children who are born to Judean mothers in the very near future. Even if we prefer the second option (which I regard as marginally the most probable), this does not make it a long-term messianic prophecy as usually understood. The messianic interpretation is familiar from the citation in Matthew 1:22, of course. The legitimacy of that is not a question of historical exegesis of the text as it stands in Isaiah (where equally the mother of the child is not specifically identified as a virgin, though the word in question does not rule out such an interpretation either); rather, it needs to be justified through the path of the history of interpretation and the manner of the citation of the OT in the NT (a topic that runs beyond the parameters of the present article).

When we turn to the second half of the book, we find that the political conditions have changed completely, and that the royal hopes of the first half of the book are turned now to the community of God's people in relation to the nations (see Is 55:3). The essential task remains, however: three times it is stressed in Isaiah 42:1-4 that this new "servant king," clearly identified in context as Israel/Jacob (see the similar language used of Israel in Is 41:8-13 as of the unnamed servant in Is 42:1-4), will "bring forth justice to the nations.” The relation of the servant and the nations is also the dominant topic in the second Servant Song (Is 49:1-6), while in the third (Is 52:13—53:12) it is also prominent, as the opening and closing verses indicate. As with the anticipated king in the first half of the book, therefore, the main point to grasp is that the figure portrayed whom we now read in messianic terms is defined by his or their role in relation to justice and peace brought to others (in Israel to start with and then internationally) (for sensible guidance on the controversial question of whether the prophet should be characterized as a nationalist or a universalist, see Van Winkle).

At Isaiah 54:17 we have the only reference in Isaiah 40—55 to the servants (plural) of the Lord, and again in this verse the familiar pair of “justice and righteousness” appears, albeit in a varied form: they are promised that they will be vindicated against any who rise up against them in judgment (the same word as “justice”), while equally their vindication (“righteousness”) is guaranteed by the Lord. As others have noted (e.g., Jeppesen; Beuken 1990; Blenkinsopp 1997), this verse forms a bridge into the final section of the book, where, as we saw in our introductory survey, there is a more individualized portrayal of the community of God, and where correspondingly the servants of the Lord are always plural—a collection of faithful people rather than a community regarded as a single entity. Thus, in terms of a messianic reading, the focus moves once again under the pressure of changing national and social conditions away from the exilic community regarded in royal terms as the bearer of promise and hope for the nations toward a world in which individuals are responsible for their own condition before God and consequently as a witness to his concern for social well-being.

In these changed circumstances the people are beginning to wonder why all the great promises do not seem to have been realized in the spectacular fashion that they perhaps had hoped for. Nevertheless, the figure in Isaiah 61:1-3 recapitulates many of the characteristics of the earlier messianic passages and emphasizes again that he will come to proclaim deliverance for the oppressed, which was an integral element of justice as envisaged in this book. He seems to gather up into himself many of the tasks that had previously been identified separately, and in that way its use by Jesus at the start of his ministry (Lk 4:16-21) may be regarded as supremely appropriate.

This brief sketch suggests that these are passages that indicate God’s purpose for a broken nation and a distressed world. That nation and that world move through all sorts of different circumstances, but the vision remains constant. When Jesus came, he lived in a situation that again was not directly envisaged in Isaiah: an artisan living under oppressive foreign occupation. Christians believe that in that very situation he demonstrated to perfection what it means to inaugurate justice under the constrained political circumstances within which he had to operate. His concern for the outcast, his care for the suffering, and his love for the unloved are part of that work, and supremely, of course, his journey to the cross and his death there fulfilled the work of reconciliation between humanity and God in a way that even surpasses what had previously been envisaged.

This does not, however, exhaust those prophecies. We should not understand their fulfilment in Christ in such a way that we do not realize that the tasks posed for the kings and servants of antiquity remain open and necessary still in the modern world. Justice, righteousness and peace at all levels, from international relations all the way down to those at the bottom of the social heap in our own neighborhoods, have not yet been fully realized. To hear these passages read during Advent or in Holy Week is not to encourage a smug feeling that all that has been taken care of by Christ; rather, it is to remind us that as imitators of him, we are challenged to implement these same costly and tiring values in our own changed circumstances.

See also ISAIAH: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION; PROPHETS IN THE NEW TESTAMENT; SERVANT OF YAHWEH; ZION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Commentaries: W. A. M. Beuken, Jesaja 1–12, 13–27 and 28–39 (3 vols; HThKAT; Freiburg: Herder, 2003-2010); J. Blenkinsopp, Isaiah: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (3 vols; AB 19, 19A, 19B; New York: Doubleday, 2000-2003); R. E. Clements, Isaiah 1–39 (NCB; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980a); F. Delitzsch, Biblical Commentary on the Prophecies of Isaiah (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1894); B. Duhm, Das Buch Jesaja (HKAT 3/1; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1892); J. Goldingay, Isaiah (IBC; Peabody: Hendrickson, 2001); idem, The Message of Isaiah 40-55: A Literary-Theological Commentary (London: T & T Clark International, 2005); J. Goldingay and D. Payne, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Isaiah 40-55 (2 vols; ICC; London: T & T Clark, 2006); G. Gray, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Isaiah I-XXVII (ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1912); J. N. Oswalt, The Book of Isaiah: Chapters 1-39 and Chapters 40-66 (2 vols; NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans; 1986-1998); C. Westermann, Isaiah 40-66: A Commentary (OTL; London: SCM, 1969); R. N. Whybray, Isaiah 40-66 (NCB; London: Oliphants, 1975). H. Wildberger, Isaiah 1-12, 13-27 and 28-39 (3 vols; Continental Commentary; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991-2002); Studies: R. Albertz, Israel in Exile: The History and Literature of the Sixth Century B.C.E., (SBL 3; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2003); H. Barstad, The Babylonian Captivity of the Book of Isaiah: "Exilic" Judah and the Provenance of Isaiah 40-55 (Oslo: Novus Forlag, 1997); H. Barth, Die Jesaja-Worte in der Josiazeit: Israel und Assur als Thema einer produktiven Neuinterpretation der Jesajaüberlieferung (WMANT 48; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1977); J. Barton, Isaiah 1-39 (OTG; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1995); W. A. M. Beuken, "The Main Theme of Trito-Isaiah: 'The Servants of YHWH,'" JSOT 47 (1990) 67-87; J. Blenkinsopp, "The Servant and the Servants in Isaiah and the Formation of the Book," in Writing and Reading the Scroll of Isaiah: Studies of an Interpretive Tradition, ed. C. C. Broyles and C. A. Evans (2 vols.; VTSup 70/1, 70/2; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997) 1:155-75; C. C. Broyles and C. A. Evans, eds., Writing and Reading the Scroll of Isaiah: Studies of an Interpretive Tradition (2 vols; VTSup 70/1, 70/2; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997); K. Budde, Jesajas Erleben: Eine gemeinverständliche Auslegung der Denkschrift des Propheten (Kap. 6,1-9,6) (BCW; Gotha: Leopold Klotz, 1928); R. E. Clements, "The Prophecies of Isaiah and the Fall of Jerusalem in 587 B.C.," VT 30 (1980b) 421-36; E. W. Conrad, Reading Isaiah (OBT; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); K. Elliger, Die Einheit des Tritojesaja, Jesaja 56-66 (BWANT 45; Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1928); G. I. Emmerson, Isaiah 56-66 (OTG; Sheffield: JSOT, 1992); P. Flint and E. Ulrich, Qumran Cave 1. II: The Isaiah Scrolls (DJD 32; Oxford: Clarendon, 2010);

D. G. Firth and H. G. M. Williamson, eds., Interpreting Isaiah: Issues and Approaches (Downers Grove, IL: IVP Academic, 2009); K. Jeppesen, "From 'You, My Servant' to 'The Hand of the Lord Is with My Servants,'" SJOT (1990) 113-29; E. Y. Kutscher, The Language and Linguistic Background of the Isaiah Scroll (1QIsa^a) (STDJ 6; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1974); C. M. Maier, Daughter Zion, Mother Zion: Gender, Space, and the Sacred in Ancient Israel (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2008); R. Rendtorff, Canon and Theology: Overtures to an Old Testament Theology, (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1994); U. Simon, "Ibn Ezra between Medievalism and Modernism: The Case of Isaiah xl-lxvi," in Congress Volume: Salamanca 1983, ed. J. Emerton (VTSup 36; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1985) 257-71; P. A. Smith, Rhetoric and Redaction in Trito-Isaiah: The Structure, Growth and Authorship of Isaiah 56-66 (VTSup 62; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1995); O. H. Steck, Studien zu Tritojesaja (BZAW 203; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1991); J. Stromberg, An Introduction to the Study of Isaiah (London: T & T Clark, 2011); idem, Isaiah After Exile: The Author of Third Isaiah as Reader and Redactor of the Book (OTM; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2011); M. A. Sweeney, "Textual Citations in Isaiah 24-27: Toward an Understanding of the Redactional Function of Chapters 24-27 in the Book of Isaiah," JBL 107 (1988) 39-52; idem, Isaiah 1-39: With an Introduction to Prophetic Literature (FOTL 16; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1996); C. C. Torrey, The Second Isaiah: A New Interpretation (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1928); R. L. Troxel, LXX-Isaiah as Translation and Interpretation: The Strategies of the Translator of the Septuagint of Isaiah (JJSJSup 124; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2008); T. Uhlig, The Theme of Hardening in the Book of Isaiah: An Analysis of Communicative Action (FAT 2/39; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2009); E. Ulrich et al., Qumran Cave 4, X: The Prophets (DJD 15; Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1997); D. W. Van Winkle, "The Relationship of the Nations to Yahweh and to Israel in Isaiah xl-lv," VT 35 (1985) 446-58; J. Vermeylen, Du prophète Isaïe à l'apocalyptique: Isaïe, I-XXXV, miroir d'un demi-millénaire d'expérience religieuse en Israël (2 vols.; EBib; Paris: Gabalda, 1977-1978); J. M. Vincent, Studien zur literarischen Eigenart und zur geistigen Heimat von Jesaja, Kap. 40-55 (BBET 5; Frankfurt: Lang, 1977); H. G. M. Williamson, The Book Called Isaiah: Deutero-Isaiah's Role in Composition and Redaction (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1994); idem, Variations on a Theme:

King, Messiah and Servant in the Book of Isaiah (Carlisle: Paternoster, 1998); idem, "Isaiah and the Holy One of Israel," in Biblical Hebrew, Biblical Texts: Essays in Memory of Michael P. Weitzman, ed. A. Rapoport-Albert and G. Greenberg (JSOTSup 333; London: Sheffield Academic, 2001) 22-38.

H. G. M. Williamson

ISAIAH: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION

Isaiah held a prominent place within ancient Israel, Judaism and Christianity and continues to hold widespread influence in Judaism and Christianity today. This popularity is due in part to the scale and scope of Isaiah's vision. Isaiah is the only major prophet to mirror the Book of the *Twelve by addressing preexilic, exilic and postexilic concerns (see Israelite History). Isaiah's importance for early Christians cannot be overstated, as evidenced not only by the numerous NT quotations and allusions to the prophetic book, but also demonstrated by the fact that several NT books possess an Isaianic narrative or rhetorical structure. The Gospel of Mark opens with a conflated reference from Exodus 23:20; Isaiah 40:3; Malachi 3:1 and then attributes the entire quotation solely to Isaiah, demonstrating the prominent role that Isaiah played in the author's mind. Isaiah was held in high regard in early Christianity because Jews in this period similarly valued the prophetic book. Ben Sira describes Isaiah as "great and trustworthy in his visions" (Sir 48:22) and as having "revealed what was to occur to the end of time, and the hidden things before they happened" (Sir 48:25). The interpretation of Isaiah became a key point of debate between Jews and Christians, and christological and ecclesiological interpretations of Isaiah became a means to distinguish the claims of Christianity over and against forms of Judaism. Early Christians read Isaiah as a "fifth Gospel" (Sawyer 1996), and it is this view that dominated Christian reception of Isaiah. In the twentieth and twenty-first centuries Isaiah has been influential for Zionism, global peace and ecological movements, and various apocalyptic visionaries. In biblical scholarship Isaiah has proven to be a flashpoint for theological debate as well as fertile ground to explore new interpretive methods.

1. Second Temple Judaism and Early Christianity
2. Patristic Era
3. Medieval and Reformation Periods
4. Modern Times

1. Second Temple Judaism and Early Christianity.

1.1. Postexilic Canonical Writings. In addition to Isaiah being reinterpreted through its own canonical editorial process (see Isaiah: Book of), writers in the postexilic period interpreted their present and future circumstances in light of Isaiah's prophecy. Although Ezra 1:1 identifies Cyrus's edict as a fulfillment of Jeremiah's prophecy, it appears that the source actually is Isaianic. In Isaiah 41—45 Cyrus is pronounced Yahweh's shepherd and anointed one who will rebuild Jerusalem. The announcement "Yahweh stirred up [hē'ir] the spirit of King Cyrus of Persia" (Ezra 1:1) fulfills Isaiah's prophecy that Yahweh will "stir up" (hē'ir) the Persian conqueror to release Israel and restore it to its homeland (Is 41:2, 25; 45:13). Given Zechariah 1—8's appreciation for the "earlier prophets" (Zech 1:4; 7:7, 12), it is unsurprising that Zechariah draws extensively from Isaiah in addition to other Prophetic Books. M. A. Sweeney has even suggested that the rendering of the prophet's name as "Zechariah ben Berechiah ben Iddo" was a deliberate attempt to equate him with Zechariah ben Jeberechiah, witness to Maher-shalal-hash-baz in Isaiah 8:2. Among the numerous citations of Isaiah 12—14 in Zechariah 1—2, the verse Zechariah 1:11c, "the whole earth remains at peace," contains a deliberate allusion to Isaiah 14:7a, "the whole earth is at rest and quiet," and suggests that Persia's defeat of *Babylon was viewed as a fulfillment of Isaiah's prophecy. Yahweh's commitment to "again comfort Zion and choose Jerusalem" (Zech 1:17) recalls Isaiah 14:1, "Yahweh will have compassion on Jacob and will again choose Israel," and reactivates the promises of "comfort" and "choosing" in Isaiah 40—55. Zechariah 1—8's extensive use of Isaiah 54 in Zechariah 1:12-14; 7:9-14 demonstrates that the author viewed his generation to be the children of the once barren Lady *Zion. The allusions in Daniel 12:1-4 to Isaiah 4:3; 8:16; 26:19; 29:11; 33:2; 52:13; 53:11; 66:24 demonstrate that the angel possesses an authoritative interpretation of Isaiah's prophecy of the eschaton. Daniel 12:2, "Many of those who sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake," echoes Isaiah 26:19, "O dwellers in the dust, awake and sing for joy," and together both passages make the strongest case for bodily resurrection in the OT. Daniel 12:4, "Keep the words secret and seal the scroll," recalls Isaiah 29:11, "The prophecy of all of this has become for you like the words of a sealed scroll," Isaiah 8:16, "Seal the teaching among my disciples," and Isaiah 24:16, "My secret is with me, my secret is with me." These texts demonstrate that the author of Daniel viewed Isaiah as an apocalyptic work. In Daniel 11:33-35 a community described as "wise" (cf. Is 52:13) suffers on behalf of the "many" (cf. Is 52:14-15; 53:11-12), and in Daniel 12:3 the wise "make many righteous" (cf. Is 53:11). It appears that Daniel possesses the first collective interpretation for the *Servant of Yahweh of Isaiah 53.

1.2. Septuagint Isaiah. Since reception involves interpretation, any investigation into the history of interpretation of Isaiah requires attention to matters of translation. The translator(s) of LXX Isaiah is likely situated in Alexandria near the middle of the second century BC. Scholars generally assume that the Vorlage of LXX Isaiah does not differ much from the MT. Such was the view of scholars working before the findings at Qumran, and the discovery of the scrolls has not altered this position. When LXX Isaiah and IQIsa^a do diverge from the MT, they oftentimes mutually do so, and they infrequently share readings in common against the MT (see Text and Textual Criticism). "Free" translations as well as literal renderings of the Hebrew original coexist in LXX Isaiah, and it is important to acknowledge that at points the LXX Isaiah translator was working with a Hebrew text different from the proto-MT. Since modern scholars do not have access to the Hebrew Vorlage of LXX Isaiah, the reconstruction of the Hebrew text and the investigation into the translator's methods ought to be viewed dialectically. What does seem clear is that the author was primarily interested in translating the Hebrew text into readable Koine Greek.

Several instances where LXX Isaiah differs from the MT are due to the translator's inadequate knowledge of the Hebrew text. In Isaiah 7:4 it appears the translator mistook rēšîn for rāšôn ("favor"), so rather than "because of the anger of Rezin," the LXX reads "when my fierce anger comes, I will heal again." In other cases the translator finds the Hebrew text puzzling or objectionable and renders the Greek in a manner suitable to his understanding. In Isaiah 26:15 the translator appears to have understood qāšwê-ʾāreš ("ends of the earth") as qēšînê-ʾāreš ("rulers of the earth") and interpreted the increase of the nation as a divine judgment. So rather than read as in the MT, "You have increased the nation, O LORD, you have increased the nation; you are glorified; you have enlarged all the borders of the land," the LXX reads, "Increase evils on them, O Lord; increase evils on the rulers of the earth."

LXX Isaiah reflects the social, historical and cultural context of Alexandrian Hellenistic Judaism. An example of this influence is found in Isaiah 59:5, where the Greek translator interpreted the "viper" as a "basilik." S. E. Porter and B. W. R. Pearson point out that the notion of a mythical lizard is a later development, and that the term basiliskos is a diminutive of basileus, used to refer to an Egyptian cobra. It appears here the translator used terms appropriate to his own Egyptian cultural milieu. In addition, it seems the LXX Pentateuch and other LXX texts were at his disposal and influenced his thinking and writing. In LXX Isaiah 3:25 the phrase is added "and your most beautiful son, whom you love" before the MT's "Your men shall fall by the sword and your warriors in battle." D. A. Baer suggests that this reference to a singular "your most beautiful [kallistos] son, whom you love [agapas]" is derived from the description of Isaac in LXX Genesis 22:2: "your son, the beloved one, whom you love." Both kallos and agapaō describe Jacob in Psalm 47:5, and in Isaiah 41:8 Yahweh declares that he has "loved" Israel, Jacob and the seed of Abraham. Baer believes that the translator read features of these texts back into Isaiah 3:25 so that this verse represents an "exegetical nationalization," a manner of interpretation in which Hellenistic Jews privileged their destiny over that of Gentiles.

I. L. Seeligmann advanced LXX Isaiah studies by suggesting that the text does not merely reflect the idiosyncrasies of the individual translator, but rather functions as a communal document of "Jewish-Alexandrian Theology." He believes that the paraphrastic elements of the text reflect "the translator's notion that the period in which he lived was to be time for the fulfilment of ancient prophecies, and of his efforts to contemporize the old biblical text and revive it by inspiring it with the religious conceptions of a new age" (Seeligmann, 128). Seeligmann believes that the translator was a theologian who regarded the Diaspora in Egypt, a community to which he belonged, as the rightful recipients of Isaiah's promised *salvation. Accordingly, the scholar's task is to determine the theological motivations behind the differences between the MT and LXX Isaiah. He then postulates that some of the variance between texts was the result of the translator's own actualizing interpretations of the Hebrew. The MT of Isaiah 11:16 prophesies of an eschatological highway from Assyria for the remnant of God's people, yet in LXX Isaiah the passage for the remnant instead originates in Egypt. In another eschatological highway text, Isaiah 19:25, Yahweh pronounces in the MT, "Blessed be Egypt my people and Assyria the work of my hands, and Israel my inheritance." In LXX Isaiah, however, the blessing falls solely on the Jewish remnant in Egypt and reads, "Blessed be my people that are in Egypt and among the Assyrians, even Israel my heritage."

A. van der Kooij develops Seeligmann's thesis even further by reading LXX Isaiah as a coherent work. He employs what he identifies as a contextual approach whereby he analyzes the differences between the MT and the LXX not merely at the word level, but also at the scope of whole pericopes or chapters. In doing so, the contextual approach investigates whether the Greek text is coherent. For van der Kooij, LXX Isaiah represents a distinct genre in which the prophecy of Isaiah is understood to be fulfilled in the time of the translator. He observes that the Hebrew word for sōpēr in LXX Isaiah 33:18 is translated as hoi grammatikoi, the only instance of this term in the LXX. He believes that the translator viewed himself as among these scribes who understood themselves to be interpreters of prophecy in the manner of Daniel 11–12, the Teacher of Righteousness in 1QpHab, and Isaiah in Sirach 48:24–25. When van der Kooij analyzes Isaiah 23 according to his contextual method, he finds that the Greek text differs from the MT and forms a meaningful and coherent text syntactically, stylistically and semantically. Whereas the MT speaks about the destruction of Tyre, LXX Isaiah describes the destruction of Carthage with serious consequences to Tyre. Van der Kooij believes that the vision was written by a member of the high priestly family of the Oniads in response to the destruction of Carthage by the Romans in 146 BC, the Parthian invasion of Babylon, and Tyre's involvement in the Hellenization of Jerusalem. He classifies LXX Isaiah 23 as an eschatological oracle containing vaticinium ex eventu prophecies meant to help people overcome national crises.

Baer characterizes the translator of LXX as a preacher whose purpose is to produce a contemporizing exposition with minimal violence to the details of the Hebrew text. The translator consistently changes third-person verbal forms into first- and second-person forms and imperatives that better suit his homiletical aims. His interpretive practices develop into the forms seen in the Targumim, midrashim and the Talmud. Baer describes the translator as a biblical theologian of sorts who ameliorates anthropomorphic and anthropopathic descriptions of God and other texts that would trouble Jewish sensibilities. He also observes a nationalistic bias that privileges Jews over Gentiles in a manner that is absent in the Hebrew text. Whereas the MT of Third Isaiah (Is 56–66) describes an intra-Jewish communal debate, the Greek text focuses on the relationship between Jews and Gentiles. In LXX Isaiah 66:14 the translator glosses ʿābādīm not with the more typical douloi or paidēs, but instead with sebomenoi, a word used nowhere else in LXX Isaiah for ʿebed and that functioned as a semitechnical term for Gentile God-fearers in the Greco-Roman era. By doing so, LXX Isaiah affords Gentile worshipers second-class status in the eschatological Jerusalem. In addition, LXX appears to minimize judgments against Israel found in the MT. Baer observes that in LXX Isaiah 3:17 the violence of judgment against the daughters of Zion is softened, and in Isaiah 10:22 exile is foreshortened. In Isaiah 6:12 the Greek adds the phrase "after these things" and translates "abandonment" in the MT with "those who have been left." So whereas the MT describes Israel experiencing the judgment of exile, "until the LORD sends people far away, and abandonment increases in the midst of the land," LXX Isaiah describes a postexilic situation where "after these things [the desolation of exile], God will send people [oppressors] far away, and those who have been left will be multiplied in the land.”

R. L. Troxel does not believe that the LXX Isaiah translator viewed himself among the grammatikoi (Is 33:18) and is skeptical of attempts to describe a method or theology in his work. Troxel’s translator is situated among the literati of the Jewish Hellenistic world and influenced by the likes of the LXX Pentateuch translators, as well as Aristarchus and the other scribes in the Alexandrian Museum. His translator possesses no exegetical method or actualizing tendency, but rather works in an ad hoc fashion to produce a translation intelligible for his audience. R. F. de Sousa similarly doubts the existence of a consistent and systematic “theology of the LXX” in his analysis of purported eschatological and messianic texts in LXX Isaiah 1-12. Since LXX studies are a developing discipline, it appears that continued work is required to determine the extent to which the LXX Isaiah translator intentionally interpreted the Hebrew text for his theological purposes.

1.3. Qumran. Clearly, Isaiah held a special place within the Qumran community (see Dead Sea Scrolls). Its twenty-one copies make it the third most copied book, behind Psalms and Deuteronomy, and its six pesherim are the most numerous of the commentaries. Within the sectarian writings, Jeremiah is cited four times, Ezekiel four times, but Isaiah is cited at least twenty-three times. Interestingly, no commentaries of Jeremiah or Ezekiel have been found, and whereas rewritten forms of these two major prophets were found at Qumran, such is not the case for Isaiah and the Twelve. These findings indicate a close relationship between Isaiah and the Twelve and also suggest that Isaiah gained authoritative status at an earlier stage than did other books, given its stable text tradition. Based upon paleography, the biblical and pesherim texts have been dated from about 100 BC to the middle of the first century AD.

Working with a three-line gap between chapter 33 and chapter 34 in 1QIsa^a and orthographic peculiarities to each half, W. H. Brownlee was the first to suggest that Isaiah ought to be bisected into two scrolls, the first composed of chapters 1-33, the second of chapters 34-66. He then proposed that this division reflected an ancient understanding of the literary structure of the book, and that each half was comprised of seven parallel sections written by two different scribes. C. A. Evans would go on to further develop Brownlee’s thesis. G. J. Brooke observes that several copies of Isaiah from Cave 4 contain only portions from chapters 1-33, while several other texts contain portions only from chapters 34-66. These findings call into question the traditional critical divisions of First Isaiah (Is 1—39), Second Isaiah (Is 40—55), Third Isaiah (Is 56—66).

Brooke classifies the interpretation of Isaiah at Qumran under the following types: legal uses, eschatological uses, poetic uses and exhortatory uses. Although legal texts such as the Temple Scroll make little use of prophetic texts, in certain cases they employ prophetic writings as a basis for their legal presentation or as support for a particular position. Regarding eschatological uses, the authors of the scrolls believed that the prophets had spoken predictively about them and their contemporary situation. They believed that eschatological blessings and curses were currently being fulfilled in their community and to their contemporaries as demonstrated in their exegesis. The Qumran writers incorporated words from Isaiah into their poetic or liturgical texts, and in doing so they formed new anthological compositions. In homiletical texts the authors employed passages from Isaiah to encourage particular patterns of behavior or understanding in the audience.

“Peshar” has been defined as “a form of biblical interpretation peculiar to Qumran, in which biblical poetic/prophetic texts are applied to postbiblical historical/eschatological settings through various literary techniques in order to substantiate a theological conviction pertaining to divine reward and punishment” (Berrin, 110). The Qumran authors believed that their inspired interpretation or prophecy came about through the agency of the Holy Spirit (1QS VIII, 13-16), but they did not articulate a theory of inspiration. They assumed that God dictated a hidden message to the original prophet that was to be revealed in the eschaton. The author of the Habakkuk pesher describes this process: “God told Habbakuk to write down what would happen to the final generation, but did not make known to him the consummation of the end time” (1QpHab VII, 1-2). Following the citation of Isaiah 5:9-10, the pesher reads, “The eschatological interpretation of the text concerns the punishment of the land by means of sword and famine. This will happen at the time when punishment is visited on the land" (4Q162 II, 1-2). The citation formula "the eschatological interpretation of the text" is unique to Isaiah pesherim and occurs frequently. J. Blenkinsopp observes that the "visitation of the land/earth" is synonymous with the final judgment, and in the Damascus Document the final judgment is prefigured in the Babylonian exile as "the first visitation." Taken together, "exile and end time are the two poles around which the thinking of the Qumran sectarians revolves" (Blenkinsopp, 110).

Given the Qumranians' propensity for Isaianic titles and their adoption of exile and eschatology as conceptual foci for the community, it is unsurprising that Isaiah 40:3 functioned as a core text in the Rule of the Community, and "the way" functioned as a semitechnical term for their religious life. The members viewed themselves as "the elect of the way" (IQS IX, 17-18) and "the perfect of the way" (IQS VIII, 10, 18, 21; IX, 5) and saw recidivists as those "who deviate from the way" (CD-A I, 13; II, 6). The Rule of the Community quotes Isaiah 40:3, "Prepare in the wilderness the way of the LORD, make straight in the desert a highway for our God," as the justification to separate from "sinful men" and migrate to the wilderness. In addition, it defines the "way" as "This is the study of the law which he commanded by the hand of Moses, that they may do according to all that has been revealed from age to age, and as the prophets have revealed by his Holy Spirit" (IQS VIII, 15-16). It goes on to state that they are to continue on this "way" in the wilderness "according to the determination of the appointed time" (IQS IX, 18) when the Righteous Teacher reveals all the mysteries of the prophets. Since the community underwent a process of reform during which it became less hierarchical and more egalitarian, Brooke believes that Isaiah 40 initially functioned metaphorically for the study of the *law with the imminent eschatological expectation of Yahweh's advent. At a subsequent stage the exhortation to "prepare a way in the wilderness" began to carry a literal force, and a later generation interpreted the passage as a command to move into the Judean wilderness.

1.4. New Testament. With some six hundred instances of quotations, paraphrases, allusions or echoes, Isaiah is the single most referenced work in the NT (see Prophets in the New Testament). It appears that Jesus' own use of Isaiah in his preaching and teaching led to its prominence in early Christianity. Certainly all depictions of Jesus' teaching are mediated through the evangelists, yet it is noteworthy that within the Synoptic Gospels Jesus quotes or alludes to Isaiah on twenty occasions. In addition, the Gospel writers associate significant aspects of Jesus' life and ministry as a fulfillment of Isaiah's prophecy: his birth, baptism, healing miracles, parables, passion, resurrection, prayer, preaching, mission, salvation and forgiveness. Because of these correspondences, it appears that Jesus himself understood his vocation and ministry in terms of Isaiah. C. A. Evans observes that one of the principal texts that summarizes Jesus' gospel preaching of repentance, Mark 1:14-15, possesses a striking resemblance to the Aramaic version of Isaiah 52:7. Aramaic Isaiah 52:7 reads, "proclaiming good tidings . . . 'The kingdom of your God is revealed,'" and Mark 1:14-15 says, "proclaiming the good tidings . . . 'The kingdom of God is at hand!'" The theme of gospel and the lexeme bsr play a prominent role in Isaiah 40—55, occurring five times (Is 40:9; 41:27; 52:7; 60:6; 61:1). Although it is debated, Jesus' identification with the "suffering servant" of Isaiah apparently originated with him rather than the apostles. Mark's record of Jesus' statements regarding his own suffering and death on behalf of many (Mk 9:12; 10:45; 14:24) fits linguistically and conceptually with the description of the servant in Isaiah 50:6; 53:3-12.

In a manner similar to the Qumran community, early Christians appealed to Isaiah 40:3 as indication that they were preparing the way in the wilderness for the eschatological return of Yahweh to Zion. For Mark, the gospel of Jesus Christ is thoroughly Isaianic, as is evidenced in his introduction: "The beginning of the good news of Jesus Christ, the Son of God. As it is written in the prophet Isaiah" (Mk 1:1-2a). Isaiah's concept of the way of the Lord/new exodus has been deemed the locus classicus (Marcus) or the Weltanschauung (Watts) for Mark, and the hermeneutical lens (Pao) or framing discourse (Litwak) for Luke. As such, it is an ideologically shaped schema of Israel's history that functions as a hermeneutical organizing principle for the gospel as well as a controlling paradigm for the lives of early Christians. The quotation of Isaiah 40:3 by Mark functions in an iconic manner and suggests that the inauguration of Israel's eschatological comfort began with the appearance of John the Baptist and Jesus in the wilderness. Included in this prophetic expectation are Israel's deliverance from the oppression of foreigners and the exiles' subsequent return to Jerusalem. According to Mark, Jesus' journey to Jerusalem fulfills, at least in part, Isaiah's eschatological expectations of the way of the Lord. Jesus' travel to Jerusalem along the "way" in Mark is no ordinary journey. In Mark 10:32-34 a technical term for festal ascents to the holy city, anabainō, is used to describe Jesus' "going up" on the "way" to Jerusalem, where he will suffer and be killed. Jesus' miraculous healings of the blind, deaf and lame are not unrelated miracles, but rather are characteristic of the eschatological way announced by Isaiah (Is 35:1-7; 42:10-16). In particular, Jesus' healing of a lame man through the pronouncement of forgiveness of sin (Mark 2:1-12) corresponds not only to the pivotal declaration of forgiveness in Isaiah 40:2, but also to Isaiah 33:23-24, the only text in the OT where lameness and forgiveness of sin are explicitly connected.

Prominent themes in Isaiah 40—55 become the organizing principles for both volumes of the Lukan writings, so the quotation of Isaiah 40:3-5 in Luke 3:4-6 not only introduces the Gospel of Luke but also serves to unify Luke and Acts as a continuous work. Luke's use of "the consolation of Israel" (Lk 2:25) testifies to the comfort that initiates Isaiah's salvation program (Is 40:1). In addition to Luke 3:4-6, the texts of Luke 1:17; 2:30; Acts 13:23-26; 28:28 share allusions to Isaiah 40:3-5. In a manner similar to Mark, Jesus' way in Luke 9:52; 10:1, which refer to the journey to Jerusalem, have in view the eschatological return of Yahweh to Zion announced in Isaiah. D. W. Pao observes that the "way" terminology in Acts is rooted in Isaiah 40:3-5 and functions in polemical contexts to distinguish the identity of the true people of God. For the early Christians, the "way" is a means to define themselves in distinction to the dominant culture in a manner similar to the Qumran community. In Acts 9:2 the term functions to identify those who separate themselves from the synagogue. In Acts 22:3-21 the "way" serves to distinguish Paul as the legiti-mate heir of the ancestral traditions as opposed to those who do not belong to this "way." In Acts 13:10 a person who opposes Christians is someone who makes "crooked the straight paths of the Lord," an obvious allusion to Isaiah 40:3. Luke's quotation of Isaiah 61:1-2, the announcement of a new age of salvation that includes the Gentiles, is supported by the overall narrative of Luke 4:16-30. In this passage the identity of the people of God is a major concern, as well as in Acts 10:35-38, which again evokes Isaiah 61:1. Later, in Luke 24:44-49, the Isaianic program introduced in Luke 4:16-30 is advanced a step further with the introduction of the theme of the inclusion of Gentiles. Pao sees Isaiah 32:15; 49:6, texts signifying the coming of the Spirit in the new exodus, as the backdrop for Acts 1:8. The conversion of the Ethiopian eunuch in Acts 8:26-40 corresponds to the inclusion of the outcasts in Isaiah 56:3-5 and is another fulfillment of the new exodus. Acts 13:46-47 inserts the quotation of Isaiah 49:6 strategically within the narrative to highlight the connection between the themes of rejection by the Jews and offer of salvation to the Gentiles. Acts 28:26-28 contains an explicit quotation of Isaiah 6:9-10 as well as an echo of Isaiah 40:5, "salvation of our God." Taken together, the two Isaianic references in Acts 28:26-28 highlight the inclusive and exclusive nature of the church. The citation of Isaiah 6:9-10 signifies that only the remnant will participate in Yahweh's announcement of salvation, and the reference to Isaiah 40:5 recalls the universal scope of salvation that includes Gentiles.

With fifteen citations and some twelve allusions to Isaiah, the book of Romans, particularly Romans 9—11, demonstrates Paul's sustained interest in the book of Isaiah. Given these numerous references, it appears that Paul, like Mark and Luke, interpreted large sections of Isaiah, along with other books such as Deuteronomy, as proclaiming Yahweh's eschatological redemption of the world begun through Israel. Both J. R. Wagner and R. B. Hays believe that the cumulative effect of his references to Isaiah in Romans demonstrates that in Isaiah 40—55 Paul sees a prefiguration of his own apostolic mission to the Gentiles as well as the rejection of the gospel by the Jews. Whereas in its original context Isaiah 65:1-2 refers to Yahweh's relentless pursuit of a faithless Israel, Paul reinterprets this passage as a prophecy of both Gentile salvation and Israel's obduracy. In Romans 10:20 Paul inserts the phrase "And Isaiah dares to say" prior to quoting Isaiah 65:1a, "I have been found by those who did not seek me; I have shown myself to those who did not ask for me," as a means of redirecting the original prophecy to now speak of Gentile salvation. In Romans 10:21 he prefaces his citation of Isaiah 65:2a, "All day long I have held out my hands to a disobedient and contrary people," with "But to Israel he says" in order to sharply distinguish this text as speaking solely of Jews. It appears that his self-understanding as the herald of Isaiah's gospel (Rom 10:15; cf. Is 52:7) and his missionary theology provided the hermeneutical justification for Paul to interpret Isaiah in this fashion. In a similar manner, it appears the redemptive drama of Isaiah 40—66 serves as the figural representation of the portrayal of Christ in 2 Corinthians 5:14-21 and Paul's apostolic ministry in 2 Corinthians 6:1-10. Commentators have observed that "servants" function as the main theme of Isaiah 54—66, initiated through the work of the servant in Isaiah 53, who through his suffering produces many offspring (Is 53:10) and makes many righteous (Is 53:11). M. Gignilliat believes that Paul's quotation of Isaiah 49:8 in 2 Corinthians 6:2, "At an acceptable time I have listened to you, and on a day of salvation I have helped you," serves as the hermeneutical key that initiates the redemptive drama of Isaiah 40—66. Viewed in this manner, Christ's reconciling work described in 2 Corinthians 5:14-21 ought to be understood through the poetry of Isaiah 53, and the new creation in 2 Corinthians 5:17 as alluding to the "new things" of Isaiah 43:18-19. Paul's claim in 2 Corinthians 6:4 to be among the "servants of God" demonstrates his self-understanding as a servant of the servant in the pattern of Isaiah 53—66.

2. Patristic Era.

From the earliest days of Christianity, Isaiah was perceived as the "fifth Gospel" (Sawyer 1996). Augustine recalls the occasion when he asked his spiritual mentor what he should read. Bishop Ambrose told him "to read the prophet Isaiah, I think because more clearly than others he foretold the gospel and the calling of the Gentiles" (Conf. 9.5.13). The church fathers viewed Isaiah alongside the four evangelists in proclaiming the good news of Jesus to the world. This view is articulated by Jerome, who believed that Isaiah contained all the sacred mysteries of Jesus. Jerome wrote, "I will propose that Isaiah is not only a prophet but also an evangelist and an apostle. Isaiah spoke about both himself and the other evangelists in this way" (Comm. Isa., prologue 18-24). So extensively did the passages from Isaiah prefigure the events of Jesus' life that an early medieval writer, Isidore of Seville, recounted the entire Gospel narrative through the words of Isaiah.

For the early patristic authors such as Justin Martyr and Clement of Rome, the OT had yet to surface as a theological problem and was viewed as the received sacred Scriptures of the church. These fathers stand in close proximity to the NT authors, so when Clement refers to "scripture" or "it is written," he cites OT texts far more often than the words of Jesus. The fathers recognized that these books were not merely documents from the past, but rather living testimonies that continued to speak about events in their day. Since the NT authors cited Isaiah so frequently, the fathers followed suit and similarly adopted it as the most beloved, esteemed and quoted prophet. Initially, Isaiah as a "fifth Gospel" antedated the other four, but as the Gospels, Pauline Epistles and other apostolic writers were elevated to a canonical status, Isaiah and the other OT books were relocated from their status as shared Scripture with Jews to their distinct role as Christian Scripture. In this new context the unity of the Bible became an article of faith, and patristic exegesis reflects this new doctrinal commitment. Two principles generally governed their interpretation. First, they believed that the Bible was a single, integrated book, and that the best approach was to interpret one passage in light of another. The NT and the full revelation of God in Jesus Christ served as the lens to interpret the OT. Second, OT texts contained two basic levels of meaning: a literal or historical meaning, and a deeper spiritual meaning.

Nevertheless, patristic authors believed the literal sense to be as much a part of Scripture as the spiritual sense. Yet because the church fathers often were engaged in anti-Jewish polemic, oftentimes the literal sense became associated with the unbelief of the Jews, and the spiritual sense distinguished Christian faith. A primary concern for early Christians was to demonstrate that they were the heirs of the OT, and spiritual exegesis became a means of doing so. One of the reasons why Isaiah was so popular for early Christians was its popularity within ancient Judaism. The exegesis of Isaiah proved to be a key point of debate between the early Christians and their Jewish contemporaries. Justin cites Isaiah more than any other biblical text, including Psalms and the Gospels, in his Dialogue with Trypho. He goes on to interpret Isaiah's harsh judgments against ancient Israel as denunciations against the Jews of his day for rejecting Christ. Ultimately, what distinguished early Christian exegesis from Jewish exegesis was not a particular hermeneutical method but rather a particular hermeneutical event. Early Christians interpreted Isaiah as fulfilled in the life of Jesus and the ministry of the church, whereas Jews understood the prophecy to refer to the reestablishment of a Jewish kingdom in the land of Israel. Varying interpretations of Isaiah 23 demonstrate this difference. Van der Kooij observes that patristic exegetes interpreted Isaiah 23 as fulfilled in two eras: the first (Is 23:1-14) in the sixth century BC, and the second, particularly Isaiah 23:18, in the Christian era. LXX Isaiah, however, interprets Isaiah 23:1-14 as being fulfilled in the time of the translator, and Isaiah 23:15-18 as yet to be fulfilled.

Isaiah as Christian Scripture was read by the church fathers in Greek, Jerome being the sole exception. By the time Jerome attempted to recover the Hebrew text, the church had been reading LXX Isaiah for almost four hundred years and possessed little to no knowledge of the Hebrew language, the Hebrew text of Isaiah, or any of the exegetical traditions based on the Hebrew text. Origen and Jerome were aware that the Hebrew text for Isaiah 7:14 contained the word 'almâ ("young woman"), whereas the Greek text uses parthenos ("virgin"). Origen writes, "If a Jew should ingeniously explain it away by saying that it is not written, 'Behold, a virgin,' but 'behold, a young woman,' we should reply to him that the word 'almah . . . also occurs, so they say, in Deuteronomy applied to a virgin" (Cels. 132.168-172). Apparently, Origen was completely dependent on hearsay in this case, since the passage that he quotes from, Deuteronomy 22:23-26, lacks the word 'almâ. Jerome does not appeal to Ori-gen's faulty argument but rather cites an instance in Genesis 24:43 where 'almâ refers to Rebecca and demonstrates that the text speaks of a virgin. Cyril, who was aware of Jerome's writings, completely ignores his discussion of the Hebrew and simply assumes the Greek text to be authoritative. Theodoret rejects the Greek translations by Aquila, Theodotion and Symmachus in favor of LXX Isaiah because the former translate the term as "young woman" rather than "virgin." In doing so, he privileges the authority of LXX Isaiah on the basis that its testimony of seventy is greater than that of three. Theodoret argues that since LXX Isaiah was translated prior to the incarnation, it is more reliable than the translation of the three, who possessed both the means to falsify the text, since they lived after Jesus, and the motivation to do so, since they were Jews.

J. D. Cassel demonstrates that patristic interpreters employed the methods of their classical education in their exegesis of biblical texts. The Greco-Roman education system was a three-tiered system that involved learning basic reading skills in Greek and Latin, grammatical skills necessary to understand the meaning of texts and their ethical implications, and the techniques of textual criticism to properly read corrupted texts. Cassel finds that it was the second stage of this education that influenced patristic authors most, since its textbooks took the form of commentaries that proceeded seriatim through the text, word by word and line by line. Origen, who possessed a strong classical education, was among the first Christians to employ these principles in the study of the Bible. His examination of Scripture in the classical commentary form was adopted by other exegetes and became among the most popular forms of early Christian scholarship, as is evidenced by the commentaries on Isaiah by John Chrysostom, Origen (although no longer extant), Eusebius of Caesarea, Jerome, Cyril of Alexandria and Theodoret of Cyrus. Cyril, in his commentary on Isaiah, clarifies tropes, historical aspects of the text, etymologies and analogies, and he reflects the classical grammarian's belief that the proper interpretation of texts required the understanding of the references to history, geography, agriculture, philosophy and science. Nevertheless, C. Kannengiesser observes that their education did not adequately prepare them to engage in literal exegesis. Instances of fanciful etymology and numerology occur in their writings, as well as geographical and historical errors. Since patristic interpretation involved not only the literal sense but also the spiritual, exegesis involved a process of moving from the gramma and historia to the dianoia.

What may be perceived by modern interpreters as idiosyncratic exegesis must be understood within the shared beliefs and practices of the church. For patristic exegetes, Jesus was the Alpha and the Omega, the first and the last, so he brought about the unity of Scripture and served as the key to proper interpretation. Since John 12:41 states that Isaiah “saw his [Christ’s] glory and spoke about him,” Cyril interprets Isaiah 6:1-13 as a prediction of Christ’s incarnation and ministry and of the destruction of the temple in AD 70. In addition, he interprets the threefold repetition of “holy” as representative of Nicene trinitarian theology, and the coal pressed to Isaiah’s lips as a symbol for Christ and atonement theology. Just as Isaiah 53 was virtually universally understood as a reference to the passion of Christ, the early church interpreted the march from Edom by the bloodied and vengeful warrior in Isaiah 63 as a reference to the ascended Christus victor. The early church also saw in Isaiah validation that the pax Romana represented the triumph of Christianity over Judaism. Even though the MT possesses the same preposition ‘al’ in Isaiah 1:1; 2:1, LXX Isaiah introduces the vision in Isaiah 1:1 as one “against” (kata) Judah and Jerusalem, and the one in Isaiah 2:1 as “concerning” (peri) Judah and Jerusalem. Cyril believes that Isaiah 1 refers solely to the historical Jerusalem and Judea, while Isaiah 2:1-4 speaks of the church. He, along with Eusebius of Caesarea, goes on to interpret the passage as fulfilled in the political stability provided to the church through Roman conquest.

3. Medieval and Reformation Periods.

The creative appropriation of the combined OT and NT canon by Christian interpreters represented the most important event in the history of Christianity for the first five centuries. Interpreters of the Latin and Byzantine Middle Ages would, by and large, continue to use and develop patristic modes of interpretation. Not until the Renaissance and Reformation would hermeneutical models be challenged and new ones proposed. For this reason, the focus here will be on John Calvin, an important figure in the history of interpretation, because he engaged patristic, medieval, Renaissance and Reformation interests in his exegesis.

Medieval exegesis was by no means monolithic, as it drew upon the fathers, who displayed great diversity in regard to hermeneutical method. Calvin chose within the medieval tradition the more literal interpretation represented by Thomas Aquinas and Nicholas of Lyra. For Thomas, the literal meaning is to be gauged by the intentions of the divine author, as well as by the intentions and the stylistic characteristics of the human writer. Nicholas went on to uniquely propose a “double literal sense,” such that for the first time in literature a NT reading of an OT passage was granted the label “literal.” Thus, Calvin inherited an interpretive tradition that saw no conflict between the historical and the theological. He recognized that the Scriptures were written by human authors and therefore employed human methods to ascertain the plain sense of the text.

Although he speaks of the dictation of the Scriptures by the Holy Spirit, Calvin rejects a dictation theory of inspiration and acknowledges that biblical books were composed and edited. In the preface to his commentary on Isaiah Calvin admits his own difficulty understanding the composition of the book. He goes on to suggest a process whereby the prophets wrote down abstracts of their preaching and left them at the temple gates for public viewing. These summaries later were edited by the priesthood into prophetic books. Yet in this whole process, from the oral speech of the prophet to the final form of the book, Calvin never allows for the words of the prophet to be corrupted in any way, even if transmitted by fallible men. He writes, “That these writings have come down to us through the agency of the Priests, whose duty it was to transmit the prophecies to posterity, (though the Priests were often the bitterest enemies of the Prophets), is a remarkable instance of the providence of God” (Commentary on Isaiah, preface). It seems that for Calvin, his belief in Isaianic authorship derives not from critical analysis of Isaiah, but rather according to a larger theological framework. Since sacred Scripture contains the very words of God, it is a unique document, so it is natural to assume that its interpretation would also be unique. In his comments on the word "vision" in Isaiah 1:1 Calvin makes clear that he believes that the contents of all sixty-six chapters of Isaiah are the revealed and inspired words of God to the eighth-century BC prophet and therefore certain in doctrine.

Unlike other Protestant Reformers, such as Luther and Oecolampadius, who focused on the christological fulfillment of Isaiah's prophecies to the virtual exclusion of the original historical context, Calvin's exegesis of Isaiah was predominantly ecclesiocentric rather than christocentric. His main concerns were theological and pastoral. He maintained that the text first refers to the historical return from exile, second to the advent of Christ and the church era, and third to the culmination of history in the eschaton. Viewed in this manner, the literal meaning embraces God's past dealings with Israel, Christ's present work in the church, and God's future kingdom, without collapsing these three into a spiritualized interpretation. In Calvin's interpretation of Isaiah 40:1 we see him drawing an application for Israel as well as for the church. He recognizes that this prophecy was not completely fulfilled in the return from Babylon and ought not to be limited to one single period. The NT's claim that Jesus' ministry fulfilled this prophecy (Mk 1:3; Lk 3:4-6) does not nullify its original application, but rather provides greater clarity to it. He observed that consolation to a persecuted people was what united exilic Israel with the Geneva of his day. Calvin writes, "And this prophecy must be of so much the greater importance to us, because it addresses us in direct terms; for, although it may be a spiritual application on what goes before, so as to be doctrine common to both the Jews and to us, yet, as he leaves the Jews of that age, and addresses posterity down to the end of the world, it appears to belong more especially to us" (Commentary on Isaiah 40:1). What is striking is that for Calvin, the indirect and spiritual application of the passage is for exilic Israel, and the direct and literal application of this text is for the church. Given that the Scriptures were intended to serve as a theological witness to posterity, direct application of OT texts to the church became for Calvin none other than the literal interpretation of a passage from a transhistorical perspective. Passages that condemned the people of Judah were interpreted as admonitions to the church to repent of its sins, and the references to Cyrus the Persian conqueror served as the basis for Calvin to appeal to Edward VI to act politically on behalf of the Protestant church.

4. Modern Times.

Modern interpretation of Isaiah has largely focused on issues of composition and aesthetics, and at times these foci have not simply run parallel to each other but instead have intersected in fresh ways. Even before B. Duhm's influential 1892 commentary, interpreters had suggested that not all of the prophecy was written by Isaiah ben Amoz. The Babylonian Talmud identifies "the assembly of Hezekiah and his colleagues" (b. B. Bat. 14b-15a) as the authors of the book, and Abraham ibn Ezra's remarks, written in the twelfth century AD, may be interpreted as to suggest a belief in non-Isaianic authorship for the last section of the book. It appears that J. C. Döderlein in 1775 was the first to suggest that Isaiah 40-66 was written by an exilic poet who, he believed, was also named "Isaiah ben Amoz." J. G. Eichhorn, in his introduction to the OT (1780-1783) distinguishes between authentic and inauthentic materials and reconstructs the historical person of Isaiah to be distinct from the character of Isaiah portrayed in the narratives. W. Gesenius, in his 1821 commentary, treated Isaiah 40-66 in a separate volume and attributed these texts to a "Pseudo-Isaiah"; by doing so, he initiated a process by which these chapters would be associated with the exilic prophetic individual now called "Deutero-Isaiah."

R. Lowth's study of Hebrew poetry and his 1778 translation of Isaiah with notes made a huge impact in Britain and Germany. His groundbreaking work to set biblical poetry in verse form, his genre distinctions particularly with regard to editorial superscriptions, his subdivisions of chapters into smaller units, critical notes on the text, and focus on the sublime had enormous influence on Isaianic scholarship. J. B. Koppe's notes on Lowth's commentary were highly regarded and were of great use to Gesenius. Lowth's attention to the sublime and his characterization of prophets as poets had a great impact on Herder, who in turn influenced H. Gunkel with his romanticism. Under this influence, H. Ewald attempted to distinguish authentic prophecy as spoken words and inauthentic prophecy as written words. Duhm set forth a summative explanation of the redaction of Isaiah, much in the manner that his contemporary J. Wellhausen did for the Pentateuch. Duhm's rationale for setting Isaiah 56—66 apart from Isaiah 40—55 was based upon his observation that the former was a more corrupt text, full of glosses and additions, less poetically refined, and degenerated into a prosaic nature. In addition, his romanticism and bias against the law influenced his decision to separate out Isaiah 56—66, which contained numerous cultic references. Just as Wellhausen dated the Priestly source to the postexilic period, Duhm designated Isaiah 56—66 as a distinct "Trito-Isaiah" dated to the same period for many of the same reasons. Conservative scholars such as J. A. Alexander in the nineteenth century and E. J. Young in the twentieth century continued to defend Isaianic authorship and read Isaiah as a prophecy of Christ, but their works largely were ignored by critical scholarship.

Form critics continued the nineteenth-century legacy of dividing the book of Isaiah into the smallest units possible. It appears that *form-critical study of Isaiah began with H. Gressman's 1914 work on Isaiah 40—55, in which he identified various prophetic genres, including promises, threats and exhortations, and also nonprophetic genres. J. Begrich advanced form-critical studies by identifying the genre that he named the "priestly salvation oracle." This was an oracular genre spoken in cultic settings by priests as a direct address, and it included the exhortation "Fear not." In North America, form-critical study of Isaiah by and large evolved into rhetorical critical analysis due to the influence of J. Muilenburg. He believed that a literary revolution took place in ancient Israel toward the end of the seventh century BC in which genres of various works were fused together such that precise genre distinctions could no longer be made. The units of analysis no longer were short passages, but rather lengthy poems consisting of several strophes. Muilenburg influenced scholars to regain a sense of the literary dimensions of Isaiah, not for the purposes of determining its Sitz im Leben, but rather analyzing Isaiah as a literary product. His contribution is clearly evident in the works of two influential Isaianic scholars, C. Westermann and R. Melugin.

Toward the end of the twentieth century, scholars began to revisit the issue of unity and probe synchronic and diachronic issues, with particular attention to the final form of the book. P. R. Ackroyd, B. S. Childs and R. E. Clements began to reread Isaiah 1—39 in light of the whole of the prophetic book. Ackroyd observed that Isaiah 36—39 served as bridge between Isaiah 1—35 and Isaiah 40—55, Clements noted how the author of Isaiah 40—55 consciously developed the themes of blindness and deafness in Isaiah 6, and Childs suggested that the mention of "former things" in Isaiah 40—55 was in reference to Isaiah 1—39. H. Williamson, in The Book Called Isaiah, offered the most sustained argument that Isaiah 40—55 never circulated independently of Isaiah 1—39 (see Isaiah: Book of). He argued that an anonymous prophet wrote Isaiah 40—55 to intentionally supplement the prophecies of Isaiah ben Amoz and, in doing so, wrote portions of Isaiah 1—39 and redacted this material. The Formation of Isaiah Study Group formed in 1991 under the assumption that the book of Isaiah achieved its present form due to intentional literary and theological decisions. Some participants, such as M. Sweeney, explored issues of unity on redactional grounds, while others, such as E. Conrad, approached the topic through literary methods. The synchronic and diachronic study of Isaiah informed, and was informed by, similar inquiries into the formation of the Book of the *Twelve. Childs and C. Seitz pressed the theological implications of Isaiah as a canonical text. They assert that texts within Isaiah were dehistoricized and arranged such that the final form of the book itself is a theological statement. In their view, interpretation ought to focus not on recovering a text's original setting but rather on investigating the theological purpose of a text within the prophetic book and the Christian canon (see Canonical Criticism). Investigations into precritical readings of Isaiah have blossomed partly in response to Childs's theological concerns and also because of growing interest in ecclesial interpretations at large.

The growing interest in synchronic and *literary readings, coupled with a growing awareness of the social context of ancient writers and modern interpreters, has influenced various reader-response interpretations of Isaiah. The wide variety of these synchronic approaches can be seen in Conrad's attempt to identify semiotic codes embedded with the text, P. Miscall's reading of Isaiah's poetry as imagistic and polysemous, and K. P. Darr's recovery of feminine themes within the book (see Women and Female Imagery). Concerning this last point, it is striking that even though Daughter Zion is of equal importance with the Servant of Yahweh within Isaiah, focus on the latter has by far dominated biblical inquiry. As more evangelicals have embraced multiauthorship views toward the book, other evangelical scholars, such as J. Oswalt and R. Schultz, have responded by defending traditional views of authorship. In Germany, scholars such as O. Steck have continued to pursue diachronic questions through redactional analysis, dating more and more of the material throughout the book of Isaiah to the Hellenistic period.

See also DEAD SEA SCROLLS; FEMINIST INTERPRETATION; FORM CRITICISM; HERMENEUTICS; ISAAH: BOOK OF; LITERARY APPROACHES; PROPHECY AND ESCHATOLOGY IN CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY; PROPHETS IN THE NEW TESTAMENT; REDACTION/EDITORIAL CRITICISM; SERVANT OF YAHWEH; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. R. Ackroyd, "Isaiah 36-39: Structure and Function," in Von Kanaan bis Kerala: Festschrift für Prof. Mag. Dr. Dr. J. P. M. van der Ploeg O.P. zur Vollendung des siebzigsten Lebensjahres am 4. Juli 1979, ed. W. C. Delsman et al. (AOAT 211; Kevelaer: Butzon & Bercker; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1982) 3-21; J. A. Alexander, The Earlier and Later Prophecies of Isaiah (2 vols.; New York: Wiley & Putnam, 1846-1847); D. A. Baer, When We All Go Home: Translation and Theology in LXX Isaiah 56-66 (JSOTSup 318; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 2001); idem, "It's All About Us! Nationalistic Exegesis in the Greek Isaiah (Chapters 1-12)," in As Those Who Are Taught: The Interpretation of Isaiah from the LXX to the SBL, ed. C. M. McGinnis and P. K. Tull (SBLSymS 27; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2006) 27-47; J. Begrich, Studien zu Deuterofesaja (BWANT 77; Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1938); W. H. Bellinger and W. R. Farmer, eds., Jesus and the Suffering Servant: Isaiah 53 and Christian Origins (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1998); S. Berrin, "Qumran Pesharim," in Biblical Interpretation at Qumran, ed. M. Henze (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2005) 110-33; J. Blenkinsopp, Opening the Sealed Book: Interpre- tations of Isaiah in Late Antiquity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2006); M. J. Boda and M. H. Floyd, eds., Traditions in Transition: Haggai and Zechariah 1-8 in the Trajectory of Hebrew Theology (LHBOTS 475; New York: T & T Clark, 2008); G. J. Brooke, "Isaiah 40:3 and the Wilderness Community," in New Qumran Texts and Studies: Proceedings of the First Meeting of the International Organization for Qumran Studies, Paris, 1992, ed. G. J. Brooke and F. García Martínez (STDJ 15; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1994) 117-32; D. Brown, Vir Trilinguis: A Study in the Biblical Exegesis of Saint Jerome (Kampen: Kok Pharos, 1992); W. H. Brownlee, "The Servant of the Lord in the Qumran Scrolls I," BASOR 132 (1953) 8-15; idem, The Meaning of the Qumran Scrolls for the Bible (New York: Oxford University Press, 1964); C. C. Broyles and C. A. Evans, eds., Writing and Reading the Scroll of Isaiah: Studies of an Interpretive Tradition (2 vols.; VTSup 70; Leiden: Brill, 1997); J. D. Cassell, "Patristic Interpretation of Isaiah," in As Those Who Are Taught: The Interpretation of Isaiah from the LXX to the SBL, ed. C. M. McGinnis and P. K. Tull (SBLSymS 27; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2006) 145-69; J. H. Charlesworth, "Intertextuality: Isaiah 40.3 and the Serek Ha-Yahad," in The Quest for Context and Meaning: Studies in Biblical Intertextuality in Honor of James A. Sanders, eds. C. A. Evans and S. Talmon (BIS 28; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997) 197-224; B. S. Childs, Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); idem, The Struggle to Understand Isaiah as Christian Scripture (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004); R. E. Clements, Old Testament Prophecy: From Oracles to Canon (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1996); J. J. Collins, A Commentary on the Book of Daniel (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); Cyril of Alexandria, Commentary on Isaiah: Chapters 1-14, trans. R. C. Hill (Brookline, MA: Holy Cross Orthodox, 2008); K. P. Darr, Isaiah's Vision and the Family of God (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1994); R. Davidson, "The Imagery of Isaiah 40:6-8 in Tradition and Interpretation," in The Quest for Context and Meaning: Studies in Biblical Intertextuality in Honor of James A. Sanders, eds. C. A. Evans and S. Talmon (BIS 28; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997) 37-55; J. D. Dawson, Christian Figural Reading and the Fashioning of Identity (Berkeley: University of California Press, 2002); H. de Lubac, Medieval Exegesis, I: The Four Senses of Scripture (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998);

- R. F. de Sousa, Eschatology and Messianism in LXX Isaiah 1-12 (LHBOTS 516; New York: T & T Clark, 2010); B. Duhm, Das Buch Jesaia (HKAT 111/1; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1892); M. W. Elliott, ed., Isaiah 40-66 (ACCS 11; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2007); C. A. Evans, "From Gospel to Gospel: The Function of Isaiah in the New Testament," in Writing and Reading the Scroll of Isaiah: Studies of an Interpretive Tradition, ed. C. C. Broyles and C. A. Evans (2 vols.; VTSup 70; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997) 2:651-92; idem, "On the Unity and Parallel Structure of Isaiah," VT 38 (1988) 129-47; A. J. Everson and H. C. P. Kim, eds., The Desert Will Bloom: Poetic Visions in Isaiah (SBLAIL 4; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2009); D. G. Firth and H. G. M. Williamson, eds., Interpreting Isaiah: Issues and Approaches (Downers Grove, IL: IVP Academic, 2009); M. Gignilliat, Paul and Isaiah's Servants: Paul's Theological Reading of Isaiah 40-66 in 2 Corinthians 5.14-6.10 (LNTS 330; London: T & T Clark, 2007); J. Goldingay, Daniel (WBC 30; Waco, TX: Word, 1989); H. Gressman, Die literarische Analyse Deuterjesajas, ZAW 34 (1914) 254-97; P. D. Hanson, The Dawn of Apocalyptic: The Historical and Sociological Roots of Jewish Apocalyptic Eschatology (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); R. B. Hays, The Conversion of the Imagination: Paul as Interpreter of Israel's Scriptures (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2005); R. W. Holder, John Calvin and the Grounding of Interpretation: Calvin's First Commentaries (SHCT 127; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2006); M. J. Hollerich, Eusebius of Caesarea's Commentary on Isaiah: Christian Exegesis in the Age of Constantine (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1999); B. Janowski and P. Stuhlmacher, eds., The Suffering Servant: Isaiah 53 in Jewish and Christian Sources (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004); C. Kannengiesser, Handbook of Patristic Exegesis: The Bible in Ancient Christianity (2 vols.; BAC 1; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2004); Y. Kaufman, The Babylonian Captivity and Deutero-Isaiah (New York: Union of American Hebrew Congregations, 1970); B. H. Lim, The "Way of the Lord" in the Book of Isaiah (LHBOTS 522; London: T & T Clark, 2010); K. D. Litwak, Echoes of Scripture in Luke-Acts: Telling the History of God's People Intertextually (JSNTSup 282; London: T & T Clark, 2005); J. Marcus, The Way of the Lord: Christological Exegesis of the Old Testament in the Gospel of Mark (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1992); S. A. McKinion, ed., Isaiah 1-39 (ACCS 10; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2004); S. Moyise and M. J. J. Menken, eds., Isaiah in the New Testament (NTSI; London: T & T Clark, 2005); J. Muilenburg, "The Book of Isaiah: Chapters 40-66," IB 5:381-773; K. M. O'Connor, "'Speak Tenderly to Jerusalem': Second Isaiah's Reception and Use of Daughter Zion," PSB 20 (1999) 281-94; T. H. Olbricht, "Isaiah at Princeton One Hundred Fifty Years Ago and Now: Joseph Addison Alexander (1809-1860) and J. J. M. Roberts (1939-)," in David and Zion: Biblical Studies in Honor of J. J. M. Roberts, ed. B. F. Batto and K. L. Roberts (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2004) 387-403; J. N. Oswalt, The Book of Isaiah (2 vols.; NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1986-1998); R. R. Ottley, The Book of Isaiah According to the Septuagint (Codex Alexandrinus) (2 vols.; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1904-1906); D. W. Pao, Acts and the Isaianic New Exodus (WUNT 130; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2000); S. E. Porter and B. W. R. Pearson, "Isaiah through Greek Eyes: The Septuagint of Isaiah," in Writing and Reading the Scroll of Isaiah: Studies of an Interpretive Tradition, ed. C. C. Broyles and C. A. Evans (2 vols.; VTSup 70/1-2; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997) 2:531-46; D. L. Puckett, John Calvin's Exegesis of the Old Testament (Louisville: Westminster/John Knox, 1995); J. F. A. Sawyer, "Daughter of Zion and Servant of the Lord in Isaiah: A Comparison," JSOT 44 (1989) 89-107; idem, The Fifth Gospel: Isaiah in the History of Christianity (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996); B. Schramm, The Opponents of Third Isaiah: Reconstructing the Cultic History of the Restoration (JSOTSup 193; Sheffield: JSOT, 1995); R. L. Schultz, "How Many Isaiahs Were There and What Does It Matter? Prophetic Inspiration in Recent Evangelical Scholarship," in Evangelicals and Scripture: Tradition, Authority and Hermeneutics, ed. V. Bacote, L. C. Miguélez and D. L. Okholm (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2004) 150-70; I. L. Seeligmann, The Septuagint Version of Isaiah and Cognate Studies, ed. R. Hanhart and H. Spieckermann (FAT 40; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2004); C. R. Seitz, "Isaiah, Book of (First Isaiah)," ABD 3:472-88; idem, "Isaiah, Book of (Third Isaiah)," ABD 3:501-7; idem, Prophecy and Hermeneutics: Toward a New Introduction to the Prophets (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2007); M. R. Stead, The Intertextuality of Zechariah 1-8 (LHBOTS 506; New York:

T & T Clark, 2009); O. H. Steck, The Prophetic Books and Their Theological Witness (St. Louis: Chalice, 2000); M. A. Sweeney, The Twelve Prophets (2 vols.; Berit Olam; Collegeville, MN: Liturgical, 2000); R. L. Troxel, LXX-Isaiah as Translation and Interpretation: The Strategies of the Translator of the Septuagint and Isaiah (JSJSup 124; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2008); A. van der Kooij, The Oracle of Tyre: The Septuagint of Isaiah XXIII as Version and Vision (VTSup 71; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1998); J. R. Wagner, Heralds of Good News: Isaiah and Paul in Concert in the Letter to the Romans (NovTSup 101; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2002); R. E. Watts, Isaiah's New Exodus and Mark (WUNT 2/88; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1997); P. Wilcox, "Calvin as Commentator on the Prophets," in Calvin and the Bible, ed. D. K. McKim (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2006) 107-30; R. L. Wilken et al., Isaiah: Interpreted by Early Christian and Medieval Commentators (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2007); E. J. Young, The Book of Isaiah (3 vols.; NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1965-1972); J. Ziegler, Untersuchungen zur Septuaginta des Buches Isaías (ATA 12/3; Münster: Ashendorffschen Verlagsbuchhandlung, 1934).

B. H. Lim

ISAIAH SCROLL. See DEAD SEA SCROLLS.

ISRAEL

The word Israel occurs frequently in the writing prophets, as elsewhere in the OT, both alone and in compound constructions. Yet it is used with a variety of distinct and different meanings, depending upon context. These range from designating the historical individual from whom the nation traced its identity, to the nation itself in the different configurations that constituted it at different points of its history, to a particular geographical location, to a future entity that God promised to bring into existence. This article looks first at the semantic range of the word Israel across the prophets (the categories may be compared with the similar list in Scatolini, 6-13), then at what this reveals about the prophetic conception of Israel and how these prophetic ideas find their development and fulfillment in the NT.

1. The Semantic Range of "Israel" in the Prophets
2. The Prophetic Conception of Israel

1. The Semantic Range of "Israel" in the Prophets.

1.1. Israel as the Original Ancestor of the People. To begin with, "Israel" can denote Jacob, the eponymous ancestor of the people. In Isaiah 63:16 the name occurs in parallel with "Abraham," referring to the patriarchs from whom the people came. In Hosea 12:12 it appears as the other name of Jacob, recalling the patriarch's journey from the promised land to a time of exile in Paddan Aram. Not all of the occurrences of the name in parallel with Jacob have to do with the original patriarch: in Isaiah the two names often are combined to denote the present people of God (e.g., Is 42:24) and the future people of God (e.g., Is 27:6). Yet the frequent occurrence of the formulae such as the "children of Israel" (bēnē yiśrā'el) and the "house of Israel" (bēt yiśrā'el) reflects a sense that common ancestry from Jacob/Israel is the glue that binds the people together.

1.2. Israel as the People of God Delivered Out of Egypt. The prophets often recounted the early history of their nation, when Israel came out of Egypt and wandered in the *wilderness. That experience formed a pattern and analogy for later generations, demonstrating the Lord's power (Jer 32:20; Amos 3:1), communicating his love and his presence (Hos 11:10; 12:9), revealing his prophetic word (Hos 12:13) and giving them his law (Mal 4:4). Yet both in the past and in the present, the prophets noted, Israel often had rebelled against that experience of God's grace and in consequence faced severe judgment (Jer 2:5; Ezek 20:8).

1.3. Israel as the Tribal League/Alliance That Predated the Monarchy. References to premonarchic Israel after the wilderness period are sparse in the prophets. However, Jeremiah 7 recalls the false confidence that Israel placed in Shiloh, the home of the ark of the covenant in Samuel's day, and the subsequent exposure of this hope as futile. This forms a rebuke to the people of God in his own day who have a similarly misplaced confidence based on the presence of God in their midst in the temple in Jerusalem. Just as the Lord abandoned Shiloh to destruction, so Jerusalem will share the same fate.

1.4. Israel as a United Monarchy. The theme of Israel as a united community is one to which the prophets refer repeatedly. Although all of the writing prophets lived after the division of the kingdom into two separate parts, Israel and Judah, they often reminded the people that it was not so in the beginning. The two kingdoms are viewed as the constituent parts of one larger reality: they are “the two kingdoms of Israel” (Is 8:14), or the single rebellious “house of Israel and Judah” (Ezek 9:9). The two historical entities are the common realm over which the Lord promised that David’s descendants would reign forever, and whose God he would be forever (Jer 33:17; Mic 5:2). For that reason, the Lord can be referred to as “the God of Israel,” “the King of Israel” or “the Holy One of Israel” (Is 1:4; 44:6; Jer 7:3; Ezek 8:4). These epithets always have Israel in view as a single, united nation (Kratz, 106), even when the surrounding context distinguishes clearly between “Israel” and “Judah” as separate entities (e.g., Jer 51:5). There can only be one Israel in relation to God.

1.5. Israel as the Northern Part of the Kingdom.

As we have noted, the historical reality with which the prophets lived was of a divided Israel, in which the northern part inherited the name “Israel.” The prophets accepted this attribution without dispute, referring to the king of the northern kingdom as the “king of Israel” (Is 7:1; Jer 41:9; Hos 1:1). The formulae “children of Israel” (bēnē yiśrāʾēl) and “house of Israel” (bēt yiśrāʾēl) can also be used somewhat anachronistically to denote the inhabitants of the separate northern kingdom, alongside the designations “children of Judah” and “house of Judah” to denote the inhabitants of the southern kingdom (e.g., Jer 32:30; 31:31). The prophets sometimes also refer to this northern kingdom more distinctively as “Ephraim” (Is 7:2; Hos 5:3; Zech 9:13) or “Joseph” (Ezek 37:16; Amos 5:6), reflecting the identity of the largest of the northern tribes. Yet when Amos was accused of being a foreigner from Judah, meddling in the affairs of the northern kingdom, he justified his right to speak there by the fact that it is “Israel” and therefore the territory of their common Lord (Amos 7:15) (Harvey, 108).

1.6. Israel as the Southern Part of the Kingdom.

Because both north and south were part of the single kingdom of Israel, the unique nation that belonged to the Lord, the southern kingdom of Judah could also be referred to as “Israel.” Isaiah’s message was directed to Judah at a time when the northern kingdom of Israel was a hostile political power (Is 7:1), yet the Lord addressed those Judeans, whose capital city had been left isolated by judgment, as “my people, Israel” (Is 1:3; cf. Is 5:3) (Harvey, 162). Writing after the fall of the northern kingdom, Jeremiah spoke of the Lord’s plan in the future to bring a nation from afar against the house of Israel (Jer 5:15), which in context can only mean Judah (cf. Jer 18). Likewise, Ezekiel’s prophecies speak of “Israel” when it is clear that the southern kingdom is in view (Ezek 2:3; 8:12). In fact, Ezekiel uses “Israel” far more often (185x) than “Judah” (15x), even though his audience was primarily made up of exiled Judeans (Zimmerli 1958, 76-77).

1.7. Israel as Judeans Exiled to Babylon. The community of Judeans who were exiled to Babylon immediately before and after the fall of Jerusalem in 586 BC could also be described as “Israel,” indicating the prophets’ recognition that these were the true heirs of the title “people of God.” This is the group repeatedly addressed as “Jacob/Israel” in Isaiah 40–66, as “the people of Israel” in Jeremiah 16:15 (cf. Jer 46:27) and as “the house of Israel” in Ezekiel 11:15 (cf. Ezek 28:25; 37:11; 43:10). In some cases the exiles represented a broader community of God’s people, including those scattered by the *exile of the northern kingdom in 722 BC (Is 49:6; Jer 31:1-8; Ezek 37:21; Obad 1:20). The continued existence of Israel in the form of this exiled community was a significant fulfillment of God’s promise to maintain a people for himself until the time when the Lord would bring his people home in a new *exodus from many lands (Is 11:12-16; Ezek 11:15-17). A remnant of both northern and southern kingdoms would return and be reunited once again in their homeland (Ezek 37:16-22).

1.8. Israel as the Judeans Who Returned during the Persian Period. Given this confident anticipation of a return from exile, it is not surprising that the title “Israel” was claimed by those who returned to Judah during the Persian period (Ezra 2:2). In the prophets, this identification is clearest in the headings of oracles given to Zechariah and Malachi (“The word of the LORD concerning Israel” [Zech 12:1; Mal 1:1]). In addition, the sin of the postexilic inhabitants of Judah in intermarrying with foreigners is considered to have been done “in Israel” (Mal 2:11), although in this case the language may simply reflect a frozen ancient idiom for any serious crime (see Deut 22:21; Josh 7:15).

1.9. Israel as a Geographical Location. Given how frequently the formula “land of X” (ʿereš X) occurs with other names as a geographical location in the prophets, it is perhaps surprising how rarely it is used to designate Israel as a place. "The land of Egypt" is especially common (e.g., Is 11:16), but "the land of Assyria" and "the land of the Chaldeans [= Babylon]" also occur with some regularity (e.g., Is 27:13; Jer 25:12). Closer at hand, there are references to "the land of Edom" (Is 34:6) and "the land of Moab" (Jer 48:24), as well as individual tribal areas—for example, "the land of Zebulun and the land of Naphtali" (Is 9:1), "the land of Judah" (Is 26:1) and "the land of Benjamin" (Jer 1:1). Yet in the prophets, the phrase "the land of Israel" ('ereš yiśrā'el) occurs only in Ezekiel 27:17; 40:2; 47:18. Of all of the prophets, Ezekiel is the only one to use "Israel" regularly as a geographical term; he normally does so by using the phrase 'admat yiśrā'el ("the soil/land of Israel"), which occurs fifteen times in his writings. He also uses the geographical phrases "mountains of Israel" (hārē yiśrā'el [15x]) and "border of Israel" (gēbūl yiśrā'el [2x]). Apart from Ezekiel, the only use of Israel in the prophets to denote a geographical location is Malachi 1:5, which declares that the Lord's greatness extends beyond the border of Israel (gēbūl yiśrā'el).

1.10. Israel as a Future Eschatological Reality Yet to Be Constituted. The prophets were convinced that the past and present realities did not exhaust God's purposes for his people. For that reason, "Israel" often appears in the prophets as the designator of a future reality, a renewed and restored people who would be regathered to their former homeland (Ezek 37:21; Zech 9:1) (Zimmerli 1983, 563). This new Israel would finally fulfill the Lord's original purposes in calling a people for himself, which was to create a holy nation and a kingdom of priests (Ex 19:6). Although nothing like that had been seen before, during or after the exile, the Lord had promised that in the future there would be such a dramatic transformation in the people's hearts and lives that an entirely new "Israel" would appear. It would take its place alongside Egypt and Assyria among God's former enemies who had now become his friends (Is 19:24-25). The fruitfulness of this new Israel would mean blessing for the entire world (Is 27:6), just as God had promised when he first called Abraham (Gen 12:1-3).

2. The Prophetic Conception of Israel.

2.1. The Origins and History of Israel. The prophets certainly are aware of the OT traditions concerning the history of the world before Abraham. The Lord created all things in the beginning (Is 40:12-28), including the first human beings in the garden of Eden, who then rebelled against him (Ezek 28:12-17; Hos 6:7 [?]). Ezekiel uses the foundational images of protohistory (storm, spirit, living creatures, firmament and rainbow) to remind his hearers of an originally good creation that was overwhelmingly destroyed because of human sin but still received hope in the shape of the rainbow of God's compassion in the midst of the storm (Ezek 1). For Ezekiel, this story provided an analogy for Israel's (= Judah's) present condition and hope for their future. Although the nation in its present form was doomed, and even a Noah could not save it (Ezek 14:14), the presence of the rainbow around the throne (Ezek 1:28) pointed to a new beginning that could be appropriated only on the far side of the destructive storm of God's judgment.

In the prophets, however, Israel's story more often begins with God's calling of Abraham. Abraham and Sarah were the physical and spiritual parents of the people of Israel (Is 51:2). The Lord called Abraham and redeemed him out of Babylon (Is 29:22); Israel, as a historic individual (Jacob) and as a nation, is descended from this "friend of God" (Is 41:8). As a result, they cannot be rejected utterly by God, in spite of their long history of sin (Jer 33:26; Mic 7:20). The parallel between God's electing grace shown to Jacob as an individual and his electing grace shown to the nation is the foundational demonstration of God's love for his people (Mal 1:2-7). It is this grace that preserved them through judgment that distinguishes them from their closest neighbor state, Esau/Edom, and all other nations. When the other nations were judged, their fall would be full and final, without hope for the future, but Israel must be preserved.

Israel is constituted as a nation by their descent from this historical individual, as the use of the common terms "children of Israel" and "house of Israel" demonstrate. Yet membership in the community of Israel is not merely a matter of genetic relationship: not all of those who are physically descended from Abraham are truly "Israel." For example, those who remained in the ruins of Judah after its destruction by Nebuchadnezzar might claim ownership of the Abrahamic promise, but by their actions they proved that they were not Abraham's true heirs (Ezek 33:24-29). Being part of Israel is not merely a matter of physical descent from Jacob, any more than it is conveyed simply by bearing the physical sign of circumcision (Jer 4:4) or by living in the city where God promised to dwell (Jer 7). Abraham's children must follow in his faith-filled footsteps if their calling and inheritance is to be a *blessing and not a curse.

Equally paradigmatic for the prophets is Israel's early experience of being delivered through the exodus out of Egypt, followed by a lengthy time of wilderness wandering. This past experience of exodus sometimes forms a paradigm for their future deliverance from exile in other countries (Is 11:16; Jer 16:14-15). At times, the initial community of Israel is depicted as having been pure and wholly devoted to the Lord, before subsequently falling into spiritual decay (Jer 2:3; Hos 9:10), while on other occasions, it is described as having been corrupt and going astray from the very beginning (Jer 32:21, 30; Ezek 20:5-8) (Wong, 214). Either way, there is no doubt in the minds of the prophets that the present Israel cannot stand before God in its own righteousness. They are corrupt and rebellious children (Is 1:2), an adulterous wife who has been unfaithful to her Lord (Hos 1—3). They have broken the Lord's *covenant, as did their fathers before them (Jer 11:2-8).

This heritage of unfaithfulness belongs equally to both northern and southern kingdoms: "Israel" and "Judah" are two twisted sisters from the same family (Jer 3:8; cf. Ezek 16; 23); they are two unfaithful households that have rebelled against their master (Jer 13:11; 32:30; Mic 1:5), and each will face its own fitting punishment of *destruction and exile (Ezek 4:4-6; Zech 1:19). That destruction mirrors the fate of the wilderness generation before them, who were similarly judged and destroyed by God's *wrath (Ezek 20:36). The Lord cannot dwell in the midst of such an unholy people; since they have defiled his chosen dwelling place in Jerusalem, he will abandon it, leaving it at the mercy of their *Babylonian enemies (Ezek 8—11).

2.2. Israel's Future. Yet the destruction of Israel that was first anticipated and then realized in the days of the prophets could not be the end of the story, any more than it could have been when their fathers were similarly judged for their unfaithfulness in the wilderness (Ezek 20:13). Because the Lord had attached his name to Israel when he called them, becoming the "God of Israel," the nation would necessarily have to be restored, lest that holy name be profaned among the nations (Ezek 20:14). Even though Israel (in all of its manifestations) repeatedly broke the covenant, and received the punishment that they deserved for their sins (Jer 11:10; 34:18), nonetheless, the Lord would remain faithful and remember his covenant with them. The promises made at Mount Sinai ultimately had to be fulfilled (Jer 33:20-21; Ezek 16:60). In addition, the Lord is a merciful and gracious God (Exod 34:6-7), who had compassion on his straying people (Is 14:1; Jer 12:15; Hos 11:8-9).

That meant that in the days to come, the Lord would restore the two nations of Israel and Judah into a single, reunited body comprising all of the clans of Israel (Jer 31:1; 33:7; Zech 8:13). This reunited community, made up of those from the former northern and southern kingdoms, would submit to a single king, a new David (Ezek 37:16-22; Hos 3:5). They would then repossess the land that had been promised to Abraham. Yet this hope, which is prominent in Zechariah 9—10, is threatened by the people's rejection of the good shepherd that the Lord provided for them (Zech 11:8). The people would be handed over for a time to worthless shepherds, resulting in a disunity completely reversing the sign act of Ezekiel 37. However, the Lord's final word is one of judgment on the worthless shepherd, which leaves open the hope of a restored reunion (Zech 11:17).

The severing of the tie between people and land caused by the exile provided the stimulus for the extension of the name "Israel" from the people to the land itself in the book of Ezekiel. However, the borders of this restored land of "Israel" would not correspond to the accidents of the historical past: the Transjordanian portion settled by the two and a half tribes before the promised land proper was conquered (Num 32) no longer featured as part of Ezekiel's description. Meanwhile, the tribal areas themselves were rearranged into equal portions aligned along the sacred east-west axis of the temple, rather than returning to the patchwork of tribal areas that belonged to Israel's previous history (Ezek 47). Significantly, the central holy city in Ezekiel's vision, which adjoins (but does not encompass) the area of the temple, is likewise disconnected from past history. It is now renamed "The LORD Is There" rather than "Jerusalem," and it occupies a location significantly to the north of the historical site of Jerusalem.

These substantial transformations show that what is at stake in this revised description of "Israel" is not merely a return to the status quo ante. Instead, the prophet Ezekiel is illustrating in geographical imagery the same kind of theological transformation that he earlier pictured in architectural terms in his description of the new *temple (Ezek 40–42) and in legislative terms in his description of the new *liturgy (Ezek 44–45) (Duguid, 549). The fact that upon their return the exiles did not seek to implement Ezekiel's description of the new Israel, even where that would have been possible, shows that they understood his description of the restored land to have spiritual rather than literal significance.

The most important transformation to take place affecting this new Israel of God would be their spiritual transformation into a new people, whose old rebellious and unresponsive hearts of stone would be transformed into new hearts of flesh through a new covenant (Jer 31:31–33). This new people would be changed by an outpouring of God's *Spirit (Ezek 36:22–28). They would be ashamed of all of their past unfaithfulness (Ezek 16:61; 20:43) and would be acceptable to God, a pleasing aroma before him (Ezek 20:40–41). The people who had been rejected by the Lord because of their sins and sent into captivity in Babylon would be redeemed by the Lord. The Lord would once again address them as "my people," for their hard service would be over and their sins fully paid for (Is 40:1–2). The new Israel would become the Lord's servant, the messenger of his good news. Although they were small and weak, the Lord would use them to be a light for the Gentiles, bringing freedom from bondage and healing to all nations, ultimately even to the ends of the earth (Is 42:6, 10).

This anticipated transformation suggests that the regular and distinctive paralleling of the names "Jacob" and "Israel" in Isaiah 40–

66 is not coincidental but rather connects back to the patriarchal narratives (Kratz, 112). Jacob himself received the new name "Israel" after his life-changing encounter with God at Peniel. It was a representation and testimony to the transformation that God had accomplished in his heart. Yet in addition to his new name, he continued to bear his old name, "Jacob" ("deceiver"), which aptly described his old nature. Jacob/Israel was simul justus et peccator, at the same time justified and a sinner. So too the postexilic Israel that Isaiah addressed would be at the same time renewed by God, restored to a new relationship with him, but also a struggling and weak people who needed continual exhortation to pursue obedience as well as constant encouragement to trust in God's faithful love for them.

In other words, the new Israel depicted in Isaiah 40–48 is not yet the new Israel that can fulfill the terms of the Sinai covenant and thus bring about the blessings promised by that covenant. Another, better Israel is yet required. This explains why even though the *servant in Isaiah 40–48 clearly represents Israel, the servant in Isaiah 49 is distinct from and more than Israel (Goldingay, 124–29). He both is identified with Israel (Is 49:3) and has a ministry to Israel (Is 49:5). This servant is entrusted with a mission like that of Isaiah himself in Isaiah 6, where the prophet's personal experience of *repentance and cleansing formed a paradigm for the people as a whole. Here too in Isaiah 49–66 the servant takes Israel's place, doing what Israel was unable to do and in that way bringing light and *justice not only to Israel itself but also to the nations (Is 49:6). Unlike historical Israel, which repeatedly rebelled against God and suffered for its own disobedience, the prophetic figure of the servant would be obedient, suffering in silence for Israel's sins and looking forward in hope to the day of his final vindication.

2.3. The Israel of the Prophets and the New Testament. This suffering servant "Israel" takes flesh in the NT in the person of Jesus Christ. From the moment of his birth, he began to reenact Israel's history, going down to Egypt with his parents so that he too could be the son whom God called out of Egypt (Mt 2:15, quoting Hos 11:1) (Kynes). As Israel passed through the Red Sea, Jesus passed through the waters of baptism (Mt 3) before being led out into the wilderness (Mt 4). There Jesus faced the same temptations that had exposed Israel's rebellious heart (Ezek 20), yet he resisted each one perfectly. As Jesus began his public ministry, he read aloud Isaiah 61:1-2 and declared that the Scripture had been fulfilled in their presence (Lk 4:18-19): he himself was the Isaianic servant upon whom God's Spirit rested. On the Mount of Transfiguration Jesus met the archetypal prophets, Moses and Elijah, to discuss his exodus (hē exodos autou), which he was to accomplish in Jerusalem (Lk 9:31). As the new Israel, Jesus perfectly fulfilled the demands of the law: indeed he is the goal (telos) for which the law exists (Rom 10:4). The new covenant that Jeremiah anticipated has now been established in his blood (Lk 22:20). Jesus himself is the chosen holy one of God, who fulfills God's original purpose for humanity and submits perfectly to his heavenly Father, thereby personally embodying the new Israel for which the prophets looked.

Since Jesus Christ himself is the new Israel, it follows that all those who are united to him by faith are incorporated into this new community of believers, the Israel of God (Gal 6:16). He is the vine, the classic image for Israel in the prophets (e.g., Is 5), and his followers are incorporated into the new Israel as they become his branches. Because Christ is the living cornerstone of God's house, all those who trust in him and are joined to him thereby become living stones in that house (1 Pet 2:4-5) and can be described in terminology that the OT exclusively used of Israel: believers are "a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people for his possession that you may proclaim the excellencies of him who called out of darkness into his marvelous light. Once you were not a people, but now you are God's people; once you had not received mercy but now you have received mercy" (1 Pet 2:9-10, alluding to Ex 19:6; Is 9:2; 43:20-21; Hos 2:23) (Beale and Carson, 1030-31). In the new covenant that has been established through Christ the promises of a new heart with the law written upon it that were first addressed to "the house of Israel" and "the house of Judah" now become the inheritance of the church (Heb 8).

Thus, being part of this new covenant Israel is not a matter of physical descent from Abraham, but rather of sharing Abraham's repentance and faith (Lk 3:8). As a result, this new people of God includes Jews and Gentiles together on an equal footing (Gal 3:28), as both are grafted into the new olive tree, Christ/Israel (Rom 11:17-24). That does not mean that God has forgotten his promises to those physically descended from Abraham. By no means (Rom 11:1)! But not everyone descended physically from Israel is part of the new Israel that Christ embodies (Rom 9:6). Indeed, this Israel of God has now expanded to encompass the ends of the earth, as Isaiah anticipated. Before Jesus' ascension into heaven, he answered the disciples' question of whether he was going to restore the kingdom to Israel at this time by sending them out as his witnesses in Jerusalem, Judea, Samaria (the former northern kingdom of Israel) and to the ends of the earth (Acts 1:6-8). This is how the restoration of the single kingdom of Israel under a new David, promised in the OT prophets, is accomplished under the new covenant. It comes as the gospel is preached to members of the former northern and southern kingdoms, together with the Gentiles, who are then incorporated into the new people of God, united as one through faith in Christ (Is 2:2-4; 19:25; 49:6; Zech 14:16-20).

In the book of Revelation John heard the full and perfect number of God's people, individually counted and securely sealed as belonging to God, described as a people totaling 144,000 made up of the twelve tribes of Israel (Rev 7:4-8). Yet when he looked and saw, he discovered that the same group has become an innumerable crowd from every nation, tribe, people and language worshiping the Lamb (Rev 7:9-12) (Beale, 418). They are two descriptions of the same single people of God who have been granted access to the heavenly new Jerusalem, the eternal city of God, a city that itself shows us the vision of Ezekiel 40-48 refracted through the lens of fulfillment in Christ (Rev 21-22). Although the enemies of God's people, represented by Gog, will assault God's people in one last battle, they cannot triumph against them, for the Lamb will fight for them and win the final victory (Rev 20:7-10; cf. Ezek 38-39). The Lord's bride, another image repeatedly used in the OT prophets for Israel (e.g., Ezek 16; Hos 1-3), is the church, who has now been beautifully adorned for her husband (Rev 21:2). In spite of her repeated unfaithfulness, she is clothed in pure linen, without spot or defect (Rev 19:8), finally fitted to stand at her husband's side and dwell with him forever. In that day, God's original purpose and plan for Israel—to have a united, holy, devoted people belonging to himself—will finally and fully be fulfilled.

See also ISRAELITE HISTORY; NATIONS; SERVANT OF YAHWEH.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. G. K. Beale, The Book of Revelation: A Commentary on the Greek Text (NIGTC; Grand Rapids, Eerdmans, 1999); G. K. Beale and D. A. Carson, eds., Commentary on the New Testament Use of the Old Testament (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2007); E. Ben Zvi, "Inclusion in and Exclusion from Israel as Conveyed by the Use of the Term 'Israel' in Post-Monarchic Biblical Texts," in The Pitcher Is Broken: Memorial Essays for Gösta W. Ahlström, ed. E. W. Hollaway and L. K. Handy (JSOTSup 190; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1995) 95-149; R. B. Coote, "The Meaning of the Name Israel," HTR 65 (1972) 137-42; G. A. Danell, Studies in the Name Israel in the Old Testament (Uppsala: Appelbergs, 1946); P. R. Davies, In Search of "Ancient Israel" (JSOTSup 148; Sheffield: JSOT, 1992); I. M. Duguid, Ezekiel (NIVAC; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1999); J. Goldingay, God's Prophet, God's Servant: A Study in Jeremiah and Isaiah 40-55 (Carlisle: Paternoster, 1984); G. Harvey, The True Israel: Uses of the Names Jew, Hebrew and Israel in Ancient Jewish and Early Christian Literature (Boston: Brill Academic, 2001); R. G. Kratz, "Israel in the Book of Isaiah," JSOT 31 (2006) 103-28; W. Kynes, A Christology of Solidarity: Jesus as the Representative of His People in Matthew (Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1991); J. R. Linville, Israel in the Book of Kings: The Past as a Project of Social Identity (JSOTSup 272; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1998); L. Rost, Israel bei den Propheten (BWANT 4/19; Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1937); S. S. Scatolini, "On the Elusiveness and Malleability of 'Israel,'" JHScr 6.7 (2006) <http://www.arts.ualberta.ca/JHS/Articles/article_57.pdf>; H. G. M. Williamson, "The Concept of Israel in Transition," in The World of Ancient Israel: Sociological, Anthropological and Political Perspectives; Essays by Members of the Society for Old Testament Study, ed. R. E. Clements (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989) 141-60; K. L. Wong, "Profanation/Sanctification and the Past, Present and Future of Israel in the Book of Ezekiel," JSOT 28 (2003) 210-39; W. Zimmerli, "Israel im Buche Ezechiel," VT 8

(1958) 75-90; idem, Ezekiel 2: A Commentary on the Book of the Prophet Ezekiel, Chapters 25-48, trans. J. D. Martin, ed. P. D. Hanson and L. J. Greenspoon (Hermeneia; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983). I. M. Duguid

ISRAELITE HISTORY

The portion of Israelite history most relevant to the Major and the Minor Prophets (including Daniel) extends from the mid-eighth century BC to the mid-second century BC. In terms of Israel and Judah, the period stretches from the reigns of Jeroboam II of Israel (788-748 BC [all dates for Israel and Judah follow Hayes and Hooker; Egyptian chronology follows Kitchen, ABD 2.322-31]) and Uzziah of Judah (785-760 BC) to the period of Greek (Seleucid) dominance over Jerusalem (c. 165 BC). In terms of wider ancient Near Eastern history, the time span overlaps all the major historical periods in the Iron Age: the Assyrian period (c. 900-609 BC), Babylonian period (c. 605-539 BC), Persian period (c. 539-333 BC) and Hellenistic period (c. 333-64 BC)—a time span often designated in terms of the biblical story of Israel as including the preexilic, exilic and postexilic, or Second Temple, periods. The available prophetic materials cluster around several eras within these periods: 750-700 BC (Amos, Hosea, Is 1—39, Micah, Jonah?), 640-570 BC (Jeremiah, Zephaniah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Ezekiel, Obadiah, Daniel?), 539-450 BC (Is 40—66, Haggai, Zechariah, Jonah? Joel? Malachi) and 190-160 BC (Daniel?). The Prophetic Books have played a significant, though often circular, role in study of these eras, with historical reconstructions being used to interpret the prophetic texts, even as the prophetic texts were used as sources for those historical reconstructions.

1. Preliminary Issues
2. Assyria, Israel and Judah Prior to the Mid-Eighth Century BC
3. The Assyrian Period (750-609 BC)
4. The Babylonian Period (605-539 BC)
5. The Persian Period (539-333 BC)
6. The Hellenistic Period (333-64 BC)

1. Preliminary Issues.

1.1. Sources. The relevant sources for the periods of Israelite history related to the Prophetic Books include biblical texts and extra-biblical data, the latter including epigraphical and archaeological discoveries. The type and availability of these sources, however, vary widely among the different historical periods, and their nature and usefulness are matters of ongoing debate.

1.1.1. Biblical Sources. The relevant biblical sources vary in quantity, type and coverage. The principal historiographical writings (1-2 Kings, 1-2 Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah; see also 1-2 Maccabees) are driven primarily by theological interests, prioritizing the concern to explain why the Israelites and Judeans experienced destruction and exile. For the Assyrian and Babylonian periods, the OT Historical Books contain two overlapping accounts of Israelite and Judean history: 1 Kings 16—2 Kings 25; 2 Chronicles 17—36. The Kings account is generally considered as part of the Deuteronomistic History, a larger historiographical composition. Some evidence suggests that a first edition of this work originated in the latter part of the Assyrian period, perhaps as early as the time of Hezekiah (Campbell, 209; Weinfeld) or Josiah (Cross, 274-89; Nelson), although it is clear that the composition continued to be supplemented in various ways throughout the Babylonian and Persian periods. The Chronicles account postdates that of Kings, originating perhaps in the sixth century BC but more likely stemming from later with even later revision and supplementation. The biblical compositions themselves attribute some of their material to earlier sources such as the Book of the Annals of the Kings of Israel/Judah (see 2 Kings 15:11; 16:19). The existence, nature and contents of these sources remain uncertain; yet such references represent the biblical writers' consciousness of their own selectivity in the material presented. Additionally, at least some of the speeches attributed to certain writing prophets belong to the Assyrian and Babylonian periods (Is 1—55, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Hosea, Amos, Obadiah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah), even if the final forms of their books come from a later era. In the view of most modern historians, the prophets are thought to have addressed the situations of their day, aiming to persuade their audience to certain beliefs and actions (see Kelle 2006); hence, their oracles may supplement the materials in the Historical Books by providing indirect information about Israelite and Judean political workings, as well as a more thorough picture of domestic, social and religious affairs (Miller and Hayes, 244). The books also include narratives that often contain historiographical materials, some of which overlap with materials in 1-2 Kings (e.g., Is 36—39; Jer 39; 52).

For the Persian period, the main historiographical biblical sources appear in the books of 2 Chronicles (esp. 2 Chron 36), Ezra and Nehemiah, which tell the story of the return from exile and the rebuilding of Jerusalem and its temple from the late sixth to mid-fifth centuries BC. Additionally, various references and date formulas associate texts from Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi with situations concerning Jerusalem in the Persian period, and a number of other biblical compositions (e.g., the Pentateuch, certain psalms) underwent final stages of editing and compilation during this era. These texts may reveal information concerning political, social and religious affairs in the sixth and fifth centuries BC, but their range of vision is limited almost entirely to the area of Jerusalem and the time between the mid-500s and mid-400s BC. Moreover, a number of unsettled issues complicate the evaluation of the biblical sources for this era, including uncertainty about when books such as Ezra and Nehemiah were compiled, what sources were used in their compilation, and how reliable were those sources.

For the Hellenistic period, the primary biblical material is limited to the book of Daniel, which is commonly seen as achieving its final form in the mid-second century BC, with its earliest roots perhaps in the sixth century BC. The most relevant texts are the visions in Daniel 7—12, but as is the case with other prophetic books, the potential data provided by these texts remains only indirect, often shrouded in figurative language and apocalyptic symbols. The primary historiographical material appears in the books of 1-2 Maccabees, which the Protestant canon places in the Apocrypha. Together, these distinct works, extant only in Greek and with some overlap between them, present a history of events from the beginnings of Seleucid rule in Judah to the death of the Jewish leader Simon (c. 180-135 BC), concentrating on the principal figures and events of the Maccabean Revolt (167-164 BC). The historical reliability of these compositions remains vexed, however, and scholars avoid generalizations and evaluate each episode on a case-by-case basis (Greenspoon, 342).

1.1.2. Archaeological and Extrabiblical Textual Sources. Archaeological remains from Israel, Judah and elsewhere are important insofar as they provide direct, unmediated evidence. Even so, these sources require interpretation because they often lack specific references to people and events. The nature and use of archaeology has shifted in recent decades from a preoccupation with major urban centers and political events to an increased interest in data related to the everyday life of ordinary people in the ancient world (see Binford). These changes have gone hand in hand with more extensive use of comparative sociological and anthropological models.

For the Assyrian and Babylonian periods, important archaeological data have come from evidence at Israelite and Judean sites such as Samaria, Jezreel, Jerusalem and Lachish. These sites have yielded data pertaining to architecture (city gates, walls, etc.), pottery styles and destruction layers. Similarly, excavations at non-Israelite sites throughout the territories of Assyria and Babylonia (e.g., Nineveh, Ashur, Dur-Sharrukin, Babylon) have yielded insights into the workings of the empires and the daily life of local peoples. Archaeological analysis of the area of Judah and Jerusalem in the Persian period (often designated as Iron Age III) remains particularly complex, as the material record does not clearly distinguish Persian-period Judean society and structures from those that existed in the preceding eras (see Stern 1982). Only a few Judean sites from the first part of the Persian period (c. 539-450 BC, known as the Persian I period) provide significant archaeological data, with most major Persian-period sites dating from the years between 450 and 333 BC (the Persian II period) (Carter, 116-17; Kessler, 131).

Some extrabiblical texts from the areas of ancient Israel and Judah have been discovered during the excavations of various locales. With the possible exception of the Siloam Tunnel inscription, these are not royal inscriptions and annals or king lists and chronicles such as one finds in Assyria and Babylonia. Rather, these sources tend to be local and occasional documents such as ostraca, seals and seal impressions, as well as various Hebrew inscriptions and letters, which commonly deal with domestic and economic matters (see Davies). The nature of these items makes them useful for specific questions but limits their significance for broader historical reconstruction.

A large amount of textual evidence from outside of Israel is available for the Assyrian and Babylonian periods. The most important textual data is the corpus of royal inscriptions from Assyria, Babylonia and Egypt. These texts often provide historians with non-Israelite perspectives on events and dates that are mentioned in the Bible (Cogan 1998, 243). The Assyrian Eponym Chronicles, or "limmu-lists," for example, preserve a year-by-year account in which each year is named after a key Assyrian official (Akk limmu, limu(m)) and records some condition or event that transpired that year, or the location of the army at the end of the year. Assyrian royal annals also report the accomplishments of various kings and display inscriptions record military achievements, often engraved on stone statues of the victorious ruler. This corpus of royal inscriptions contains a number of specific references to rulers and events in Israel and Judah during the Assyrian period. Alongside these official records stand letters, judicial records, administrative documents and religious texts from all areas of the Assyrian Empire. Of special note here are vassal treaties (e.g., the vassal treaties of Esarhaddon from the seventh century BC), which offer a number of insights into the relationship between Assyria and its western vassals such as Israel and Judah. The Babylonian Chronicles, a partial chronological record that provides a year-by-year account of the king's major military actions with minimal editorial bias, constitute the primary source from Babylonia (Grayson 1975). Extant portions of the Chronicles cover the periods from 626-623 BC, 616-594 BC and 557-538 BC. Sources from Egypt during the Assyrian and Babylonian periods often are few and focused on internal political happenings, although some inscriptions recount Egyptian movements into Syria-Palestine (Cogan 1998, 244; Kitchen 1986; Spalinger). The smaller kingdoms in the immediate vicinity of Israel and Judah also provide some relevant textual sources. Two of the most important are the Mesha Inscription, or Moabite Stone (ANET 320; COS 2.23:137-38), a stela set up by Mesha, king of Moab, in the ninth century BC that refers to Omri of Israel, and the Tel Dan Inscription (COS 2.39:161-62), an Aramaic text apparently erected by Hazael, a ninth-century BC king of Aram-Damascus, which mentions kings of both "Israel" and the "House of David," although the proper reading of the inscription has been heavily debated (see Athas; COS 2.39:162n11).

A variety of extrabiblical textual sources exists from the Persian Empire. These texts are of various types, languages (Akkadian, Aramaic, Egyptian, Elamite) and provenance, but only a limited number of them bear directly on affairs in Judah after 539 BC. Critical among texts of the Persian era are royal inscriptions, including portions of the Babylonian Chronicles, the Nabonidus Chronicles, the Cyrus Cylinder (ANET 315-16; COS 2.124:314-16) and the Behistun Inscription, as well as various domestic and economic records, such as the archive of the Murashu business firm (c. 464-404 BC) (see Grabbe 1992; 2004). These Persian sources may be supplemented by a variety of bullae and cylinder seals from the area of Judah that preserve the names of governors of the province of Yehud in the Persian period (see Avigad). Earlier assessments tended to accept relatively uncritically the favorable presentation of the Persian rulers offered by these inscriptions, especially in contrast with the seemingly militaristic character of the Assyrian and Babylonian Empires (Leith, 285). Scholarly assessment has changed as historians have taken the pro-Persian bias and self-serving nature of the source materials more seriously, revealing a fuller picture of the militaristic and violent actions taken by the Persians when deemed necessary to the empire's goals.

In the later Persian period and especially in the Hellenistic period, some classical writings, including the works of Herodotus, the fifth-century BC Greek historian, and Josephus, the first-century AD Jewish historian, offer important information on earlier events and circumstances in the Assyrian and Babylonian periods, as well. Classical Greek writings (e.g., Thucydides, Xenophon) provide some of the most extensive narrative sources for the Persian period and following, especially due to the increasing interaction of the Persians and the Greeks after the mid-sixth century BC. Even so, the extensively pro-Greek perspective of these writings means that scholars must evaluate their historical reliability on a case-by-case basis in conjunction with other available evidence.

1.2. The Nature and Use of Biblical and Extrabiblical Sources. Over the last two decades the study of Israelite history has fostered increased and vigorous debate in contemporary scholarship (see Moore and Kelle; Long). How one understands the nature, reliability and usefulness of the biblical texts, extrabiblical inscriptions and archaeological remains, not to mention the interrelationship of these materials, is now hotly debated and often dictates the way one reconstructs Israelite history in its various periods (see Moore 2006a; Grabbe 2007; Lemche).

Since the 1970s there has been a growing trend in scholarship to consider the biblical texts as literary and ideological constructs that can be used only cautiously, if at all, as a historical source for ancient Israel. In the 1990s especially the discipline of Israelite history focused almost exclusively on methodological, theoretical and philosophical debates, some of which questioned whether the entire enterprise of the study of Israelite history was seriously flawed. Currently, three primary approaches can be identified:

The maximalist position: The overall storyline of Genesis through 2 Kings is predominantly historically accurate, and the biblical texts constitute an important reliable source for Israelite and Judean history in the Iron Age.

The minimalist position: The character and late date of the biblical texts render them too problematic to be used even selectively as evidence for most of Israel's past. The biblical literature is better understood as an artifact from the Persian or Hellenistic periods, although it reveals little direct information about the critical happenings in those eras. Furthermore, contrary to the impression gained from the OT, the kingdoms of Israel and Judah were modest kingdoms of minimal historical importance throughout most of the Iron Age.

A middle position: Portions of the OT, especially in the Historical Books and the prophetic literature, preserve some historical information that can be used after critical analysis and in conjunction with other available evidence.

The general trend in present scholarship has been to assign the origins of more and more of the materials in the OT to the exilic and postexilic periods (post-586 BC), thus placing them at some remove from the events that they describe relating to the Iron Age kingdoms of Israel and Judah. The typical, but not necessarily foregone (see Provan, Long and Longman), conclusion that follows from this trend is that the biblical materials are less important for historical investigation than the contemporaneous extrabiblical textual and artifactual sources, which at times yield differing or conflicting historical information. Clearly, the biblical texts are a mixture of reportage and interpretation and contain elements (ancient perspectives, visionary reports, folk traditions) that make them difficult to use as historical sources by modern historiographical standards (see Miller and Hayes, 70-79). But the same considerations attend to archaeological and extrabiblical textual sources, the latter also being literary, ideological and theological formulations whose biased and selective character does not permit them to be used uncritically (Grayson 1992, 734; Cogan 1998, 244). Historians, then, must take up specific issues and sources on a case-by-case basis and attend to the importance of clarity and consistency in method. Any reconstruction should make full use of all available data, particularly looking for points at which various sources converge, while at the same time taking account of the literary, theological and even ideological nature of the sources involved (see Kelle 2007, 8-11).

The recent debates in the field of Israelite history have had a direct impact on the question of whether and how the OT Prophetic Books in particular should be used as historical sources. The relevant questions include whether the Prophetic Books can be considered “history” or “historical,” what specific types of information about the past one can find in the Prophetic Books and how such information should be used in historical reconstruction, and how the prophetic corpus might aid in writing about Israel’s past in ways that go beyond the typical political history (Moore 2006b, 23).

On the one hand, the Prophetic Books contain various historical features that connect the prophetic words to particular events and circumstances. The most evident historical features occur in historiographical narratives that appear in a few of the Prophetic Books, some of which overlap texts in 1-2 Kings (e.g., Is 36—39; Jer 39; 52). At least three other types of specific information about the past appear in the prophetic texts: (1) superscriptions, although the references found in such texts are often general in nature; (2) imagery that seemingly alludes to historical events (e.g., Is 1:7-9; Hos 5:8—6:6) but often remains ambiguous; (3) incidental (or nonintentional) information regarding domestic life, religious practices and socioeconomic realities (Moore 2006b, 25-27). Considered as a whole, a number of texts in prophetic books such as Hosea and Amos offer particular renderings of history and seem to indicate a historical consciousness that lies at the heart of prophetic theology (e.g., Hos 1—3; 11:1-4; 12; Amos 2:9-11). On the other hand, the features just described do not qualify the Prophetic Books as “history” in the same way that one thinks of a composition that was intended to record significant happenings for future generations. Furthermore, the Prophetic Books share characteristics that present lingering difficulties for their use as historical sources. These include a mixture of the original words of the prophet and the later additions of editors, as well as the symbolic and theological nature of the books’ portrayals of historical situations (see Cogan 1998, 243-48). Scholars typically have concluded that the study of Hebrew prophecy can play a supporting role to the study of Israelite history, if one balances these factors.

Recent decades have seen challenges to the usefulness of the Prophetic Books as historical sources. At one level, these challenges point to the composite and literary nature of the Prophetic Books, developed through multiple stages over a lengthy period of time and dominated by poetic and metaphorical language that often remains vague (see Kelle 2005, 5-7; Melugin; Ben Zvi 1996). Even more recently, challenges have placed greater emphasis upon the macrogenre of the prophetic writings as “authoritative prophetic books,” ultimately compiled in the Persian period as a way to educate the postmonarchic literati by associating authoritative teachings with prophetic personages and messages of the past (Ben Zvi 2005; 2006). Hence, the function of these books is not historical but rather social, ideological and didactic, and any historical information relates primarily, if not solely, to what the book’s final form reveals about its Persian-period authors, audiences and circumstances. The present forms of the Prophetic Books, it is argued, intentionally dehistoricize and deconcretize specific texts, associating the prophet's words only with general time periods (as reflected in the superscriptions), in order to create a lasting application and authority for their message (Ben Zvi 2006).

These recent developments call for theoretical and methodological precision in the use of the prophetic texts as historical sources. Given the complexities involved, any examination of the prophetic texts should take account of their poetic and metaphorical character, as well as the compositional process that produced the authoritative books preserved in the OT canon. Even so, the historicizing references in several books, which explicitly associate some speeches and visions with very narrow historical circumstances (e.g., Is 6:1; 36:1; Hag 1:1; 2:1), and the apparent similarity of prophetic discourse to rhetoric and oratory, which interacts closely with shared rhetorical-historical situations, suggests that the Prophetic Books can be used alongside other sources in the service of historical reconstruction (see Kelle 2006).

1.3. Social History. Traditionally, reconstructions of Israel's past have focused on the political history of persons and events with large-scale social impact (kings, wars, governments, etc.). Many of the prophets' speeches, however, concern domestic, economic and religious aspects of daily life and society in ancient Israel and Judah, especially as they decry personal and societal practices such as the exploitation of peasant farmers, disparity in access to resources, and royal consolidation of land and wealth. These aspects of the prophetic literature fit well with the growing interest in a larger-scale approach to history and a deeper appreciation of social history that emerged in the second half of the twentieth century (see Moore and Kelle). This type of study avoids too narrow a preoccupation with events and examines social changes over a long period of time, with attention to environment, climate, geography and the experiences of common people in ancient society (see Kessler). Social history, which began to find a significant place in works on Israel's past in the 1980s (see Coote and Whitelam), brings together a variety of evidence—texts, artifacts, demography, sociological and anthropological models—to explore such things as systems of material production, relationships between landed gentry and peasants, shifts in economic systems (e.g., from a subsistence agrarian economy to a tribute-based economy) and differing types of societies (e.g., kinship/tribal societies versus stratified class societies). Given the prominence of social concerns in the prophetic literature, an outline of Israelite/Judean political history like the one given here should also give attention to significant elements of social history in the periods under consideration (see Social-Scientific Approaches).

2. Assyria, Israel and Judah Prior to the Mid-Eighth Century BC.

By the mid-eighth century BC—the period in which Israelite history becomes most directly relevant for the Prophetic Books—the Assyrian Empire had held sway over the ancient Near East for more than one hundred years. The rise of Assyria was a gradual process that began in the preceding centuries as various emperors developed bureaucratic, imperial and military systems that allowed them to expand control westward (Grayson 1992, 741-42). By the mid-ninth century BC, Shalmaneser III (858-824 BC) solidified Assyrian power and dominance by conducting annual military campaigns and asserting control over territories in northern and southern Syria (see Hallo, 37).

According to the biblical story, much had already occurred in Israel's history: Israel's ancestors had journeyed throughout Mesopotamia, the Israelites had experienced an exodus from Egypt and settlement in the land of Canaan, and David and Solomon had reigned from Jerusalem over a united Israel. The Prophetic Books contain allusions and references, both direct and indirect, to events in these earlier eras (e.g., Jacob [Hos 12]; Moses, Miriam and the exodus [Mic 6:4]; entrance into the land [Mic 6:5]; David [Ezek 37:24-25]). However, the immediate backdrop for the historical periods relevant to the writing prophets was the time of the Omride and Jehu dynasties in the northern kingdom and their concomitant rulers in the south (879-748 BC) (see 1 Kings 16—2 Kings 8; 2 Chron 17—20). The biblical texts concerning the Omrides (Omri, Ahab, Ahaziah, Jehoram) focus almost exclusively on the issue of religious apostasy and the royal house's propagation of Baal worship. The only achievements noted for Omri and Ahab are the founding of Samaria (1 Kings 16:24) and various building projects (1 Kings 22:39). By contrast, the available extrabiblical evidence suggests that the reigns of Omri and Ahab saw significant developments for Israel in both the domestic and geopolitical arenas (see Kelle 2007, 29-33). Archaeology attests building activities at cities such as Samaria, Megiddo, Hazor and Jezreel (Campbell, 220). Other biblical and extrabiblical textual data suggests that the Omrides, while often in conflict with the kingdom of Aram-Damascus, cooperated with and, at times, established dominance over neighboring kingdoms, such as Phoenicia, Edom and Moab (see 1 Kings 16:31; 22:47; the Mesha Inscription). Ahab (868-854 BC) appears to have reduced Judah to a subservient, if not vassal, status and the Assyrian Monolith Inscription of Shalmaneser III depicts Ahab as part of a coalition of western kingdoms, perhaps even as the dominant partner to some of them, which opposed Assyrian expansion in 853 BC (see Kelle 2007, 32-37).

After the death of Ahab, Israel's long-time regional rival Aram-Damascus experienced a resurgence with the ascension of Hazael to the throne (see Grayson 1996, 118). Against this backdrop, 2 Kings 8-10 and 2 Chronicles 22 describe Jehu's assassination of Jehoram of Israel and Ahaziah of Judah and usurpation of the throne in Samaria. The historical details, including the identities of the kings involved and the agents responsible, remain unclear, as the Tel Dan Inscription, a memorial stela of a ninth-century Aramean king (probably Hazael), seems to reflect these events but differs in its details from the biblical presentation. Probably the most significant event of the years of Jehu's rule came in 841 BC, when Jehu paid tribute to Shalmaneser III as a vassal and voluntarily submitted to Assyrian sovereignty (as recorded on Shalmaneser III's Black Obelisk; see ANEP, nos. 351-55). Jehu's pro-Assyrian alignment would be Israel's (and seemingly Judah's) dominant political posture for nearly a century and during that time Israel's fortunes would be constantly affected by the struggle for power between Assyria and regional entities such as Aram-Damascus. The tension between pro- and anti-Assyrian sentiments, as well as questions concerning Israel's and Judah's involvement in alliances and rebellions, constitute the focus for some of the oracles of the eighth-century prophets (e.g., Is 7:1-9; 8:5-8; Hos 7:11; 8:9).

3. The Assyrian Period (750-609 BC).

The several centuries of Assyrian rule over the ancient Near East, especially the height of Assyrian power from the mid-eighth to late seventh centuries BC, form the ostensible backdrop for the prophetic messages of *Hosea, *Amos, *Jonah, *Micah, *Nahum and *Zephaniah, as well as portions of *Isaiah 1-39 and *Jeremiah.

3.1. The Resurgence of Israel and Judah: The Reigns of Jeroboam II of Israel (788-748 BC) and Uzziah and Jotham of Judah (785-744 BC). After several years of regional dominance by Aram-Damascus in Syria-Palestine, an Assyrian resurgence and return to active campaigning in the west near the end of the ninth century BC inaugurated a period of national restoration and prosperity in Israel and Judah that would last for nearly fifty years. As loyal Assyrian vassals, Israel and, presumably, Judah benefited from a strong Assyrian presence in the region. The bulk of the reigns of Jeroboam II in Israel (788-748 BC) and Uzziah (785-760 BC) and Jotham (759-744 BC) in Judah witnessed this revitalization. Although the Deuteronomistic History, with its focus upon religious matters, devotes only seven verses to Jeroboam II (2 Kings 14:23-29), even the biblical texts hint at major accomplishments during this period. Second Kings 14:25 says that Jeroboam II expanded (or "restored") the border of Israel northward to the Beqa' valley and southward to the Dead Sea, expansions likely to have been made at the expense of Damascus and Hamath. While some of the biblical claims are not historically substantiated and may be exaggerated (e.g., 2 Kings 14:28; 2 Chron 26:6), archaeological discoveries, such as larger quantities of luxury items (e.g., ivory inlays; see Amos 6:4), and extrabiblical texts, such as the Samarian Ostraca (shipment receipts from eighth-century Samaria), witness to increased prosperity in this era.

When examined from the perspective of social history, this overall resurgence carried some negative consequences (see Kessler). The prosperity of the time seems to have produced dramatic changes in the social structure, likely stretching back to developments under the Omrides and giving rise to an economically stratified society characterized by the emergence of an economic elite that increasingly controlled major land estates meted out by the royal government (see Campbell, 234-35). Israel underwent a transition from a family-based agrarian and subsistence economy, where farmers retained most of their surplus, to a tribute-based economy, centralized in the royal administration in order to meet the demands created by political alliances, vassal tribute and commercial trade (see Kelle 2007, 64-66). In this tribute-based economy, surpluses were funneled to local rulers/elites (patrons) who did not distribute them to farmers, while the royal government created estates through land grants and consolidation and forced local farmers to plant cash crops (grain, wine, oil) that could be used for trade and tribute. As a result, Israel developed more fully toward an "ancient class society," characterized by conflicting groups with oppositional social and economic interests and increasing disparity in access to resources (Kessler, 108-10). Prophetic books such as Isaiah, Amos, and Micah provide a different perspective on the "boom" experienced in Israel during the time of Jeroboam II, voicing apparent objections to these realities of a society divided by economic class (Amos 2:6-8; 4:1; 5:10-12) with resources concentrated in the hands of an aristocratic few (Is 5:8; Mic 2:1-2).

3.2. The Syro-Ephraimitic War (734-731 BC). The prosperity of the major part of Jeroboam II's reign did not last (see Hayes and Hooker, 53-54; contrast Soggin, 229). As long as Assyria maintained a strong presence in the west, its loyal vassals like Israel and, presumably, Judah reaped the benefits of renewed stabilization. Assyria, however, fell into decline during the reigns of Adad-nirari III's successors (c. 780-750 BC; Hallo, 44), and Aram-Damascus began to reassert its influence. Both Assyrian and biblical texts attest the emergence of Rezin as the new king of Damascus, who became the dominant political force in the region after 750 BC (see Tadmor, 187). Second Kings 15:37 and 16:5 suggest that Rezin encroached upon Israelite territory already during the final years of Jeroboam II, and Amos's prophetic oracle against Damascus in Amos 1:3-5, which describes a Syrian invasion of Galilee, may date from this time (c. 750 BC).

The circumstances throughout the ancient Near East changed dramatically in 745 BC, however, when Tiglath-pileser III took the throne of Assyria. He immediately undertook a series of campaigns designed to reassert control over the full extent of the empire (see Tadmor). Given Aram-Damascus's newfound power, As-syria's resurgence further destabilized relations among kingdoms in the west, especially for long-standing pro-Assyrian vassal kingdoms such as Israel and Judah. Additionally, the resurgence brought Assyria into conflict with Egypt. The Twenty-fifth (Kushite/Ethiopian) Dynasty from Napata in present-day Sudan was attempting at this time to subjugate the Egyptian Delta and to extend its influence into southern Syria-Palestine (Miller and Hayes, 232-33; Spalinger, 358-59; Kitchen 1986, 358-98). These Egyptian maneuverings likely provided some of the impetus for renewed rebellions against Assyrian authority in Syria-Palestine. The combination of all of these factors must have produced turmoil in Samaria over where to place the kingdom's loyalty. 2 Kings 15—17 briefly notes that after the death of Jeroboam II four kings (Zechariah, Shallum, Menahem, Pekahiah) reigned in rapid succession, with three of the four being assassinated after brief reigns, and one (Menahem) achieving a longer reign as a result of loyal submission to Tiglath-pileser III (Tadmor, 69, 89, 107; 2 Kings 15:19-20). Judah under Jotham (759-744 BC) and Ahaz (743-728 BC) remained more stable but still suffered the effects of Rezin's ascendant Damascus (see 2 Kings 15:37).

The tension between the ascendancy of Aram-Damascus and the resurgence of Assyria reached a peak in the years immediately preceding 734 BC. Although Rezin of Damascus is recorded as paying tribute to Tiglath-pileser as early as 738 BC (see Tadmor, 55)—perhaps nominal payments designed to appease—Rezin was simultaneously building a widespread, anti-Assyrian coalition in the west. Pekah of Israel apparently played a key part in these developments, although the chronology of his reign is difficult to establish. Sometime around 734 BC Pekah, probably with Rezin's support, assassinated Pekahiah and seized the throne in Samaria (2 Kings 15:25), but he may have been active as a rival king in league with Rezin and his anti-Assyrian movement as early as the time of Jeroboam II (see 2 Kings 15:27, 37; Hos 5:5 [Kelle 2007, 42]). These actions brought the northern kingdom into an apparent coalition of rebellious states opposing Assyria's hegemony and precipitated a conflict between Damascus, Israel and Judah referred to as the "Syro-Ephraimitic War" (734-731 BC).

Upon Pekah's accession, for the first time in over a century, Judah under Ahaz refused to follow the northern kingdom's lead and pursued an independent course (for another perspective on the nature of this conflict, see Tomes; Oded). Several biblical texts—most notably Isaiah 7:1-17—indicate that Rezin and Pekah besieged Ahaz in Jerusalem in order to replace him with a ruler who would cooperate with the coalition (see also 2 Kings 16:1-18; 2 Chron 28:1-25). Other prophetic oracles may also preserve theological interpretations of this course of events (e.g., Hos 2:1-23; 5:8—6:6; see Kelle 2005). It is not possible to work out the precise timing and sequence of these events (see Irvine, 95-109), but the attack failed. Tiglath-pileser III moved his forces down the Mediterranean coast beginning in 734-733 BC, subduing the kingdoms that were in open rebellion and ultimately besieging and capturing Damascus in 733-731 BC. The Deuteronomistic History explains the Assyrian intervention by claiming that Ahaz sent a “bribe” to Tiglath-pileser (2 Kings 16:8; but cf. Is 7), but Assyrian texts record a payment by Ahaz in 733 in terms of a typical tribute given after the Assyrians were already in the area (see Tadmor, 171; Irvine, 107-108). In any case, the Assyrians did not move against Pekah of Israel during this campaign. Rather, a rebellion broke out in Israel led by Hoshea in the late 730s BC. Apparently after Tiglath-pileser had left the area, Hoshea captured Samaria, deposed Pekah, and sent tribute to the Assyrian king (2 Kings 15:30; see also Hos 1:10—2:23).

3.3. The Fall of Israel (730-720 BC). Tiglath-pileser III died on campaign in 727 BC. Either just before or immediately upon his death, rebellion broke out in the west, and Tiglath-pileser's son and successor Shalmaneser V extended his father's campaign in that direction. These events inaugurated a protracted period of antagonism between Israel and Assyria that led to the end of the northern kingdom's existence as a political entity by 720 BC. The events and chronology of this period, however, are extremely complex and remain debated. The primary biblical text for this era, 2 Kings 17:1-6, provides several pieces of information that are difficult to correlate and seems to condense multiple events into a succinct theological explanation that attributes the fall of Israel to divine punishment for the abandonment of Yahweh. For example, 2 Kings 17:4 highlights a rebellion by Hoshea during the beginning years of Shalmaneser V's reign in which Hoshea appealed for help to “King So” of Egypt, whose identity remains in dispute (see Redford, 346-47; Spalinger, 359; Kitchen 1986, 374-75). Likewise, the Assyrian texts are unclear concerning which king conquered Samaria and when. Although there are no surviving inscriptions of Shalmaneser V, the Babylonian Chronicles attribute a capture of Samaria to him sometime prior to the year 722 BC (see Grayson 1975, 10; Kelle 2002, 662; contra Younger, 466). Several Assyrian inscriptions of his successor, Sargon II, however, claim that he captured Samaria sometime around 720 BC as part of a campaign against Hamath (see COS 2.118A: 293-94; 2.118D: 295-96; 2.118E: 296-97). Scholars have explained the confusing biblical and extrabiblical references to the capture of Samaria in numerous ways, with proposals ranging from one destruction claimed by two different kings to as many as four separate captures under various circumstances (cf. Younger; Becking; Hayes and Kuan; see the references to political turmoil in Hos 8—13).

Whatever the precise course of events, Sargon II imposed lasting provincial status upon the northern kingdom in 720 BC. An Assyrian governor assumed control of the area, a significant number of the population were deported, and foreign peoples were forcibly relocated into their place (2 Kings 17:6, 24). Sargon himself claims to have captured over 27,000 Israelites and there are archaeological indications of destruction at northern cities such as Tirzah, Shechem, and Samaria (Campbell, 239). One by-product of this destruction may have been the flight of portions of the north's population to the south, perhaps bringing some of their traditions with them. This migration could perhaps explain the preservation of textual traditions with northern origins, possibly including those that later became the book of Hosea. It would be a mistake to assume, however, that the territory and population of the former northern kingdom ceased to be of any significance for the remainder of the Iron Age. Recent studies have increasingly concluded that the destruction and population transfers of the late eighth century BC were localized and temporary in their effects, and there was an ongoing presence in the area of a people with ethnic and religious continuity to their predecessors in the northern kingdom (Tappy; Knoppers).

3.4. The Reign of Hezekiah of Judah (727-699 BC).

3.4.1. Initial Expansion under Assyria (720-714 BC). Hezekiah inherited the throne in Judah (2 Kings 18:1) at the beginning of the turbulent years that led to the final destruction of the northern kingdom (c. 730-720 BC). It does not appear, however, that Judah became involved in the anti-Assyrian rebellions that marked this period. Biblical texts make no mention of Hezekiah in this regard, and the scattered references to Judah in Assyrian texts before 712 BC record a Judean tribute payment and give no indication of rebellious activity (see Dalley, 388). One Assyrian letter thought to date to about 715 BC may even mention a contingent of Judean troops fighting alongside Assyrian troops in Urartu (Dalley, 388).

Assyrian kings frequently rewarded kingdoms that remained loyal in the midst of nearby rebellions by giving them expanded territory taken from rebels. While the primary biblical materials about Hezekiah (2 Kings 18–20; 2 Chron 29–32; Is 36–39) focus on religious reforms, the period immediately after the fall of the northern kingdom (720-714 BC) was a time of political ascendancy and expansion for Judah within the Assyrian system, perhaps due to Hezekiah's consistent loyalty. Archaeological evidence from Jerusalem and its environs indicates the emergence of new settlements and the expansion of the capital city to nearly three times its previous size (Cogan 1998, 246; Finkelstein and Silberman, 243). Also in this time, Sargon II opened a cooperative trade relationship with the Egyptian rulers in the Nile Delta (against the Ethiopians of the Twenty-Fifth Dynasty) and expanded the border of Assyrian territory in the southwestern corner of the empire further south of Gaza to the Wadi el-Arish, events perhaps reflected in the hopeful oracle concerning Egypt in Isaiah 19 (see COS 2.1118D:296; Kitchen 1986, 375-76; Spalinger, 359). Coincidentally, 2 Kings 18:8 says that Hezekiah also expanded Judean territory as far as Gaza. Taken together, these indications raise the possibility that the years between 720 and 714 BC represent the height of Judean power, as Judah at least bordered the territory that was the primary area of Assyria's expansion and perhaps received Sargon II's appointment to supervise this vicinity.

3.4.2. The Ashdod Revolt (714-712 BC). The biblical texts that describe Hezekiah's reign jump immediately from his accession and reforms to his confrontation with the Assyrian king Sennacherib in 701 BC. Assyrian inscriptions, however, point to Judah's participation in an earlier anti-Assyrian revolt. Sargon II's annals and other inscriptions report that a rebellion broke out in Syria-Palestine in 714 BC while the emperor was occupied in Urartu (COS 2.118A:293; 2.118E:296; 2.118F:297). This revolt, led by the usurper Yamani of Ashdod, included other kingdoms such as Philistia, Edom and Moab (see ANET 287). The rebels appealed for help, at least according to the Assyrian accounts, to an Egyptian Pharaoh, probably the Ethiopian Shabako (716-702 BC), who had invaded the delta in 715 BC (Kitchen 1986, 380; Spalinger, 359). Inspiration may also have come from Babylon, where Merodach-baladan had wrested control away from Assyria near the beginning of Sargon II's reign in 721 BC. Sometime in either 712 or 711 BC (Sargon's annals and prisms do not match) the Assyrians moved west to put down the Ashdod revolt. Yamani fled to Egypt, where the Egyptian king turned him over to Assyria (see COS 2.118J:300), and Sargon made Ashdod into a province.

The OT Historical Books make no mention of the Ashdod revolt. One of Sargon's inscriptions, however, specifically lists Judah as a participant (see ANET 287), yet curiously does not name Hezekiah. Given the fact that Hezekiah had remained loyal to Assyria for more than a decade, and apparently reaped political and economic benefits as a result, it is difficult to imagine how and why he would have become involved. The Prophetic Books, which contain the Bible's only explicit witness to these events, may suggest a possible explanation. The prophetic narrative in Isaiah 20 refers to the affair but does not state directly that Judah was involved. Yet, several elements of the biblical presentation of Hezekiah's reign that are placed by Kings, Chronicles and Isaiah in the later context of Sennacherib's invasion in 701 BC seem to fit better with the earlier Ashdod revolt. For instance, 2 Kings 18:13 and Isaiah 36:1 identify Hezekiah's "fourteenth year" as the time of Sennacherib's invasion in 701 BC. If this reference is not an indication of the need to downgrade Hezekiah's accession or posit some kind of co-regency, Hezekiah's fourteenth year would be not 701 BC but 714 BC, a date that corresponds nicely with the Ashdod revolt (cf. 2 Kings 18:10's equation of the fall of Samaria in 722 BC with Hezekiah's sixth year). Likewise, the story of Hezekiah's life-threatening illness, which 2 Kings 20, 2 Chronicles 32 and Isaiah 38 place in the context of 701 BC, promises Hezekiah fifteen additional years of rule (2 Kings 20:6), a reference that makes more sense if these years are added to his fourteenth year (see 2 Kings 18:2, which assigns Hezekiah's reign a total of twenty-nine years).

Given the failure of the Assyrian texts to name Hezekiah, the likely dating of the king's life-threatening illness to around 714 BC, if correct, suggests the possibility that Hezekiah became incapacitated and turned the leadership of the kingdom over to his chief officials, who in turn threw Judah's lot in with Yamani. The prophetic oracle in Isaiah 22, which occurs in a broader context that references the Ashdod revolt (Is 20:1), may provide a fuller picture, as the prophet condemns Shebna, called the "master of the household" (Is 22:15; see also Jotham in 2 Kings 15:5) (see Goldberg). There is conflicting evidence as to the results of Judah's participation and Assyrian reprisals. Sargon's annals refer only to the capture and provincialization of Ashdod, but some evidence may be construed as reporting the destruction of certain Judean territories (e.g., Azekah [see COS 2.119D:304-305; Goldberg]). In any case, Hezekiah, perhaps after recovering and reversing his officials' actions, remained on the throne but surely lost the favored status and expanded territory that he had possessed.

3.4.3. Sennacherib's Invasion of Judah (701 BC). In 705 BC Sargon II died on the battlefield in Anatolia, and rebellions broke out throughout the empire. The new Assyrian ruler, Sennacherib (704-681 BC), struggled to subdue revolts in the east throughout his first few years. In the west, Hezekiah, perhaps motivated by the Assyrian reprisals taken against his kingdom in 712-711 BC, became the ringleader of a rebellion that included Sidon, Ekron and Ashkelon (see COS 2.119B:302-303; Gallagher, 255). Textual and archaeological evidence indicates that Hezekiah undertook a series of preparations in anticipation of his revolt and Assyria's reactions (Vaughn). These preparations focused on military organization, supply and defense (e.g., 2 Chron 32:5-6) (Finkelstein and Silberman, 255-57). Perhaps most noteworthy were the construction of a new segment of the city wall around Jerusalem (the so-called Broad Wall), as well as the Siloam Tunnel, cut through the rock to bring water into Jerusalem and bearing an inscription that describes the digging process (see Cogan 1998, 250; contrast Dalley), and the use of numerous storage jars stamped with the seal lmlk ("belonging to the king"), found primarily in the southwestern corner of Judah and serving apparently as a system for shipping supplies.

Sennacherib's response came in 701 BC. This invasion is the most well-documented event in Judean history, with numerous biblical and extrabiblical texts, as well as archaeological remains, witnessing to the affair. As a result, the general course of events is clear (see Gallagher). After putting down the revolts in the east, Sennacherib moved down the Mediterranean coast, captured cities in Phoenicia and Philistia, and turned back an Egyptian force at Eltekeh. He then directed his forces against Judah. Sennacherib's inscriptions attest to the massive destruction that he inflicted upon Judean territory (perhaps described in Is 1:7-9; Mic 1:8-16). He claims to have captured forty-six fortified cities and deported 200,150 people (but see De Odorico). Archaeological remains demonstrate that the Judean city of Lachish suffered the most extensive damage, and a wall relief in Sennacherib's palace in Nineveh gives a graphic depiction of the battle for the city.

What remains unclear, however, is the precise course of events involved in the final outcome of the invasion, specifically concerning Jerusalem. The biblical account in 2 Kings 18—19 (paralleled in 2 Chron 32; Is 36—37) consists of several different traditions that have now been combined, providing varying descriptions that cannot easily be reconciled (see Evans; Gallagher, 145): (1) Hezekiah's surrender and payment of tribute (2 Kings 18:13-16); (2) Sennacherib's withdrawal under threat from elsewhere (2 Kings 19:7, 9a, 36-37; Is 36:2—37:9a, 37-38); (3) Yahweh's miraculous killing of 185,000 Assyrians in a single night (2 Kings 19:9b-35; Is 37:9b-36). Numerous attempts have been made to untangle these references and establish their connections with Assyrian and other extrabiblical texts (e.g., comparisons with Herodotus, Hist. 2.141). Due to the confusing nature of the sources, it seems likely that the specific details of the affair will remain unclear. Even so, the available evidence points to the interpretation that Hezekiah submitted and paid tribute to Assyria, but for some reason, Sennacherib relented from the siege without taking Jerusalem and allowed Hezekiah to remain on the throne (see Dalley). Still, the land of Judah as a whole was decimated by the invasion. Along with the destroyed cities and deported peoples, Sennacherib redistributed parts of Judean territory into the control of Philistine kingdoms such as Ashdod and Ekron (Cogan 1998, 252).

3.5. Judah as an Assyrian Vassal: The Reign of Manasseh (698-644 BC). The corpus of OT prophetic literature attributes no surviving prophetic voices to the years from around 700 to 640 BC, a period that covers the reigns of Manasseh (698-644 BC) and Amon (643-642 BC), as well as the first part of the reign of Josiah (641-610 BC). Even the accounts of Manasseh and Amon in the OT Historical Books (2 Kings 21; 2 Chron 33) are sparse, largely passing over the first half of the seventh century BC except to theologize about the kings' apostate practices. Manasseh inherited a Judean kingdom in dire straits after the events of 701 BC. Surveys of sites in the Shephelah indicate that 85 percent of the eighth-century BC settlements were abandoned and not reoccupied in the seventh century BC (Faust). These historical realities, especially when combined with the biblical presentations, yield the impression that Judah under Manasseh was merely a marginal and depressed Assyrian vassal. Historians throughout the twentieth century often have followed this impression and downplayed any importance of Manasseh's time (e.g., Provan, Long and Longman, 274-75). Recent works, however, have pointed to other evidence that suggests significant domestic and economic recovery took place under Manasseh. Archaeological evidence from throughout the whole of Manasseh's time suggests a recovery that featured rebuilding in Jerusalem, expansion into other areas, and participation in the commerce of the Assyrian Empire, leading some current scholars to conclude that the time of Manasseh was, in fact, the peak of settlement and development in the history of the southern kingdom (e.g., Faust).

In the wider context, during Manasseh's reign the Assyrian Empire reached the height of its power under Esarhaddon and Ashurbanipal, and some later prophetic texts contain allusions to events that took place in these years. This power was especially marked by a series of offensive campaigns against Egypt (679, 673, 671, 669-668 BC), culminating with Ashurbanipal's capture of Memphis and destruction of Thebes in 664 BC (see the retrospective reference to the destruction of Thebes [called "No-amon"] in Nah 3:8) (see Kitchen 1986, 394). In the course of these events, Manasseh is mentioned only in passing in Assyrian texts as a loyal vassal who provided building materials to Esarhaddon and contributed troops to Ashurbanipal's invasion of Egypt in 668 BC (ANET 291, 294; but cf. 2 Chron 33:10-17, whose historicity remains disputed). Yet, perhaps the most important facet of these years for the study of the prophetic literature is religious. As noted above, the biblical texts demonize Manasseh by telling how he sponsored apostate and idolatrous forms of worship (2 Kings 21:1-9), practices that may be reflected in the criticisms of prophets from later periods (e.g., Zeph 1:4-6). Some interpreters attribute these developments to an Assyrian imposition of their religious practices on vassals such as Manasseh (Spieckermann), but others have maintained that typical Assyrian imperial relations do not support this conclusion (McKay; Cogan 1974). It is more likely that Manasseh's propagation of unorthodox worship, while probably reflecting Assyrian influence, was a voluntary syncretism that also revived older religious practices from the time before Hezekiah's reforms.

3.6. The End of the Assyrian Empire: The Reign of Josiah (641-610 BC). When Josiah ascended the Judean throne in 641 BC, Assyria had entered a downward spiral from which it would not recover. Throughout the second half of Ashurbanipal's reign, Assyria became increasingly involved with conflicts to the north and firm control over other parts of the empire began to slip away. By the mid-620s BC, Nabopolassar had wrested Babylon from Assyrian control, and the Babylonian Chronicles indicate that he had complete control of Babylonia by 616 BC, actively engaging in military conflict against Assyria (see Grayson 1975). Throughout the period of Assyria's decline, Egypt benefited the most. Ashurbanipal's capture of Thebes in 664 BC had brought an end to the anti-Assyrian Twenty-Fifth (Kushite) Dynasty and given control of Egypt to the Twenty-Sixth Dynasty, ruled from Sais, reestablishing the cooperative relationship between Assyria and Egypt that had existed in the time of Sargon II (Miller and Hayes 446; Kitchen 1992, 325). During the long reign of Pharaoh Psammetichus I (664-610 BC), Egypt, as an Assyrian ally, played an ever-increasing role in the control of Syria-Palestine that filled the void created by Assyrian withdrawal, a role attested in the frequent references to Egypt in books such as Jeremiah.

This course of events forms the background against which 2 Kings 22–23 and 2 Chronicles 34–35 depict Josiah as Judah's most righteous king. Josiah is said to have carried out an extensive religious reform that reversed the apostate practices of Manasseh by centralizing worship in Jerusalem and destroying all outlying sanctuaries, including some in the territory of the former northern kingdom (2 Kings 23:15–20). Although the accounts in Kings and Chronicles do not align precisely (cf. 2 Kings 23:4–20; 2 Chron 34:3–7), both attribute the impetus for Josiah's actions to the discovery of a "book of the law" in the temple. The exact nature and significance of this event, attested only in the biblical narratives, remain disputed. The scholarly consensus since the early nineteenth century has identified Josiah's law book with some form of the book of Deuteronomy, but debate continues over whether it was an ancient work that was "found" in the temple, a seventh-century BC document that was composed then to support Josiah's reforms, or some combination thereof.

The thoroughgoing positive judgment of Josiah in the OT Historical Books has led some scholars to propose that an edition of the Deuteronomistic History was first produced during his reign (Cross). Interpreters have also viewed Josiah's reign as a generative time for parts of the prophetic literature. The superscriptions of the books of Jeremiah and Zephaniah, for example, place some of the preaching of both prophets in the reign of Josiah, although neither book seems to mention Josiah's reform. Additionally, similarities in superscriptions and other elements lead some scholars to conclude that an initial collection of books that would later grow into the Book of the Twelve (the Minor Prophets) was first produced during Josiah's time and under Deuteronomistic influences (Nogalski).

The combination of the biblical presentation with evidence for Assyrian decline leads many contemporary interpreters to consider Josiah's reign as a period of renewed political freedom and territorial expansion, even constituting, in the minds of some, the greatest period of autonomy that Judah had experienced since the time of David (e.g., Bright, 316; Soggin, 257; Sweeney). Josiah, it is suggested, was able to annex territories in the former northern kingdom and establish Judean dominance over the bulk of Syria-Palestine. This interpretation rests especially on the biblical texts, but proponents also marshal extrabiblical evidence, including Hebrew inscriptions from Mesad Hashavyahu (a small fortress on the Mediterranean coast), the construction of a seventh-century fort at Megiddo, and the fortification of some important southern cities such as Arad and Kadesh-Barnea. In recent years, however, new scholarly assessments, especially concerning the role of Egypt, conclude that the archaeological evidence does not clearly indicate that fortifications like that at Mesad Hashavyahu were Judean, and that several texts and artifacts from throughout Syria-Palestine indicate that Egypt, under the Twenty-Sixth (Saite) Dynasty, came to play the dominant role in the region during this era (see Na'aman 1991; Finkelstein and Silberman, 348–53; Redford, 430–69). These reassessments point to the conclusion that Judah likely was subservient to Egypt throughout most of Josiah's reign, especially its latter portions. If accurate, this situation accords well with the events depicted by the biblical sources concerning the end of Josiah's rule. The biblical accounts in 2 Kings 23:29–30; 2 Chronicles 35:20–24; Jeremiah 22:10–12 are exceedingly vague and difficult to reconcile; hence, the debate over the historical reconstruction remains unsettled. However, the biblical accounts place Josiah's unexpected death at the hands of the Egyptians in the context of the clashes between Egypt and Babylonia in the waning days of Assyrian vitality (c. 610 BC) and assign the decisive power in deposing and appointing Judean kings after Josiah's death to the Egyptian Pharaoh Neco II (610–595 BC).

The events in Judah parallel the developments that led to the final collapse of the Assyrian Empire and the transition to Babylonian dominance in Syria-Palestine and beyond (see Arnold, 87-93; Brinkman). In 614 BC the Medes captured the city of Ashur and formed an alliance with Nabopolassar of Babylonia. In 612 BC the new alliance destroyed the Assyrian capital Nineveh, an event celebrated as divine judgment in the book of Nahum. Sometime in 610 BC Pharaoh Neco II marched northward through Syria-Palestine, killing Josiah on the way (2 Kings 23:29), to join forces with the Assyrians at Haran. Through a series of attacks and counterattacks, the Babylonians and the Medes defeated the opposing Assyrian-Egyptian force. The Egyptians, for their part, withdrew southward and maintained nominal control for the time being over southern Syria-Palestine. The Assyrians, however, would never again play a role in the politics of the ancient Near East or the life of Judah. For the next half-century the southern kingdom's fate would be intertwined with the two powers of Babylonia and Egypt.

4. The Babylonian Period (605-539 BC).

The period of Babylonian dominance over the ancient Near East between the late seventh and mid-sixth centuries BC forms the ostensible backdrop for the prophetic books of *Obadiah and *Habakkuk, as well as portions of *Isaiah 40—55, *Jeremiah, *Ezekiel and *Daniel.

4.1. The Establishment of Babylonian Dominance (605-601 BC). In the years immediately following Assyria's demise, Babylonia (under Nabopolassar [625-605 BC]) and Egypt vied for dominance over the western territories in Syria-Palestine (see Arnold, 89-91; Vanderhooft, 23-33). The decisive turning point came in 605 BC, when the Babylonian crown prince Nebuchadnezzar II (alternatively, "Nebuchadrezzar" [see Jer 39:1]) defeated the forces of Pharaoh Neco II at Carchemish. Both the Babylonian Chronicles (see Grayson 1975, 99) and Jeremiah's oracle against Egypt in Jeremiah 46:1-12 point to this as a decisive victory that drove the Egyptians out of Syria-Palestine and established Babylonian control of the region down to the border of Egypt south of Philistia. During the following period of 605-601 BC, Nebuchadnezzar, who ascended to the Babylonian throne shortly after the battle of Carchemish, marched throughout Syria-Palestine in an effort to consolidate power and establish the many smaller kingdoms in the area as Babylonian vassals.

The early years of the reign of King Jehoiakim in Judah (608-598 BC) unfolded against this background. His rule provides the context for much of the material in the book of Jeremiah, and the prophet is almost always at odds with the king's foreign policy. As one who had been placed on the throne by the Egyptians (2 Kings 23:34-35), Jehoiakim, like other local rulers in the area, faced the choice of maintaining loyalty to Egypt or capitulating to the new Babylonian emperor. The biblical materials give the impression of a tense and divisive situation in Judah, and Jeremiah in particular depicts this reign as marked by misguided policies and unjust practices (e.g., Jer 22:13-19; 26:1-24). The book of Habakkuk also preserves some of the angst present in Judah at the time. The decisive moment seems to have come in 604 BC, when, the Babylonian Chronicles report, Nebuchadnezzar destroyed the coastal city of Ashkelon (see Grayson 1975, 100). Archaeological evidence not only confirms this report but also attests to further destructions at other Philistine cities. These Babylonian successes likely provided the impetus for Jehoiakim to switch his loyalty to the Babylonians, though surely not without significant reservation (note the fast in Jerusalem in Jer 36:9) (Arnold, 92-93; Vanderhooft, 90-99).

Only a few years later, however, the Babylonians apparently made the fateful decision that they could not allow Egypt to remain autonomous. Hence, late in 601 BC Nebuchadnezzar invaded Egypt. The Babylonian Chronicles, in their characteristically unbiased style, reported that the Babylonians were repelled, and Nebuchadnezzar returned to Babylon for the duration of the following year (see Grayson 1975, 101). This defeat allowed Pharaoh Neco II to advance northward into Syria-Palestine, possibly conquering Gaza (see Jer 47:1). Babylonia's perceived weakness, along with Egypt's apparent resurgence, seemingly led Jehoiakim of Judah to enter into open rebellion against Nebuchadnezzar sometime around 600 BC (see 2 Kings 24:1).

4.2. The Fall of Judah: The Reigns of Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin and Zedekiah (601-586 BC). The precise course of events in Judah following Nebuchadnezzar's defeat in Egypt in 601 BC is difficult to establish. The account in 2 Kings 24 is highly telescoped, but various passages set in the time of Jehoiakim in the book of Jeremiah may provide a somewhat fuller picture (e.g., Jer 22:13-23; 25; 26; 35). Throughout these texts, Jeremiah is a forceful advocate for submission to the Babylonians, casting rebellion as an act of disobedience to the divine will. The Babylonian response to the rebellion in the west began in late November or early December 598 BC, when Nebuchadnezzar led the main army out of Akkad toward the specific target of Jerusalem. Although no details of this campaign are known, 2 Kings 24:2 states that forces from the Chaldeans, Arameans, Moabites and Ammonites, perhaps auxiliary forces in the service of Nebuchadnezzar, moved against Judean territory. Collections of Hebrew ostraca discovered at the fortified Judean city of Arad preserve correspondence that may be related to Judean military preparations and allude to Edomite advances into the Negeb at this time (see Obadiah).

Differing biblical traditions exist concerning the fate of Jehoiakim (cf. 2 Kings 24:6; 2 Chron 36:6), but it seems likely that he died in office before Nebuchadnezzar's forces arrived in Jerusalem. Both biblical and extrabiblical accounts suggest that Jehoiakim's eighteen-year-old son, Jehoiachin, inherited his father's royal throne and ill-advised rebellion (2 Kings 24:6-8). The combined evidence fits a scenario in which Jehoiachin surrendered without a battle when Nebuchadnezzar finally reached Jerusalem (see 2 Kings 24:12). The Babylonian Chronicle for the year in question preserves the precise date of Jerusalem's capture as March 15/16, 597 BC (see Grayson 1975, 102). Perhaps because Jehoiachin was not personally responsible for the revolt and offered immediate submission, Nebuchadnezzar did not destroy Jerusalem or provincialize Judah on this occasion. Rather, he exiled Jehoiachin and deported members of the royal family, aristocracy, soldiers, artisans and religious leaders, including the priest-turned-prophet Ezekiel (see Ezek 1:1-3). The precise number of deportees, as well as its relationship to the size of the population as a whole, remain unclear. Yet, probably in an effort to maintain stability in a region so near to the troublesome Egyptians, Nebuchadnezzar left Jerusalem's ruling dynasty intact by installing Zedekiah, Jehoiachin's twenty-one-year-old uncle, on the throne as a Babylonian vassal.

The limited sources for Zedekiah's reign render precise historical reconstruction difficult. The Babylonian Chronicles are not extant for these years, and archaeological data remains mostly indirect. The primary biblical account in 2 Kings 24—25 (cf. Jer 39; 52) skips from the beginning to the end of Zedekiah's reign and narrates only the final stages of the events, with a focus limited to Jerusalem. Other biblical materials, however, provide more potential information, especially the books of Jeremiah, who is pictured as preaching in Jerusalem and interacting with Zedekiah in various ways, and Ezekiel, who is portrayed as one of the exiles deported from Jerusalem in 597 BC. Both prophets consistently advocate submission to the Babylonians, and Jeremiah's royal encounters in particular (Jer 37—44) show the conflict among multiple factions and perspectives (pro-Babylonian, anti-Babylonian) in Jerusalem at the time (Cogan 1998, 262).

Based almost entirely on the biblical depictions, most historians conclude that Zedekiah initiated a rebellion against Babylonia in conjunction with an Egyptian resurgence in the late 590s BC (see Miller and Hayes, 473; Provan, Long and Longman, 279-80). Zedekiah apparently hosted a council in Jerusalem with officials from Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre and Sidon in order to coordinate a regional revolt against Babylonia, an event known only from Jeremiah 27:3. The exact timing of the council remains debated (cf. Miller and Hayes, 469; Soggin, 250), but this initial revolt evidently never materialized. Perhaps the reference in Jeremiah 51:59 to Zedekiah's being compelled to appear before Nebuchadnezzar in Babylon reflects the emperor's response to this initial sedition. Whatever the case, in 592 BC the new Pharaoh Psammetichus II (595-589 BC), who had succeeded Neco II shortly after Zedekiah came to the throne, won a decisive victory over Nubia (Ethiopia) and subsequently embarked on a victory tour of Syria-Palestine, an event recorded in an Egyptian priestly composition (Rylands IX Papyrus) (see Grabbe 2007, 209). Possibly inspired by this Egyptian resurgence, Zedekiah withheld annual tribute and entered into open rebellion against Babylonia in the late 590s or early 580s BC.

Both biblical and extrabiblical texts offer snapshots of discrete events in the course of what happened next. Hebrew ostraca, for instance, note that a Judean royal official was dispatched to Egypt, likely to negotiate for support. Perhaps more significantly, the totality of evidence for Babylonian actions over the following years suggests that the resurgent Egyptian threat and the quickly renewed western rebellion led Nebuchadnezzar to alter his earlier policy of maintaining stability in the region, which had resulted in the survival of Jerusalem and the Davidic dynasty after Jehoiachin's surrender in 597 BC. Nebuchadnezzar apparently decided henceforth to deal with rebellious vassals by removing the current ruling line, relocating the kingdom's capital city, and ruling the territory more directly (see Lipschits). Thus, in the late fall of 589 BC Nebuchadnezzar set out for Jerusalem, soon placing the city under an extended siege. As part of this campaign, the Babylonians inflicted serious devastation on a number of Judean towns. Messages on ostraca from the fortified city of Lachish, for example, most likely testify to the soldiers' inability to receive communications from another town that has presumably fallen (COS 3.42:78-81; see Jer 34:6-7). Some evidence also points to Edom's aggression against Judean territory, especially in the area of the southern Negeb desert (see the condemnations of Edom in Obad and Ps 137:7). At some point during the siege of Jerusalem, the Babylonian army temporarily withdrew to turn back an Egyptian force that had entered Syria-Palestine under the new Pharaoh Apries (Hophra) (589-570 BC) (see Jer 37:1-10) and thereafter reconstituted the siege.

Biblical texts indicate that the siege of Jerusalem that had begun in January 587 BC concluded eighteen months later in July 586 BC, although the lack of a surviving Babylonian Chronicle makes these dates imprecise, perhaps off by as much as a year (Arnold, 95). In any case, the biblical texts (2 Kings 25; Jer 39; 52) recount that Zedekiah and a military escort attempted to flee toward the Transjordan but were captured and brought to Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah. There, perhaps in keeping with the stipulated punishments of his vassal treaty, Zedekiah's sons were executed, his eyes were put out, and he was deported to Babylonia in chains. One month after the city's capture, Nebuzaradan, captain of the Babylonian royal guard, razed Jerusalem, burning the temple, palace and houses, dismantling the city's walls (see Jer 39:9-10; 52:12-26), and exiling a significant number of the population to Babylonia.

4.3. Judah under Gedaliah and the Babylonian Exile (586-539 BC). Immediately after, or perhaps even during, the siege of Jerusalem, the Babylonians established a new administrative capital for Judah at Mizpah and placed Gedaliah, a non-Davidic royal official, in authority there (2 Kings 25:22-26; Jer 40:5—41:3). These events provide the background for some of the final stories about the prophet Jeremiah (Jer 39:11—43:13), but only indirect evidence from a few seals and archaeological data from the city of Mizpah are available for comparison. The available evidence suggests a few things clearly: (1) the Babylonians reorganized the government of Judah by removing the Davidic family from power and relocating the administrative capital; (2) Gedaliah governed alongside a Babylonian garrison stationed in Mizpah and gathered remaining Judeans around himself for a time; (3) Gedaliah subsequently was assassinated by Ishmael, a member of the Davidic family, perhaps with the support of the Ammonites, and his government collapsed; (4) after the assassination, army officers from Mizpah took a number of Judeans, including the prophet Jeremiah, and fled to Egypt because they feared Babylonian reprisals. Beyond this general course of events, however, much remains uncertain. Scholars debate Gedaliah's exact status as a ruler—whether he was installed as a non-Davidic king of what was still considered to be a semi-independent vassal kingdom, or merely as a governor of a directly ruled imperial province (cf. Soggin, 255; Miller and Hayes, 483). Also uncertain is the timing of Gedaliah's assassination depicted in the biblical texts (2 Kings 25:25; Jer 41:2-3), which provide the month but not the year of the event (e.g., Jer 52:30 mentions a third Babylonian deportation from Judah in Nebuchadnezzar's twenty-third year [581 BC]) (see Cogan 1998, 268; Miller and Hayes, 486).

In any event, the end of Gedaliah's government in Mizpah marked the beginning of what has come to be known as the "exilic period" (c. 586-539 BC). Other than the brief reference to the first capture of Jerusalem (597 BC) in the Babylonian Chronicles, only the biblical texts offer information on the number of Judean exiles, and these sources do not agree in the numbers that they provide. The book of 2 Kings, for instance, mentions two deportations, with several numbers of deportees whose referents are not clear: (1) a deportation of ten thousand or more people in Nebuchadnezzar's eighth year (597 bc) (2 Kings 24:12, 14-16); (2) a deportation of an unspecified number in Nebuchadnezzar's nineteenth year (586 bc) (2 Kings 25:8, 11). The book of Jeremiah reports three deportations, featuring different numbers and dates (cf. Jer 52:28, 29, 30). Historians offer a variety of interpretations of this data, often harmonizing the figures or assuming some exaggeration, but the conflicting data resists any firm conclusions on the number of deportations and deportees (see Albertz, 74-80; Miller and Hayes, 478-97).

Whatever the number, historians typically have focused on the nature and conditions of life in exile for those who were deported to Babylonia, although other deportations resulted in Judean exiles also living in places such as Egypt (see Jer 43—44 and, later, the Elephantine texts). Historians mostly have proceeded by combining biblical, especially prophetic, texts (e.g., Is 40—55; Jer 29; Ezek 1-24) with indirect extrabiblical references, relying heavily on analogy, inference and extrapolation. Several cuneiform sources, such as records prescribing rations for King Jehoiachin and his sons, tablets mentioning a "city of Judah" near Babylon, and later texts from the Nippur area associated with the Murashu business firm—receipts from a mid-fifth century bc business firm's real estate and commercial activities that refer to the participation of persons with Jewish names (ANET 308; Cardascia; Stolper)—have generated the common interpretation that the deported Judeans did not experience undue subjugation or persecution but rather maintained their basic communal identity and had a reasonable level of participation in the social and economic life of the empire. In this view, the group of Babylonian exiles numbered in the tens of thousands, and the majority settled in dilapidated areas as a type of somewhat free immigrant community of land tenants (see Albertz, 99-101; Cogan 1998, 270). In the last two decades, however, new evaluations of the evidence and new constructions of life among the Babylonian exiles have emerged (see Smith-Christopher; Moore and Kelle). These reconsiderations stress that most of the data used to support the common interpretation is only indirect, limited or geographically and chronologically removed from the Babylonian deportees. By examining biblical references to suffering and bondage (e.g., Is 40—55; Lamentations) and, especially, by employing insights from sociological, anthropological and psychological studies of refugees and displaced populations, some recent interpreters conclude that the Judean experience of exile was a severe and traumatic personal, social and psychological event, constituting a crisis that forced the deportees into destabilizing recalibrations of their communal and theological understandings, some of which are reflected in the prophetic texts such as Ezekiel and Isaiah 40—55 (see Kelle 2009).

The constitution and character of life in the land of Judah after 586 bc has also received attention in recent years and presently affords no consensus. The most directly relevant OT texts (2 Kings 25:8-9; 2 Chron 36:17-21; Jer 52:12-34) claim that the Babylonians essentially emptied the land of all but a meager group of the poorest inhabitants, thus implying that all significant elements of Judean life shifted to Babylonia. The majority of scholarly treatments before the 1990s (see Bright, 344; Soggin, 92), as well as some more recent ones (e.g., Stern 2001), supplemented this biblical picture with archaeological evidence of destruction at major urban centers (Lachish, Azekah, Ramet Rahel) and posited that although the territory of Judah was surely not devoid of all inhabitants and towns, Judah suffered a high degree of devastation that left a sixth-century bc gap in meaningful social, cultural and political activity. This gap left the area and its people without any significance for the future development of Judah's life and faith. In recent years, however, several interpreters have revisited the archaeological data in particular and proposed a different reconstruction with several elements (see Barstad; Lipschits): (1) the Babylonian destruction in Judah was limited to certain major urban centers (especially Jerusalem and its environs), while other areas were less, if at all, affected (especially Mizpah and its environs); (2) the deportees constituted only a small group of political and social elites, and the majority of the population remained in the land, especially in the areas north of Jerusalem and the Judean hills; (3) cultural, societal and religious activity continued in Judah, with substantial continuity to what was there before 586 bc. These conclusions rest primarily upon new interpretations of the archaeological data for levels of continued occupation and settlement patterns, especially surface surveys and demographic studies. Overall, the ongoing investigation of life in Judah after 586 BC is a lively archaeological debate, with archaeologists offering different interpretations of the same evidence.

5. The Persian Period (539-333 BC).

The period of Persian dominance over the ancient Near East between the mid-sixth and late fourth centuries BC forms the ostensible backdrop for the prophetic materials of *Isaiah 40–66, *Haggai, *Zechariah and *Malachi, perhaps also being the time of origin for the books of *Joel and *Jonah. In terms of the biblical presentation, this era signals the end of the Babylonian exile by relating the return of various members of the exilic community, the rebuilding of the temple and city in Jerusalem, and the establishment of the Persian province of Yehud in part of the former territory of the kingdom of Judah. The biblical depiction, however, leaves much untold, as significant Jewish communities continued to exist in places such as Babylonia and Egypt throughout the remainder of the Persian and Hellenistic periods (see Kessler, 151-52).

In addition to the biblical books of Ezra, Nehemiah, Haggai and Zechariah, archaeology and social-science modeling have helped flesh out the overall picture of these centuries. Still, the nature of the available sources constitutes a particularly complex issue for this period, and current scholarly approaches remain in flux (see Moore and Kelle). The biblical texts likely preserve some accurate information about the postexilic era, but they offer detailed data about only a limited group of people (the immigrants to Jerusalem from Babylonia) and a narrow geographical area (Jerusalem and its immediate environs). Moreover, the biblical texts relate only to a few years scattered throughout the period (c. 520-450 BC) and only in an episodic fashion, with a sometimes unclear chronology. A number of unanswered questions about the biblical sources, including when the books of Ezra and Nehemiah were compiled, what sources their authors used, and how reliable those sources were, further complicate the issue (see Briant; Grabbe 2004). Extrabiblical texts related to events in Judah are rare, and archaeological evidence from the Persian period is just beginning to come to light in significant ways, although the majority of what has been uncovered and analyzed does not come from the area of Judah. Hence, even archaeological evidence for matters such as the size and population of Jerusalem during these years remains heavily contested.

5.1. The Rise of Persia Before 539 BC. The OT Prophetic Books contain no voices that relate explicitly to the time between the final visions of Ezekiel (c. 571 BC) and the poetry of Isaiah 40–55 (c. 539 BC), the era that marked the transition from Babylonian to Persian power. Very little is known of Persian history before 550 BC, when the small Indo-European kingdom in the area of ancient Susa began expanding under Cyrus II (the Great) (see Leith). After winning victories over the Medes and Lydians, the Persians moved against the Babylonians. The Babylonian emperor at the time was Nabonidus (556-539 BC), a usurper whose reign was characterized by internal strife. For reasons that are not fully known, Nabonidus installed his son Belshazzar as regent in Babylon three years after his accession and led the army into northwest Arabia, where he stayed for ten years at Teima, five hundred miles from Babylon (Arnold, 101-3). These actions may have been religiously motivated, as Nabonidus sponsored the worship of the moon-god, Sin, who had a cult center in the Syrian city of Haran and whose worship put the emperor at odds with the dominant cult of the god Marduk in Babylon (Cogan 1998, 273). Alternatively, Nabonidus's sojourn may have been strategic, perhaps an attempt to establish a control base for the Arabian caravan routes (see Arnold, 103). Whatever the case, extrabiblical texts (e.g., the Prayer of Nabonidus, found among the DSS) indicate that legends grew up around the emperor casting his actions as the result of a madness brought upon him by divine means. The stories of Nebuchadnezzar's madness and exile in Daniel 4, whose broader context also contains a reference to Belshazzar's rule in Babylon (Dan 5:1), are considered by most scholars to be adaptations of the traditions originally associated with Nabonidus (see Collins, 216-21).

Nabonidus's extended absence from his capital city and royal duties eroded Babylonian power abroad and led to unrest at home. In 539 BC, the Babylonian Chronicles record that the Persians defeated the Babylonian army in Opis, and that Cyrus subsequently gained control of the city of Babylon without a fight. The OT prophetic texts preserve positive evaluations of Cyrus and these accomplishments. The collection of poems in Isaiah 40–55, for example, which reflects the circumstances around 539 BC, describes Cyrus as Yahweh’s “anointed” (lit., “messiah” [Is 45:1]), whom Yahweh will use to bring about a deliverance from exile in the vein of a second exodus (e.g., Is 43:1-13). Over the next two centuries, the textual and archaeological data reveal a significant distinction relevant to Judah and the Judeans between the early and later Persian periods, known as the Persian I (c. 539-450 BC) and Persian II (c. 450-333 BC) periods (see Carter). Prior to the mid-fifth century BC, Persian emperors such as Darius remained focused on the north and west and paid little attention to the area of Syria-Palestine. The postexilic prophetic books about whose dating we can be reasonably certain relate only to the early Persian period: Isaiah 40–55 reflects the beginning of Persian rule in 539 BC, Haggai, Zechariah and Isaiah 56–66 relate to the time around the rebuilding of the temple in 520-515 BC, and Malachi likely dates to the situation in Jerusalem around 500 BC. Important material development and strategic significance came to the area of Syria-Palestine only in the Persian II period (c. 450 BC; i.e., the time of the biblical figures of Ezra and Nehemiah), when there is evidence for the establishment of new political and social structures and an increase in building projects and seal and coin production. The population of Jerusalem before 450 BC, for instance, likely consisted of only about five hundred people, but this number seems to have grown to more than one thousand in the following years (note the prophetic calls to repopulate Jerusalem in the late 500s BC [e.g., Zech 8:4-8]) (Leith, 289-90).

5.2. The Early Persian Period (539-450 BC).

During the time between Cyrus’s capture of Babylon in 539 BC and the completion of the Jerusalem temple in 515 BC, Judah existed as a subprovince called “Yehud” in the fifth satrapy of the Persian Empire, called “Abar Nahara” (“Across the River”), which consisted of Syria-Palestine and Cyprus (Leith, 286). Few details of Persian administration are known, however, and the question of how Yehud related to the subprovince of Samaria, ruled by several generations of the Sanballat family, remains debated (see Grabbe 1992, 2004; Briant). Additionally, although scholars disagree over the precise borders of Yehud at various times in the Persian period, the evidence from lists in the biblical texts (e.g., Ezra 2:1-63; Neh 3:2-32; 7:5-65; 12:1-26) and Judean seals and coins points to a much smaller community around Jerusalem than in the Assyrian and Babylonian periods (see Carter; Lipschits). From the sociohistorical perspective, postexilic Yehud also differed from its preexilic predecessors. The Persians deviated from the deportation policies of the Assyrians and Babylonians, granting limited autonomy to their provinces, allowing formerly deported populations to return home, and possibly supporting the revitalization of local religious temples and practices. For Yehud, an area located on the fringes of Persian territory and attention (at least prior to c. 450 BC), these developments produced a “provincial society” characterized by some sense of restoration and religious identity but also by a lack of full autonomy under the constraints of imperial governors, taxation requirements and difficult economic conditions (Kessler, 153-55).

In keeping with these general characteristics, the biblical texts (2 Chron 36:22-23; Ezra 1:1-4; 6:3-5) identify the beginning of the return from exile with Cyrus’s decree that Yahweh had commissioned him to let the Judean exiles return to Jerusalem and rebuild the temple. The Rassam Cylinder (or Cyrus Cylinder) (ANET 316; COS 2.1214:314-16), a cuneiform inscription in which Cyrus describes his similar allowances for Babylonians and the worship of the god Marduk, has traditionally been understood as indicating that such actions were not a special favor bestowed upon the Jews but rather are representative of Persian policies more generally. In recent years scholars have more adequately assessed these policies not as indicators of the benevolence of the Persian emperors but as means to create loyal vassals and reestablish areas of the empire as sources for economic and material goods (see Hoglund). Even so, questions concerning the details and extent of the return to Jerusalem remain vexed (see Miller and Hayes, 511). Ezra 2 and Nehemiah 7 claim to present lists of returnees, with the former naming about fifty thousand persons, but doubts remain regarding how many waves of return are included, the times from which the lists come, and the level of their authenticity. The initial return was likely small, and the relevant biblical texts as a whole give the impression of a return that unfolded in several phases, with different leaders at different times.

Ezra 1 and Ezra 5 attribute the first phase of the return to Sheshbazzar, a Persian-appointed governor, in 538 BC. This phase accomplished the laying of the new temple's foundation (but cf. Ezra 3:10). The work, however, apparently stopped, a circumstance that the OT attributes to opposition from the local population who had remained in the land throughout the sixth century BC (Ezra 4—5) (see Leith, 277-98). From the perspective of the biblical texts, the conflict was primarily about defining the identity of the true community of Israel, with texts such as Ezra and Nehemiah later making the ethnically exclusive argument that only the returnees constitute the legitimate Jewish community (see the conflict over mixed marriages in Ezra 10; Neh 13). From a broader perspective, conflict among groups in Yehud likely included economic and political struggles over control of Jerusalem, with its temple and resources. Earlier scholarly proposals to define postexilic Yehud specifically as a "citizen-temple community" in which a restricted group of privileged citizens formed a closed community around the temple (Weinberg) have not found continued support, but these political and economic aspects certainly supplement the religious factors emphasized by the biblical sources (Kessler, 135).

According to the biblical texts, the work stoppage on the temple's construction provided the context for the next phase of return (Ezra 3—6) and the preaching of the prophets Haggai and Zechariah (c. 520 BC). Scholars traditionally have reconstructed this phase as taking place under the leadership of Zerubbabel, a Persian-appointed governor apparently from the Davidic line (but see Miller and Hayes, 518), and Joshua, the high priest who governed Yehud as a "diarchy" of cooperative political and religious authority (see Zech 4:6b-10a; 6:9-15) (Kessler, 140-41). The traditional notion of such a diarchy, however, has been challenged more recently (see Boda; Rooke). Haggai and Zechariah proclaimed Yahweh's involvement with Zerubbabel and Joshua and attempted to convince the people of the divine calling to finish the work on the temple. This era corre-

